Ernest Bloch has proved a clever researcher among such themes, making an undeniably variegated and well organized patchwork quilt which would grace any musical antiquarian's collection. His use of Indian motives is to the barbaric, blazing crudeness of their native charm as the generally accepted "Indian" words "wigwam" and "Great Spirit," ect., are to the real, guttural Indian languages. In the second movement, dedicated to the Civil War period, one never felt the primitive passions and power of the bitterest of conflicts that our country has ever known; one only glimpsed them dimly down the vague corridors of funereal dirges and looked instinctively for a silver screen "Birth of a Nation" to vivify them. The Southern tunes and, in the third movement, the jazz tunes had moments when they seemed perilously close to the better motion picture orchestra's medleys, even though they wore noticeably authentic symphonic cut of garments. There were moments when, even with the score before one, the mind of one listener at least would wander wearily.

After all, American spirit is essentially energetic optimism, with sparkle and snap in rhythms. This rhapsody seemed to lack such qualities. It was frequently minor-keyed and pessimistic. In spite of all its contrapuntal adroitness in sorting a "Message" out of a medley, it distinctly had its dreary moments. This clearly was not due to conductor or orchestra.

Preceding the epic rhapsody yesterday was Ravel's delightfully clever orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," which has not been heard here for some time. It is amusing and fascinating music, definitely programmatic with the subtle delineation of the conversation between two Jews one of the best limning in music of human characters ever written. It was excellently performed.

H. F.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
MAR 3 - 1929

* * *

POLI'S—

Boston Symphony

ONE of the musical highlights of Inauguration Week will be the final 1928-29 concert in Washington of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Poli's Theater, Wednesday afternoon, at 4:30 o'clock, which closes the Philharmonic Course of afternoon concerts presented by Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

Mr. Koussevitzky will present for the first time in this city, Ernest Bloch's epic rhapsody, "America," which was unanimously selected by a jury of five famous conductors, including Mr. Koussevitzky, as the prize-winning entry in Musical America's contest. The anthem, which constitutes an outstanding feature of Bloch's composition, will be sung by a chorus of 125 Washington singers.

Bloch's first number, based upon Indian tribal melodies and Puritan hymns, depicts the life of the early white settlers in America. The second movement describes the Old South, suddenly broken by the tragic measures of the outbreak of war. The third movement, "The Present—the Future," opens with a depiction of our own age of riotous jazz and pounding machinery.

Another interesting feature of this concert will be Koussevitzky's introduction of Moussorgsky's humorous suite of piano pieces by Maurice Ravel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASH., D. C.
STAR
MAR 3 - 1929

BOSTON ORCHESTRA—Wednesday.

One of the outstanding musical events of inauguration week in Washington will be the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Poli's Theater Wednesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

Mr. Koussevitzky will present for the first time in Washington Ernest Bloch's prize-winning symphony, "America," which Mr. Koussevitzky, with four other distinguished American conductors, unanimously selected in Musical America's prize contest. The anthem which constitutes the climax of "America" will be sung by a mixed choir of 125 Washington singers, the National Capital Oratorio Association, Dr. Harned, conductor.

The program also will include Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," orchestrated especially for the Boston Symphony by Maurice Ravel, which has been a feature of Mr. Koussevitzky's concerts in Boston and New York.

Seats are on sale at the concert bureau in Droop's, 1300 G street northwest.

WASH., D. C.
POST
MAR 3 - 1929

IN ITS THEME, EPIC RHAPSODY LAUDS AMERICA

"America," Ernest Bloch's "Epic Rhapsody," the new prize-winning composition which has been played all over the United States with great success, will be brought to Washington by Serge Koussevitzky, when the Russian conductor comes here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to give his second concert of the season in Poli's Theater on Wednesday afternoon, March 6. The performance of "America" will thus fittingly take place just after the inauguration. Koussevitzky was one of the five awarding judges in the contest in which the score won. The piece was played simultaneously in five cities last December.

Bloch divides his rhapsody into three parts, the first depicting the America of the Indians and early Puritan settlers. The second movement portrays the old South, with its gay romance and the tragedy and sorrow brought by the Civil War. The last movement, entitled "The Present—The Future," sets forth our own jazz age and thence builds up hopes of a more ideal future. The climax of the composition, magnificently prepared, is a hymn to America, in which the composer affirms his faith in the greatness and idealism of this, his adopted country. The culminating hymn will be sung by a mixed chorus of Washington, trained by Albert W. Harned.

One other score stands upon Koussevitzky's program—Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," which has been arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel. Moussorgsky's score is a vivid and descriptive piano concerto, in which he characterizes a series of pictures in an exhibition by his artist friend, Hartmann. This suite has been orcheatrated by three different composers but Ravel's arrangement, needless to say, is far superior to the others.

Koussevitzky has introduced this score to Europe and America.

This concert will bring to a close the Philharmonic Course of afternoon concerts presented by Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
MAR 3 - 1929

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN

Special interest attaches to each of the three numbers on the program of the coming Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, which will be the last visit but one of Boston's Orchestra in Brooklyn this season.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the program with a little symphony by Frederick the Great, which this conductor gave its first American performance in Boston last Friday and Saturday. The eighteenth century king, known in history to have been a skilled flutist, writes two flute parts into this score, giving them prominence in the slow movement. This symphony was revived in Berlin last May, and it is also being played by Koussevitsky in New York.

As soloist of the evening, Richard Burgin, the talented young Russian concertmaster of the orchestra, will appear in the Violin Concerto of Sibelius, the Finnish composer. Burgin is well known by his appearance as soloist, also by his recitals and the string quartet which bears his name.

The concert will close with Tschaikowsky's Symphony in E Minor, No. 5, which Koussevitsky is considered to give one of his finest and most moving interpretations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
MAR 3 - 1929

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra pay their last visit but one to New York this season in the coming week. On the first of his three programs here the Russian leader has put Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exposition" in an arrangement made for Koussevitzky in Paris by Maurice Ravel. Next Thursday's concert in Carnegie Hall opens with a suite for strings, Op. 63, by the American composer Arthur Foote.

Sibelius's Third Symphony, to be heard Saturday afternoon, was once performed in New York, on Jan. 16, 1908, by the former Russian Symphony Orchestra under Modest Altschuler. Two of Koussevitzky's predecessors announced the work, but left it unperformed until he revived it on Nov. 9 last and thrice since in Boston. Another matinee "novelty" is a symphony credited to Frederick the Great.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph
MAR 3 -1929

FREDERICH THE FIRST, King of Prussia, was a composer. His Third Symphony will be given its first New York hearing on Saturday.

At that time it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, who will also revive the Second Symphony of Sibylius and Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustia." The last named will have previously been played Thursday, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its fourth visit and last but one of the season to New York. On Thursday's program Serge Koussevitzky has put Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition"—the suite of descriptive piano pieces which have been arranged for orchestra especially for this conductor by Maurice Ravel. He will also play the Suite for String Orchestra in E minor by Arthur Foote, the American composer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
MAR 4 - 1929

In a leaflet inclosed in the program books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra recently, [illegible] director, Serge Koussevitsky, invited subscriptions for a monument to Claude Debussy which is being projected in France, and suggested that if everyone would give 25 cents the result would be gratifying. Next week the appeal was repeated, but the two-bit reference had been blue penciled. The phrase was changed to "a contribution, however small."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
MAR [illegible] 1929

BOSTONIAN

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Sympyony, at Poli's Wednesday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO
CALL
MAR 5 - 1929

Bloch's 'America' Featured Tonight At Hoover Recital

Two great Californians, Herbert Hoover and Ernest Bloch, will be honored simultaneously tonight at the traditional inaugural concert to be held in Washington, D. C.

Bloch received word from Washington today that the epic rhapsody, "America," prize winning symphony composition, has been chosen as the work to be played at the concert tonight.

O. Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will lead the orchestra playing "America."

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
MAR [illegible]

WASHINGTON SOCIETY

Washington, D. C., March 6.—[Special.]—Mrs. Hoover made her first public appearance as first lady of the land this afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra. She had with her the President's sister, Mrs. Leavitt, of California; her uncle, Maj. W. D. Henry of North Dakota; her sister, Mrs. Large, and the latter's daughter, Miss Janet Large.

Mrs. Hoover wore black, a dress of black velvet and black hat, with a coat of black broadtail lamb trimmed with sable. A secret service man escorted the party to their box and returned for them during the last number on the program.

The President's wife has appointed Miss Mary Randolph, who was secretary to Mrs. Coolidge, as her social secretary with two aides, Miss Ruth Fessler, who accompanied her on the Hoover trip to Latin American countries, and Mildred Hall, both graduates of Stanford university.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
EVE. SUN
MAR 6 - 1929

MUSIC

By F. W. Strehlau.

Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony Features Last Concert Of Season By Boston Orchestra Under Baton Of Serge Koussevitzky — Two Other Works Given

THE Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 5, in E minor, opus 64, is perhaps the most self-revealing of all this composer's works. In it the great Russian, so reticent at other times and in the spoken word, discloses all of his longing, his passion, his despair, his exaltation, his hopes, his gayety verging on gloom, his almost hysterical ebullience. The symphony, in a way, is autobiographical.

Its poignance, its nobility, its restlessness, its richness of tonal coloring, its beauty were painted last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky with bold strokes and with a broad sweep that voiced to the full the surcharged emotions which have been put into the work.

Always an arresting interpreter of Russian music, Koussevitzky perhaps surpassed himself in depicting the intensity of this close-knit Fifth, drawing a picture that moved the audience to a demonstration. In the presentation of this music he is probably unapproached and in it he attains his highest eloquence. It was an inspiring feature of the farewell visit of the Bostonians for this season and made an impression that will linger long in the memory. It was notable for various things apart from the massed effect, among them the mellifluous horn notes in the andante.

There were other things in the concert to hold the attention closely, one of these being the introductory number, the Symphony in D major No. 3, by Frederick the Great, King of Prussia, for small orchestra. It is generally known that this royal personage busied himself with various things besides statecraft, that he composed extensively and also played the flute with skill. In this work he has given expression to his fondness for the instrument by including a two-flute slow movement. The piece is very simple in its structure and carries swinging melodies, though it lacks Mozartian grace and is not at all spiritual in its essence. It was played with smoothness and a careful preservation of its atmosphere.

As for the Sibelius Symphony No. 3, opus 52, the only other number, its reiterations might give a sense of monotony but for its peculiar idiomatic structure, its unusual progressions, its use of an irregular figure to produce quaint rhythms and its employment of what might be called folk tunes. It carries a forceful suggestion of forests and lakes and of northern psychology, and there is about it a persistency of utterance that does not let one wander. The opening is striking with its unison passages.

Above all, the work is not somber, but [illegible] wistful, especially in the

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
MAR 6 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitsky Conducts Unusual Program Of Three Symphonies, By Frederick The Great, Sibelius And Tschaikowsky

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its final concert of the season last night at the Lyric Theater, with Serge Koussevitsky conducting. As a program maker, Mr. Koussevitsky has achieved a reputation for the unusual and last night's was no exception, for three symphonies were presented, two of which never had been heard in Baltimore before.

In the first instance there was the Symphony in D major by Frederick the Great, who was a performer on the flute and a composer of no mean ability. He was an amateur in the real sense of the word, his love for music being so great that although his father considered its study effeminate and declined to allow [illegible], he studied in secret, engaging musical servants.

Not serious in content, his opus is courtly, gay music, typical of the period, very pleasant to hear and easy of comprehension and which the orchestra disposed of in a very happy and graceful fashion.

The music of Sibelius' Third Symphony was neither happy nor so easily disposed of. It is neither deliberately modern nor studiedly archaic, but has most characteristic manifestations. He uses the traditional symphonic form with which to hold his ideas together, which are short motives of a mosaic style with folk flavor. Meticulously written, there are times when the very thin orchestration seems sombre and spare.

After the Finnish music, the kaleidoscopic tonal hues of Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony provided a rich contrast. The masterly first movement—every note a telling one—the impassioned romance of the French horns in the second, the perfectly proportioned passages in the conversation between the oboe and the horn, the slow valse of the third—sorrowfully jesting in the Russian style—and the tremendous swirl of the finale were in direct contrast with the music which preceded it.

If any conductor can vitalize the contemporary works, it is Mr. Koussevitsky, and although he lavished much care and skill upon the Sibelius Symphony, bringing out with finesse the fine points of the opus—even that failed to make it wholly convincing music.

With Russian music Mr. Koussevitsky is unsurpassed. His native music, he brings to it a sympathetic insight and grasp of the inner meaning which revivifies and gives it new life.

W. P. H.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASH., D. C.
STAR
MAR 7 - 1929

123

MUSIC

ERNEST BLOCH'S "AMERICA."

That admirable organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, who has many friends and ad[illegible] Washington, made its second and final appearance of the season at Poli's Theater, yesterday afternoon, when the feature was the local premiere of Ernest Bloch's prize-winning epic rhapsody, "America."

A large audience, led by Mrs. Herbert Hoover in the presidential box, showed unusually alert anticipation of the epic rhapsody. In fact, so anxious had a group of sincere Washington music lovers become to hear this prize-winning work that, when they found it was liable to be canceled due to the extra cost of erecting a platform for the 125 singers in Dr. Albert Harned's National Capital Oratorio Association chorus they went into their own pockets and raised the amount. It was a highly laudable gesture, and it is to be hoped that they felt the result merited the expense. Certainly no fault could be found with the work of the chorus. The majority of Mr. Bloch's very common-place phrases were clearly audible, with admirable enunciation and tone. There seemed no room for worry about the life of "The Star Spangled Banner" being threatened by this rather banal verse and its setting.

As for the epic rhapsody as a whole, one felt a decided gratification to hear a work considered sufficiently important for five famous conductors to have awarded it the first prize of $3,000 and to have burst forth practically simultaneously with first performances of it by their respective orchestras. Mr. Koussevitzky was one of the five. Ordinarily, but for the interest and initiative of the above-mentioned music lovers, Washington, in the natural course of indifferent events, would not have heard this work, which the whole country is animatedly discussing—except perhaps via radio—for several seasons to come, perhaps never.

It was Reginald de Koven, an American born in Middletown, Conn., who had a song in his popular work, "Robin Hood," entitled "It Takes Nine Tailors to Make a Man." Similarly, it would seem that it takes more than a dozen years to make an American composer. Superficially and even patriotically, perhaps that length of time is sufficient. But not spiritually or emotionally. Mr. Bloch's sincerity and industry are quite as unquestioned as his European point of view. He obviously loves his adopted land and is intrigued by its folk tunes, an accumulated assortment of a trio of racial backgrounds, and also by the ballads of Stephen Collins Foster, America's greatest song writer.

Ernest Bloch has proved a clever researcher among such themes, making an undeniably variegated and well organized patchwork quilt which would grace any musical antiquarian's collection. His use of Indian motives is to the barbaric, blazing crudeness of their native charm as the generally accepted "Indian" words "wigwam" and "Great Spirit," ect., are to the real, guttural Indian languages. In the second movement, dedicated to the Civil War period, one never felt the primitive passions and power of the bitterest of conflicts that our country has ever known; one only glimpsed them dimly down the vague corridors of funereal dirges and looked instinctively for a silver screen "Birth of a Nation" to vivify them. The Southern tunes and, in the third movement, the jazz tunes had moments when they seemed perilously close to the better motion picture orchestra's medleys, even though they wore noticeably authentic symphonic cut of garments. There were moments when, even with the score before one, the mind of one listener at least would wander wearily.

After all, American spirit is essentially energetic optimism, with sparkle and snap in rhythms. This rhapsody seemed to lack such qualities. It was frequently minor-keyed and pessimistic. In spite of all its contrapuntal adroitness in sorting a "Message" out of a medley, it distinctly had its dreary moments. This clearly was not due to conductor or orchestra.

Preceding the epic rhapsody yesterday was Ravel's delightfully clever orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," which has not been heard here for some time. It is amusing and fascinating music, definitely programmatic with the subtle delineation of the conversation between two Jews one of the best limning in music of human characters ever written. It was excellently performed.

H. F.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
MAR 3 - 1929

* * *

POLI'S—

Boston Symphony

ONE of the musical highlights of Inauguration Week will be the final 1928-29 concert in Washington of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Poli's Theater, Wednesday afternoon, at 4:30 o'clock, which closes the Philharmonic Course of afternoon concerts presented by Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

Mr. Koussevitzky will present for the first time in this city, Ernest Bloch's epic rhapsody, "America," which was unanimously selected by a jury of five famous conductors, including Mr. Koussevitzky, as the prize-winning entry in Musical America's contest. The anthem, which constitutes an outstanding feature of Bloch's composition, will be sung by a chorus of 125 Washington singers.

Bloch's first number, based upon Indian tribal melodies and Puritan hymns, depicts the life of the early white settlers in America. The second movement describes the Old South, suddenly broken by the tragic measures of the outbreak of war. The third movement, "The Present—the Future," opens with a depiction of our own age of riotous jazz and pounding machinery.

Another interesting feature of this concert will be Koussevitzky's introduction of Moussorgsky's humorous suite of piano pieces by Maurice Ravel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
MAR 3 - 1929

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN

Special interest attaches to each of the three numbers on the program of the coming Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, which will be the last visit but one of Boston's Orchestra in Brooklyn this season.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the program with a little symphony by Frederick the Great, which this conductor gave its first American performance in Boston last Friday and Saturday. The eighteenth century king, known in history to have been a skilled flutist, writes two flute parts into this score, giving them prominence in the slow movement. This symphony was revived in Berlin last May, and it is also being played by Koussevitsky in New York.

As soloist of the evening, Richard Burgin, the talented young Russian concertmaster of the orchestra, will appear in the Violin Concerto of Sibelius, the Finnish composer. Burgin is well known by his appearance as soloist, also by his recitals and the string quartet which bears his name.

The concert will close with Tschaikowsky's Symphony in E Minor, No. 5, which Koussevitsky is considered to give one of his finest and most moving interpretations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
MAR 3 - 1929

BOSTONIAN

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Sympyony, at Poli's Wednesday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASH., D. C.
STAR
MAR 3 - 1929

BOSTON ORCHESTRA—Wednesday.

One of the outstanding musical events of inauguration week in Washington will be the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Poli's Theater Wednesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

Mr. Koussevitzky will present for the first time in Washington Ernest Bloch's prize-winning symphony, "America," which Mr. Koussevitzky, with four other distinguished American conductors, unanimously selected in Musical America's prize contest. The anthem which constitutes the climax of "America" will be sung by a mixed choir of 125 Washington singers, the National Capital Oratorio Association, Dr. Harned, conductor.

The program also will include Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," orchestrated especially for the Boston Symphony by Maurice Ravel, which has been a feature of Mr. Koussevitzky's concerts in Boston and New York.

Seats are on sale at the concert bureau in Droop's, 1300 G street northwest.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
MAR 3 - 1929

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra pay their last visit but one to New York this season in the coming week. On the first of his three programs here the Russian leader has put Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exposition" in an arrangement made for Koussevitzky in Paris by Maurice Ravel. Next Thursday's concert in Carnegie Hall opens with a suite for strings, Op. 63, by the American composer Arthur Foote.

Sibelius's Third Symphony, to be heard Saturday afternoon, was once performed in New York, on Jan. 16, 1908, by the former Russian Symphony Orchestra under Modest Altschuler. Two of Koussevitzky's predecessors announced the work, but left it unperformed until he revived it on Nov. 9 last and thrice since in Boston. Another matinee "novelty" is a symphony credited to Frederick the Great.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASH., D. C.
POST
MAR 3 - 1929

IN ITS THEME, EPIC RHAPSODY LAUDS AMERICA

"America," Ernest Bloch's "Epic Rhapsody," the new prize-winning composition which has been played all over the United States with great success, will be brought to Washington by Serge Koussevitzky, when the Russian conductor comes here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to give his second concert of the season in Poli's Theater on Wednesday afternoon, March 6. The performance of "America" will thus fittingly take place just after the inauguration. Koussevitzky was one of the five awarding judges in the contest in which the score won. The piece was played simultaneously in five cities last December.

Bloch divides his rhapsody into three parts, the first depicting the America of the Indians and early Puritan settlers. The second movement portrays the old South, with its gay romance and the tragedy and sorrow brought by the Civil War. The last movement, entitled "The Present—The Future," sets forth our own jazz age and thence builds up hopes of a more ideal future. The climax of the composition, magnificently prepared, is a hymn to America, in which the composer affirms his faith in the greatness and idealism of this, his adopted country. The culminating hymn will be sung by a mixed chorus of Washington, trained by Albert W. Harned.

One other score stands upon Koussevitzky's program—Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," which has been arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel. Moussorgsky's score is a vivid and descriptive piano concerto, in which he characterizes a series of pictures in an exhibition by his artist friend, Hartmann. This suite has been orchestrated by three different composers but Ravel's arrangement, needless to say, is far superior to the others.

Koussevitzky has introduced this score to Europe and America.

This concert will bring to a close the Philharmonic Course of afternoon concerts presented by Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph
MAR 3 -1929

FREDERICH THE FIRST, King of Prussia, was a composer. His Third Symphony will be given its first New York hearing on Saturday.

At that time it will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, who will also revive the Second Symphony of Sibylius and Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustia." The last named will have previously been played Thursday, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its fourth visit and last but one of the season to New York. On Thursday's program Serge Koussevitzky has put Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition"—the suite of descriptive piano pieces which have been arranged for orchestra especially for this conductor by Maurice Ravel. He will also play the Suite for String Orchestra in E minor by Arthur Foote, the American composer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
MAR 4 - 1929

In a leaflet inclosed in the program books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra recently, director Serge Koussevitsky, invited subscriptions for a monument to Claude Debussy which is being projected in France, and suggested that if everyone would give 25 cents the result would be gratifying. Next week the appeal was repeated, but the two-bit reference had been blue penciled. The phrase was changed to "a contribution, however small."

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
EVE. SUN
MAR 6 - 1929

MUSIC

By F. W. Strehlau.

Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony Features Last Concert Of Season By Boston Orchestra Under Baton Of Serge Koussevitzky — Two Other Works Given

THE Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 5, in E minor, opus 64, is perhaps the most self-revealing of all this composer's works. In it the great Russian, so reticent at other times and in the spoken word, discloses all of his longing, his passion, his despair, his exaltation, his hopes, his gayety verging on gloom, his almost hysterical ebullience. The symphony, in a way, is autobiographical.

Its poignance, its nobility, its restlessness, its richness of tonal coloring, its beauty were painted last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky with bold strokes and with a broad sweep that voiced to the full the surcharged emotions which have been put into the work.

Always an arresting interpreter of Russian music, Koussevitzky perhaps surpassed himself in depicting the intensity of this close-knit Fifth, drawing a picture that moved the audience to a demonstration. In the presentation of this music he is probably unapproached and in it he attains his highest eloquence. It was an inspiring feature of the farewell visit of the Bostonians for this season and made an impression that will linger long in the memory. It was notable for various things apart from the massed effect, among them the mellifluous horn notes in the andante.

There were other things in the concert to hold the attention closely, one of these being the introductory number, the Symphony in D major No. 3, by Frederick the Great, King of Prussia, for small orchestra. It is generally known that this royal personage busied himself with various things besides statecraft, that he composed extensively and also played the flute with skill. In this work he has given expression to his fondness for the instrument by including a two-flute slow movement. The piece is very simple in its structure and carries swinging melodies, though it lacks Mozartian grace and is not at all spiritual in its essence. It was played with smoothness and a careful preservation of its atmosphere.

As for the Sibelius Symphony No. 3, opus 52, the only other number, its reiterations might give a sense of monotony but for its peculiar idiomatic structure, its unusual progressions, its use of an irregular figure to produce quaint rhythms and its employment of what might be called folk tunes. It carries a forceful suggestion of forests and lakes and of northern psychology, and there is about it a persistency of utterance that does not let one wander. The opening is striking with its unison passages.

Above all, the work is not somber, but quaintly wistful, especially in the andantino, and without any of the gloom that characterizes Tschaikowsky. It is the expression of a composer serious and influenced by conditions of climate and country, but not moody.

The presentation gave recognition to and projected this quality in an admirable manner and imparted vitality to the music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
MAR 7 - 1929

WASHINGTON SOCIETY

Washington, D. C., March 6.—[Special.]—Mrs. Hoover made her first public appearance as first lady of the land this afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra. She had with her the President's sister, Mrs. Leavitt, of California; her uncle, Maj. W. D. Henry of North Dakota; her sister, Mrs. Large, and the latter's daughter, Miss Janet Large.

Mrs. Hoover wore black, a dress of black velvet and black hat, with a coat of black broadtail lamb trimmed with sable. A secret service man escorted the party to their box and returned for them during the last number on the program.

The President's wife has appointed Miss Mary Randolph, who was secretary to Mrs. Coolidge, as her social secretary with two aides, Miss Ruth Fessler, who accompanied her on the Hoover trip to Latin American countries, and Mildred Hall, both graduates of Stanford university.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO
CALL
MAR 5 - 1929

Bloch's 'America' Featured Tonight At Hoover Recital

Two great Californians, Herbert Hoover and Ernest Bloch, will be honored simultaneously tonight at the traditional inaugural concert to be held in Washington, D. C.

Bloch received word from Washington today that the epic rhapsody, "America," prize winning symphony composition, has been chosen as the work to be played at the concert tonight.

O. Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will lead the orchestra playing "America."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASH., D. C.
STAR
MAR 7 - 1929

MUSIC

ERNEST BLOCH'S "AMERICA."

That admirable organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, who has many friends and ad[illegible] Washington, made its second and final appearance of the season at Poli's Theater, yesterday afternoon, when the feature was the local premiere of Ernest Bloch's prize-winning epic rhapsody, "America."

A large audience, led by Mrs. Herbert Hoover in the presidential box, showed unusually alert anticipation of the epic rhapsody. In fact, so anxious had a group of sincere Washington music lovers become to hear this prize-winning work that, when they found it was liable to be canceled due to the extra cost of erecting a platform for the 125 singers in Dr. Albert Harned's National Capital Oratorio Association chorus they went into their own pockets and raised the amount. It was a highly laudable gesture, and it is to be hoped that they felt the result merited the expense. Certainly no fault could be found with the work of the chorus. The majority of Mr. Bloch's very common-place phrases were clearly audible, with admirable enunciation and tone. There seemed no room for worry about the life of "The Star Spangled Banner" being threatened by this rather banal verse and its setting.

As for the epic rhapsody as a whole, one felt a decided gratification to hear a work considered sufficiently important for five famous conductors to have awarded it the first prize of $3,000 and to have burst forth practically simultaneously with first performances of it by their respective orchestras. Mr. Koussevitzky was one of the five. Ordinarily, but for the interest and initiative of the above-mentioned music lovers, Washington, in the natural course of indifferent events, would not have heard this work, which the whole country is animatedly discussing—except perhaps via radio—for several seasons to come, perhaps never.

It was Reginald de Koven, an American born in Middletown, Conn., who had a song in his popular work, "Robin Hood," entitled "It Takes Nine Tailors to Make a Man." Similarly, it would seem that it takes more than a dozen years to make an American composer. Superficially and even patriotically, perhaps that length of time is sufficient. But not spiritually or emotionally. Mr. Bloch's sincerity and industry are quite as unquestioned as his European point of view. He obviously loves his adopted land and is intrigued by its folk tunes, an accumulated assortment of a trio of racial backgrounds, and also by the ballads of Stephen Collins Foster, America's greatest song writer.

Ernest Bloch has proved a clever researcher among such themes, making an undeniably variegated and well organized patchwork quilt which would grace any musical antiquarian's collection. His use of Indian motives is to the barbaric, blazing crudeness of their native charm as the generally accepted "Indian" words "wigwam" and "Great Spirit," ect., are to the real, guttural Indian languages. In the second movement, dedicated to the Civil War period, one never felt the primitive passions and power of the bitterest of conflicts that our country has ever known; one only glimpsed them dimly down the vague corridors of funereal dirges and looked instinctively for a silver screen "Birth of a Nation" to vivify them. The Southern tunes and, in the third movement, the jazz tunes had moments when they seemed perilously close to the better motion picture orchestra's medleys, even though they wore noticeably authentic symphonic cut of garments. There were moments when, even with the score before one, the mind of one listener at least would wander wearily.

After all, American spirit is essentially energetic optimism, with sparkle and snap in rhythms. This rhapsody seemed to lack such qualities. It was frequently minor-keyed and pessimistic. In spite of all its contrapuntal adroitness in sorting a "Message" out of a medley, it distinctly had its dreary moments. This clearly was not due to conductor or orchestra.

Preceding the epic rhapsody yesterday was Ravel's delightfully clever orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," which has not been heard here for some time. It is amusing and fascinating music, definitely programmatic with the subtle delineation of the conversation between two Jews one of the best limning in music of human characters ever written. It was excellently performed.

H. F.

[illegible]ONY

[illegible]cts Unusual Pro-[illegible]ies, By Fred-[illegible]schaikowsky

Th[illegible] gave its[illegible] night at [illegible] Koussevits[illegible] gram maker[illegible]nas achieved a rep[illegible]nusual and last night's [illegible]ception, for three symphonies [illegible]presented, two of which never had been heard in Baltimore before.

In the first instance there was the Symphony in D major by Frederick the Great, who was a performer on the flute and a composer of no mean ability. He was an amateur in the real sense of the word, his love for music being so great that although his father considered its study effeminate and declined to allow [illegible] studied in secret, engaging musical servants.

Not serious in content, his opus is courtly, gay music, typical of the period, very pleasant to hear and easy of comprehension and which the orchestra disposed of in a very happy and graceful fashion.

The music of Sibelius' Third Symphony was neither happy nor so easily disposed of. It is neither deliberately modern nor studiedly archaic, but has most characteristic manifestations. He uses the traditional symphonic form with which to hold his ideas together, which are short motives of a mosaic style with folk flavor. Meticulously written, there are times when the very thin orchestration seems sombre and spare.

After the Finnish music, the kaleidoscopic tonal hues of Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony provided a rich contrast. The masterly first movement—every note a telling one—the impassioned romance of the French horns in the second, the perfectly proportioned passages in the conversation between the oboe and the horn, the slow valse of the third—sorrowfully

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
MAR 7 - 1929

MUSIC

Strange new music ushers out local orchestral season; Koussevitzky leads Boston Orchestra in new Block rhapsody

By RUTH HOWELL

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston symphony orchestra made their farewell bow to Washington for this season yesterday at Poli's, and Ernest Bloch's prize-winning symphony made its initial obeisance. After Toscanini and the Philharmonic the day before, yesterday's music was a little dull. But that is hardly a fair criticism, because Koussevitzky is, after all, a fine conductor, and the Boston orchestra 'way up the scale.

Koussevitzky's talents do not need delineation. He conducts with intelligence—more of it than emotion usually—and his abilities are widespread over the field of orchestral music. His most intensive and evident achievement yesterday was in the leading of the chorus, an unusual feature of the program which he whipped and obviously inspired to a good performance.

Not that the rest of his work wasn't good; but that part was such hard work. The Bloch prize rhapsody, "America," heard here for the first time, awakened great interest. But it is not great. Bloch has written a great deal and should by this time know how to write intelligently. His most recent piece shows that, and shows an idea behind the whole. However, it is not replete with musical ideas. One or two good themes were evident—one at the very beginning, and the other in the last movement, a really choice short theme for the horns.

To the audience, the portions of the composition that worked in folk songs and familiar themes were most interesting. It seemed that "Sewanee River" and the "Battle Cry of Freedom" were overworked; and the Whitemanesque quaking of Koussevitzky's knees as he led the orchestra over a tempting passage devoted to "Wabash Blues" on the slide trombone showed him still a young conductor, but was almost more than a prize symphonic work could stand. The anthem which concludes the rhapsody, however, is simple and appropriate in theme, and yesterday was notably well sung by a local chorus. More voices, mostly men, to throw the singing out over the orchestra, would improve this portion.

Bloch's music did one obvious thing yesterday: it showed what a thoro musician Moussorgsky was. His "Pictures at an Exhibition," the other number on the program, was simply conceived and utterly charming thruout. The interesting series of pictures was understandingly played by Koussevitzky and his men, and the merit of Ravel's orchestration was notable. In succession, the pictures of the Polish ox-cart, of the chicken ballet, of the catacombs, and of the weird witch's hut were most entertaining.

And no more orchestra music until next fall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASH., D. C.
POST
MAR 7 - 1929

FIRST LADY HEADS PARTY AT CONCERT

Mrs. Herbert Hoover Has Box for Orchestra Program at Poli's Theater.

PROMINENT IN APPLAUSE

Mrs. Herbert Hoover, wife of the President, made her first public appearance in her capacity of First Lady of the Land when she appeared at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Poli's Theater yesterday afternoon.

Mrs. Hoover, who occupied a stage box, was accompanied by her sister, Mrs. J. M. Large, the President's sister, Mrs. May Leavitt, of Long Beach, Calif., and her uncle, W. D. Henry, of North Dakota, all of whom are house guests at the White House. Mrs. Hoover was gowned attractively in a one-piece black silk frock over which she wore a black silk coat with a collar of mink. Her hat was a close-fitting black felt.

Appropriately enough, the principal feature of the program was the first presentation in Washington of "America," the epic rhapsody by Ernest Bloch, a new symphony which won the Musical America prize in 1928.

The orchestra, under the dynamic baton of Serge Koussevitsky, gave a splendid rendition of the stirring movements of this much discussed symphony. Quite novel in symphonic form and at times slightly monotonous in theme, yet the introduction of native American airs and a lofty purpose throughout the symphony of voicing in melody the spirit of America, won it much applause yesterday.

The concluding anthem, "America," with its magnificent measure, brought a new element into the music, that of the singing of the large mixed chorus which had been trained by Albert W. Harned and which occupied seats at the back of the stage during the playing of the symphony.

Mrs. Hoover led the applause which followed the conclusion of the rhapsody and did not leave her box until the conductor had bowed his acknowledgment to several distinct ovations.

The other number on the program was Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," arranged for the orchestra by M. Ravel, which also pleased the audience greatly.

This was the last appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Washington this season. The series was presented under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
MAR 7 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINAL CONCERT

Serge Koussevitzky gave a brilliant (to Washington) program with his splendid Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at Poli's, when he appeared for the second and last time for this season under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene as one of her concert-course attractions.

He played two suites only, the first a series by Moussorgsky called "Pictures at an Exhibition," which was literally painting in music. Each number was a musical replica of pictures the composer had passed in an exhibition. They were all graphic, but one called "Bydlo," representing a lumbering two-wheeled cart of Poland, was not only uncanny in its reproduction, but it was very beautiful, and the final, "Grand Porte de Kiev" was magnificent. Mr. Koussevitzky read the whole suite marvelously.

Many were interested in the new "America" composition by Ernest Bloch which took the prize in the Musical America symphony contest last fall. It is full of "atmosphere," folk song and other songs of other nations as well as American music of the three periods it represents, the landing of the Pilgrims, the storm and stress of the civil war, and the present, which is ushered in by jazz, and finishes with the hymn "America I Love Thee" sung by a mixed chorus. The Washington chorus was trained by Albert W. Harned, whose "Messiah" presentations are a part of each Christmas season.

The composition as a whole is not original, though it shows great skill and musicianship in the way Bloch has combined his multitudinous themes. Nor will "America I Love Thee" become the national anthem as was hoped by some of the promoters, but the work has a high popular appeal and will probably be heard frequently, we venture to say never better read and played than yesterday by Mr. Koussevitzky and his delightful orchestra, whose smoothness and form are a perpetual pleasure. A large house greeted leader and orchestra enthusiastically.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES
MAR 7 - 1929

NOTED BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS

An impressionable audience, including Mrs. Hoover and her party, attended the recital of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon, at Poli's Theater.

The stately Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted the remarkable organization through the stupendous compositions, merited well the ovations that were accorded him at the sub-divisions and close of the program.

His mode of leadership, one of moderate augmentation of the energies, rising to a brilliant and glorious climax, leads to a volcanic eruption of tonal grandeur and flaming expression.

He wields his baton with firmness and grace, gaining from the musicians a perfect co-ordination of playing and meticulous treatment of the score.

The major features of the program were two: "Pictures at an Exhibition," by Moussorgsky—as arranged for an orchestra by M. Ravel, and Bloch's epic rhapsody, "America."

The first was a "drawing in music" which the composer wrote in tribute to the posthumous exhibit of drawings and water-colors by his friend, Victor Hartmenn. The premiere of this arrangement was done in 1924 by the Bostonians under Koussevitsky.

In this opus, the introductory motive "Promenade" is a precise and sustained rhythmic suggestion of an idle person walking with different moods affecting his attitude. The "Gnomes" is a tricky little delight in musical complexities. The "Bydlo" arises from heavier, more pedantic measures representing a yoke of oxen drawing a wagon with enormous wheels. The ballet of chickens in their shells, a dainty and amusing essay, tinkles with rippling scales and capricious thrills. The "Catacombs" invoked by a series of variating chords and de-rhythmed measures creates the enchanting atmosphere of underground temples of worship.

"America" was also introduced in New England by Koussevitzky and his men, December, 1928.

The first movement—the Soil—the Indians (England)—the Mayflower—the Landing of the Pilgrims, assumes an Indian theme with frequent changes of tempo, harmonic jubilance and triumphant anthems.

"Hours of Joy"—"Hours of Sorrow," varied melodies which constitute the second movement, give way to negro songs "Pop Goes the Weasel," "Hail Columbia," "Dixie," "John Brown's Body," "Battle Cry of Freedom" and other civil war songs ringing against a chromatic anthem.

Part three, "The Present—the Future," syncopates dances and negro blues continuing in intermittent chords to the "Fulfillment," sung by a large mixed chorus trained by Albert W. Harned.

The entire program, rare in subject, unique in treatment, was poetic and inspirational. The readings were vivid, the interpretations masterful. Koussevitzky won sincere admiration as a poetic moster of conducting.

MADELINE ENSIGN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
MAR 8 - 1929

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts.

The program given by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall was one of the richest and the best contrasted in material that these concerts have provided for audiences of this city. Mr. Koussevitzky began with a Suite for strings by Arthur Foote, who is now in his seventy-sixth year, one of the most modest and accomplished musicians of his group and generation, and, as the event proved, a composer of delightful music. The conductor proceeded with the thunderous visions of Richard Strauss's "Also Sprach Zarathustra," a composition of compelling audacity, scorn and revolt, and a fantasy which is often apocalyptic; and he concluded with the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exposition." Of this last work, it may be said that the genius of Ravel, the orchestrator, is only second to that of Moussorgsky, creator of the music; and that, notwithstanding excellent preceding performances, it became the climax of the evening of magnificent playing.

Nothing is rarer or pleasanter in these days of 1929 than to encounter in art or on the street a gentleman who is quietly himself, who never alters his manner for an occasion, and whose simplicity and self-possession are indexes to like qualities of his character. Mr. Foote makes his listener think of these things. His music apes no other composer; it does not affect a modernity to which its author is not sympathetic; it does not rest upon platitudes or academic devices to command the respect of the listener. The Suite is simple, melodic; it is simply and well composed, and scored gracefully and in a transparent manner. Harmonically the music could have been written by Mendelssohn. Composed in 1907 and 1908, it holds the attention and it gratifies the listener by its melodiousness, proportion, and workmanship.

It served not only as a genial opening performance but as the most effective possible foil to what followed. With Strauss, of course, everything is resplendant, intense, romantic, and defiant of high heaven. It might be said that "Also Strach Zarathustra" is nothing but a passage of gorgeous post-romanticism. But there is more in the music. First of all there is a formal power that the dreaming romantics of the early nineteenth century did not know. There are vast arches, and lines, and stark contours under Strauss's dripping orchestral color and his occasional Bavarian sentimentality. Above everything, and through everything, there drives a special irresistible and heroic force.

This force generates a heat which fuses all the material, the weakest as well as the strongest in the composition, together, and gives it new shapes and new potencies of Strauss's devising. It is the imperious will back of the music, the imagination that vaults to the very skies, and knocks impudently on the portals of unknown realms, which stir and excite some listeners as perhaps no other music, even of Strauss, contrives to do. From the very beginning we are overwhelmed, and the spell is not quickly dissipated.

Of the performance, which was of special lucidness and technical brilliancy, more can be said when "Zarathustra" is repeated by Mr. Koussevitzky and his men tomorrow afternoon. Of the performance of the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exposition" it is only possible to speak in unqualified superlatives. It was one of those performances which seem to belong to one conductor, and to him alone. We do not refer here merely to Mr. Koussevitzky's exclusive proprietorship of the Ravel orchestration, but to every detail, color, nuance of his performance.

But he has one enormous, indeed unconquerable, handicap over all other conductors in his exclusive right to Ravel's arrangement, which the composer completed for Mr. Koussevitzky by decree of the publishers, and for him alone, in 1923. In this arrangement Ravel has done more for Moussorgsky than Moussorgsky could do for himself. His orchestral version is infinitely preferable to the original piano pieces. For the conceptions of Moussorgsky, in the first place, the piano was too limited, while only Ravel has been able to reveal to the world what Moussorgsky imagined, and what he was only able to suggest in a series of singularly original compositions. How can such insight, divination, united to consummate orchestral knowledge on the part of an arranger, and that arranger a musician not of Moussorgsky's nature, be explained?

Only, perhaps, by the supposition that the great knowledge and sensibility of a very old race is in Ravel's veins, and that such knowledge and wisdom may become nourished and newly creative by contact with a younger race and a more virile creative power. Thus Ravel with Moussorgsky. Only one factor was needed to complete the creative circuit interpretation of M. Koussevitzky.

Programs This Week Of Boston Orchestra

Programs in New York this week of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzy:

Saturday Afternoon
Suite in E Minor for Strings...Foote
"Also Sprach Zarathustra"...Strauss
Pictures at an Exhibition
Moussorgsky

Thursday Evening
Symphony.....Frederick the Great
Symphony No. 3.....Sibelius
"Also Sprach Zarathustra"...Strauss

N.Y. WORLD MAR 8-1929

Koussevitzky to Revive Sibelius

Symphony by Frederick the Great Listed for Saturday

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its fourth visit and last but one of the season to New York to give concerts in Carnegie Hall, next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, March 7 and 9.

On the first program Serge Koussevitzy has put Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," the suite of descriptive piano pieces arranged for orchestra especially for this conductor by Maurice Ravel. At the Thursday evening concert Mr. Koussevitzky also will play the Suite for String Orchestra, in E Minor, by Arthur Foote, the American composer, and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Also Spake Zarathustra."

At the Saturday afternoon concert, Mr. Koussevitzky will revive the third symphony of Sibelius. This symphony, practically unknown in America, was revived in Boston by Koussevitzky on Nov. 9 and 10 and repeated there Dec. 28 and 29. Another novelty will be the third symphony by Frederick the Great, King of Prussia. This eighteenth century piece had its first American performance in Boston last Friday and Saturday.

Frederick Wrote Four Symphonies

Frederick the Great wrote a number of orchestral scores as well as compositions for the flute. Among these were four symphonies. The third, which Koussevitzky is to play here, is the only one of these which is not for strings only. It is scored for two flutes, two oboes, two horns and a bassoon, in addition to strings. This is the only symphony which was not substantially changed by Quantz, the King's master of the flute. The symphony was performed in Berlin May 4, 1928. It had its first American performances in Boston, in Symphony Hall, on Friday and Saturday, March 1 and 2.

The third symphony of Sibelius, although well known in Europe, is unfamiliar in this country, records on hand showing only one performance previous to this season, at a New York concert of the Russian Symphony Society, Modest Altschuler, conductor, Jan. 16, 1908. Two previous conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra planned to perform the score, and even rehearsed it, but withdrew it without a public performance. Koussevitzky performed the symphony at the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston last Nov. 9 and 10, and repeated the work on Dec. 28 and 29.

Four Composers Transcribed Moussorgsky's "Pictures"

Moussorgsky's piano suite, "Pictures at an Exhibition," has been transcribed for orchestra by four composers—Toushmalov in 1891, and in recent years Sir Henry Wood, Leonidas Leonardi and Maurice Ravel. Ravel's orchestration was performed in Paris by Koussevitzky, and in America in this conductor's first season here.

When Moussorgsky wrote his "Tableaux d'une Exposition" in memory of his painter friend, Victor Hartmann, the composer described in these piano pieces his impressions of the following pictures at a posthumous exhibition of the artist's work. The subtitles are: "Promenade," "Gnomus," "Tuileries," "Bydlo," "Ballet des Poussins dans leur coques," "Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle," "Catacombs," and "La Cabane sur des paites de Poule" and "La Grande Porte de Kiev."

Bach "St. Matthew" By Friends To-day

Bach's "Passion According to St. John" will be given by the Friends of Music this afternoon in Town Hall.

This somewhat less celebrated of the two extant Bach "Passions," leaving aside the doubtful St. Luke, should by this time be as well known to New York concert goers as the St. Matthew "Passion," as it has become a regular Lenten production of the Friends of Music since that society revived it in 1924. The same soloists as last year will take part and Artur Bodanzky will conduct, as usual, with the society's chorus trained by Walter Wohllebe and the orchestra of the Metropolitan Opera House.

124

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
MAR 7 - 1929

MUSIC

Strange new music ushers out local orchestral season; Koussevitzky leads Boston Orchestra in new Block rhapsody

By RUTH HOWELL

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston symphony orchestra made their farewell bow to Washington for this season yesterday at Poli's; and Ernest Bloch's prize-winning symphony made its initial obeisance. After Toscanini and the Philharmonic the day before, yesterday's music was a little dull. But that is hardly a fair criticism, because Koussevitzky is, after all, a fine conductor, and the Boston orchestra 'way up the scale.

Koussevitzky's talents do not need delineation. He conducts with intelligence—more of it than emotion usually—and his abilities are widespread over the field of orchestral music. His most intensive and evident achievement yesterday was in the leading of the chorus, an unusual feature of the program which he whipped and obviously inspired to a good performance.

Not that the rest of his work wasn't good; but that part was such hard work. The Bloch prize rhapsody, "America," heard here for the first time, awakened great interest. But it is not great. Bloch has written a great deal and should by this time know how to write intelligently. His most recent piece shows that, and shows an idea behind the whole. However, it is not replete with musical ideas. One or two good themes were evident—one at the very beginning, and the other in the last movement, a really choice short theme for the horns.

To the audience, the portions of the composition that worked in folk songs and familiar themes were most interesting. It seemed that "Sewanee River" and the "Battle Cry of Freedom" were overworked; and the Whitemanesque quaking of Koussevitzky's knees as he led the orchestra over a tempting passage devoted to "Wabash Blues" on the slide trombone showed him still a young conductor, but was almost more than a prize symphonic work could stand. The anthem which concludes the rhapsody, however, is simple and appropriate in theme, and yesterday was notably well sung by a local chorus. More voices, mostly men, to throw the singing out over the orchestra, would improve this portion.

Bloch's music did one obvious thing yesterday: it showed what a thoro musician Moussorgsky was. His "Pictures at an Exhibition," the other number on the program, was simply conceived and utterly charming thruout. The interesting series of pictures was understandingly played by Koussevitzky and his men, and the merit of Ravel's orchestration was notable. In succession, the pictures of the Polish ox-cart, of the chicken ballet, of the catacombs, and of the weird witch's hut were most entertaining.

And no more orchestra music until next fall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASH., D. C.
POST
MAR 7 - 1929

FIRST LADY HEADS PARTY AT CONCERT

Mrs. Herbert Hoover Has Box for Orchestra Program at Poli's Theater.

PROMINENT IN APPLAUSE

Mrs. Herbert Hoover, wife of the President, made her first public appearance in her capacity of First Lady of the Land when she appeared at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Poli's Theater yesterday afternoon.

Mrs. Hoover, who occupied a stage box, was accommpanied by her sister, Mrs. J. T. Large; the President's sister, Mrs. May Leavitt, of Long Beach, Calif., and her uncle, W. D. Henry, of North Dakota, all of whom are house guests at the White House. Mrs. Hoover was gowned attractively in a one-piece black silk frock over which she wore a black silk coat with a collar of mink. Her hat was a close-fitting black felt.

Appropriately enough, the principal feature of the program was the first presentation in Washington of "America," the epic rhapsody by Ernest Bloch, a new symphony which won the Musical America prize in 1928.

The orchestra, under the dynamic baton of Serge Koussevitsky, gave a splendid rendition of the stirring movements of this much discussed symphony. Quite novel in symphonic form and at times slightly monotonous in theme, yet the introduction of native American airs and a lofty purpose throughout the symphony of voicing in melody the spirit of America, won it much applause yesterday.

The concluding anthem, "America," with its magnificent measure, brought a new element into the music, that of the singing of the large mixed chorus which had been trained by Albert W. Harned and which occupied seats at the back of the stage during the playing of the symphony.

Mrs. Hoover led the applause which followed the conclusion of the rhapsody and did not leave her box until the conductor had bowed his acknowledgment to several distinct ovations.

The other number on the program was Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," arranged for the orchestra by M. Ravel, which also pleased the audience greatly.

This was the last appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Washington this season. The series was presented under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
MAR 7 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINAL CONCERT

Serge Koussevitzky gave a brand new (to Washington) program with his splendid Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at Poli's, when he appeared for the second and last time for this season under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene as one of her concert-course attractions.

He played two suites only, the first a series by Moussorgsky called "Pictures at an Exhibition," which was literally painting in music. Each number was a musical replica of pictures the composer had passed in an exhibition. They were all graphic, but one called "Bydlo," representing a lumbering two-wheeled cart of Poland, was not only uncanny in its reproduction, but it was very beautiful, and the final, "Grand Porte de Kiev" was magnificent. Mr. Koussevitzky read the whole suite marvelously.

Many were interested in the new "America" composition by Ernest Bloch which took the prize in the Musical America symphony contest last fall. It is full of "atmosphere," folk song and other songs of other nations as well as American music of the three periods it represents, the landing of the Pilgrims, the storm and stress of the civil war, and the present, which is ushered in by jazz, and finishes with the hymn "America I Love Thee" sung by a mixed chorus. The Washington chorus was trained by Albert W. Harned, whose "Messiah" presentations are a part of each Christmas season.

The composition as a whole is not original, though it shows great skill and musicianship in the way Bloch has combined his multitudinous themes. Nor will "America I Love Thee" become the national anthem as was hoped by some of the promoters, but the work has a high popular appeal and will probably be heard frequently, we venture to say never better read and played than yesterday by Mr. Koussevitzky and his delightful orchestra, whose smoothness and form are a perpetual pleasure. A large house greeted leader and orchestra enthusiastically.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

NOTED BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS

An impressionable audience, including Mrs. Hoover and her party, attended the recital of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon, at Poli's Theater.

The stately Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted the commendable organization through the stupendous compositions, merited well the ovations that were accorded him at the sub-divisions and close of the program.

His mode of leadership, one of moderate augmentation of the energies, rising to a brilliant and glorious climax, leads to a volcanic eruption of tonal grandeur and flaming expression.

He wields his baton with firmness and grace, gaining from the musicians a perfect co-ordination of playing and meticulous treatment of the score.

The major features of the program were two: "Pictures at an Exhibition," by Moussorgsky—as arranged for an orchestra by M. Ravel, and Bloch's epic rhapsody, "America."

The first was a "drawing in music" which the composer wrote in tribute to the posthumous exhibit of drawings and water-colors by his friend, Victor Hartmenn. The premiere of this arrangement was done in 1924 by the Bostonians under Koussevitsky.

In this opus, the introductory motive "Promenade" is a precise and sustained rhythmic suggestion of an idle person walking with different moods affecting his attitude. The "Gnomes" is a tricky little delight in musical complexities. The "Bydlo" arises from heavier, more pedantic measures representing a yoke of oxen drawing a wagon with enormous wheels. The ballet of chickens in their shells, a dainty and amusing essay, tinkles with rippling scales and capricious thrills. The "Catacombs" invoked by a series of variating chords and de-rhythmed measures creates the enchanting atmosphere of underground temples of worship.

"America" was also introduced in New England by Koussevitzky and his men, December, 1928.

The first movement—the Soil—the Indians (England)—the Mayflower—the Landing of the Pilgrims, assumes an Indian theme with frequent changes of tempo, harmonic jubilance and triumphant anthems.

"Hours of Joy"—"Hours of Sorrow," varied melodies which constitute the second movement, give way to negro songs "Pop Goes the Weasel," "Hail Columbia," "Dixie," "John Brown's Body," "Battle Cry of Freedom" and other civil war songs ringing against a chromatic anthem.

Part three, "The Present—the Future," syncopates dances and negro blues continuing in intermittent chords to the "Fulfillment," sung by a large mixed chorus trained by Albert W. Harned.

The entire program, rare in subject, unique in treatment, was poetic and inspirational. The readings were vivid, the interpretations masterful. Koussevitzky won sincere admiration as a poetic moster of conducting.

MADELINE ENSIGN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
MAR 8 - 1929

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts.

The program given by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall was one of the richest and the best contrasted in material that these concerts have provided for audiences of this city. Mr. Koussevitzky began with a Suite for strings by Arthur Foote, who is now in his seventy-sixth year, one of the most modest and accomplished musicians of his group and generation, and, as the event proved, a composer of delightful music. The conductor proceeded with the thunderous visions of Richard Strauss's "Also Sprach Zarathustra," a composition of compelling audacity, scorn and revolt, and a fantasy which is often apocalyptic; and he concluded with the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exposition." Of this last work, it may be said that the genius of Ravel, the orchestrator, is only second to that of Moussorgsky, creator of the music; and that, notwithstanding excellent preceding performances, it became the climax of the evening of magnificent playing.

Nothing is rarer or pleasanter in these days of 1929 than to encounter in art or on the street a gentleman who is quietly himself, who never alters his manner for an occasion, and whose simplicity and self-possession are indexes to like qualities of his character. Mr. Foote makes his listener think of these things. His music apes no other composer; it does not affect a modernity to which its author is not sympathetic; it does not rest upon platitudes or academic devices to command the respect of the listener. The Suite is simple, melodic; it is simply and well composed, and scored gracefully and in a transparent manner. Harmonically the music could have been written by Mendelssohn. Composed in 1907 and 1908, it holds the attention and it gratifies the listener by its melodiousness, proportion, and workmanship.

It served not only as a genial opening performance but as the most effective possible foil to what followed. With Strauss, of course, everything is resplendant, intense, romantic, and defiant of high heaven. It might be said that "Also Strach Zarathustra" is nothing but a passage of gorgeous post-romanticism. But there is more in the music. First of all there is a formal power that the dreaming romantics of the early nineteenth century did not know. There are vast arches, and lines, and stark contours under Strauss's dripping orchestral color and his occasional Bavarian sentimentality. Above everything, and through everything, there drives a special irresistible and heroic force.

This force generates a heat which fuses all the material, the weakest as well as the strongest in the composition, together, and gives it new shapes and new potencies of Strauss's devising. It is the imperious will back of the music, the imagination that vaults to the very skies, and knocks impudently on the portals of unknown realms, which stir and excite some listeners as perhaps no other music, even of Strauss, contrives to do. From the very beginning we are overwhelmed, and the spell is not quickly dissipated.

Of the performance, which was of special lucidness and technical brilliancy, more can be said when "Zarathustra" is repeated by Mr. Koussevitzky and his men tomorrow afternoon. Of the performance of the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exposition" it is only possible to speak in unqualified superlatives. It was one of those performances which seem to belong to one conductor, and to him alone. We do not refer here merely to Mr. Koussevitzky's exclusive proprietorship of the Ravel orchestration, but to every detail, color, nuance of his performance.

But he has one enormous, indeed unconquerable, handicap over all other conductors in his exclusive right to Ravel's arrangement, which the composer completed for Mr. Koussevitzky by decree of the publishers, and for him alone, in 1923. In this arrangement Ravel has done more for Moussorgsky than Moussorgsky could do for himself. His orchestral version is infinitely preferable to the original piano pieces. For the conceptions of Moussorgsky, in the first place, the piano was too limited, while only Ravel has been able to reveal to the world what Moussorgsky imagined, and what he was only able to suggest in a series of singularly original compositions. How can such insight, divination, united to consummate orchestral knowledge on the part of an arranger, and that arranger a musician not of Moussorgsky's nature, be explained?

Only, perhaps, by the supposition that the great knowledge and sensibility of a very old race is in Ravel's veins, and that such knowledge and wisdom may become nourished and newly creative by contact with a younger race and a more virile creative power. Thus Ravel with Moussorgsky. Only one factor was needed to complete the creative circuit interpretation of M. Koussevitzky.

Programs This Week Of Boston Orchestra

Programs in New York this week of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzy:

Saturday Afternoon
Suite in E Minor for Strings..Foote
"Also Sprach Zarathustra"..Strauss
Pictures at an Exhibition
Moussorgsky

Thursday Evening
Symphony.....Frederick the Great
Symphony No. 3.....Sibelius
"Also Sprach Zarathustra"..Strauss

N.Y. WORLD MAR 8-1929

Koussevitzky to Revive Sibelius

Symphony by Frederick the Great Listed for Saturday

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its fourth visit and last but one of the season to New York to give concerts in Carnegie Hall, next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, March 7 and 9.

On the first program Serge Koussevitzy has put Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," the suite of descriptive piano pieces arranged for orchestra especially for this conductor by Maurice Ravel. At the Thursday evening concert Mr. Koussevitzky also will play the Suite for String Orchestra, in E Minor, by Arthur Foote, the American composer, and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Also Spake Zarathustra."

At the Saturday afternoon concert, Mr. Koussevitzky will revive the third symphony of Sibelius. This symphony, practically unknown in America, was revived in Boston by Koussevitzky on Nov. 9 and 10 and repeated there Dec. 28 and 29. Another novelty will be the third symphony by Frederick the Great, King of Prussia. This eighteenth century piece had its first American performance in Boston last Friday and Saturday.

Frederick Wrote Four Symphonies

Frederick the Great wrote a number of orchestral scores as well as compositions for the flute. Among these were four symphonies. The third, which Koussevitzky is to play here, is the only one of these which is not for strings only. It is scored for two flutes, two oboes, two horns and a bassoon, in addition to strings. This is the only symphony which was not substantially changed by Quantz, the King's master of the flute. The symphony was performed in Berlin May 4, 1928. It had its first American performances in Boston, in Symphony Hall, on Friday and Saturday, March 1 and 2.

The third symphony of Sibelius, although well known in Europe, is unfamiliar in this country, records on hand showing only one performance previous to this season, at a New York concert of the Russian Symphony Society, Modest Altschuler, conductor, Jan. 16, 1908. Two previous conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra planned to perform the score, and even rehearsed it, but withdrew it without a public performance. Koussevitzky performed the symphony at the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston last Nov. 9 and 10, and repeated the work on Dec. 28 and 29.

Four Composers Transcribed Moussorgsky's "Pictures"

Moussorgsky's piano suite, "Pictures at an Exhibition," has been transcribed for orchestra by four composers—Toushmalov in 1891, and in recent years Sir Henry Wood, Leonidas Leonardi and Maurice Ravel. Ravel's orchestration was performed in Paris by Koussevitzky, and in America in this conductor's first season here.

When Moussorgsky wrote his "Tableaux d'une Exposition" in memory of his painter friend, Victor Hartmann, the composer described in these piano pieces his impressions of the following pictures at a posthumous exhibition of the artist's work. The subtitles are: "Promenade," "Gnomus," "Tuileries," "Bydlo," "Ballet des Poussins dans leur coques," "Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle," "Catacombs," and "La Cabane sur des paites de Poule" and "La Grande Porte de Kiev."

Bach "St. Matthew" By Friends To-day

Bach's "Passion According to St. John" will be given by the Friends of Music this afternoon in Town Hall.

This somewhat less celebrated of the two extant Bach "Passions," leaving aside the doubtful St. Luke, should by this time be as well known to New York concert goers as the St. Matthew "Passion," as it has become a regular Lenten production of the Friends of Music since that society revived it in 1924. The same soloists as last year will take part and Artur Bodanzky will conduct, as usual, with the society's chorus trained by Walter Wohllebe and the orchestra of the Metropolitan Opera House.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN
MAR 8 - 1929

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Koussevitzky Presents Program That Includes Moussorgsky's 'Pictures at an Exhibition.'

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The fourth Thursday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Koussevitzky had prepared a program of three dimensions, Arthur Foote's suite in E major for strings, Richard Strauss's tone poem "Also Sprach Zarathustra" and Modest Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." The last named is a piano composition (it was played at a recital last evening in the Town Hall) and was orchestrated by Maurice Ravel, a French composer as far removed from Moussorgsky as Petrograd from Paris. Others have also made orchestral versions.

The music bears the imprint of the Russian master's strange individuality and naturally makes an effective orchestral piece. Possibly for most of the more hardened music lovers in the audience the Strauss work, which is not too often performed, was the focus of attention. Every one knows what a superman is and can enjoy a tone poem referring to such a being. The Kaiser is still alive and Mussolini has arisen. There are several other supermen even "in our midst" and no end of superfluous ones prancing in the spotlight of the world. Therefore what Nietzsche had to say about this race divine seemed worth while.

However, all this is of little significance. The question is whether Strauss wrote a good tone poem. As the years roll by and things once apparently confused clarify themselves it becomes more and more certain that Strauss had something to offer which no one else of his day had and in "Also Sprach Zarathustra" there is that voluptuous passion of enwrapped sounds, that gorgeous expanse of orchestral cloud tints, that magnificence surrounding themes of fundamental simplicity which stamped him as the arch colorist and of the era. It is not always easy to correlate the music with the text of Nietzsche and perhaps there is no good reason why we should try to do so. It is the music itself which we must consider and only as a reproduction in the artist's chosen medium of the poignant sensations and palpitating emotions which the philosopher's thoughts bred in him.

The tone poem wears well. It will outlive all the latest products of Strauss's pen. It will be played when the Helen of Egypt is suitably entombed and "Tageszeiten" rests in the shades of night. The Bostonians gave a mighty performance of the composition last evening. This was the Boston Symphony of old, splendid in tone and confident in technic. Mr. Koussevitkzy was not betrayed into incontinence in his reading. It had all the sensuous quality of the work, but it lost no jot of breadth or weight. The length of the tone poem will probably always militate against its popularity, but last evening's audience surely approved it.

It was good to hear Arthur Foote's suite once more. To be sure no one can write a pizzicato without recalling the symphonic one of Tschaikowsky, but Mr. Foote's stands pretty firmly on its own feet. The fugue is about as exhilarating a piece of canonic writing as one could expect to hear from any composer not of the authoritative classic school. It is one of the gems of American music and ought to be studied by every young composer who wishes to see how scholarship can be made to serve the purposes of romanticism. The whole suite was brilliantly played last night, but the audience seemed to be in doubt as to how it ought to react to the name of one A. Foote of Boston. Music lovers who do not know Arthur Foote should look him up; he is worth knowing.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
MAR 8 - 1929

The Hoovers Give Diplomatic Corps Reception Monday

White House to Observe Traditions by Entertaining for Foreign Envoys

By a Staff Correspondent

Washington, March 8.—The President and Mrs. Hoover will receive the chiefs of diplomatic missions and the next ranking officers of embassies and legations and their wives at the White House on Monday afternoon at 4 o'clock. Except for festivities in connection with the inauguration, this is traditionally the first hospitality of the new Administration at the White House. Mrs. Hoover bids fair to be as generous in her patronage of music as was Mrs. Coolidge. She attended the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert with a party of guests.

New Cabinet members and their wives attended the sixteenth annual amaryllis show of the Department of Agriculture yesterday and many of the public seized this opportunity to catch a glimpse of the new official family. The Secretary of Agriculture and Mrs. Hyde and their daughter, Miss Caroline Hyde, opened the show.

The Ambassador of Cuba and Senora Ferrera entertained at dinner last night in honor of the Ambassador of Great Britain and Lady Isabella Howard. In the afternoon there was a reception at the British Embassy, with the Ambassador and Lady Isabella Howard as hosts, for the 150 Australian cadets who are in this country on an educational tour. The staff of the embassy was invited, with the staffs of the Canadian and Irish Free State legations, a number of school girls and those who have been hosts to the boys from the Antipodes. Their visit to Washington was timed so that they might see the inauguration.

The Ambassador of Japan and Mme. Debuchi and Justice and Mrs. Harlan Fiske Stone were the guests for whom Mr. and Mrs. William Livingston Crouns entertained at dinner last night. Another of the day's pleasant events was a luncheon given by Brigadier General Augusto Villa, Military Attache of the Italian Embassy, for Count and Countess di Santelia, who will bring their visit to Washington to a close on Monday.

Representative Ruth Hanna McCormick was the guest of honor at a reception given by Mrs. Ellis Logan. Most of the several hundred guests had Illinois affiliations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK AMERICAN
MAR 8 - 1929

Music World

By GRENA BENNETT.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, appearing [illegible] fourth evening concert for the season in Carnegie Hall last evening, opened its programme with a composition by a native son of Massachusetts. A suite for strings by Arthur Foote of Newton Centre, was the work so honored. It was played with becoming tone quality, good co-ordination of the string choirs and a clear manifestation of the melodic line that was definite and obvious in each of its four movements.

The second number was Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra," and a curious coincidence marked the closing work, Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," for at the same time Rudolph Gruen, at Town Hall, was playing a piano arrangement of the same composition.

The band from Boston was conscientiously and effectively conducted by Serge Kous[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
MAR 8 - 1929

Music : By Oscar Thompson

"Zarathustra" Speaks Again, Thanks to Koussevitzky and His Bostonians—"Siegfried" in Wagner Cycle

WHOEVER SPEAKS in "Also sprach Zarathustra," whether Zoroaster, Nietzsche, or Strauss, there was much eloquence in the speaking at Carnegie Hall last night, due to the Boston Symphony's thrice admirable performance of this work, as conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. The "World Riddle," which Philip Hale in his program notes reminds us is left unsolved by Nietzsche, by Strauss and even by Strauss's commentators, was not unriddled by Mr. Koussevitzky.

The two-key conclusion over which musical bigwigs were once agog had to be listened to very dilligently to be recognized for what it is, in these days of polytonality, and, like so many of the innovations that caused Strauss to be regarded in some quarters as a master cacophonist, yielded the effect of something soundly conventional if not even a little commonplace. But "Zarathustra," as restored to currency last night by a conductor gifted with no ordinary powers of reanimation, and an orchestra fully settled into its new stride of responsive virtuosity, has weathered the years better than was predicted for it after its early performances in America.

This is not to say that the Strauss tone-poem has grown in stature. To the contrary, it seemed last night to have contracted, to have given up most of its pretenses to the supermanish, to have receded in large measure from its grandiose apotheosis of life, or whatever it is the musical program-maker had in mind to deify; and to have relapsed into a simpler and more purely musical message for humanity. "Zarathustra," as music, is sentimental, and it is bourgeois. But it is not necessarily the bore hostile critics voted it twenty and thirty years ago, when there was more concern about its philosophical implications than is likely to confront it today. Perhaps quite as much of banality can be found in the thematic material of other tone-poems of Strauss which have had a much firmer place in the repertory of American orchestras; perhaps, also, quite as much beauty of scoring and sensuous warmth are to be found in "Zarathustra" as in these others. The much traduced "Tanzlied" is not lofty or inspired music, but in the light of much of the dance music of latter-day novelties it has at least the virtue of human feeling to compensate for its none too distinguished invention.

IN those sections given titles of "The Great Yearning," "Grave Song," "Night Song" and "Song of the Night Wanderer" there are felicities and sonorities that need not be thrust aside because the tone-poem nowhere reaches again the level it achieves in the "Sunrise" of the Introduction. "Zarathustra" is not likely to be overplayed. It was well worth while for Mr. Koussevitzky to include the work in his two New York concert this week.

Last night's program included a devoir to American art in the form of a Suite in E Major for String Orchestra, by Arthur Foote, and there was a welcome reversion to one of the novelties of Mr. Koussevitzky's first American season, Maurice Ravel's orchestral arrangement of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." Mr. Foote's music of twenty years ago is slender, but engagingly wrought, especially [illegible]le pieces have not suffered in their transmutation as have some other keyboard compositions made over by instrumental colorists. They were most adroitly played, and seldom has the brass of the Boston band sounded so rich and buoyant, so completely a match for the singing splendor of the strings.

WITH TULLIO SERAFIN conducting, "Siegfried" on yesterday afternoon bore subscribers of the Metropolitan's special Wagner cycle on to the awakening of Bruennhilde, and marked the completion of all the titanic preliminaries for what Wagner originally conceived as a single music-drama, the tragedy of "Goetterdaemmerung."

Yesterday there were two heroes, and neither of them the character whose name the music-drama bears. The first was the orchestra under Mr. Serafin, the second, the Wanderer as again sung superbly by Friedrich Schorr. The additional restoration of music formerly elided in the forge scene, made by the Italian conductor at the last previous representation, was retained, together with the music he put back last year, but what was more important was that Wagner's melos glowed and sang, not always with the greatest power of effect, but invariably musically and with a fine clarity.

Besides Mr. Schorr, praise must be accorded the Alberich of Gustav Schutzendorf. Gertrude Kappel was less happy in the music of the Bruennhilde of "Siegfried" than that of "Walkuere" and there was much forced tone between her and Mr. Laubenthal, the Siegfried of the afternoon. The latter did not improve his characterization by bits of clowning or by his time-beating with the sword fragments in the forge scene. Karin Branzell sang Erda in place of Ernestine Schumann-Heink, originally announced, which was, of course, a disappointment, although the big voice of the substitute aided Mr. Schorr in making the first scene of the last act the highest point of the cycle to date. Max Bloch again sang Mime. William Gustafson did megaphone duty as Fafner and Thalia Sabanleeva had the minor tribulations of the Forest Bird.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
MAR 8 - 1929

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

Philosophy and Music

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 8.30 P.M.

Suite in E major for Strings, Op. 63 ..... Arthur Foote
Also sprach Zarathustra ..... Strauss
Pictures at an Exhibition. Moussorgsky-Ravel

As Schopenhauer spake thus spake Wagner; as Nietzsche spake thus spake Strauss; and whatever is outmoded in the utterance of the philosophers is the weakest portion of the music of the two Richards. Fortunately both Wagner and Strauss spoke of other things besides a sensuous pessimism and a self-conscious superman—the former of Eva and Walther and the poetic wonders of youth and of Hans Sachs, that wise adumbration of experience; the latter of Til and Sophie, Octavian and the Marschallin, all human in their joys and their sufferings. Theories and grandiose systems are born with every new philosopher and often die with their originators, and composers who wreak their talents on philosophical abstractions must be content to see their efforts speedily suffer mortality.

Last night Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra attempted to recapture for us the passionate intellectual thrill we used to get in the old days from Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra." When the band blazed a monstrous C major sunrise we were indeed engulfed in the vivifying majesty of Nature. But whatever thrills there were for us came not at all from Nietzsche's poetic system but from the lesser more familiar phenomena of Nature, the shriek of the terrified animals who fled from their caves at the sound of Zarathustra's voice, or the lovely B major theme at the close, sufficiently beautiful in itself not to require the most esoteric of literary explanations.

Even with the help of Strauss's own program notes we turned an indifferent ear to the intellectual implications of the tone poem, preferring to surrender ourselves to the obvious beauties of the score, the orchestral amplitude, the magnificent effects.

The dry fugue which Strauss invented to portray that science toward which man turns in vain for a solution to the problems of life left us as chilled as the fugal invocation, but the memory of the song of the "Night Wanderer" was still upon us when we left the hall.

Mr. Foote's E Major Suite seemed like good, innocent, well-made New England music, and the Moussorgsky "Pictures at an Exhibition" again convinced us that the real Moussorgsky is only to be found in "Boris," "Khovantchina" and a half dozen songs.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
MAR 8 - 1929

Boston Symphony Gives Fourth Evening Concert

Strauss's "Zarathustra" Features Carnegie Hall Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth Thursday evening concert last night at Carnegie Hall, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The program comprised music by an American, a German and a Russian (with a Frenchman as orchestrator). Mr. Koussevitzky began the proceedings with Arthur Foote's Suite in E major for strings (Op. 63), went on to Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and ended with Ravel's orchestral arrangement of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

Mr. Foote, who is now seventy-six years old, composed his Suite for strings in 1907-'08. It is agreeable music, and its Adagietto is even more than that—for in this movement Mr. Foote has written with sensibility and charm and a fine instinct for melodic contours. The Suite was warmly applauded.

Strauss's huge setting of Nietzsche's philosophical rhapsody seemed more than ever a curiously uneven work, ranging from the elemental grandeur of its opening pages—that colossal evocation of the mood of dawn—to the brazen triviality of the "Dance Song." A strange composition, in which Strauss endeavored to convey (not with complete success) what he naïvely described as "an idea of the development of the human race from its origin." Merely that!

Mr. Koussevitzky and his brilliant orchestra played the work magnificently, with a devotion which took no account of inequalities of inspiration or problems of technique.

There was much applause for the gifted conductor and his men.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILA., PA.
PUBLIC LEDGER
MAR [illegible]

WASHINGTON SOCIETY VISITS FLOWER SHOW

Hoovers' First Public Function Will Be Reception of Diplomats

Public Ledger Bureau

Washington, March 7.—The President and Mrs. Hoover will receive the chiefs of diplomatic missions and the next ranking officers of embassies and legations and their wives at the White House on Monday afternoon at 4 o'clock. Except for festivities in connection with the inauguration, this is traditionally the first hospitality of the new Administration at the White House. Mrs. Hoover bids fair to be as generous in her patronage of music as was Mrs. Coolidge. Yesterday afternoon she attended the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert with a party of guests.

New Cabinet members and their wives attended the sixteenth annual amaryllis show of the Department of Agriculture today, and many of the public seized this opportunity to catch a glimpse of the new official family. The Secretary of Agriculture and Mrs. Hyde and their daughter, Miss Caroline Hyde, opened the show yesterday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
MAR 8 - 1929

Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel, which was on the Boston Symphony's program last night, is the exclusive property of Sergei Koussevitzky, the conductor. No other director may perform it, and Mr. Koussevitzky possesses the original manuscript presented to him by M. Ravel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN
MAR 8 - 1929

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Koussevitzky Presents Program That Includes Moussorgsky's 'Pictures at an Exhibition.'

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The fourth Thursday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Koussevitzky had prepared a program of three dimensions, Arthur Foote's suite in E major for strings, Richard Strauss's tone poem "Also Sprach Zarathustra" and Modest Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." The last named is a piano composition (it was played at a recital last evening in the Town Hall) and was orchestrated by Maurice Ravel, a French composer as far removed from Moussorgsky as Petrograd from Paris. Others have also made orchestral versions.

The music bears the imprint of the Russian master's strange individuality and naturally makes an effective orchestral piece. Possibly for most of the more hardened music lovers in the audience the Strauss work, which is not too often performed, was the focus of attention. Every one knows what a superman is and can enjoy a tone poem referring to such a being. The Kaiser is still alive and Mussolini has arisen. There are several other supermen even "in our midst" and no end of superfluous ones prancing in the spotlight of the world. Therefore what Nietzsche had to say about this race divine seemed worth while.

However, all this is of little significance. The question is whether Strauss wrote a good tone poem. As the years roll by and things once apparently confused clarify themselves it becomes more and more certain that Strauss had something to offer which no one else of his day had and in "Also Sprach Zarathustra" there is that voluptuous passion of enwrapped sounds, that gorgeous expanse of orchestral cloud tints, that magnificence surrounding themes of fundamental simplicity which stamped him as the arch colorist and of the era. It is not always easy to correlate the music with the text of Nietzsche and perhaps there is no good reason why we should try to do so. It is the music itself which we must consider and only as a reproduction in the artist's chosen medium of the poignant sensations and palpitating emotions which the philosopher's thoughts bred in him.

The tone poem wears well. It will outlive all the latest products of Strauss's pen. It will be played when the Helen of Egypt is suitably entombed and "Tageszeiten" rests in the shades of night. The Bostonians gave a mighty performance of the composition last evening. This was the Boston Symphony of old, splendid in tone and confident in technic. Mr. Koussevitzky was not betrayed into incontinence in his reading. It had all the sensuous quality of the work, but it lost no jot of breadth or weight. The length of the tone poem will probably always militate against its popularity, but last evening's audience surely approved it.

It was good to hear Arthur Foote's suite once more. To be sure no one can write a pizzicato without recalling the symphonic one of Tschaikowsky, but Mr. Foote's stands pretty firmly on its own feet. The fugue is about as exhilarating a piece of canonic writing as one could expect to hear from any composer not of the authoritative classic school. It is one of the gems of American music and ought to be studied by every young composer who wishes to see how scholarship can be made to serve the purposes of romanticism. The whole suite was brilliantly played last night, but the audience seemed to be in doubt as to how it ought to react to the name of one A. Foote of Boston. Music lovers who do not know Arthur Foote should look him up; he is worth knowing.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
MAR 8 - 1929

Music : By Oscar Thompson

"Zarathustra" Speaks Again, Thanks to Koussevitzky and His Bostonians—"Siegfried" in Wagner Cycle

WHOEVER SPEAKS in "Also sprach Zarathustra," whether Zoroaster, Nietzsche, or Strauss, there was much eloquence in the speaking at Carnegie Hall last night, due to the Boston Symphony's thrice admirable performance of this work, as conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. The "World Riddle," which Philip Hale in his program notes reminds us is left unsolved by Nietzsche, by Strauss and even by Strauss's commentators, was not unriddled by Mr. Koussevitzky.

The two-key conclusion over which musical bigwigs were once agog had to be listened to very dilligently to be recognized for what it is, in these days of polytonality, and, like so many of the innovations that caused Strauss to be regarded in some quarters as a master cacophonist, yielded the effect of something soundly conventional if not even a little commonplace. But "Zarathustra," as restored to currency last night by a conduetor gifted with no ordinary powers of reanimation, and an orchestra fully settled into its new stride of responsive virtuosity, has weathered the years better than was predicted for it after its early performances in America.

This is not to say that the Strauss tone-poem has grown in stature. To the contrary, it seemed last night to have contracted, to have given up most of its pretenses to the supermanish, to have receded in large measure from its grandiose apotheosis of life, or whatever it is the musical program-maker had in mind to deify; and to have relapsed into a simpler and more purely musical message for humanity. "Zarathustra," as music, is sentimental, and it is bourgeois. But it is not necessarily the bore hostile critics voted it twenty and thirty years ago, when there was more concern about its philosophical implications than is likely to confront it today. Perhaps quite as much of banality can be found in the thematic material of other tone-poems of Strauss which have had a much firmer place in the repertory of American orchestras; perhaps, also, quite as much beauty of scoring and sensuous warmth are to be found in "Zarathustra" as in these others. The much traduced "Tanzlied" is not lofty or inspired music, but in the light of much of the dance music of latter-day novelties it has at least the virtue of human feeling to compensate for its none too distinguished invention.

IN those sections given titles of "The Great Yearning," "Grave Song," "Night Song" and "Song of the Night Wanderer" there are felicities and sonorities that need not be thrust aside because the tone-poem nowhere reaches again the level it achieves in the "Sunrise" of the Introduction. "Zarathustra" is not likely to be overplayed. It was well worth while for Mr. Koussevitzky to include the work in his two New York concert this week.

Last night's program included a devoir to American art in the form of a Suite in E Major for String Orchestra, by Arthur Foote, and there was a welcome reversion to one of the novelties of Mr. Koussevitzky's first American season, Maurice Ravel's orchestral arrangement of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." Mr. Foote's music of twenty years ago is slender, but engagingly wrought, especially the Prelude and the Fugue. The Moussorgsky piano pieces have not suffered in their transmutation as have some other keyboard compositions made over by instrumental colorists. They were most adroitly played, and seldom has the brass of the Boston band sounded so rich and buoyant, so completely a match for the singing splendor of the strings.

WITH TULLIO SERAFIN conducting, "Siegfried" on yesterday afternoon bore subscribers of the Metropolitan's special Wagner cycle on to the awakening of Bruennhilde, and marked the completion of all the titanic preliminaries for what Wagner originally conceived as a single music-drama, the tragedy of "Goetterdaemmerung."

Yesterday there were two heroes, and neither of them the character whose name the music-drama bears. The first was the orchestra under Mr. Serafin, the second, the Wanderer as again sung superbly by Friedrich Schorr. The additional restoration of music formerly elided in the forge scene, made by the Italian conductor at the last previous representation, was retained, together with the music he put back last year, but what was more important was that Wagner's melos glowed and sang, not always with the greatest power of effect, but invariably musically and with a fine clarity.

Besides Mr. Schorr, praise must be accorded the Alberich of Gustav Schutzendorf. Gertrude Kappel was less happy in the music of the Bruennhilde of "Siegfried" than that of "Walkuere" and there was much forced tone between her and Mr. Laubenthal, the Siegfried of the afternoon. The latter did not improve his characterization by bits of clowning or by his time-beating with the sword fragments in the forge scene. Karin Branzell sang Erda in place of Ernestine Schumann-Heink, originally announced, which was, of course, a disappointment, although the big voice of the substitute aided Mr. Schorr in making the first scene of the last act the highest point of the cycle to date. Max Bloch again sang Mime. William Gustafson did megaphone duty as Fafner and Thalia Sabanieeva had the minor tribulations of the Forest Bird.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
MAR 8 - 1929

Boston Symphony Gives Fourth Evening Concert

Strauss's "Zarathustra" Features Carnegie Hall Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth Thursday evening concert last night at Carnegie Hall, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The program comprised music by an American, a German and a Russian (with a Frenchman as orchestrator). Mr. Koussevitzky began the proceedings with Arthur Foote's Suite in E major for strings (Op. 63), went on to Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and ended with Ravel's orchestral arrangement of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

Mr. Foote, who is now seventy-six years old, composed his Suite for strings in 1907-'08. It is agreeable music, and its Adagietto is even more than that—for in this movement Mr. Foote has written with sensibility and charm and a fine instinct for melodic contours. The Suite was warmly applauded.

Strauss's huge setting of Nietzsche's philosophical rhapsody seemed more than ever a curiously uneven work, ranging from the elemental grandeur of its opening pages—that colossal evocation of the mood of dawn—to the brazen triviality of the "Dance Song." A strange composition, in which Strauss endeavored to convey (not with complete success) what he naïvely described as "an idea of the development of the human race from its origin." Merely that!

Mr. Koussevitzky and his brilliant orchestra played the work magnificently, with a devotion which took no account of inequalities of inspiration or problems of technique.

There was much applause for the gifted conductor and his men.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILA., PA.
PUBLIC LEDGER
MAR 8 - 1929

WASHINGTON SOCIETY VISITS FLOWER SHOW

Hoovers' First Public Function Will Be Reception of Diplomats

Public Ledger Bureau

Washington, March 7.—The President and Mrs. Hoover will receive the chiefs of diplomatic missions and the next ranking officers of embassies and legations and their wives at the White House on Monday afternoon at 4 o'clock. Except for festivities in connection with the inauguration, this is traditionally the first hospitality of the new Administration at the White House. Mrs. Hoover bids fair to be as generous in her patronage of music as was Mrs. Coolidge. Yesterday afternoon she attended the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert with a party of guests.

New Cabinet members and their wives attended the sixteenth annual amaryllis show of the Department of Agriculture today, and many of the public seized this opportunity to catch a glimpse of the new official family. The Secretary of Agriculture and Mrs. Hyde and their daughter, Miss Caroline Hyde, opened the show yesterday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK AMERICAN
MAR 8 - 1929

Music World

By GRENA BENNETT.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, appearing for the fourth evening concert for the season in Carnegie Hall last evening, opened its programme with a composition by a native son of Massachusetts. A suite for strings by Arthur Foote of Newton Centre, was the work so honored. It was played with becoming tone quality, good co-ordination of the string choirs and a clear manifestation of the melodic line that was definite and obvious in each of its four movements.

The second number was Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra," and a curious coincidence marked the closing work, Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," for at the same time Rudolph Gruen, at Town Hall, was playing a piano arrangement of the same composition.

The band from Boston was conscientiously and effectively conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
MAR 8 - 1929

The Hoovers Give Diplomatic Corps Reception Monday

White House to Observe Traditions by Entertaining for Foreign Envoys

By a Staff Correspondent

Washington, March 8.—The President and Mrs. Hoover will receive the chiefs of diplomatic missions and the next ranking officers of embassies and legations and their wives at the White House on Monday afternoon at 4 o'clock. Except for festivities in connection with the inauguration, this is traditionally the first hospitality of the new Administration at the White House. Mrs. Hoover bids fair to be as generous in her patronage of music as was Mrs. Coolidge. She attended the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert with a party of guests.

New Cabinet members and their wives attended the sixteenth annual amaryllis show of the Department of Agriculture yesterday and many of the public seized this opportunity to catch a glimpse of the new official family. The Secretary of Agriculture and Mrs. Hyde and their daughter, Miss Caroline Hyde, opened the show.

The Ambassador of Cuba and Senora Ferrera entertained at dinner last night in honor of the Ambassador of Great Britain and Lady Isabella Howard. In the afternoon there was a reception at the British Embassy, with the Ambassador and Lady Isabella Howard as hosts, for the 150 Australian cadets who are in this country on an educational tour. The staff of the embassy was invited, with the staffs of the Canadian and Irish Free State legations, a number of school girls and those who have been hosts to the boys from the Antipodes. Their visit to Washington was timed so that they might see the inauguration.

The Ambassador of Japan and Mme. Debuchi and Justice and Mrs. Harlan Fiske Stone were the guests for whom Mr. and Mrs. William Livingston Crouns entertained at dinner last night. Another of the day's pleasant events was a luncheon given by Brigadier General Augusto Villa, Military Attache of the Italian Embassy, for Count and Countess di Santelli, who will bring their visit to Washington to a close on Monday.

Representative Ruth Hanna McCormick was the guest of honor at a reception given by Mrs. Ellis Logan. Most of the several hundred guests had Illinois affiliations.

MAR 8 - 1929

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

Philosophy and Music

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting; Carnegie Hall, 8.30 P.M.

Suite in E major for Strings, Op. 63.....Arthur Foote
Also sprach Zarathustra.....Strauss
Pictures at an Exhibition, Moussorgsky-Ravel

As Schopenhauer spake thus spake Wagner; as Nietzsche spake thus spake Strauss; and whatever is outmoded in the utterance of the philosophers is the weakest portion of the music of the two Richards. Fortunately both Wagner and Strauss spoke of other things besides a sensuous pessimism and a self-conscious superman—the former of Eva and Walther and the poetic wonders of youth and of Hans Sachs, that wise adumbration of experience; the latter of Til and Sophie, Octavian and the Marschallin, all human in their joys and their sufferings. Theories and grandiose systems are born with every new philosopher and often die with their originators, and composers who wreak their talents on philosophical abstractions must be content to see their efforts speedily suffer mortality.

Last night Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra attempted to recapture for us the passionate intellectual thrill we used to get in the old days from Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra." When the band blazed a monstrous C major sunrise we were indeed engulfed in the vivifying majesty of Nature. But whatever thrills there were for us came not at all from Nietzsche's poetic system but from the lesser more familiar phenomena of Nature, the shriek of the terrified animals who fled from their caves at the sound of Zarathustra's voice, or the lovely B major theme at the close, sufficiently beautiful in itself not to require the most esoteric of literary explanations.

Even with the help of Strauss's own program notes we turned an indifferent ear to the intellectual implications of the tone poem, preferring to surrender ourselves to the obvious beauties of the score, the orchestral amplitude, the magnificent effects.

The dry fugue which Strauss invented to portray that science toward which man turns in vain for a solution to the problems of life left us as chilled as the fugal invocation, but the memory of the song of the "Night Wanderer" was still upon us when we left the hall.

Mr. Foote's E Major Suite seemed like good, innocent, well-made New England music, and the Moussorgsky "Pictures at an Exhibition" again convinced us that the real Moussorgsky is only to be found in "Boris," "Khovantchina" and a half dozen songs.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
MAR 8 - 1929

Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel, which was on the Boston Symphony's program last night, is the exclusive property of Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor. No other director may perform it, and Mr. Koussevitzky possesses the original manuscript presented to him by M. Ravel.

126

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL
MAR 8 - 1929

KOUSSEVITZSKY DIRECTS BOSTON ORCHESTRA AT CARNEGIE

By IRVING WEIL.

The process of inflation and deflation has affected the reputation of Richard Strauss as a composer more swiftly than it has anyone else identified with the last quarter of the nineteenth century—for Strauss was already accounted for by the time the twentieth was well begun. Once extravagantly labelled the superman of music, he is now seen to be merely an innovator of trivialities. And every new performance nowadays of one of his "tone poems" serves to confirm this judgment.

These performances seem to grow less and less frequent as time goes on, but occasionally a conductor, for one or another of the reasons which nt to unaccountably actuate conductors, does programme a Strauss work. Serge Koussevitzky has lately been attracted to the "Also Sprach Zarathustra" ("Thus Spake Zarathustra"), and after playing it in Boston brought it to Carnegie Hall last night on the latest visit of the Boston Orchestra.

SELDOM PLAYED.

We believe it is three years since the piece was last done here and the total of its performances in the thirty-three years since it was written has been small. The whole active Strauss orchestral repertoire, indeed, consists now of scarcely more than "Death and Transfiguration," "A Hero's Life" and "Don Juan," and even the second of these would propably not be heard much hereabouts if it hadn't been dedicated to Willem Mengelberg.

"Zarathustra," in a way, is the most pretentious of all the Strauss "tone poems," since here the composer seeks to create the impression that he has translated Nietzsche and pretty much the whose of his bombastic but dazzling philosophy into music. But what "Zarathustra" actually does is to make a paltry little word-of-one-syllable story, a series of puny sentimentalist episodes out of Nietzsche and his Uebermensch. It is much the same thing as though Shelley, let us say, were to be rewritten by Mr. Eddie Guest.

Most of Strauss's output is distinguished chiefly by two things—clever orchestral effects and as commonplace a melodic substance as can readily be imagined in a symphonic composer. But in "Zarathustra" the latter far more than ordinarily overbalances the former. There is one sugary and cheap melodic episode after another which of course has about as much to do with Nietzsche as a chocolate sundae has to do with strong drink.

NEEDS GUIDEBOOK.

There are some obviously childish attempts to work over into musical expression a dash of some of the Nietzchean philosophic ideas (probably an impossible thing for music to express under any circumstances). There is, for example, a fugued passage; which is supposed to convey the notion of Nietzsche's ideas on science; and the piece ends in two keys—very high in B-major, whilst the basses are in C-major with the trombones intoning an unresolved chord, from all of which one is expected to divine that the Ideal remains aloft whilst the riddle of the universe persists unsolved.

Of course no one can possibly divine anything of the sort without a guidebook and would merely believe Strauss to be playing musical anagrams if he could. The whole work, indeed, needs its guidebook in order to be followed at all intelligibly; without one it simply becomes a string of highly sentimentalist episodes.

Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to be pleasantly engaged in playing this music. He sugared its sentimentalism to the last drop and made its one-syllable story a neatly dramatic "outline" of Strauss. Otherwise last evening he was concerned with the American, Arthur Foote's E-major suite for strings, well written but not particularly individual music, and Maurice Ravel's orchestral version of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE
MAR 8 - 1929

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

Mr. Koussewitsky Conducts "Also sprach Zarathustra"—"Siegfried" and "La Rondine" at the Metropolitan Opera House.

IT WAS to Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra that we were last evening indebted for one of the infrequent performances which "Also sprach Zarathustra" receives in New York. Since it was first heard here, 30 or more years ago, inspiring one of Mr. Huneker's most memorable monographs on Strauss, it has remained perhaps the least popular of the early tone-poems (we except, of course, "Macbeth"). Condemned by some blunderer as an arid and irksome score, a tedious attempt to expound metaphysics in music, toilsome and thorny as an entertainment, it gathers dust, neglected on library shelves. Conductors avoid it, and audiences know it not. Thus pedantry spoils our fun.

Long ago Strauss disclaimed any intention of setting Nietzsche to music: his "Zarathustra" deals not with the dialectic of philosophy, but its fructifying impulse, the lust for self-enlargement, for the completion and consummation of life, its justification in freedom and beauty and truth. This theme Strauss' music shares with Nietzsche's great rhapsody, from which its inspiration sprang, and we ought not, by a more literal interpretation, confine its eloquence.

"Zarathustra" assaults the imagination, a mighty and a magnificent work. It deserves its place with "Don Quixote" and "Ein Heldenleben," as the least of a trinity of symphonic masterpieces, but still grander in scope and more profound in substance than even its treasurable predecessors among the Strauss tone-poems, "Don Juan" and "Till." We cannot listen to the apocalyptic introduction nor to the desperate C-minor declarations of the strings in the section "Of Joys and Passions" and believe that this is the lesser Strauss who speaks, or find here the prophecy of artistic impotence. This music is surpassed only in the finest pages of the later works.

The performance under Mr. Koussewitsky's direction was of unrivaled splendor, to which the orchestra contributed its vital tone, its skill and ardor of execution.

The Strauss was preceded by a little-known Suite in E for Strings by the American Arthur Foote. Composed previous to 1909, but seldom played, it contains harmless and agreeable music, neither poor in invention nor awkward in presentation. Mr. Koussewitsky played this Suite with the grace and energy that in turn it demanded. After an intermission that followed "Zarathustra" the evening was given over to Ravel's orchestral transcription of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," for which Mr. Koussewitsky appears to feel an inexplicable affection.

* * *

The revelation of Wagner's "R des Nibelungen" continued at Metropolitan Opera House yester afternoon with a performance "Siegfried," the second music-dra of the trilogy. Thus far, these Wa nerian matinees have maintained higher standard of excellence tha is attained at ordinary subscriptio performances, though whether th should be ascribed to coincidence o to design we cannot know. The ex cellence that characterized the pres entation of "Das Rheingold" tw weeks ago was again apparent i the "Siegfried." Memory again con trasted Mr. Serafin's glowing ver sion of the score with the more pedestrian conducting of a colleague, but upon the stage equal cause for satisfaction and enthusiasm was afforded. Pace the conscientious objectors, Mr. Laubenthal's Siegfried is as good as we may hope to have. As for Mr. Schorr's Wanderer, it is incomparable, nor does one ask a finer Erda than that of Mme. Branzell.

Yesterday Mme. Kappel sang the "Siegfried" Bruennhilde for the first time this year, and to the effect of her performance may be ascribed the triumphant conclusion of the afternoon. She sang splendidly, with the full exercise of her gift for vocal dramatization, with beauty and flexibility and plenitude of tone, a role difficult for her since it lies consistently high. That it in any way taxed her was yesterday difficult to believe.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
MAR 8 - 1929

MUSIC

By Richard L. Stokes

...he right to an off-day than Serge Kous... ...on Symphony Orchestra, and he exercised ...ening at Carnegie Hall. His program was ...mely in print but which scarcely come off ...e eminent Bostonian had desired to prove ...perfervid emotion but of sobriety, quietude, ...ble was not altogether convincing.

...bote's ... g or- ...poem, ...chard ...lean; ...rans- ...leces, ...lass., ...rmed ...dim ...or of ...ently ...ng of ...clude ...iddle ...—the ...t and ...t was ...f the present day, and was refreshing in its pellucid grace and its confident air of distinction. It was the score of a writer who had taken the trouble to master the spelling, grammar and rhetoric of his art. A more eloquent reading was deserved than that obtained from Mr. Koussevitzky, whose performance seemed a casual gesture in the direction of Americanism.

* * *

In the ensuing tone poem, Dr. Strauss undertook to illustrate the evolution of the human race through its sacerdotal hallucinations of the past, its scientific aberrations of the present, and its progress to the doctrine of the superman in the future. Interspersed are episodes from Nietzsche's book answerable to lyric treatment, such the passages entitled "Of the Gr Yearning," "Of Joys and Passion "Grave Song," "The Convalescen "Dance Song," and "Night Song."

Mr. Koussevitzky delivered wi splendor and power the mighty intr duction, ending on a C Major cho like the spring of the sun above th horizon, and depicted the realm of th Dwellers in the Rear World—that is, the unfortunates whose minds are still darkened and lamed by traditional religion—with a sombre and tragic horror recalling the deeps of the river bed in "Das Rheingold." Across this gloom ran the tattered and mendicant snivel of a Gregorian hymn. Science fared no better than theology, its pomp and bombast being caricatured by means of a pretentious and risible fugue.

While this work is not one of the prime Straussian masterpieces, it is scarcely so dreary and protracted as it appeared yesterday evening. Mr. Koussevitzky seemed more concerned with detail than with the ... re's broad lines, and ... tellectual ... ent. But ... he World

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
JOURNAL
MAR 9 - 1929

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAM
MAR 8 - 1929

...Riddle, with the orchestra playing in ... two keys, was projected by the conductor with much of the quality of its mystic agnosticism.

* * *

Three other composers besides Ravel have tried their hands at instrumenting the "Pictures at an Exhibition," forgetting that had Moussorgsky wished to express his impressions by means of the orchestra instead of the piano, he would undoubtedly have done so. Mr. Ravel has done a stunning job, but it seemed to me that the canvas was too large for the material.

At any rate, I have gained a clearer and more graphic notion of the pictures described by means of piano performances. This may again have been due to the performance, through the familiar Koussevitzky blazed up at the end in the proclamation celebrating "The Gate of the Bohatyrs at Kiev."

...idor of the colossal opening; ...eful, gently ironic "Dance ...nd the mysterious bi-tonal ...n. Then along came ...oussevitzky and the Boston ...Orchestra last night and my smug little theory to ...ens. ...Spake Zarathustra" was the ...offering of the visiting ...ns at their Carnegie Hall ...of yesterday, and as they ...it every bar stood forth ...g, pulsing life. For perfec- ...orchestral style and execu- ...rich, warm, encompassing ...his performance was with- ...arallel in my experience. ...breadth, the poise, the ...grandeur, the vivifying imaginative insight of Mr. Koussevitzky's reading made that of Richard Strauss himself seem in comparison pale and shallow.

The Strauss composition shared the program with two other numbers—Arthur Foote's E major suite for strings and Ravel's orchestral version of Moussorgsky's familiar piano suite, "Pictures at an Exhibition." In Mr. Foote's work the justly famed Bostonian string choir was heard to radiant advantage. The suite itself, composed over twenty years ago, possesses qualities which ... e piping times of atonality, ...ality, "new" counterpoint, ...or second regnant are mer- ...dated."

...y one who still hankers ... outmoded flesh pots of win- ...lody, orthodox workman- ...hony, grace and even— ... horrors!—elegance will ... meats seasoned to his lik-

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, N. J.
EVE. NEWS

New Regime Gets Its Social Bearings Without Trouble

Special to the NEWARK NEWS.

WASHINGTON—Music, it would seem, is to have a place among the chosen interests and pleasures of the new administration.

Mrs. Hoover's first public appearance as first lady of the land was at the Boston Symphony concert Wednesday afternoon. This afternoon the first White House concert will be given in the east room by the Westminster Choir of Dayton O.

It will be a private audition, arranged by Mrs. Harry Elstner Talbott, spons...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

TO DINE KOUSSEVITZKY

On April 1 a dinner will be given at Hotel Commodore by the Bohemians' Club in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Only gentlemen will be present, but they will be entertained by ladies. Mme. Lea Luboschutz will perform on the violin, and Mme. Rosina Lherinne will play the piano.

Mrs. Hoover and Party Occupy Box at Symphony Concert

By SALLIE V. H. PICKETT

WASHINGTON, March 9.—(AP)—Socially speaking, the new administration is finding its bearings without the slightest difficulty, both the president and Mrs. Hoover being well versed in the intricate labyrinth of official etiquette, the most important event being in arranging for the diplomatic corps to meet the new administration. This the president and Mrs. Hoover have planned for 4 o'clock Monday afternoon.

For the first time since becoming the first lady of the land Mrs. Hoover occupied the White House box in a local theater, going to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra in its ... gram. She created quite a flurry as the White House car drove up and she and her party stepped out.

While Mrs. Coolidge added to the fame of her husband's administration by her spontaneous smile Mrs. Hoover also smiles, and when she does she shows dimples in her pretily turned cheeks and her eyes dance.

She wore a becoming gown of black velvet very simple in desig , a black velvet hat, brimless and quite close fitting, and long white gloves. The coat was the one she wore for the inaugural ceremonies, of black broadtail quite conservative in length and with a broad collar of sable and a deep band of the fur reaching the bottom of the coat. The cuffs of sable were quite deep.

With Mrs. Hoover was her uncle, W. D. Henry of Wahpeton; her sister, Mrs. Jean Henry Large; Mrs. May Leavitt, the sister of the president, ... Mrs. Mark Requa of California, second year of her residence here as the wife of the vice president, and when she became the first lady of the land Miss ...andolph accompanied her to the Wh... House, occupying a secondary plac... under Miss Laura Harlan, who ha... been secretary to Mrs. Harding. La...r she succeeded to the first place a... was the friend and companion of ...Mrs. Coolidge as well as secretary. ...hat Miss Randolph is successful in ...er position is evidenced by the ...ct that she made no enemies for th... first lady, her position being such ... that she might at any time cause ... social quarrel.

Serving with ... Randolph as secretary are Miss ...Ruth Fessler, who not only served ... Hoover but Mr. Hoover as well, ...d Miss Mildred Hall, who has be... with Mrs. Hoover for a lesser ti... Miss Fessler is a particularly ca...ble woman and was secretary to D... Vernon Kellogg, the close friend of ...r. Hoover.

The large house ...rty entertained by Vice President C...tis and his sister, Mrs. Gann, ov... March 4 is almost entirely disban...d, Mrs. Charles P. George, wife of M... George, alone remaining until Mo...ay. The vice president's son and ...ughter-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Harry ...ng Curtis, returned to Chicago ea... in the week, Mr. and Mrs. Webste... Knight II. returned to their hom... early in the week, and Mrs. Jero... Colvin, the vice president's sister, ...turned ... Topeka in midweek.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
TIMES

ROYALTY AT THE ACADEMY

Serge Koussevitsky brought his Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Academy of Music last night for the fourth in a series of five concerts there this season. And Mr. Koussevitsky likewise brought a program which was somewhat different from the usual symphonic fare.

His opening symphony—he had two on his program—was a composition of royalty, being the handiwork of Frederick the Great, who is said to have been somewhat of a flutist among other accomplishments. Therefore, it was to be expected that the symphony would be a setting for flute fireworks and thus it proved to be what with two such instruments holding forth in the andante. The symphony is of the intimate type and requires only a small orchestra for its rendition. Mr. Koussevitsky read it carefully and somewhat attractively.

Came then the Sibelius concerto for violin and orchestra in D Minor and Richard Burgin, concertmeister of the orchestra, was the assisting soloist. Mr. Burgin appears rather regularly in this role here in Brooklyn. The violinist displayed a sweet and pleasing tone albeit somewhat lacking in texture and content. It was a fiery reading but not one of depth either interpretatively or tonally.

The second symphonic offering was the No. 5 of Tschaikovsky which closed the program and which was presented more in keeping with the tenets of the orchestra. Mr. Koussevitsky was thoroughly at home in it and so was the orchestra and the reading was the highlight of the ev... H. E. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL
MAR 8 - 1929

KOUSSEVITZKY
Be convinced—Visit a Store To-day and judge
You will marvel at the supe
exquisite appearance.

The ... inflation and deflation has affected the reputation of Richard Strauss as a composer more swiftly than it has anyone else identified with the last quarter of the nineteenth century—for Strauss was already accounted for by the time the twentieth was well begun. Once extravagantly labelled the superman of music, he is now seen to be merely an innovator of trivialities. And every new performance nowadays of one of his "tone poems" serves to confirm this judgment.

These performances seem to grow less and less frequent as time goes on, but occasionally a conductor, for one or another of the reasons which nt to unaccountably actuate conductors, does programme a Strauss work. Serge Koussevitzky has lately been attracted to the "Also Sprach Zarathustra" ("Thus Spake Zarathustra"), and after playing it in Boston brought it to Carnegie Hall last night on the latest visit of the Boston Orchestra.

SELDOM PLAYED.

We believe it is three years since the piece was last done here and the total of its performances in the thirty-three years since it was written has been small. The whole active Strauss orchestral repertoire, indeed, consists now of scarcely more than "Death and Transfiguration," "A Hero's Life" and "Don Juan," and even the second of these would propably not be heard much hereabouts if it hadn't been dedicated to Willem Mengelberg.

"Zarathustra," in a way, is the most pretentious of all the Strauss "tone poems," since here the composer seeks to create the impression that he has translated Nietzsche and pretty much the whose of his bombastic but dazzling philosophy into music. But what "Zarathustra" actually does is to make a paltry little word-of-one-syllable story, a series of puny sentimentalist episodes out of Nietzsche and his Uebermensch. It is much the same thing as though Shelley, let us say, were to be rewritten by Mr. Eddie Guest.

Most of Strauss's output is distinguished chiefly by two things—clever orchestral effects and as commonplace a melodic substance as can readily be imagined in a symphonic composer. But in "Zarathustra" the latter far more than ordinarily overbalances the former. There is one sugary and cheap melodic episode after another which of course has about as much to do with Nietzsche as a chocolate sundae has to do with strong drink.

NEEDS GUIDEBOOK.

There are some obviously childish attempts to work over into musical expression a dash of some of the Nietzchean philosophic ideas (probably an impossible thing for music to express under any circumstances). There is, for example, a fugued passage; which is supposed to convey the notion of Nietzsche's ideas on science; and the piece ends in two keys—very high in B-major, whilst the basses are in C-major with the trombones intoning an unresolved chord, from all of which one is expected to divine that the Ideal remains aloft whilst the riddle of the universe persists unsolved.

Of course no one can possibly divine anything of the sort without a guidebook and would merely believe Strauss to be playing musical anagrams if he could. The whole work, indeed, needs its guidebook in order to be followed at all intelligibly; without one it simply becomes a string of highly sentimentalist episodes.

Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to be pleasantly engaged in playing this music. He sugared its sentimentalism to the last drop and made its one-syllable story a neatly dramatic "outline" of Strauss. Otherwise last evening he was concerned with the American, Arthur Foote's E-major suite for strings, well written but not particularly individual music, and Maurice Ravel's orchestral version of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition.'

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE
MAR 8 - 1929

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

Mr. Koussewitsky Conducts "Also sprach Zarathustra"—"Siegfried" and "La Rondine" at the Metropolitan Opera House.

IT WAS to Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra that we were last evening indebted for one of the infrequent performances which "Also sprach Zarathustra" receives in New York. Since it was first heard here, 30 or more years ago, inspiring one of Mr. Huneker's most memorable monographs on Strauss, it has remained perhaps the least popular of the early tone-poems (we except, of course, "Macbeth"). Condemned by some blunderer as an arid and irksome score, a tedious attempt to expound metaphysics in music, toilsome and thorny as an entertainment, it gathers dust, neglected on library shelves. Conductors avoid it, and audiences know it not. Thus pedantry spoils our fun.

Long ago Strauss disclaimed any intention of setting Nietzsche to music: his "Zarathustra" deals not with the dialectic of philosophy, but its fructifying impulse, the lust for self-enlargement, for the completion and consummation of life, its justification in freedom and beauty and truth. This theme Strauss' music shares with Nietzsche's great rhapsody, from which its inspiration sprang, and we ought not, by a more literal interpretation, confine its eloquence.

"Zarathustra" assaults the imagination, a mighty and a magnificent work. It deserves its place with "Don Quixote" and "Ein Heldenleben," as the least of a trinity of symphonic masterpieces, but still grander in scope and more profound in substance than even its treasurable predecessors among the Strauss tone-poems, "Don Juan" and "Till." We cannot listen to the apocalyptic introduction nor to the desperate C-minor declarations of the strings in the section "Of Joys and Passions" and believe that this is the lesser Strauss who speaks, or find here the prophecy of artistic impotence. This music is surpassed only in the finest pages of the later works.

The performance under Mr. Koussewitsky's direction was of unrivaled splendor, to which the orchestra contributed its vital tone, its skill and ardor of execution.

The Strauss was preceded by a little-known Suite in E for Strings by the American Arthur Foote. Composed previous to 1909, but seldom played, it contains harmless and agreeable music, neither poor in invention nor awkward in presentation. Mr. Koussewitsky played this Suite with the grace and energy that in turn it demanded. After an intermission that followed "Zarathustra" the evening was given over to Ravel's orchestral transcription of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," for which Mr. Koussewitsky appears to feel an inexplicable affection.

* * *

The revelation of Wagner's "Ring des Nibelungen" continued at the Metropolitan Opera House yesterday afternoon with a performance of "Siegfried," the second music-drama of the trilogy. Thus far, these Wagnerian matinees have maintained a higher standard of excellence than is attained at ordinary subscription performances, though whether this should be ascribed to coincidence or to design we cannot know. The excellence that characterized the presentation of "Das Rheingold" two weeks ago was again apparent in the "Siegfried." Memory again contrasted Mr. Serafin's glowing version of the score with the more pedestrian conducting of a colleague, but upon the stage equal cause for satisfaction and enthusiasm was afforded. Pace the conscientious objectors, Mr. Laubenthal's Siegfried is as good as we may hope to have. As for Mr. Schorr's Wanderer, it is incomparable, nor does one ask a finer Erda than that of Mme. Branzell.

Yesterday Mme. Kappel sang the "Siegfried" Bruennhilde for the first time this year, and to the effect of her performance may be ascribed the triumphant conclusion of the afternoon. She sang splendidly, with the full exercise of her gift for vocal dramatization, with beauty and flexibility and plenitude of tone, a role difficult for her since it lies consistently high. That it in any way taxed her was yesterday difficult to believe.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
MAR 8 - 192

MUSIC

...hard L. Stokes

...e right to an off-day than Serge K... ...on Symphony Orchestra, and he exercised ...ening at Carnegie Hall. His program was ...mely in print but which scarcely come off ...e eminent Bostonian had desired to prove ...perfervid emotion but of sobriety, quietude, ...le was not altogether convincing.

...pote's ... g or... ...poem, ...hard ...lean; ...rans... ...ieces, ...lass., ...rmed ...dim ...or of ...ently ...ng of ...elude ...iddle ...—the ...l and ...t was ...f the present day, and was refreshing in its pellucid grace and its confident air of distinction. It was the score of a writer who had taken the trouble to master the spelling, grammar and rhetoric of his art. A more eloquent reading was deserved than that obtained from Mr. Koussevitzky, whose performance seemed a casual gesture in the direction of Americanism.

* * *

In the ensuing tone poem, Dr. Strauss undertook to illustrate the evolution of the human race through its sacerdotal hallucinations of the past, its scientific aberrations of the present, and its progress to the doctrine of the superman in the future. Interspersed are episodes from Nietzsche's book answerable to lyric treatment, such the passages entitled "Of the G... Yearning," "Of Joys and Passion "Grave Song," "The Convalescen "Dance Song," and "Night Song."

Mr. Koussevitzky delivered wi splendor and power the mighty intr... duction, ending on a C Major chor like the spring of the sun above th horizon, and depicted the realm of th Dwellers in the Rear World—that is, the unfortunates whose minds are still darkened and lamed by traditional religion—with a sombre and tragic horror recalling the deeps of the river bed in "Das Rheingold." Across this gloom ran the tattered and mendicant snivel of a Gregorian hymn. Science fared no better than theology, its pomp and bombast being caricatured by means of a pretentious and risible fugue.

While this work is not one of the prime Straussian masterpieces, it is scarcely so dreary and protracted as it appeared yesterday evening. Mr. Koussevitzky seemed more concerned with detail than with the structure's broad lines, and to regard it as an intellectual rather than a musical document. But the enigmatic conclusion of the World Riddle, with the orchestra playing in two keys, was projected by the conductor with much of the quality of its mystic agnosticism.

* * *

Three other composers besides Ravel have tried their hands at instrumenting the "Pictures at an Exhibition," forgetting that had Moussorgsky wished to express his impressions by means of the orchestra instead of the piano, he would undoubtedly have done so. Mr. Ravel has done a stunning job, but it seemed to me that the canvas was too large for the material.

At any rate, I have gained a clearer and more graphic notion of the pictures described by means of piano performances. This may again have been due to the performance, through the familiar Koussevitzky blazed up at the end in the proclamation celebrating "The Gate of the Bohatyrs at Kiev."

...dor of the colossal opening; ...eful, gently ironic "Dance ...nd the mysterious bi-tonal ...n. Then along came ...oussevitzky and the Boston ...Orchestra last night and ...ens. ...Spake Zarathustra" was the ...offering of the visiting ...ns at their Carnegie Hall ...of yesterday, and as they ...it every bar stood forth ...g, pulsing life. For perfec... ...rchestral style and execu... ...rich, warm, encompassing ...his performance was with... ...arallel in my experience. ...breadth, the poise, the ...grandeur, the vivifying ...imaginative insight of Mr. Koussevitzky's reading made that of Richard Strauss himself seem in comparison pale and shallow.

The Strauss composition shared the program with two other numbers—Arthur Foote's E major suite for strings and Ravel's orchestral version of Moussorgsky's familiar piano suite, "Pictures at an Exhibition." In Mr. Foote's work the justly famed Bostonian string choir was heard to radiant advantage. The suite itself, composed over twenty years ago, possesses qualities which ... ...e piping times of atonality, ...ality, "new" counterpoint, ...or second regnant are mer... ...'dated."

...y one who still hankers ... outmoded flesh pots of win... ...lody, orthodox workman... ...hony, grace and even— ... horrors!—elegance will ... meats seasoned to his lik...

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, N. J.
EVE. NEWS

New Regime Gets Its Social Bearings Without Trouble

Special to the NEWARK NEWS.

WASHINGTON—Music ... it would seem, is to have a place among the chosen interests and pleasures of the new administration.

Mrs. Hoover's first public appearance as first lady of the land was at the Boston Symphony concert Wednesday afternoon. This afternoon the first White House concert will be given in the east room by the Westminster Choir of Dayton O.

It will be a private audition, arranged by Mrs. Harry Elstner Talbott, spons...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

TO DINE KOUSSEVITZKY

On April 1 a dinner will be given at Hotel Commodore by the Bohemians' Club in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Only gentlemen will be present, but they will be entertained by ladies. Mme. Lea Luboschutz will perform on the violin, and Mme. Rosina Lhevinne will play the piano.

...oover and Party Occupy Box at Symphony Concert

By SALLIE V. H. PICKETT

WASHINGTON, March 9.—(AP)—Socially speaking, the new administration is finding its bearings without the slightest difficulty, both the president and Mrs. Hoover being well versed in the intricate labyrinth of official etiquette, the most important event being in arranging for the diplomatic corps to meet the new administration. This the president and Mrs. Hoover have planned for 4 o'clock Monday afternoon.

For the first time since becoming the first lady of the land Mrs. Hoover occupied the White House box in a local theater, going to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra in its ... gram. She created quite a flurry as the White House car drove up and she and her party stepped out.

While Mrs. Coolidge added to the fame of her husband's administration by her spontaneous smile Mrs. Hoover also smiles, and when she does she shows dimples in her pretily turned cheeks and her eyes dance.

She wore a becoming gown of black velvet very simple in desig , a black velvet hat, brimless and quite close fitting, and long white gloves. The coat was the one she wore for the inaugural ceremonies, of black broadtail quite conservative in length and with a broad collar of sable and a deep band of the fur reaching the bottom of the coat. The cuffs of sable were quite deep.

With Mrs. Hoover was her uncle, W. D. Henry of Wahpeton; her sister, Mrs. Jean Henry Large; Mrs. May Leavitt, the sister of the president, Mrs. Mark Requa of California, second year of her residence here as the wife of the vice president, and when she became the first lady of the land Miss Randolph accompanied her to the Whi... House, occupying a secondary plac... under Miss Laura Harlan, who ha... been secretary to Mrs. Harding. L... she succeeded to the first place a... was the friend and companion of... Mrs. Coolidge as well as secretary. ...hat Miss Randolph is successful in ... position is evidenced by the ...ct that she made no enemies for th... first lady, her position being suc... that she might at any time cause ... social quarrel.

Serving with M... Randolph as secretary are Miss ... Ruth Fessler, who not only served ... Hoover but Mr. Hoover as well, ... Miss Mildred Hall, who has be... with Mrs. Hoover for a lesser ti... Miss Fessler is a particularly ca... woman and was secretary to D... Vernon Kellogg, the close friend of ... Hoover.

The large house ... by Vice President ... tis and his sister, Mrs. Gann, ov... March 4 is almost entirely disban... Mrs. Charles P. George, wife of M... George, alone remaining until Mo... ay. The vice president's son and ... ughter-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Harry ... ng Curtis, returned to Chicago ea... in the week, Mr. and Mrs. Webste... Knight II. returned to their hom... early in the week, and Mrs. Jero... Colvin, the vice president's sister, ... urned ... Topeka in midweek.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
TIMES

ROYALTY AT THE ACADEMY

Serge Koussevitsky brought his Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Academy of Music last night for the fourth in a series of five concerts there this season. And Mr. Koussevitsky likewise brought a program which was somewhat different from the usual symphonic fare.

His opening symphony ... had two on his program ... was a composition of royalty, being the handiwork of Frederick the Great, who is said to have been somewhat of a flutist among other accomplishments. Therefore, it was to be expected that the symphony would be a setting for flute fireworks and thus it proved to be what with two such instruments holding forth in the andante. The symphony is of the intimate type and requires only a small orchestra for its rendition. Mr. Koussevitsky read it carefully and somewhat attractively.

Came then the Sibelius concerto for violin and orchestra in D Minor and Richard Burgin, concertmeister of the orchestra, was the assisting soloist. Mr. Burgin appears rather regularly in this role here in Brooklyn. The violinist displayed a sweet and pleasing tone albeit somewhat lacking in texture and content. It was a fiery reading but not one of depth either interpretatively or tonally.

The second symphonic offering was the No. 5 of Tschaikovsky which closed the program and which was presented more in keeping with the tenets of the orchestra. Mr. Koussevitsky was thoroughly at home in it and so was the orchestra and the reading was the highlight of the ...

H. E. S.

126

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL
MAR 8 - 1929

KOUSSEVITZKY

Be convinced—Visit a Store To-day and judge f
You will marvel at the supe
exquisite appearance.

The [illegible] of inflation and deflation has affected the reputation of Richard Strauss as a composer more swiftly than it has anyone else identified with the last quarter of the nineteenth century—for Strauss was already accounted for by the time the twentieth was well begun. Once extravagantly labelled the superman of music, he is now seen to be merely an innovator of trivialities. And every new performance nowadays of one of his "tone poems" serves to confirm this judgment.

These performances seem to grow less and less frequent as time goes on, but occasionally a conductor, for one or another of the reasons which nt to unaccountably actuate conductors, does programme a Strauss work. Serge Koussevitzky has lately been attracted to the "Also Sprach Zarathustra" ("Thus Spake Zarathustra"), and after playing it in Boston brought it to Carnegie Hall last night on the latest visit of the Boston Orchestra.

SELDOM PLAYED.

We believe it is three years since the piece was last done here and the total of its performances in the thirty-three years since it was written has been small. The whole active Strauss orchestral repertoire, indeed, consists now of scarcely more than "Death and Transfiguration," "A Hero's Life" and "Don Juan," and even the second of these would propably not be heard much hereabouts if it hadn't been dedicated to Willem Mengelberg.

"Zarathustra," in a way, is the most pretentious of all the Strauss "tone poems," since here the composer seeks to create the impression that he has translated Nietzsche and pretty much the whose of his bombastic but dazzling philosophy into music. But what "Zarathustra" actually does is to make a paltry little word-of-one-syllable story, a series of puny sentimentalist episodes out of Nietzsche and his Uebermensch. It is much the same thing as though Shelley, let us say, were to be rewritten by Mr. Eddie Guest.

Most of Strauss's output is distinguished chiefly by two things—clever orchestral effects and as commonplace a melodic substance as can readily be imagined in a symphonic composer. But in "Zarathustra" the latter far more than ordinarily overbalances the former. There is one sugary and cheap melodic episode after another which of course has about as much to do with Nietzsche as a chocolate sundae has to do with strong drink.

NEEDS GUIDEBOOK.

There are some obviously childish attempts to work over into musical expression a dash of some of the Nietzchean philosophic ideas (probably an impossible thing for music to express under any circumstances). There is, for example, a fugued passage; which is supposed to convey the notion of Nietzsche's ideas on science; and the piece ends in two keys—very high in B-major, whilst the basses are in C-major with the trombones intoning an unresolved chord, from all of which one is expected to divine that the Ideal remains aloft whilst the riddle of the universe persists unsolved.

Of course no one can possibly divine anything of the sort without a guidebook and would merely believe Strauss to be playing musical anagrams if he could. The whole work, indeed, needs its guidebook in order to be followed at all intelligibly; without one it simply becomes a string of highly sentimentalist episodes.

Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to be pleasantly engaged in playing this music. He sugared its sentimentalism to the last drop and made its one-syllable story a neatly dramatic "outline" of Strauss. Otherwise last evening he was concerned with the American, Arthur Foote's E-major suite for strings, well written but not particularly individual music, and Maurice Ravel's orchestral version of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE
MAR 8 - 1929

house, lawn, shrubbery, large trees; plot 53x100x78x102; copper screens, garden tools. LAFayette 1493.

LYNBROOK—Stores; Atlantic, corner Union av. Telephone PENnsylvania 4674-1431. Broadway, corner 40th st.

QUEENS VILLAGE—Cozy attractive tax-exempt corner home, with garage, $150 worth shrubbery surrounds house, six rooms, bath, sun parlor, parquet floors first floor, hardwood second, copper screens; Tontine shades, curtains, draperies for entire house. Phone HOLlis 7049.

RIVIERA PARK,

SAYVILLE, L. I. FOR THE DISCRIMINATING BUYER WE OFFER A CHARMING NEW DUTCH COLONIAL HOME OF 9 ROOMS AND 3 BATHS ON A LANDSCAPED PLOT; GARAGE AND BOATHOUSE; YACHT, COUNTRY AND GOLF CLUB NEARBY. NOTE—ONLY 55 MILES FROM BROADWAY. PRICED FOR QUICK SALE, $22,000.

WESTWOOD REALTY CO.,
685 FLATBUSH AV. FLATBUSH 4030.

ROCKVILLE CENTRE—Our most complete list includes the home that will meet all your requirements. Canterbury Realty Corp., Sunrise Highway and North Village av. Telephone Rockville Centre 3800.

ROCKVILLE CENTRE, 7-room house, all improvements, open plumbing, steam; 57x200, barn, 10 minuts schools, station.

[illegible] shares with Nietzsche's great rhapsody, from which its inspiration sprang, and we ought not, by a more literal interpretation, confine its eloquence.

"Zarathustra" assaults the imagination, a mighty and a magnificent work. It deserves its place with "Don Quixote" and "Ein Heldenleben," as the least of a trinity of symphonic masterpieces, but still grander in scope and more profound in substance than even its treasurable predecessors among the Strauss tone-poems, "Don Juan" and "Till." We cannot listen to the apocalyptic introduction nor to the desperate C-minor declarations of the strings in the section "Of Joys and Passions" and believe that this is the lesser Strauss who speaks, or find here the prophecy of artistic impotence. This music is surpassed only in the finest pages of the later works.

The performance under Mr. Koussewitsky's direction was of unrivaled splendor, to which the orchestra contributed its vital tone, its skill and ardor of execution.

The Strauss was preceded by a little-known Suite in E for Strings by the American Arthur Foote. Composed previous to 1909, but seldom played, it contains harmless and agreeable music, neither poor in invention nor awkward in presentation. Mr. Koussewitsky played this Suite with the grace and energy that in turn it demanded. After an intermission that followed "Zarathustra" the evening was given over to Ravel's orchestral transcription of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," for which Mr. Koussewitsky appears to feel an inexplicable affection.

* * *

The revelation of Wagner's "Ring des Nibelungen" continued at the Metropolitan Opera House yesterday afternoon with a performance of "Siegfried," the second music-drama of the trilogy. Thus far, these Wagnerian matinees have maintained a higher standard of excellence than is attained at ordinary subscription performances, though whether this should be ascribed to coincidence or to design we cannot know. The excellence that characterized the presentation of "Das Rheingold" two weeks ago was again apparent in the "Siegfried." Memory again contrasted Mr. Serafin's glowing version of the score with the more pedestrian conducting of a colleague, but upon the stage equal cause for satisfaction and enthusiasm was afforded. Pace the conscientious objectors, Mr. Laubenthal's Siegfried is as good as we may hope to have. As for Mr. Schorr's Wanderer, it is incomparable, nor does one ask a finer Erda than that of Mme. Branzell.

Yesterday Mme. Kappel sang the "Siegfried" Bruennhilde for the first time this year, and to the effect of her performance may be ascribed the triumphant conclusion of the afternoon. She sang splendidly, with the full exercise of her gift for vocal dramatization, with beauty and flexibility and plenitude of tone, a role difficult for her since it lies consistently high. That it in any way taxed her was yesterday difficult to believe.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
MAR 8 - 1929

MUSIC

By Richard L. Stokes

NO ONE has better earned the right to an off-day than Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and he exercised the privilege yesterday evening at Carnegie Hall. His program was one of those which shine handsomely in print but which scarcely come off in performance. It was as if the eminent Bostonian had desired to prove that he was capable not only of perfervid emotion but of sobriety, quietude, and even philosophy. His new role was not altogether convincing.

The numbers were Arthur Foote's Suite in E Major, Op. 63, for string orchestra; the rarely heard tone poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra," by Richard Strauss, himself an ardent Nietzschean; and Maurice Ravel's orchestral transcription of Moussorgsky's piano pieces, "Pictures at an Exhibition."

Mr. Foote was born at Salem, Mass., in 1853, and his suite, first performed in 1909 and harking back to the dim era when Max Fiedler was director of the Boston orchestra, was sufficiently antiquarian to take on the seeming of a novelty. With its classical Prelude and Fugue—but with a pizzicato middle movement by way of innovation—the music was perhaps only a pallid and belated phantom of Bach, but it was untouched by the turbulence of the present day, and was refreshing in its pellucid grace and its confident air of distinction. It was the score of a writer who had taken the trouble to master the spelling, grammar and rhetoric of his art. A more eloquent reading was deserved than that obtained from Mr. Koussevitzky, whose performance seemed a casual gesture in the direction of Americanism.

* * *

In the ensuing tone poem, Dr. Strauss undertook to illustrate the evolution of the human race through its sacerdotal hallucinations of the past, its scientific aberrations of the present, and its progress to the doctrine of the superman in the future. Interspersed are episodes from Nietzsche's book answerable to lyric treatment, such as the passages entitled "Of the Great Yearning," "Of Joys and Passions," "Grave Song," "The Convalescent," "Dance Song," and "Night Song."

Mr. Koussevitzky delivered with splendor and power the mighty introduction, ending on a C Major chord like the spring of the sun above the horizon, and depicted the realm of the Dwellers in the Rear World—that is, the unfortunates whose minds are still darkened and lamed by traditional religion—with a sombre and tragic horror recalling the deeps of the river bed in "Das Rheingold." Across this gloom ran the tattered and mendicant snivel of a Gregorian hymn. Science fared no better than theology, its pomp and bombast being caricatured by means of a pretentious and risible fugue.

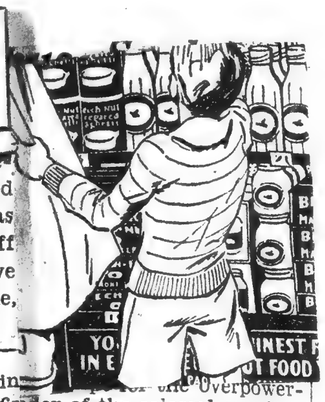
While this work is not one of the prime Straussian masterpieces, it is scarcely so dreary and protracted as it appeared yesterday evening. Mr. Koussevitzky seemed more concerned with detail than with the structure's broad lines, and to regard it as an intellectual rather than a musical document. But the enigmatic conclusion of "The World Riddle, with the orchestra playing in two keys, was projected by the conductor with much of the quality of its mystic agnosticism.

* * *

Three other composers besides Ravel have tried their hands at instrumenting the "Pictures at an Exhibition," forgetting that had Moussorgsky wished to express his impressions by means of the orchestra instead of the piano, he would undoubtedly have done so. Mr. Ravel has done a stunning job, but it seemed to me that the canvas was too large for the material.

At any rate, I have gained a clearer and more graphic notion of the pictures described by means of piano performances. This may again have been due to the performance, through the familiar Koussevitzky blazed up at the end in the proclamation celebrating "The Gate of the Bohatyrs at Kiev."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAM
MAR 8 - 1929



[illegible] of the colossal opening; ful, gently ironic "Dance nd the mysterious bi-tonal n. Then along came oussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra last night and my smug little theory to ens.

Spake Zarathustra" was the offering of the visiting ns at their Carnegie Hall of yesterday, and as they it every bar stood forth g, pulsing life. For perfec- rchestral style and execu- rich, warm, encompassing his performance was with- arallel in my experience. breadth, the poise, the grandeur, the vivifying imaginative insight of Mr. Koussevitzky's reading made that of Richard Strauss himself seem in comparison pale and shallow.

The Strauss composition shared the program with two other numbers—Arthur Foote's E major suite for strings and Ravel's orchestral version of Moussorgsky's familiar piano suite, "Pictures at an Exhibition." In Mr. Foote's work the justly famed Bostonian string choir was heard to radiant advantage. The suite itself, composed over twenty years ago, possesses qualities which in these piping times of atonality, polytonality, "new" counterpoint, and minor second regnant are mercilessly "dated."

Yet any one who still hankers after the outmoded flesh pots of winsome melody, orthodox workmanship, euphony, grace and even—horror of horrors!—elegance will here find meats seasoned to his lik-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

NE KOUSSEVITZKY

[illegible] 1 a dinner will be given at Commodore by the Bohemians' [illegible] in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Only gentlemen will be present, but they will be entertained by ladies. Mme. Lea Luboschutz will perform on the violin, and Mme. Rosina Lhevinne will play the piano.

W[illegible] seem[illegible] chosen [illegible] new adm[illegible]

Mrs. H[illegible] [illegible]as a ance as fi[illegible] [illegible]ert hec the Boston [illegible] Wednesday a[illegible] [illegible]s afternoc the first White [illegible] [illegible]oncert will b given in the ea[illegible]om by the Wes minster Choir of Dayton O.

It will be a private audition, arrang by Mrs. Harry Elstner Talbott, spons

[illegible]oover and Party Occupy Box at Symphony Concert

By SALLIE V. H. PICKETT

WASHINGTON, March 9.—(AP)—Socially speaking, the new administration is finding its bearings without the slightest difficulty, both the president and Mrs. Hoover being well versed in the intricate labyrinth of official etiquette, the most important event being in arranging for the diplomatic corps to meet the new administration. This the president and Mrs. Hoover have planned for 4 o'clock Monday afternoon.

For the first time since becoming the first lady of the land Mrs. Hoover occupied the White House box in a local theater, going to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra in its [illegible] gram. She created quite a flurry as the White House car drove up and she and her party stepped out.

While Mrs. Coolidge added to the fame of her husband's administration by her spontaneous smile Mrs. Hoover also smiles, and when she does she shows dimples in her pretily turned cheeks and her eyes dance.

She wore a becoming gown of black velvet very simple in desig , a black velvet hat, brimless and quite close fitting, and long white gloves. The coat was the one she wore for the inaugural ceremonies, of black broadtail quite conservative in length and with a broad collar of sable and a deep band of the fur reaching the bottom of the coat. The cuffs of sable were quite deep.

With Mrs. Hoover was her uncle, W. D. Henry of Wahpeton; her sister, Mrs. Jean Henry Large; Mrs. May Leavitt, the sister of the president, [illegible] Mark Requa of California, second year of her residence here as the wife of the vice president, and when she became the first lady of the land Miss [illegible]andolph accompanied her to the Whi[illegible] House, occupying a secondary plac[illegible] under Miss Laura Harlan, who ha[illegible] been secretary to Mrs. Harding. La[illegible]r she succeeded to the first place a[illegible] was the friend and companion of [illegible]Mrs. Coolidge as well as secretary. [illegible]hat Miss Randolph is successful in [illegible]er position is evidenced by the [illegible]ct that she made no enemies for th[illegible] first lady, her position being such [illegible] that she might at any time cause [illegible] social quarrel.

Serving with M[illegible]s Randolph as secretary are Miss [illegible]Ruth Fessler, who not only served [illegible]. Hoover but Mr. Hoover as well [illegible]nd Miss Mildred Hall, who has be[illegible] with Mrs. Hoover for a lesser ti[illegible] Miss Fessler is a particularly ca[illegible]ble woman and was secretary to D[illegible] Vernon Kellogg, the close friend of [illegible]r. Hoover.

The large house [illegible]rty entertained by Vice President C[illegible]tis and his sister, Mrs. Gann, ove[illegible] March 4 is almost entirely disban[illegible]d, Mrs. Charles P. George, wife of M[illegible] George, alone remaining until Mo[illegible]ay. The vice president's son and [illegible]ughter-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Harry [illegible]ng Curtis, returned to Chicago ea[illegible] in the week, Mr. and Mrs. Webste[illegible]Knight II. returned to their hom[illegible]early in the week, and Mrs. Jeron[illegible] Colvin, the vice president's sister, [illegible]urned to Topeka in midweek.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
TIMES

ROYALTY AT THE ACADEMY

Serge Koussevitsky brought his Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Academy of Music last night for the fourth in a series of five concerts there this season. And Mr. Koussevitsky likewise brought a program which was somewhat different from the usual symphonic fare.

His opening symphony—he had two on his program—was a composition of royalty, being the handiwork of Frederick the Great, who is said to have been somewhat of a flutist among other accomplishments. Therefore, it was to be expected that the symphony would be a setting for flute fireworks and thus it proved to be what with two such instruments holding forth in the andante. The symphony is of the intimate type and requires only a small orchestra for its rendition. Mr. Koussevitsky read it carefully and somewhat attractively.

Came then the Sibelius concerto for violin and orchestra in D Minor and Richard Burgin, concertmeister of the orchestra, was the assisting soloist. Mr. Burgin appears rather regularly in this role here in Brooklyn. The violinist displayed a sweet and pleasing tone albeit somewhat lacking in texture and content. It was a fiery reading but not one of depth either interpretatively or tonally.

The second symphonic offering was the No. 5 of Tschaikovsky which closed the program and which was presented more in keeping with the tenets of the orchestra. Mr. Koussevitsky was thoroughly at home in it and so was the orchestra and the reading was the highlight of the [illegible]

H. E. S.

126

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL
MAR 8 - 1929

KOUSSEVITZKY
Be convinced—Visit a Store To-day and judge f
You will marvel at the supe
exquisite appearance.

The [illegible] of inflation and deflation has affected the reputation of Richard Strauss as a composer more swiftly than it has anyone else identified with the last quarter of the nineteenth century—for Strauss was already accounted for by the time the twentieth was well begun. Once extravagantly labelled the superman of music, he is now seen to be merely an innovator of trivialities. And every new performance nowadays of one of his "tone poems" serves to confirm this judgment.

These performances seem to grow less and less frequent as time goes on, but occasionally a conductor, for one or another of the reasons which nt to unaccountably actuate conductors, does programme a Strauss work. Serge Koussevitzky has lately been attracted to the "Also Sprach Zarathustra" ("Thus Spake Zarathustra"), and after playing it in Boston brought it to Carnegie Hall last night on the latest visit of the Boston Orchestra.

SELDOM PLAYED.

We believe it is three years since the piece was last done here and the total of its performances in the thirty-three years since it was written has been small. The whole active Strauss orchestral repertoire, indeed, consists now of scarcely more than "Death and Transfiguration," "A Hero's Life" and "Don Juan," and even the second of these would propably not be heard much hereabouts if it hadn't been dedicated to Willem Mengelberg.

"Zarathustra," in a way, is the most pretentious of all the Strauss "tone poems," since here the composer seeks to create the impression that he has translated Nietzsche and pretty much the whose of his bombastic but dazzling philosophy into music. But what "Zarathustra" actually does is to make a paltry little word-of-one-syllable story, a series of puny sentimentalist episodes out of Nietzsche and his Uebermensch. It is much the same thing as though Shelley, let us say, were to be rewritten by Mr. Eddie Guest.

Most of Strauss's output is distinguished chiefly by two things—clever orchestral effects and as commonplace a melodic substance as can readily be imagined in a symphonic composer. But in "Zarathustra" the latter far more than ordinarily overbalances the former. There is one sugary and cheap melodic episode after another which of course has about as much to do with Nietzsche as a chocolate sundae has to do with strong drink.

NEEDS GUIDEBOOK.

There are some obviously childish attempts to work over into musical expression a dash of some of the Nietzschean philosophic ideas (probably an impossible thing for music to express under any circumstances). There is, for example, a fugued passage; which is supposed to convey the notion of Nietzsche's ideas on science; and the piece ends in two keys—very high in B-major, whilst the basses are in C-major with the trombones intoning an unresolved chord, from all of which one is expected to divine that the Ideal remains aloft whilst the riddle of the universe persists unsolved.

Of course no one can possibly divine anything of the sort without a guidebook and would merely believe Strauss to be playing musical anagrams if he could. The whole work, indeed, needs its guidebook in order to be followed at all intelligibly; without one it simply becomes a string of highly sentimentalist episodes.

Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to be pleasantly engaged in playing this music. He sugared its sentimentalism to the last drop and made its one-syllable story a neatly dramatic "outline" of Strauss. Otherwise last evening he was concerned with the American, Arthur Foote's E-major suite for strings, well written but not particularly individual music, and Maurice Ravel's orchestral version of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE
MAR 8 - 1929

house, lawn, shrubbery, large trees; plot 53x100x78x102; copper screens, garden tools. LAFayette 1493.

LYNBROOK—Stores; Atlantic, corner Union av. Telephone PENnsylvania 4674-1431. Broadway, corner 40th st.

QUEENS VILLAGE—Cozy attractive tax-exempt corner home, with garage, $150 worth shrubbery surrounds house, six rooms, bath, sun parlor, parquet floors first floor, hardwood second, copper screens; Tontine shades, curtains, draperies for entire house. Phone HOLlis 7049.

RIVIERA PARK,

SAYVILLE, L. I. FOR THE DISCRIMINATING BUYER WE OFFER A CHARMING NEW DUTCH COLONIAL HOME OF 9 ROOMS AND 3 BATHS ON A LANDSCAPED PLOT; GARAGE AND BOATHOUSE; YACHT, COUNTRY AND GOLF CLUB NEARBY. NOTE—ONLY 55 MILES FROM BROADWAY. PRICED FOR QUICK SALE, $22,000.

WESTWOOD REALTY CO.,
685 FLATBUSH AV. FLATBUSH 4030.

ROCKVILLE CENTRE—Our most complete list includes the home that will meet all your requirements. Canterbury Realty Corp., Sunrise Highway and North Village av. Telephone Rockville Centre 3800.

ROCKVILLE CENTRE, 7-room house, all improvements, open plumbing, steam; 57x200, barn, 10 minuts schools, station.

[illegible] This theme Strauss [illegible] shares with Nietzsche's great rhapsody, from which its inspiration sprang, and we ought not, by a more literal interpretation, confine its eloquence.

"Zarathustra" assaults the imagination, a mighty and a magnificent work. It deserves its place with "Don Quixote" and "Ein Heldenleben," as the least of a trinity of symphonic masterpieces, but still grander in scope and more profound in substance than even its treasurable predecessors among the Strauss tone-poems, "Don Juan" and "Till." We cannot listen to the apocalyptic introduction nor to the desperate C-minor declarations of the strings in the section "Of Joys and Passions" and believe that this is the lesser Strauss who speaks, or find here the prophecy of artistic impotence. This music is surpassed only in the finest pages of the later works.

The performance under Mr. Koussewitsky's direction was of unrivaled splendor, to which the orchestra contributed its vital tone, its skill and ardor of execution.

The Strauss was preceded by a little-known Suite in E for Strings by the American Arthur Foote. Composed previous to 1909, but seldom played, it contains harmless and agreeable music, neither poor in invention nor awkward in presentation. Mr. Koussewitsky played this Suite with the grace and energy that in turn it demanded. After an intermission that followed "Zarathustra" the evening was given over to Ravel's orchestral transcription of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," for which Mr. Koussewitsky appears to feel an inexplicable affection.

* * *

The revelation of Wagner's "Ring des Nibelungen" continued at the Metropolitan Opera House yesterday afternoon with a performance of "Siegfried," the second music-drama of the trilogy. Thus far, these Wagnerian matinees have maintained a higher standard of excellence than is attained at ordinary subscription performances, though whether this should be ascribed to coincidence or to design we cannot know. The excellence that characterized the presentation of "Das Rheingold" two weeks ago was again apparent in the "Siegfried." Memory again contrasted Mr. Serafin's glowing version of the score with the more pedestrian conducting of a colleague, but upon the stage equal cause for satisfaction and enthusiasm was afforded. Pace the conscientious objectors, Mr. Laubenthal's Siegfried is as good as we may hope to have. As for Mr. Schorr's Wanderer, it is incomparable, nor does one ask a finer Erda than that of Mme. Branzell.

Yesterday Mme. Kappel sang the "Siegfried" Bruennhilde for the first time this year, and to the effect of her performance may be ascribed the triumphant conclusion of the afternoon. She sang splendidly, with the full exercise of her gift for vocal dramatization, with beauty and flexibility and plenitude of tone, a role difficult for her since it lies consistently high. That it in any way taxed her was yesterday difficult to believe.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
MAR 8 - 1929

MUSIC

—By Rich[illegible]

NO ONE has better earned the [illegible] vitzky, director of the Boston [illegible] the privilege yesterday even[illegible] one of those which shine handsom[illegible] in performance. It was as if the [illegible] that he was capable not only of p[illegible] and even philosophy. His new rol[illegible]

The numbers were Arthur Foo[illegible] Suite in E Major, Op. 63, for string [illegible] chestra; the rarely heard tone po[illegible] "Also Sprach Zarathustra," by Rich[illegible] Strauss, himself an ardent Nietzsche[illegible] and Maurice Ravel's orchestral tr[illegible] cription of Moussorgsky's piano pi[illegible] "Pictures at an Exhibition."

Mr. Foote was born at Salem, M[illegible] in 1853, and his suite, first perfor[illegible] in 1909 and harking back to the [illegible] era when Max Fiedler was direct[illegible] the Boston orchestra, was sufficie[illegible] antiquarian to take on the seemi[illegible] a novelty. With its classical Pr[illegible] and Fugue—but with a pizzicato m[illegible] movement by way of innovation—music was perhaps only a pallid belated phantom of Bach, but it untouched by the turbulence of [illegible] present day, and was refreshing in its pellucid grace and its confident air of distinction. It was the score of a writer who had taken the trouble to master the spelling, grammar and rhetoric of his art. A more eloquent reading was deserved than that obtained from Mr. Koussevitzky, whose performance seemed a casual gesture in the direction of Americanism.

* * *

In the ensuing tone poem, Dr. Strauss undertook to illustrate the evolution of the human race through its sacerdotal hallucinations of the past, its scientific aberrations of the present, and its progress to the doctrine of the superman in the future. Interspersed are episodes from Nietzsche's book answerable to lyric treatment, such as the passages entitled "Of the Great Yearning," "Of Joys and Passions," "Grave Song," "The Convalescent," "Dance Song," and "Night Song."

Mr. Koussevitzky delivered with splendor and power the mighty introduction, ending on a C Major chord like the spring of the sun above the horizon, and depicted the realm of the Dwellers in the Rear World—that is, the unfortunates whose minds are still darkened and lamed by traditional religion—with a sombre and tragic horror recalling the deeps of the river bed in "Das Rheingold." Across this gloom ran the tattered and mendicant snivel of a Gregorian hymn. Science fared no better than theology, its pomp and bombast being caricatured by means of a pretentious and risible fugue.

While this work is not one of the prime Straussian masterpieces, it is scarcely so dreary and protracted as it appeared yesterday evening. Mr. Koussevitzky seemed more concerned with detail than with the structure's broad lines, and to regard it as an intellectual rather than a musical document. But the enigmatic conclusion of the World

& 84th St. 3rd
n. and Sat. Ope until 10 P.M. Ever s YOU ed thi ng?
STORES, NO ice of all that is n ery room—for ever uch lower, affordi

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAM
MAR 8 - 1929

"Thus Spake Zarathustra" Is Dominating Boston Offering

By PITTS SANBORN.

IT is unprofitable business labelling and pigeon-holing a work of art and supposing its future settled so far as one's own self is concerned. I had fondly believed that the Nietzschean tone poem of Richard Strauss, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," had taken its definitive place in my musical cosmos—forever dead and done with except for the overpowering splendor of the colossal opening; the graceful, gently ironic "Dance Song," and the mysterious bi-tonal conclusion. Then along came Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night and knocked my smug little theory to smithereens.

"Thus Spake Zarathustra" was the principal offering of the visiting Bostonians at their Carnegie Hall concert of yesterday, and as they presented it every bar stood forth in glowing, pulsing life. For perfection of orchestral style and execution, for rich, warm, encompassing beauty, this performance was without a parallel in my experience. And the breadth, the poise, the measured grandeur, the vivifying imaginative insight of Mr. Koussevitzky's reading made that of Richard Strauss himself seem in comparison pale and shallow.

The Strauss composition shared the program with two other numbers—Arthur Foote's E major suite for strings and Ravel's orchestral version of Moussorgsky's familiar piano suite, "Pictures at an Exhibition." In Mr. Foote's work the justly famed Bostonian string choir was heard to radiant advantage. The suite itself, composed over twenty years ago, possesses qualities which in these piping times of atonality, polytonality, "new" counterpoint, and minor second regnant are mercilessly "dated."

Yet any one who still hankers after the outmoded flesh pots of winsome melody, orthodox workmanship, euphony, grace and even—horror of horrors!—elegance will here find meats seasoned to his liking. Mr. Foote's suite is charming music—discreetly reminiscent in parts, but none the worse for that. It was a pleasure to listen to it last evening—a pleasure alike for its own "dated" self and for the dateless excellence of the setting forth.

A huge audience received this concert with deserved enthusiasm.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

[illegible]E KOUSSEVITZKY
[illegible] a dinner will be given at Commodore by the Bohemians'
[illegible] in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Only gentlemen will be present, but they will be entertained by ladies. Mme. Lea Luboschutz will perform on the violin, and Mme. Rosina Lhevinne will play the piano.

[illegible] seem[illegible] chosen[illegible] new ad[illegible]
Mrs. H[illegible] ance as h[illegible] the Boston[illegible] Wednesday [illegible] the first White[illegible] given in the ea[illegible]om by the Wes minster Choir of Dayton O.
It will be a private audition, arrang by Mrs. Harry Elstner Talbott, spons

[illegible]oover and Party Occupy Box at Symphony Concert

By SALLIE V. H. PICKETT

WASHINGTON, March 9.—(AP)—Socially speaking, the new administration is finding its bearings without the slightest difficulty, both the president and Mrs. Hoover being well versed in the intricate labyrinth of official etiquette, the most important event being in arranging for the diplomatic corps to meet the new administration. This the president and Mrs. Hoover have planned for 4 o'clock Monday afternoon.

For the first time since becoming the first lady of the land Mrs. Hoover occupied the White House box in a local theater, going to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra in its [illegible]gram. She created quite a flurry as the White House car drove up and she and her party stepped out.

While Mrs. Coolidge added to the fame of her husband's administration by her spontaneous smile Mrs. Hoover also smiles, and when she does she shows dimples in her pretily turned cheeks and her eyes dance.

She wore a becoming gown of black velvet very simple in desig[illegible], a black velvet hat, brimless and quite close fitting, and long white gloves. The coat was the one she wore for the inaugural ceremonies, of black broadtail quite conservative in length and with a broad collar of sable and a deep band of the fur reaching the bottom of the coat. The cuffs of sable were quite deep.

With Mrs. Hoover was her uncle, W. D. Henry of Wahpeton; her sister, Mrs. Jean Henry Large; Mrs. May Leavitt, the sister of the president, [illegible] Mark Requa of California.

second year of her residence here as the wife of the vice president, and when she became the first lady of the land Miss [illegible]andolph accompanied her to the Whi[illegible] House, occupying a secondary plac[illegible] under Miss Laura Harlan, who ha[illegible] been secretary to Mrs. Harding. La[illegible]r she succeeded to the first place a[illegible] was the friend and companion of [illegible]Mrs. Coolidge as well as secretary. [illegible]hat Miss Randolph is successful in [illegible]er position is evidenced by the [illegible]ct that she made no enemies for th[illegible] first lady, her position being such [illegible] that she might at any time cause [illegible] social quarrel.

Serving with [illegible]s Randolph as secretary are Miss [illegible]Ruth Fessler, who not only served [illegible]. Hoover but Mr. Hoover as well, [illegible]nd Miss Mildred Hall, who has be[illegible] with Mrs. Hoover for a lesser ti[illegible] Miss Fessler is a particularly ca[illegible]ble woman and was secretary to D[illegible] Vernon Kellogg, the close friend of [illegible]r. Hoover.

The large house [illegible]rty entertained by Vice President [illegible]tis and his sister, Mrs. Gann, ov[illegible] March 4 is almost entirely disbar[illegible]d, Mrs. Charles P. George, wife of M[illegible] George, alone remaining until Mo[illegible]y. The vice president's son and [illegible]ughter-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Harry [illegible]ng Curtis, returned to Chicago ea[illegible] in the week, Mr. and Mrs. Webste[illegible]Knight II. returned to their hom[illegible]early in the week, and Mrs. Jero[illegible] Colvin, the vice president's sister, [illegible]urned To-peka in midweek.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
TIMES

ROYALTY AT THE ACADEMY

Serge Koussevitsky brought his Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Academy of Music last night for the fourth in a series of five concerts there this season. And Mr. Koussevitsky likewise brought a program which was somewhat different from the usual symphonic fare.

His opening symphony—he had two on his program—was a composition of royalty, being the handiwork of Frederick the Great, who is said to have been somewhat of a flutist among other accomplishments. Therefore, it was to be expected that the symphony would be a setting for flute fireworks and thus it proved to be what with two such instruments holding forth in the andante. The symphony is of the intimate type and requires only a small orchestra for its rendition. Mr. Koussevitsky read it carefully and somewhat attractively.

Came then the Sibelius concerto for violin and orchestra in D Minor and Richard Burgin, concertmeister of the orchestra, was the assisting soloist. Mr. Burgin appears rather regularly in this role here in Brooklyn. The violinist displayed a sweet and pleasing tone albeit somewhat lacking in texture and content. It was a fiery reading but not one of depth either interpretatively or tonally.

The second symphonic offering was the No. 5 of Tschaikovsky which closed the program and which was presented more in keeping with the tenets of the orchestra. Mr. Koussevitsky was thoroughly at home in it and so was the orchestra and the reading was the highlight of the [illegible]

H. E. S.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
MAR 9 - 1929

MUSIC

A King and a Peer, Frederick the Great and the Ninth Baron Berners, Appear With Plebeian Strauss and Brahms as Composers on Week's Symphonic Programs—Frederick's Contrasted Relations With Voltaire and Bach

By Richard L. Stokes

FROM the herd of arrant commoners, such as Balakireff, Sibelius, Strauss and Brahms, who figure on this week's orchestral programs as suitors for popular suffrage, there emerges the rare and dazzling apparition of two Persons of Quality. The first is Gerald Hugh Tyrwhitt, ninth Baron Berners, whose suite from "The Triumph of Neptune: an English Pantomime in Ten Tableaux," was presented on Tuesday evening—with but slight accession of lustre to the nobility—by Eugene Goossens and the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra. The other is no less a being than the most formidable of Prussian autocrats, Frederick the Great, whose Symphony No. 3, in D Major, is scheduled for this afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky. It remains to be seen whether the royal opus will bolster up the declining estate of monarchy.

That the victor of Rossbach and Leuthen was an indefatigable scribbler of wretched doggerel is familiarly known, and also that he was an industrious performer on the flute. The further circumstances that he was a prolific composer may cause suprise, even to those reasonably acquainted with the minutiae of musical biography. When a search of the archives was instituted in 1835 by King Frederick William III., there were unearthed as many as 120 compositions by the royal amatur. So that we may ave to amend Macaulay's famous portrait of Frederick as "bearing up against a world in arms, with an ounce of corrosive sublimate in one pocket and a quire of bad verses in the other." Quite probably there was a third receptacle containing a ream of music somewhat better than the poetry.

* * *

IN ALL accounts of the savage and cynical monarch through whose constitution ran so perverse a strain of the artist, two singular truths may be noted. The first was that Frederick loved German music and despised that of France and Italy. He once remarked that "French music is good for nothing." This was the more extraordinary in that his idolatry of French literature was notorious. It was in the language of Racine that he labored those tragedies which he hoped would gain for him in purer form the immortality which was his in statecraft and in war.

Secondly, the malevolent torments which Frederick delighted in visiting upon his academy of writing men was in vivid contrast to the human relations subsisting between the sovereign and his conservatory of composers. Toward one of these he appears to have stood in considerable awe. This was his teacher of the flute, Johann Joachim Quantz. C. P. E. Bach once propounded the riddle: "What is the most fearsome animal in the Prussian Kingdom?" No one could tell, so he replied: "Frau Quantz's lapdog." He explained that Frau Quantz was afraid of her dog, Herr Quantz was afraid of his wife, and "the greatest monarch on earth was afraid of Quantz." While this martinet was in the room, none of the other musicians dared applaud Frederick when he played well.

* * *

IN THE course of his career, Frederick came in personal touch with the two men of the day who possessed the greatest creative genius in the respective fields of his own esthetic ambitions. The first was Voltaire; the second was Johann Sebastian Bach. All the world knows how Voltaire was invited to Potsdam, caressed with honors and decorations and put to torture through the King's skill at stinging his vanity, and how Voltaire retorted with the diatribe of "Doctor Akakia;" also, how the poet at last obtained his demission, but was arrested by Frederick's orders at Frankfort, confined for twelve days in a hovel and plundered of sixteen hundred dollars—a more grievous outrage to the avaricious philosopher than the affront to his person.

Far different was Frederick's relation with Bach, who regarded his visit to Potsdam during May, 1747, as the culmination of his entire life. His eldest son, Carl Philipp Emmanuel Bach, held the post of court accompanist at Berlin—a function which was far from a sinecure, since Frederick's sense of time was so erratic that accompanying him was regarded as an art in itself.

Except on the evenings when the Opera House was open, it was the King's habit to regale himself with a concert before supper. He not only played in the orchestra. He selected the program from his conservative repertory, and even discharged the humble office of librarian by placing the parts with his own hands upon the orchestral desks.

* * *

IT WAS on a Sunday evening, and Frederick was already surrounded by his players, when a messenger arrived and the King leapt to his feet, exclaiming: "Gentlemen, old Bach is here!" The concert was forthwith abandoned, and Bach was escorted from room to room by Frederick and his musicians. The King had possessed sufficient taste to discern that the new pianos with hammer action, which had just come in, would supplant the harpsichord, and he had made a collection of instruments manufactured by Silbermann. All of these Bach was required to test.

Then Frederick proposed that his great visitor should improvise on a theme of the King's invention. If Frederick was amazed when Bach proceeded to elaborate the motive on the spot into a fugue, the latter was [illegible]

THE PLAY

(The [illegible] cannot well be condemned.)

Trick 1: N leads Queen of Spades; S, 3 of Spades; S, 8 of Spades; W, 3 of Clubs.

Trick 2: W leads 7 of Clubs; N, Jack of Clubs; E, Ace of Clubs; S, 3 of Clubs.

Trick 3: E leads 2 of Clubs; S, 6 of Clubs; W, King of Clubs; N, 4 of Clubs.

Trick 4: W leads 9 of Diamonds; N, King of Diamonds; E, Ace of Diamonds; S, 2 of Diamonds.

Trick 5: E leads 7 of Spades; S, 10 of Spades; W, 3 of Clubs; N, 3 of Clubs.

Trick 6: W leads Queen of Diamonds; N, Queen of Clubs; E, 3 of Diamonds; S, 4 of Diamonds.

Trick 7: N leads 8 of Spades; E, 9 of Spades; S, Ace of Spades; W, 9 of Clubs.

Trick 8: W leads 6 of Diamonds; N, 9 of Hearts; E, Jack of Diamonds; S, 2 of Diamonds.

Trick 9: E leads 7 of Diamonds; S, 8 of Diamonds; W, 10 of Diamonds; N, 9 of Hearts.

Trick 10: W leads 9 of Hearts; N, 10 of Hearts; E, 4 of Hearts; S, 3 of Spades.

Tricks 11 to 13: N concedes Declarer the last three tricks, as there is no escape from a Heart lead that will permit the Queen to make as well as the Ace.

start suit bidding cheaply.

W properly refuses to be shut out, that freak deals are often a matter of guesswork, particularly for the defensive side. E likewise has to guess whether he can set four Spades; the King of Spades cannot be expected to make, and the three side Aces may net but two tricks, as one of the opponents at least probably holds a void. An assist to five Clubs appears better, as a double of four Spades.

Trick 6: The second Spade force, formerly feared, is now doubly advantageous. It is part of a necessary scheme to make the remaining W-E trumps separately, and assists to strip N out of Spades for an end-play that Declarer can already foresee.

Trick 7: All this is according to schedule. N has to assist in stripping himself out of Spades in order to avoid opening the Heart. Had N failed to trump at Trick 4, W would have led another Diamond to Dummy and trumped out the Spade King himself.

Trick 10: The point of Declarer's machinations. S surely had seven Spades to dare to pre-empt on a suit headed the King and Queen. If he had seven Spades, he was void of Hearts, a fact evident to Declarer at Trick 4 when N produced a singleton King of Diamonds. Declarer plotted a throw-in whereby N is forced to give W two Heart tricks.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph
MAR 9 - 1929

Boston Symphony Tour Of Europe Cancelled

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will not go to Europe this year.

The long-pending plans have been cancelled, it was learned yesterday, although officials of the organization declared it is only a matter of postponement.

It has been rumored for over eight months that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, would tour Europe in the Spring and Summer.

Reports from a dozen cities, including London, Berlin, Rome, Paris, Dresden and Vienna, came to America that plans had been completed and all that remained was to set a definite series of dates.

While the trip would not have paid its way, even with sold-out houses, nevertheless the financial obligation was less than a hundred thousand dollars.

Since Walter Damrosch tourned Europe with the late New York Symphony Orchestra Bostonians have been anxious to let the old world hear their organization, for in the old music centers the Boston Symphony Orchestra is rated as America's finest musical body.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
MAR 9 - 1929

New Administration Finds Its Social Bearings Easily

President [illegible]oover and New First Lady Are Both W[illegible] Versed in Intricate Labyrinth of Official Etiquet.

WASHINGTON [illegible]arch 9—(AP) Socially speaking, [illegible] new administration is finding [illegible] bearings without the slightest dif[illegible]ulty, both the President and Mrs. [illegible]Hoover being well versed in the [illegible]ricate labyrinth of official etiquet, the most important event being in a[illegible]anging for the diplomatic corps to [illegible]eet the new administration. This t[illegible] President and Mrs. Hoover have [illegible]nned for 4 o'clock Monday aftern[illegible]n, when the ambassadors, ministe[illegible] and charge d'affaires and their wiv[illegible] and the counselors and their wiv[illegible], or where there are not counselors[illegible]e first secretaries and their wives w[illegible] pay their respects. Officials of th[illegible] State Department and the full comp[illegible]ment of White House aides will be [illegible]and to present and care for the g[illegible]sts. The Marine Band will add a live[illegible] note and of course the diplomats wil[illegible] be in full court dress, while many o[illegible]he ladies have already rushed off to New York to visit importers' shop[illegible] and secure new costumes for th[illegible] occasion.

Aside from this specially arranged formality, bo[illegible] the President and Mrs. Hoover have been busily engaged visiting with th[illegible]r family, receiving delegations and settling their effects in the White H[illegible]use cupboards and closets and mak[illegible]g themselves at home.

For the first time since becoming the First Lady of the Land, Mrs. Hoover occupied the White House box in a local theater, going to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its program created quite a flurry as the White House car drove up and she and her party stepped out. While Mrs. Coolidge added to the fame of her husband's administration by her spontaneous smile, Mrs. Hoover also smiles, and when she does, she shows dimples in her prettily turned cheeks and her eyes dance. While there was no real demonstration at the theater, Mrs. Hoover looked out over the large street group with interest. She wore a becoming gown of black velvet, very simple in design, a black velvet hat, brimless and quite close fitting, and long white gloves. The coat was the one she wore for the inaugural ceremonies, of black broadtail, quite conservative in length and with a broad collar of sable and a deep band of the fur reaching the bottom of the coat. The cuffs of sable were quite deep.

With Mrs. Hoover was her uncle, W. D. Henry of Wahpeton, N. D.; her sister, Mrs. Jean Henry Large; Mrs. May Leavitt, the sister of the President, and Mrs. Mark Requa [illegible] California.

* * *

The char[illegible]sidence of the President and Mrs. Hoover in S Street is not to be fully d[illegible]mantled or rather vacated until the [illegible]st of next month, when Senator Fred[illegible]ick C. Walcott of Connecticut and [illegible]s. Walcott, who have leased it, [illegible] take possession. Senator Walcott [illegible]as a suite at the Mayflower, where [illegible]ice-President Curtis lives, but Mr[illegible] Walcott will not come to Washingt[illegible] to stay until they take over the S S[illegible]eet residence. Their two sons, William [illegible] Welch Walcott and Alexander Guthr[illegible] Walcott, are students at Yale. [illegible] is not likely that many of the new [illegible] members of official society will becom[illegible]e permanently settled for several [illegible] weeks yet, but the special session of [illegible] Congress will cause a continuation of [illegible] social events up to its very close. [illegible]ealthy society folk who come here [illegible]rom all sections of the country have [illegible]o idea of deserting the capital while [illegible]here are important officials and dipl[illegible]mats to entertain.

* * *

Everything M[illegible]s. Hoover has done since March 4 h[illegible]s met with unalloyed approval, espec[illegible]lly her retention of Miss Mary Ra[illegible]dolph as head of the social secretary[illegible] staff in the White House. Miss R[illegible]ndolph is the daughter of the lat[illegible] Gen. Randolph and since her earl[illegible] girlhood days has known Washin[illegible]ton society. She is connected with [illegible]many of the most important families [illegible] of the East and her elder sister, Mi[illegible]s Anne Randolph, is social secretary [illegible] Secretary of the Treasury Mellon.

Mrs. Coolidge selected Miss Mary Randolph as her secretary about the second year of her residence here as the wife of the Vice-President and when she became the First Lady of the Land Miss Randolph accompanied her to the White House, occupying a secondary place under Miss Laura Harlan who had been secretary to Mrs. Harding. Later she succeeded to the first place and was the friend and companion of Mrs. Coolidge as well as secretary.

Serving with Miss Randolph as secretary are Miss Ruth Fessler, who not only served Mrs. Hoover, but Mr. Hoover as well, and Miss Mildred Hall, who has been with Mrs. Hoover for a lesser time. Miss Fessler is a particularly capable woman and was secretary to Dr. Vernon Kellogg, the close friend of Mr. Hoover.

* * *

While many congressional families are rushing off to their respective homes to remain for a few weeks during the recess, others and especially those with children in Washington schools, are remaining on and assisting in the social excitement that follows in the wake of a new administration. The large house party entertained by Vice-President Curtis and his sister, Mrs. Gann, over March 4, is almost entirely disbanded, Mrs. Charles P. George, wife of Maj. George, alone remaining until Monday. The Vice-President's son and daughter in law, Mr. and Mrs. Harry King Curtis, returned to Chicago early in the week. Mr. and Mrs. Webster Knight, 2d, returned to their home early in the week, and Mrs. Jerome Colvin, the Vice-President's sister, returned to Topeka in midweek. During the recess of Congress the Vice-President and his sister are accepting many invitations and it is expected Mrs. Gann and all of the new Cabinet women now in town, will receive informally Wednesday, the regular Cabinet day at home.

* * *

Never before has Washington enjoyed so familiar an acquaintance with a new executive family, and with Mrs. Frank B. Kellogg, wife of the Secretary of State, remaining in Washington with her husband, until the arrival of the new Secretary, Henry Lewis Stimson, the newest women feel that they have an experienced pilot into the social shoals. Mrs. Kellogg is a great favorite here and has filled her place with unequalled tact and grace. Mrs. Stimson also knows the ways of Washington Cabinet life, and in fact so does Mrs. William De Witt Mitchell, whose husband is the new Attorney General. As the wife of the solicitor general, Mrs. Mitchell figured constantly in society. The new Secretary of War and Mrs. Good have been living in Washington most of the time since 1921. Because Mr. Good was in the lower house of Congress before he retired to enter the practise of law in Chicago, Mr. Good is a member of the Congressional Club and has religiously kept up all of her congressional social connections. Both the Secretary and Mrs. Good have taken particular interest in the Iowa State Society here, their former home being at Cedar Rapids.

* * *

Nothing has so pleased Washington society as that James J. Davis remains in the Cabinet. His handsome blonde wife is a very particular favorite and nothing could have been more charming than her rush of hospitality during the inaugural week. She was never daunted at entertaining three or four hundred guests at a time and the refreshments she offered were of a substantial and sustaining sort.

On each occasion when these large delegations arrived, they found her waiting with the Secretary of Labor just within the front door to greet them, and ranged along in the great entrance hall of their home or walking wonderingly through the drawing rooms were the four little girls, Jane, Jean, June and Jewel, dressed exactly alike in pretty yellow crepe frocks, as dainty as French dolls. The son of the house and the eldest of the five children, took especial interest in assisting and waiting on the guests.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph
MAR 9 - 1929

137

[illegible] Ta[illegible]

[illegible]

Orchestra, [illegible] Symphony canny power of [illegible]

Not only has he[illegible] ings, wherein there are [illegible] all over there is never that [illegible] when banquets are better to look [illegible]

Further, Koussevitzky know[illegible] performances, at revivals for sp[illegible] or anything else you might menti[illegible] No other conductor of the present season has been so uniformly successful in this regard. Even Mr. Toscanini in the two programs of his present visit has not compared with the Boston conductor in his selection of program matter, new and old.

In the matter of playing American works, not even American musicians have shown so uninterruptedly the better side of American composition. Not one has Koussevitzky chosen a shoddy piece of American creative art.

Thus, on Thursday evening, all of these points were again in evidence when the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to Carnegie Hall for its fourth visit.

The Suite in E Major for String Orchestra of Arthur Foote was Mr. Koussevitzky's present obeisance to American musical literature, and a further gratification of his own love of the windless, percussionless ensemble. The conductor-contrabassist is never happier than when the strings are at it alone, whether in the performance of classic or modern works.

The Composer's Art

THE chaste, pure quality of the strings in choir formation was Foote's dream when he wrote the Suite. He has eminently succeeded in creating a mood of fleshless loveliness, wherein Catalonian marbel shines white and dazzling. The Fugue exhibits Foote as a master builder in the form, but the Prelude is the best example of him, as a maker of music. "Pizzicato" is an ingenious use of a massed plucking, and the Adagietto is almost as alluring as the Prelude.

Was it the performance which Koussevitsky gave to the Suite, which made it so seeming important? Partially, and yet I do not think Mr. Koussevitsky can make anything sound better than it is, latently. Toscanini has that gift—a tawdry Respighi composition sounds momentarily like great music when the Italian is before the audience.

I have never heard Toscanini conduct the Moussorgsky "Pictures at an Exhibition" as orchestrated by Ravel. But it is certain that despite the typical heaven-soaring climaxes with which he sought to bewilder the senses, Koussevitzky was unable to transfigure the score which Ravel has evolved. Only at a few points, in the always descriptive panorama of studies and portraits, has the orchestration done anything good for Moussorgsky's piano composition. The rest of the way the result has been confusing, denaturizing, neutralizing and frequently the means of a complete annihilation of character, mood, color.

Strauss Number

THE passage at arms of Goldenburg and Schmuyle grew in humor, the Promenade steps were more vigorous, but the gnomes were turned into giants, the Wheels of the Wagon did not bump, the Catacombs lost their mystery. Personally, I prefer the "Pictures" as Moussorgsky wrote the work —on the piano.

The performance of "Also Sprach Zarathustra" of Richard Strauss was the most notable portion of the program. In many respects the genius of the German composer was never better exhibited than in this musical version of Nietsche's epic to the Superman. The tone poem touches the heights of the Nietschean ideal. It suggests and evokes phases of Zarathustra's wanderings and teachings. Yet there is a surging, swirling flood of intoxicating, sensuous beauty throughout the long score.

At some moments, the blend of rapturous and swooning phrases, flowing in a river of quivering colors, catches the senses and threatens to rob the mind of will-power.

Koussevitzky, in "Zarathustra," emerged almost as great as Strauss. The Bostonians never drew a richer tone from their instruments.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

MAR 9 - 1929

MUSIC

A King and a Peer, Frederick the Great and the Ninth Baron Berners, Appear With Plebeian Strauss and Brahms as Composers on Week's Symphonic Programs—Frederick's Contrasted Relations With Voltaire and Bach

By Richard L. Stokes

FROM the herd of arrant commoners, such as Balakireff, Sibelius, Strauss and Brahms, who figure on this week's orchestral programs as suitors for popular suffrage, there emerges the rare and dazzling apparition of two Persons of Quality. The first is Gerald Hugh Tyrwhitt, ninth Baron Berners, whose suite from "The Triumph of Neptune: an English Pantomime in Ten Tableaux," was presented on Tuesday evening—with but slight accession of lustre to the nobility—by Eugene Goossens and the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra. The other is no less a being than the most formidable of Prussian autocrats, Frederick the Great, whose Symphony No. 3, in D Major, is scheduled for this afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky. It remains to be seen whether the royal opus will bolster up the declining estate of monarchy.

That the victor of Rossbach and Leuthen was an indefatigable scribbler of wretched doggerel is familiarly known, and also that he was an industrious performer on the flute. The further circumstances that he was a prolific composer may cause suprise, even to those reasonably acquainted with the minutiae of musical biography. When a search of the archives was instituted in 1835 by King Frederick William III., there were unearthed as many as 120 compositions by the royal amatur. So that we may ave to amend Macaulay's famous portrait of Frederick as "bearing up against a world in arms, with an ounce of corrosive sublimate in one pocket and a quire of bad verses in the other." Quite probably there was a third receptacle containing a ream of music somewhat better than the poetry.

* * *

IN ALL accounts of the savage and cynical monarch through whose constitution ran so perverse a strain of the artist, two singular truths may be noted. The first was that Frederick loved German music and despised that of France and Italy. He once remarked that "French music is good for nothing." This was the more extraordinary in that his idolatry of French literature was notorious. It was in the language of Racine that he labored those tragedies which he hoped would gain for him in purer form the immortality which was his in statecraft and in war.

Secondly, the malevolent torments which Frederick delighted in visiting upon his academy of writing men was in vivid contrast to the human relations subsisting between the sovereign and his conservatory of composers. Toward one of these he appears to have stood in considerable awe. This was his teacher of the flute, Johann Joachim Quantz. C. P. E. Bach once propounded the riddle: "What is the most fearsome animal in the Prussian Kingdom?" No one could tell, so he replied: "Frau Quantz's lapdog." He explained that Frau Quantz was afraid of her dog, Herr Quantz was afraid of his wife, and "the greatest monarch on earth was afraid of Quantz." While this martinet was in the room, none of the other musicians dared applaud Frederick when he played well.

* * *

IN THE course of his career, Frederick came in personal touch with the two men of the day who possessed the greatest creative genius in the respective fields of his own esthetic ambitions. The first was Voltaire; the second was Johann Sebastian Bach. All the world knows how Voltaire was invited to Potsdam, caressed with honors and decorations and put to torture through the King's skill at stinging his vanity, and how Voltaire retorted with the diatribe of "Doctor Akakia;" also, how the poet at last obtained his demission, but was arrested by Frederick's orders at Frankfort, confined for twelve days in a hovel and plundered of sixteen hundred dollars—a more grievous outrage to the avaricious philosopher than the affront to his person.

Far different was Frederick's relation with Bach, who regarded his visit to Potsdam during May, 1747, as the culmination of his entire life. His eldest son, Carl Philipp Emmanuel Bach, held the post of court accompanist at Berlin—a function which was far from a sinecure, since Frederick's sense of time was so erratic that accompanying him was regarded as an art in itself.

Except on the evenings when the Opera House was open, it was the King's habit to regale himself with a concert before supper. He not only played in the orchestra. He selected the program from his conservative repertory, and even discharged the humble office of librarian by placing the parts with his own hands upon the orchestral desks.

* * *

IT WAS on a Sunday evening, and Frederick was already surrounded by his players, when a messenger arrived and the King leapt to his feet, exclaiming: "Gentlemen, old Bach is here!" The concert was forthwith abandoned, and Bach was escorted from room to room by Frederick and his musicians. The King had possessed sufficient taste to discern that the new pianos with hammer action, which had just come in, would suppplant the harpsichord, and he had made a collection of instruments manufactured by Silbermann. All of these Bach was required to test.

Then Frederick proposed that his great visitor should improvise on a theme of the King's invention. If Frederick was amazed when Bach proceeded to elaborate the motive on the spot into a fugue, the latter was [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph

MAR 9 - 1929

[illegible] Orchestra, [illegible] canny power of [illegible]

Not only has he [illegible] ings, wherein there are co[illegible] all over there is never that sur[illegible] when banquets are better to look

Further, Koussevitzky know[illegible] performances, at revivals for sp[illegible] or anything else you might menti[illegible] No other conductor of the present season has been so uniformly successful in this regard. Even Mr. Toscanini in the two programs of his present visit has not compared with the Boston conductor in his selection of program matter, new and old.

In the matter of playing American works, not even American musicians have shown so uninterruptedly the better side of American composition. Not one has Koussevitzky chosen a shoddy piece of American creative art.

Thus, on Thursday evening, all of these points were again in evidence when the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to Carnegie Hall for its fourth visit.

The Suite in E Major for String Orchestra of Arthur Foote was Mr. Koussevitzky's present obeisance to American musical literature, and a further gratification of his own love of the windless, percussionless ensemble. The conductor-contrabassist is never happier than when the strings are at it alone, whether in the performance of classic or modern works.

The Composer's Art

THE chaste, pure quality of the strings in choir formation was Foote's dream when he wrote the Suite. He has eminently succeeded in creating a mood of fleshless loveliness, wherein Catalonian marbel shines white and dazzling. The Fugue exhibits Foote as a master builder in the form, but the Prelude is the best example of him, as a maker of music. "Pizzicato" is an ingenious use of a massed plucking, and the Adagietto is almost as alluring as the Prelude.

Was it the performance which Koussevitsky gave to the Suite, which made it so seeming important? Partially, and yet I do not think Mr. Koussevitsky can make anything sound better than it is, latently. Toscanini has that gift—a tawdry Respighi composition sounds momentarily like great music when the Italian is before the audience.

I have never heard Toscanini conduct the Moussorgsky "Pictures at an Exhibition" as orchestrated by Ravel. But it is certain that despite the typical heaven-soaring climaxes with which he sought to bewilder the senses, Koussevitzky was unable to transfigure the score which Ravel has evolved. Only at a few points, in the always descriptive panorama of studies and portraits, has the orchestration done anything good for Moussorgsky's piano composition. The rest of the way the result has been confusing, denaturizing, neutralizing and frequently the means of a complete annihilation of character, mood, color.

Strauss Number

THE passage at arms of Goldenburg and Schmuyle grew in humor, the Promenade steps were more vigorous, but the gnomes were turned into giants, the Wheels of the Wagon did not bump, the Catacombs lost their mystery. Personally, I prefer the "Pictures" as Moussorgsky wrote the work—on the piano.

The performance of "Also Sprach Zarathustra" of Richard Strauss was the most notable portion of the program. In many respects the genius of the German composer was never better exhibited than in this musical version of Nietsche's epic to the Superman. The tone poem touches the heights of the Nietschean ideal. It suggests and evokes phases of Zarathustra's wanderings and teachings. Yet there is a surging, swirling flood of intoxicating, sensuous beauty throughout the long score.

At some moments, the blend of rapturous and swooning phrases, flowing in a river of quivering colors, catches the senses and threatens to rob the mind of will-power.

Koussevitzky, in "Zarathustra," emerged almost as great as Strauss. The Bostonians never drew a richer tone from their instruments.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

MAR 9 - 1929

New Administration Finds Its Social Bearings Easily

President Hoover and New First Lady Are Both Well Versed in Intricate Labyrinth of Official Etiquet.

WASHINGTON March 9—(AP) Socially speaking, the new administration is finding its bearings without the slightest difficulty, both the President and Mrs. Hoover being well versed in the intricate labyrinth of official etiquet, the most important event being in arranging for the diplomatic corps to meet the new administration. This the President and Mrs. Hoover have planned for 4 o'clock Monday afternoon, when the ambassadors, ministers and charge d'affaires and their wives and the counselors and their wives, or where there are not counselors the first secretaries and their wives will pay their respects. Officials of the State Department and the full complement of White House aides will be on hand to present and care for the guests. The Marine Band will add a lively note and of course the diplomats will be in full court dress, while many of the ladies have already rushed off to New York to visit importers' shops and secure new costumes for the occasion.

Aside from this specially arranged formality, both the President and Mrs. Hoover have been busily engaged visiting with their family, receiving delegations and settling their effects in the White House cupboards and closets and making themselves at home.

* * *

For the first time since becoming the First Lady of the Land, Mrs. Hoover occupied the White House box in a local theater, going to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its program. She created quite a flurry as the White House car drove up and she and her party stepped out. While Mrs. Coolidge added to the fame of her husband's administration by her spontaneous smile, Mrs. Hoover also smiles, and when she does, she shows dimples in her prettily turned cheeks and her eyes dance. While there was no real demonstration at the theater, Mrs. Hoover looked out over the large street group with interest. She wore a becoming gown of black velvet, very simple in design, a black velvet hat, brimless and quite close fitting, and long white gloves. The coat was the one she wore for the inaugural ceremonies, of black broadtail, quite conservative in length and with a broad collar of sable and a deep band of the fur reaching the bottom of the coat. The cuffs of sable were quite deep.

With Mrs. Hoover was her uncle, W. D. Henry of Wahpeton, N. D.; her sister, Mrs. Jean Henry Large; Mrs. May Leavitt, the sister of the President, and Mrs. Mark Requa [illegible] California.

* * *

The change of residence of the President and Mrs. Hoover in S Street is not to be fully dismantled or rather vacated until the first of next month, when Senator Frederick C. Walcott of Connecticut and Mrs. Walcott, who have leased it, will take possession. Senator Walcott has a suite at the Mayflower, where Vice-President Curtis lives, but Mrs. Walcott will not come to Washington to stay until they take over the S Street residence. Their two sons, William Welch Walcott and Alexander Guthrie Walcott, are students at Yale. It is not likely that many of the new members of official society will become permanently settled for several weeks yet, but the special session of Congress will cause a continuation of social events up to its very close. Wealthy society folk who come here from all sections of the country have no idea of deserting the capital while there are important officials and diplomats to entertain.

* * *

Everything Mrs. Hoover has done since March 4 has met with unalloyed approval, especially her retention of Miss Mary Randolph as head of the social secretary's staff in the White House. Miss Randolph is the daughter of the late Gen. Randolph and since her early girlhood days has known Washington society. She is connected with many of the most important families of the East and her elder sister, Miss Anne Randolph, is social secretary to Secretary of the Treasury Mellon.

Mrs. Coolidge selected Miss Mary Randolph as her secretary about the second year of her residence here as the wife of the Vice-President and when she became the First Lady of the Land Miss Randolph accompanied her to the White House, occupying a secondary place under Miss Laura Harlan who had been secretary to Mrs. Harding. Later she succeeded to the first place and was the friend and companion of Mrs. Coolidge as well as secretary.

Serving with Miss Randolph as secretary are Miss Ruth Fessler, who not only served Mrs. Hoover, but Mr. Hoover as well, and Miss Mildred Hall, who has been with Mrs. Hoover for a lesser time. Miss Fessler is a particularly capable woman and was secretary to Dr. Vernon Kellogg, the close friend of Mr. Hoover.

* * *

While many congressional families are rushing off to their respective homes to remain for a few weeks during the recess, others and especially those with children in Washington schools, are remaining on and assisting in the social excitement that follows in the wake of a new administration. The large house party entertained by Vice-President Curtis and his sister, Mrs. Gann, over March 4, is almost entirely disbanded, Mrs. Charles P. George, wife of Maj. George, alone remaining until Monday. The Vice-President's son and daughter in law, Mr. and Mrs. Harry King Curtis, returned to Chicago early in the week; Mr. and Mrs. Webster Knight, 2d, returned to their home early in the week, and Mrs. Jerome Colvin, the Vice-President's sister, returned to Topeka in midweek. During the recess of Congress the Vice-President and his sister are accepting many invitations and it is expected Mrs. Gann and all of the new Cabinet women now in town, will receive informally Wednesday, the regular Cabinet day at home.

* * *

Never before has Washington enjoyed so familiar an acquaintance with a new executive family and with Mrs. Frank B. Kellogg, wife of the Secretary of State, remaining in Washington with her husband, until the arrival of the new Secretary, Henry Lewis Stimson, the newest women feel that they have an experienced pilot into the social shoals. Mrs. Kellogg is a great favorite here and has filled her place with unequaled tact and grace. Mrs. Stimson also knows the ways of Washington Cabinet life, and in fact so does Mrs. William De Witt Mitchell, whose husband is the new Attorney General. As the wife of the solicitor general, Mrs. Mitchell figured constantly in society. The new Secretary of War and Mrs. Good have been living in Washington most of the time since 1921. Because Mr. Good was in the lower house of Congress before he retired to enter the practise of law in Chicago, Mr. Good is a member of the Congressional Club and has religiously kept up all of her congressional social connections. Both the Secretary and Mrs. Good have taken particular interest in the Iowa State Society here, their former home being at Cedar Rapids.

* * *

Nothing has so pleased Washington society as that James J. Davis remains in the Cabinet. His handsome blonde wife is a very particular favorite and nothing could have been more charming than her rush of hospitality during the inaugural week. She was never daunted at entertaining three or four hundred guests at a time and the refreshments she offered were of a substantial and sustaining sort.

On each occasion when these large delegations arrived, they found her waiting with the Secretary of Labor just within the front door to greet them, and ranged along in the great entrance hall of their home or walking wonderingly through the drawing rooms were the four little girls, Jane, Jean, June and Jewel, dressed exactly alike in pretty yellow crepe frocks, as dainty as French dolls. The son of the house and the eldest of the five children, took especial interest in assisting and waiting on the guests.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph

MAR 9 - 1929

Boston Symphony Tour Of Europe Cancelled

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will not go to Europe this year.

The long-pending plans have been cancelled, it was learned yesterday, although officials of the organization declared it is only a matter of postponement.

It has been rumored for over eight months that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, would tour Europe in the Spring and Summer.

Reports from a dozen cities, including London, Berlin, Rome, Paris, Dresden and Vienna, came to America that plans had been completed and all that remained was to set a definite series of dates.

While the trip would not have paid its way, even with sold-out houses, nevertheless the financial obligation was less than a hundred thousand dollars.

Since Walter Damrosch tourned Europe with the late New York Symphony Orchestra Bostonians have been anxious to let the old world hear their organization, for in the old music centers the Boston Symphony Orchestra is rated as America's finest musical body.

THE DOMINO IS SQUARE [illegible] cannot well be condemned.)

THE PLAY

Trick 1: N leads Queen of Spades; E, 5 of Spades; S, 3 of Spades; W, 8 of Clubs.

Trick 2: W leads 7 of Clubs; N, Jack of Clubs; E, Ace of Clubs; S, 3 of Clubs.

Trick 3: E leads 2 of Clubs; S, 6 of Clubs; W, King of Clubs; N, 4 of Clubs.

Trick 4: W leads 9 of Diamonds; N, King of Diamonds; E, Ace of Diamonds; S, 3 of Diamonds.

Trick 5: E leads 7 of Spades; S, 10 of Spades; W, 8 of Clubs; N, 3 of Spades.

Trick 6: W leads Queen of Diamonds; N, Queen of Clubs; E, 8 of Diamonds; S, 4 of Diamonds.

Trick 7: N leads 9 of Spades; E, King of Spades; S, Ace of Spades; W, 9 of Clubs.

Trick 8: W leads 6 of Diamonds; N, 3 of Hearts; E, Jack of Diamonds; S, 5 of Diamonds.

Trick 9: E leads 7 of Diamonds; S, 8 of Diamonds; W, 10 of Diamonds; N, 9 of Hearts.

Trick 10: W leads 9 of Hearts; N, 10 of Hearts; E, 4 of Hearts; S, 3 of Spades.

Trick 11 to 13: N concedes Declarer the last three tricks, as there is no escape from a Heart lead that will permit the Queen to make as well as the Ace.

start suit, bidding cheaply. W properly refuses to be shut out. Of N's Spade assist it can only be said that freak deals are often a matter of guesswork, particularly for the defensive side. E likewise has to guess whether he can set four Spades; the King of Spades cannot be expected to make, and the three side Aces may not but two tricks, as one of the opponents at least probably holds a void. An assist of five Clubs appears better than a double of four Spades.

Trick 5: The second Spade force, formerly feared, is now doubly advantageous. It is part of a necessary scheme to make the remaining W-E trumps separately, and assists to strip N out of Spades for an end-play that Declarer can already foresee.

Trick 7: All this is according to schedule. N has to assist in stripping himself out of Spades in order to avoid opening the Hearts. Had N failed to trump at Trick 4, W would have led another Diamond to Dummy and trumped out the Spade King himself.

Trick 10: The point of Declarer's machinations. S surely had seven Spades to dare to pre-empt on a suit lacking the King and Queen. If he had seven Spades, he was void of Hearts, a fact evident to Declarer at Trick 4 when N produced a singleton King of Diamonds. Declarer plotted a throw-in whereby N is forced to give W two Heart tricks.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
MAR 9 - 1929

MUSIC

A King and a Peer, Frederick the Great and the Ninth Baron Berners, Appear With Plebeian Strauss and Brahms as Composers on Week's Symphonic Programs—Frederick's Contrasted Relations With Voltaire and Bach

By Richard L. Stokes

FROM the herd of arrant commoners, such as Balakireff, Sibelius, Strauss and Brahms, who figure on this week's orchestral programs as suitors for popular suffrage, there emerges the rare and dazzling apparition of two Persons of Quality. The first is Gerald Hugh Tyrwhitt, ninth Baron Berners, whose suite from "The Triumph of Neptune: an English Pantomime in Ten Tableaux," was presented on Tuesday evening—with but slight accession of lustre to the nobility—by Eugene Goossens and the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra. The other is no less a being than the most formidable of Prussian autocrats, Frederick the Great, whose Symphony No. 3, in D Major, is scheduled for this afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky. It remains to be seen whether the royal opus will bolster up the declining estate of monarchy.

That the victor of Rossbach and Leuthen was an indefatigable scribbler of wretched doggerel is familiarly known, and also that he was an industrious performer on the flute. The further circumstances that he was a prolific composer may cause suprise, even to those reasonably acquainted with the minutiae of musical biography. When a search of the archives was instituted in 1835 by King Frederick William III., there were unearthed as many as 120 compositions by the royal amatur. So that we may ave to amend Macaulay's famous portrait of Frederick as "bearing up against a world in arms, with an ounce of corrosive sublimate in one pocket and a quire of bad verses in the other." Quite probably there was a third receptacle containing a ream of music somewhat better than the poetry.

* * *

IN ALL accounts of the savage and cynical monarch through whose constitution ran so perverse a strain of the artist, two singular truths may be noted. The first was that Frederick loved German music and despised that of France and Italy. He once remarked that "French music is good for nothing." This was the more extraordinary in that his idolatry of French literature was notorious. It was in the language of Racine that he labored those tragedies which he hoped would gain for him in purer form the immortality which was his in statecraft and in war.

Secondly, the malevolent torments which Frederick delighted in visiting upon his academy of writing men was in vivid contrast to the human relations subsisting between the sovereign and his conservatory of composers. Toward one of these he appears to have stood in considerable awe. This was his teacher of the flute, Johann Joachim Quantz. C. P. E. Bach once propounded the riddle: "What is the most fearsome animal in the Prussian Kingdom?" No one could tell, so he replied: "Frau Quantz's lapdog." He explained that Frau Quantz was afraid of her dog, Herr Quantz was afraid of his wife, and "the greatest monarch on earth was afraid of Quantz." While this martinet was in the room, none of the other musicians dared applaud Frederick when he played well.

* * *

IN THE course of his career, Frederick came in personal touch with the two men of the day who possessed the greatest creative genius in the respective fields of his own esthetic ambitions. The first was Voltaire; the second was Johann Sebastian Bach. All the world knows how Voltaire was invited to Potsdam, caressed with honors and decorations and put to torture through the King's skill at stinging his vanity, and how Voltaire retorted with the diatribe of "Doctor Akakia;" also, how the poet at last obtained his demission, but was arrested by Frederick's orders at Frankfort, confined for twelve days in a hovel and plundered of sixteen hundred dollars—a more grievous outrage to the avaricious philosopher than the affront to his person.

Far different was Frederick's relation with Bach, who regarded his visit to Potsdam during May, 1747, as the culmination of his entire life. His eldest son, Carl Philipp Emmanuel Bach, held the post of court accompanist at Berlin—a function which was far from a sinecure, since Frederick's sense of time was so erratic that accompanying him was regarded as an art in itself.

Except on the evenings when the Opera House was open, it was the King's habit to regale himself with a concert before supper. He not only played in the orchestra. He selected the program from his conservative repertory, and even discharged the humble office of librarian by placing the parts with his own hands upon the orchestral desks.

* * *

IT WAS on a Sunday evening, and Frederick was already surrounded by his players, when a messenger arrived and the King leapt to his feet, exclaiming: "Gentlemen, old Bach is here!" The concert was forthwith abandoned, and Bach was escorted from room to room by Frederick and his musicians. The King had possessed sufficient taste to discern that the new pianos with hammer action, which had just come in, would suppplant the harpsichord, and he had made a collection of instruments manufactured by Silbermann. All of these Bach was required to test.

Then Frederick proposed that his great visitor should improvise on a theme of the King's invention. If Frederick was amazed when Bach proceeded to elaborate the motive on the spot into a fugue, the latter was no less arrested by the quality of the melody. When Frederick sent a package of his manuscript to Voltaire for correction, the poet exclaimed: "See what a quantity of his dirty linen the King has sent me to wash." Whereupon, as Macaulay relates, Frederick was as much incensed as a Grub Street hack who found his name in the "Dunciad."

Bach, on the contrary, was so impressed by Frederick's melody that he carried it away in his memory and soon took occasion to develop it with his profoundest science in the work known as his "Musikalisches Opfer," because he despatched it to the King as a "Musical Offering." Furthermore, when Bach came to write his monumental work, "Kunst der Fuge," a series of fugues and canons on a single theme, it was the King's melody, in shortened form, that he chose as his subject.

Long after Voltaire had escaped from Potsdam, he was accustomed to write to Frederick in this vein: "You have great talents. You have good qualities. But you have one odious vice. You delight in the abasement of your fellow-creatures. You have brought disgrace on the name of philosopher. You have given some color to the slander of bigots, who say that no confidence can be placed in the justice or humanity of those who reject the Christian faith."

Bach, on communicating his "Musikalisches Opfer" to the King, wrote that "its most distinguished part was the work of your illustrious hand," that his improvisation was not equal to "the excellence" of the motive and that he had determined "to give a right royal thema the treatment it deserves, and to make it known to the whole world." Nearly thirty years afterward, Frederick, in conversation with Van Swieten, "sang in a loud voice the theme for a chromatic fugue which he had given to the elder Bach." But the King habitually referred to Voltaire as "a bad-hearted fellow, and the greatest rascal on the face of the earth."

* * *

THE ROYAL symphony played to-day for the first time in New York was composed in 1743—that is, during the interval between Frederick's seizure of Silesia and his resumption of hostilities with the invasion of Saxony in 1745. It is the third of his four symphonies, the others having been written for strings alone. The one in D Major is scored for strings, two flutes, two oboes, two horns and bassoon. The King wrote all the parts without assistance, according to Philip Hale, but showed the score to Quantz, who corrected only a few notes. It was one of the few compositions by the King which were published during his life-time. It was printed at Nuremberg by order of his sister Wilhelmine, Margravine of Bayreuth, as a pleasant surprise for her brother.

According to one authority, when Frederick composed, he wrote out the melody in notation, and then set down in words what the bass and the other voices should be, with directions such as "Here the bass goes in eighth notes," or "These measures for violin alone." It was the task of the court composer, Johann Friedrich Agricola, to translate the memoranda into musical notation. But the symphony in D appears to have been an exception to this practice, in that Frederick wrote the parts out in their entirety with his own hand.

C. P. E. Bach had no great admiration for Frederick's talent as a composer. As a performer on the flute, it was said that he could render an andante with an expressiveness fit to bring tears to the eyes, which startled those who regarded the King as an unprincipled robber and sceptic. But his execution was not proficient in rapid movements, while his eccentric notions of time were the despair of accompanists. He composed several marches, one to Lessing's play, "Minna von Barnhelm," operatic arias and overtures. But there is question as to the authorship of "Der Hohenfriedberger," the most popular of the marches once ascribed to the regal pen.

Frederick's love of music and his unflagging courtesy to musicians, so different from his barbarity toward men of letters, stands out as a peculiarly human trait in the commander who, seeing that one of his soldiers flinched before a storm of bullets, cried out: "Schweinhund, do you wish to live forever?"

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
MAR 9 - 1929

New Administration Finds Its Social Bearings Easily

President Hoover and New First Lady Are Both Well Versed in Intricate Labyrinth of Official Etiquet.

WASHINGTON, March 9—(AP) Socially speaking, the new administration is finding its bearings without the slightest difficulty, both the President and Mrs. Hoover being well versed in the intricate labyrinth of official etiquet, the most important event being in arranging for the diplomatic corps to meet the new administration. This the President and Mrs. Hoover have planned for 4 o'clock Monday afternoon, when the ambassadors, ministers and charge d'affaires and their wives and the counselors and their wives, or where there are not counselors the first secretaries and their wives will pay their respects. Officials of the State Department and the full complement of White House aides will be on hand to present and care for the guests. The Marine Band will add a lively note and of course the diplomats will be in full court dress, while many of the ladies have already rushed off to New York to visit importers' shops and secure new costumes for the occasion.

Aside from this specially arranged formality, both the President and Mrs. Hoover have been busily engaged visiting with their family, receiving delegations and settling their effects in the White House cupboards and closets and making themselves at home.

For the first time since becoming the First Lady of the Land, Mrs. Hoover occupied the White House box in a local theater, going to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its program which created quite a flurry as the White House car drove up and she and her party stepped out. While Mrs. Coolidge added to the fame of her husband's administration by her spontaneous smile, Mrs. Hoover also smiles, and when she does, she shows dimples in her prettily turned cheeks and her eyes dance. While there was no real demonstration at the theater, Mrs. Hoover looked out over the large street group with interest. She wore a becoming gown of black velvet, very simple in design, a black velvet hat, brimless and quite close fitting, and long white gloves. The coat was the one she wore for the inaugural ceremonies, of black broadtail, quite conservative in length and with a broad collar of sable and a deep band of the fur reaching the bottom of the coat. The cuffs of sable were quite deep.

With Mrs. Hoover was her uncle, W. D. Henry of Wahpeton, N. D.; her sister, Mrs. Jean Henry Large; Mrs. May Leavitt, the sister of the President, and Mrs. Mark Requa of California.

* * *

The change of residence of the President and Mrs. Hoover in S Street is not to be fully dismantled or rather vacated until the first of next month, when Senator Frederick C. Walcott of Connecticut and Mrs. Walcott, who have leased it, will take possession. Senator Walcott has a suite at the Mayflower, where Vice-President Curtis lives, but Mrs. Walcott will not come to Washington to stay until they take over the S Street residence. Their two sons, William Welch Walcott and Alexander Guthrie Walcott, are students at Yale. It is not likely that many of the new members of official society will become permanently settled for several weeks yet, but the special session of Congress will cause a continuation of social events up to its very close. Wealthy society folk who come here from all sections of the country have no idea of deserting the capital while there are important officials and diplomats to entertain.

* * *

Everything Mrs. Hoover has done since March 4 has met with unalloyed approval, especially her retention of Miss Mary Randolph as head of the social secretary staff in the White House. Miss Randolph is the daughter of the late Gen. Randolph and since her early girlhood days has known Washington society. She is connected with many of the most important families of the East and her elder sister, Miss Anne Randolph, is social secretary to Secretary of the Treasury Mellon.

Mrs. Coolidge selected Miss Mary Randolph as her secretary about the second year of her residence here as the wife of the Vice-President and when she became the First Lady of the Land Miss Randolph accompanied her to the White House, occupying a secondary place under Miss Laura Harlan who had been secretary to Mrs. Harding. Later she succeeded to the first place and was the friend and companion of Mrs. Coolidge as well as secretary.

Serving with Miss Randolph as secretary are Miss Ruth Fessler, who not only served Mrs. Hoover, but Mr. Hoover as well, and Miss Mildred Hall, who has been with Mrs. Hoover for a lesser time. Miss Fessler is a particularly capable woman and was secretary to Dr. Vernon Kellogg, the close friend of Mr. Hoover.

* * *

While many congressional families are rushing off to their respective homes to remain for a few weeks during the recess, others and especially those with children in Washington schools, are remaining on and assisting in the social excitement that follows in the wake of a new administration. The large house party entertained by Vice-President Curtis and his sister, Mrs. Gann, over March 4, is almost entirely disbanded, Mrs. Charles P. George, wife of Maj. George, alone remaining until Monday. The Vice-President's son and daughter in law, Mr. and Mrs. Harry King Curtis, returned to Chicago early in the week. Mr. and Mrs. Webster Knight, 2d, returned to their home early in the week, and Mrs. Jerome Colvin, the Vice-President's sister, returned to Topeka in midweek. During the recess of Congress the Vice-President and his sister are accepting many invitations and it is expected Mrs. Gann and all of the new Cabinet women now in town, will receive informally Wednesday, the regular Cabinet day at home.

* * *

Never before has Washington enjoyed so familiar an acquaintance with a new executive family, and with Mrs. Frank B. Kellogg, wife of the Secretary of State, remaining in Washington with her husband, until the arrival of the new Secretary, Henry Lewis Stimson, the newer women feel that they have an experienced pilot into the social shoals. Mrs. Kellogg is a great favorite here and has filled her place with unequalled tact and grace. Mrs. Stimson also knows the ways of Washington Cabinet life, and in fact so does Mrs. William De Witt Mitchell, whose husband is the new Attorney General. As the wife of the solicitor general, Mrs. Mitchell figured constantly in society. The new Secretary of War and Mrs. Good have been living in Washington most of the time since 1921. Because Mr. Good was in the lower house of Congress before he retired to enter the practise of law in Chicago, Mrs. Good is a member of the Congressional Club and has religiously kept up all of her congressional social connections. Both the Secretary and Mrs. Good have taken particular interest in the Iowa State Society here, their former home being at Cedar Rapids.

* * *

Nothing has so pleased Washington society as that James J. Davis remains in the Cabinet. His handsome blonde wife is a very particular favorite and nothing could have been more charming than her rush of hospitality during the inaugural week. She was never daunted at entertaining three or four hundred guests at a time and the refreshments she offered were of a substantial and sustaining sort.

On each occasion when these large delegations arrived, they found her waiting with the Secretary of Labor just within the front door to greet them, and ranged along in the great entrance hall of their home or walking wonderingly through the drawing rooms were the four little girls, Jane, Jean, June and Jewel, dressed exactly alike in pretty yellow crepe frocks, as dainty as French dolls. The son of the house and the eldest of the five children, took especial interest in assisting and waiting on the guests.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph
MAR 9 - 1929

...than to select novelties at first-time ...al occasion or non-special occasion.

...sustained musical event... but when they are ...ssed of an un...

Orchestra, ... canny power of ...

Not only has he ... ings, wherein there are ... all over there is never that ... when banquets are better to look ...

Further, Koussevitzky knows ... performances, at revivals for ... or anything else you might mention. No other conductor of the present season has been so uniformly successful in this regard. Even Mr. Toscanini in the two programs of his present visit has not compared with the Boston conductor in his selection of program matter, new and old.

In the matter of playing American works, not even American musicians have shown so uninterruptedly the better side of American composition. Not one has Koussevitzky chosen a shoddy piece of American creative art.

Thus, on Thursday evening, all of these points were again in evidence when the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to Carnegie Hall for its fourth visit.

The Suite in E Major for String Orchestra of Arthur Foote was Mr. Koussevitzky's present obeisance to American musical literature, and a further gratification of his own love of the windless, percussionless ensemble. The conductor-contrabassist is never happier than when the strings are at it alone, whether in the performance of classic or modern works.

The Composer's Art

THE chaste, pure quality of the strings in choir formation was Foote's dream when he wrote the Suite. He has eminently succeeded in creating a mood of fleshless loveliness, wherein Catalonian marbel shines white and dazzling. The Fugue exhibits Foote as a master builder in the form, but the Prelude is the best example of him, as a maker of music. "Pizzicato" is an ingenious use of a massed plucking, and the Adagietto is almost as alluring as the Prelude.

Was it the performance which Koussevitsky gave to the Suite, which made it so seeming important? Partially, and yet I do not think Mr. Koussevitsky can make anything sound better than it is, latently. Toscanini has that gift—a tawdry Respighi composition sounds momentarily like great music when the Italian is before the audience.

I have never heard Toscanini conduct the Moussorgsky "Pictures at an Exhibition" as orchestrated by Ravel. But it is certain that despite the typical heaven-soaring climaxes with which he sought to bewilder the senses, Koussevitzky was unable to transfigure the score which Ravel has evolved. Only at a few points, in the always descriptive panorama of studies and portraits, has the orchestration done anything good for Moussorgsky's piano composition. The rest of the way the result has been confusing, denaturizing, neutralizing and frequently the means of a complete annihilation of character, mood, color.

Strauss Number

THE passage at arms of Goldenburg and Schmuyle grew in humor, the Promenade steps were more vigorous, but the gnomes were turned into giants, the Wheels of the Wagon did not bump, the Catacombs lost their mystery. Personally, I prefer the "Pictures" as Moussorgsky wrote the work—on the piano.

The performance of "Also Sprach Zarathustra" of Richard Strauss was the most notable portion of the program. In many respects the genius of the German composer was never better exhibited than in this musical version of Nietsche's epic to the Superman. The tone poem touches the heights of the Nietschean ideal. It suggests and evokes phases of Zarathustra's wanderings and teachings. Yet there is a surging, swirling flood of intoxicating, sensuous beauty throughout the long score.

At some moments, the blend of rapturous and swooning phrases, flowing in a river of quivering colors, catches the senses and threatens to rob the mind of will-power.

Koussevitzky, in "Zarathustra," emerged almost as great as Strauss. The Bostonians never drew a richer tone from their instruments.

...go to Europe this year.

The long-pending plans have been cancelled, it was learned yesterday, although officials of the organization declared it is only a matter of postponement.

It has been rumored for over eight months that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, would tour Europe in the Spring and Summer.

Reports from a dozen cities, including London, Berlin, Rome, Paris, Dresden and Vienna, came to America that plans had been completed and all that remained was to set a definite series of dates.

While the trip would not have paid its way, even with sold-out houses, nevertheless the financial obligation was less than a hundred thousand dollars.

Since Walter Damrosch tournedEurope with the late New York Symphony Orchestra Bostonians have been anxious to let the old world hear their organization, for in the music centers the Boston Symphony Orchestra is rated as America's finest musical body.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
MAR 10 1929

New Administration Will Greet Diplomats Monday

President and Mrs. Hoover Now Divide Time Between Settling Themselves in New Home and Official Duties.

Washington, March 9, 1929.

SOCIALLY speaking the new administration is finding its bearings without the slightest difficulty as both the President and Mrs. Hoover are well versed in the intricate labyrinth of official etiquet. The most important event rests in arranging for the diplomatic corps to meet the new administration. This the President and Mrs. Hoover have planned for 4 o'clock Monday afternoon, when the ambassadors, ministers and charge d'affaires and their wives, and the counselors and their wives, or where there are no counselors, the first secretaries and their wives will pay their respects. Officials of the state department and the full complement of White House aides will present and care for the guests. The Marine band will add a lively note and, of course, the diplomats will be in full court dress, while many of the ladies have already rushed off to New York to visit importers' shops and secure new costumes for the occasion.

ASIDE from this specially arranged formality both the President and Mrs. Hoover have been busily engaged visiting with their family, receiving delegations and settling their effects in the White House cupboards and closets and making themselves at home.

For the first time since becoming the first lady of the land Mrs. Hoover occupied the White House box in a local theater, having gone to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra in its program. She created quite a flurry as the White House car drove up and she and her party stepped out. While Mrs. Coolidge added to the fame of her husband's administrations by her spontaneous smile, Mrs. Hoover also smiles, and when she does, she shows dimples in her prettily turned cheeks and her eyes dance. While there was no real demonstration at the theater, Mrs. Hoover looked out over the large street group with interest. She wore a becoming gown of black velvet very simple in design, a black velvet hat, brimless and quite close fitting, and long white gloves. The coat was the one she wore for the inaugural ceremonies, of black broadtail, quite conservative in length and with a broad collar of sable and a deep band of the fur reaching the bottom of the coat; the cuffs of sable were rather deep. With Mrs. Hoover was her uncle, Mr. W. D. Henry, of Wahpeton, N. D.; her sister, Mrs. Jean Henry Large; Mrs. May Leavitt, the sister of the president, and Mrs. Mark Requa, of California.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS
MAR 9 1929

President and Mrs. Hoover Enter on Social Life

Washington, March 9.—(AP)—Socially speaking the new administration is finding its bearings without the slightest difficulty. Both the president and Mrs. Hoover are well versed in the intricate labyrinth of official etiquet, the most important event being in arranging for the diplomatic corps to meet the new administration. This the president and Mrs. Hoover have planned for 4 o'clock Monday afternoon, when the ambassadors, ministers and charge d'affaires and their wives, and the counselors and their wives, or where there are no counselors, the first secretaries and their wives will pay their respects.

For the first time since becoming the first lady of the land Mrs. Hoover occupied the White House box in a local theater, going to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra in its program. She created quite a flurry as the White House car drove up and she and her party stepped out. While Mrs. Coolidge added to the fame of her husband's administrations by her spontaneous smile, Mrs. Hoover also smiles, and when she does, she shows dimples in her prettily turned cheeks and her eyes dance.

While there was no real demonstration at the theater, Mrs. Hoover looked out over the large street group with interest. She wore a becoming gown of black velvet very simple in design, a black velvet hat, brimless and quite close fitting, and long white gloves. The coat was the one she wore for the inaugural ceremonies, of black broadtail quite conservative in length and with a broad collar of sable and a deep band of the fur reaching the bottom of the coat. The cuffs of sable were quite deep.

With Mrs. Hoover was her uncle, W. D. Henry of Wahpeton, N. D., her sister, Mrs. Jean Henry Large, Mrs. May Leavitt, the sister of the president, and Mrs. Mark Requa of California.

Everything Mrs. Hoover has done since March 4 has met with unalloyed approval, especially her retention of Miss Mary Randolph as head of the social secretary staff in the White House. Miss Randolph is

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAR 9 - 1929

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, gave concerts in New York on Thursday evening and in Brooklyn on Friday. A program of exceptional interest being given at the concert in Carnegie hall, New York, this afternoon, at which time the "Third Symphony" by Jean Sibelius is being given.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE
MAR 9 - 1929

of the Day

VARD CUSHING

erto at a Boston Symphony phony by Frederick the —Other Music.

garden wherein nature is presented under s, rather, a vast and primitive acreage xpanding, feeds upon vistas desolate and places, steppe and firth" northern sky. A rigorous hospitality it the prettiness we call beauty. For these m invited thither; for these reasons, perignored. On the fingers of one hand it number of performances that the Violin the past 10 years. Virtuosi, we do not ber and grueling pages—from which only fruits seeing labor y are con- phony ch as soloist tra at vening ncerto large- uering allengan epic suavity diction. ichness nfigura- laconic ot hear gend, a ed from music, whose art, developed in remote solitude, beyond the corruption of foreign influence, expresses so profoundly, so eloquently the consciousness of an individual and a race?

Here, not in the dilettante scribblings of younger men, opportunists all, is the music of the future; here, a voice that does not presume when it demands silence before it speaks. We court the ridicule of posterity to ignore so impressive a gift as the seven symphonies and other works of Sibelius.

* * *

Mr. Koussewitsky had another but less important surprise for his Brooklyn audience last evening, disclosing to them a Symphony in D major by that unique monarch, Frederick the Great. Composed in 1743 for two flutes, two oboes, bassoon, two horns and strings, and not entirely original in its material, it suggests that the King had a cultivated rather than a creative mind. The slow movement, a duet for the flutes, Frederick wrote in compliment to his favorite instrument, in the manipulation of which he could claim some proficiency Doubtless the court was amused by the performances of the royal composer-flutist, but Frederick took himself and his music seriously—as was, indeed, his right. The world, or any portion thereof, would do well to boast today a sovereign whose talents as a statesman did not preclude such diversions as the composition of symphonies. Of the King's agreeable but slim measures, Mr. Koussewitsky conducted a lively performance.

The concert concluded with the E minor Symphony of Tschaikowsky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
MAR 10

THIS CLIPPING FROM KALAMAZOO, MICH.
GAZETTE
MAR 10 1929

Inaugural Over,

Mrs. Herbert Hoover, Jr., and their two adorable youngsters, Peggy Ann and Herbert, III, and Mr. and Mrs. Mark Requa of California, old-time friends. Allan Hoover, the youngest son, set off Friday for California to pick up his studies where he left off about 10 days ago to come East for the crowning event in the Hoover family history.

STILL 'SEEING WASHINGTON'

Upon the whole at the old Hoover home in S street everything is going 100 per cent, with the overflow of relatives and family friends in residence. One of the first lady's good friends, a very generally helpful standby, is playing host for Mrs. Hoover to a family made up of her sister, Mrs. Jean Henry Large, and W. D. Henry, an uncle, and a very great family favorite. During the day, there is generally a grand re-assembling about the White House luncheon table, and a general dispersal thereafter.

Mr. and Mrs. Hoover, Jr., and their two children will possibly remain for a fortnight longer before going to California, where they will establish a home. As the guests at the White House take leave, those stopping at the S street home will betake themselves to the White House. An elderly personage, full of pep and keenly interested in the grand-sight-seeing tours engineered for the benefit of the visitors, Mr. Henry, who made the trip from North Dakota, may possibly stop for a while with the President and Mrs. Hoover.

Despite the long separation and the transcontinental distances, the Hoover family is a closely-knit group and there is no dull day when the kinsfolk on both sides foregather for a visit.

At all events no group of "trippers" ever went at the business of "seeing Washington" with greater enthusiasm than does the little company of the White House family, relatives, and old-time friends who journeyed to Washington for the inaugural ceremonies.

Come Monday afternoon and the first state event of the new administration will be staged. The President and Mrs. Hoover will formally receive the chiefs of foreign diplomatic missions and the next ranking officers of the embassies and legations at 4 p. m. This is traditionally the first White House hospitality, and being an occasion of state and ceremony, it is a brilliant affair.

Meantime, quite an ovation did the new first lady receive when she appeared in the presidential box at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on Wednesday with Mr. Henry, Mrs. Large, Mrs. Leavitt, and Mr. and Mrs. Requa. She looked distingue in a black velvet one-piece gown, a tight-fitting hat of black velvet and a lovely full-length coat of broad tail, with a collar and hem-border of sable.

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

A Symphony by Frederick the Great

Mr. Koussevitzky, who is so assiduous in placing before us the music of the future, rested from his labors on the Sabbath, his recreation taking the form of a concert of symphonic music which took account of the middle of the eighteenth century and the dawn of the twentieth. Notwithstanding these familiar and unsensational eras traversed by the Bostonians at yesterday's matinee, Mr. Koussevitzky found it possible to unearth a novelty—without which, of course, a present day orchestral concert is unthinkable.

It was, to be sure, a hoary novelty, this Symphony in D major by Frederick the Great. But it came as a big surprise to those of us who had thought that a little pleasant flute-playing was the extent of the celebrated warrior's affiliation with the art of music. We could not have been more astonished if we had suddenly come upon a sonnet series by Mr. Coolidge in the current issue of the Cosmopolitan Magazine. However, there it was, a genuine symphony for strings, two flutes, two oboes, two horns and a bassoon, sounding like any composition of its time, with its well-defined naive melodies and lucid instrumentation.

The program notes assured us that the King wrote all the parts without assistance, but it is permissable to believe that Frederick, even if possessed of the necessary skill, might have, on account of the press of other business, hired the Ferdie Grofe of the court to do a bit of ghost-writing for him. But whether royalty or a mere hireling fashioned the instrumental clothes for the little symphony, the job seems a fairly good one even in this day and age.

A more baffling opus was Sibelius's Third Symphony. Although the work breathes sincerity in every note it fails, for this listener at least, to image a coherent musical entity. In the first movement, especially, there is an insistence on passages which seem hardly important enough to merit such prodigious underlining.

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
STAR
MAR 10 1929

MORE ABOUT GOOD RECORDS.

So much interesting music is coming in on the records this year as almost to embarrass the reviewer. Another Wagner album, for one, comes from the Victor foreign studios, directed by Dr. Karl Muck—the overture to "Die Meistersinger," the music to "Siegfried's Rhine Journey," and the gorgeous funeral music on the death of that same hero; finishing with the long prelude to "Parsifal," deliberately played—only Dr. Muck knows how to deliberate.

Then Victor introduces a group which has not played on the records since Dr. Muck took his unfortunate leave for the Fatherland early in the war—the Boston Symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, playing an abbreviated version of Stravinsky's "Petrouchka." A most colorful performance of a most interesting score, by a conductor famous for his playing of such works. It is just as well, perhaps, that Dr. Muck went away—no one who plays "Parsifal" as he does could play Stravinsky as Koussevitzky does. Coupled to one of the Petrouchka records is a fragment from the recent ballet by the same composer called "Apollo, Leader of the Muses," a gem of rare and tender beauty. Except in the berceuse which occurs in the "Fire-Bird" suite, we do not recall catching Stravinsky writing in such a mood of ingratiating repose.

Victor also breaks its long strange silence in regard to Richard Strauss this month. It has employed the composer to conduct, with an augmented opera house orchestra, a suite from his "Rosenkavalier," the vocal high points of which he has agreeably transcribed for the orchestra. This is excellent music, deserving to remain with his tone poems long after the "Salome" and "Elecktra" mistakes have been forgotten. You'll like the waltz music best at first, but there are other treasures hidden away in the score which will

THIS CLIPPING FROM WILMINGTON, DEL.
STAR
MAR 10 1929

HOOVER KINSFOLK SEEING WASHINGTON

Family Group Out in Force for Inaugural Ceremonies

BY JEAN JARVIS
(Copyright, 1929, by The Sunday Star)

Washington, March 9—Just as feverishly busy this week shaking down into its characteristic gait as it has been the last few weeks working up to its inauguration week speed, Washington, by and large, is pretty well frazzled. Oddly enough, the casualties concern not the top-liners, who might readily be expected to be gasping on the brink, but the rank and file of the near-great.

There is a noticeable letting down everywhere but at the White House where, so to speak, things are going double.

At the White House itself, the President and Mrs. Hoover have as house guests Mrs. May Leavitt, of California, sister of the President; Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Hoover, Jr., and their two adorable youngsters, Peggy Ann and Herbert, III; and Mr. and Mrs. Mark Requa, of California, old-time friends. Allan Hoover, the youngest son, set off Friday for California to pick up his studies where he left off about ten days ago to come east for the crowning event in the Hoover family history.

Overflow at Old Hoover Home

Up on the hill at the old Hoover home in S street, everything is going 100%, with the overflow of relatives and family friends in residence. One of the First Lady's good friends, a very generally helpful standby, is playing host for Mrs. Hoover to a family made up of her sister, Mrs. Jean Henry Large, and W. D. Henry, an uncle, and a very great family favorite. During the day, there is generally a grand re-assembling about the White House luncheon table, and a general dispersal thereafter.

Mr. and Mrs. Hoover, Jr., and their two children will possibly remain for a fortnight longer before going to California, where they will establish a home. As the guests at the White House take leave, those stopping at the S street home will betake themselves to the White House. An elderly personage, full of pep and keenly interested in the grand-sight-seeing tours engineered for the benefit of the visitors, Mr. Henry, who made the trip from North Dakota, may possibly stop for a while with the President and Mrs. Hoover.

Despite the long separation and the transcontinental distances, the Hoover family is a closely-knit group, and there is no dull day when the kinsfolk on both sides foregather for a visit.

At all events no group of "trippers" ever went at the business of "seeing Washington" with greater enthusiasm than does the little company of the White House family, relatives, and old-time friends who journeyed to Washington for the inaugural ceremonies.

Come Monday afternoon and the first state event of the new administration will be staged. The President and Mrs. Hoover will formally receive the chiefs of foreign diplomatic missions and the next ranking officers of the embassies and legations at 4 p. m. This is traditionally the first White House hospitality, and being an occasion of state and ceremony, it is a brilliant affair.

Meantime, quite an ovation did the new First Lady receive when she appeared in the presidential box at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on Wednesday with Mr. Henry, Mrs. Large, Mrs. Leavitt, and Mr. and Mrs. Requa. She looked distingue in a black velvet one-piece gown, a tight-fitting hat of black velvet, and a lovely full-length coat of broadtail, with collar and hem-border of sable.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

MAR 10 1929

New Administration Will Greet Diplomats Monday

President and Mrs. Hoover Now Divide Time Between Settling Themselves in New Home and Official Duties.

Washington, March 9, 1929.

SOCIALLY speaking the new administration is finding its bearings without the slightest difficulty as both the President and Mrs. Hoover are well versed in the intricate labyrinth of official etiquet. The most important event rests in arranging for the diplomatic corps to meet the new administration. This the President and Mrs. Hoover have planned for 4 o'clock Monday afternoon, when the ambassadors, ministers and charge d'affaires and their wives, and the counselors and their wives, or where there are not counselors, the first secretaries and their wives will pay their respects. Officials of the state department and the full complement of White House aides will present and care for the guests. The Marine band will add a lively note and, of course, the diplomats will be in full court dress, while many of the ladies have already rushed off to New York to visit importers' shops and secure new costumes for the occasion.

ASIDE from this specially arranged formality both the President and Mrs. Hoover have been busily engaged visiting with their family, receiving delegations and settling their effects in the White House cupboards and closets and making themselves at home.

For the first time since becoming the first lady of the land Mrs. Hoover occupied the White House box in a local theater, having gone to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra in its program. She created quite a flurry as the White House car drove up and she and her party stepped out. While Mrs. Coolidge added to the fame of her husband's administrations by her spontaneous smile, Mrs. Hoover also smiles, and when she does, she shows dimples in her prettily turned cheeks and her eyes dance. While there was no real demonstration at the theater, Mrs. Hoover looked out over the large street group with interest. She wore a becoming gown of black velvet very simple in design, a black velvet hat, brimless and quite close fitting, and long white gloves. The coat was the one she wore for the inaugural ceremonies, of black broadtail, quite conservative in length and with a broad collar of sable and a deep band of the fur reaching the bottom of the coat; the cuffs of sable were rather deep. With Mrs. Hoover was her uncle, Mr. W. D. Henry, of Wahpeton, N. D.; her sister, Mrs. Jean Henry Large; Mrs. May Leavitt, the sister of the president, and Mrs. Mark Requa, of California.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

MAR 9 192

President and Mrs. Hoover Enter on Social Life

Washington, March 9.—(AP)—Socially speaking the new administration is finding its bearings without the slightest difficulty. Both the president and Mrs. Hoover are well versed in the intricate labyrinth of official etiquet, the most important event being in arranging for the diplomatic corps to meet the new administration. This the president and Mrs. Hoover have planned for 4 o'clock Monday afternoon, when the ambassadors, ministers and charge d'affaires and their wives, and the counselors and their wives, or where there are no counselors, the first secretaries and their wives will pay their respects.

For the first time since becoming the first lady of the land Mrs. Hoover occupied the White House box in a local theater, going to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra in its program. She created quite a flurry as the White House car drove up and she and her party stepped out. While Mrs. Coolidge added to the fame of her husband's administrations by her spontaneous smile, Mrs. Hoover also smiles, and when she does, she shows dimples in her prettily turned cheeks and her eyes dance.

While there was no real demonstration at the theater, Mrs. Hoover looked out over the large street group with interest. She wore a becoming gown of black velvet very simple in design, a black velvet hat, brimless and quite close fitting, and long white gloves. The coat was the one she wore for the inaugural ceremonies, of black broadtail quite conservative in length and with a broad collar of sable and a deep band of the fur reaching the bottom of the coat. The cuffs of sable were quite deep.

With Mrs. Hoover was her uncle, W. D. Henry of Wahpeton, N. D., her sister, Mrs. Jean Henry Large, Mrs. May Leavitt, the sister of the president, and Mrs. Mark Requa of California.

Everything Mrs. Hoover has done since March 4 has met with unalloyed approval, especially her retention of Miss Mary Randolph as head of the social secretary staff in the White House. Miss Randolph is

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

MAR 9

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, gave concerts in New York on Thursday evening and in Brooklyn on Friday. A program of exceptional interest is being given at the concert in Carnegie hall, New York, this afternoon, at which time the "Third Symphony" by Jean Sibelius is being given.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE

MAR 9 -

Inaugural Over, of the Day

VARD CUSHING

...erto at a Boston Symphony ...phony by Frederick the ...Other Music.

...garden wherein nature is presented under ...s, rather, a vast and primitive acreage ...xpanding, feeds upon vistas desolate and ...

... places, steppe and firth"

...northern sky. A rigorous hospitality it ... the prettiness we call beauty. For these ... invited thither; for these reasons, per... ignored. On the fingers of one hand it ... number of performances that the Violin ... the past 10 years. Virtuosi, we do not ... ber and grueling pages—from which only ... fruits ... seeing ... labor ... are ... con... phony ... ich as ... soloist ... stra at ... vening ... ncerto ... large... uering ... allenging ... an epic ... suavity ... diction. ... ichness ... figura... laconic ... ot hear ... egend, a ... ed from ... music.

whose art, developed in remote solitude, beyond the corruption of foreign influence, expresses so profoundly, so eloquently the consciousness of an individual and a race?

Here, not in the dilettante scribblings of younger men, opportunists all, is the music of the future; here, a voice that does not presume when it demands silence before it speaks. We court the ridicule of posterity to ignore so impressive a gift as the seven symphonies and other works of Sibelius.

* * *

Mr. Koussewitsky had another but less important surprise for his Brooklyn audience last evening, disclosing to them a Symphony in D major by that unique monarch, Frederick the Great. Composed in 1743 for two flutes, two oboes, bassoon, two horns and strings, and not entirely original in its material, it suggests that the King had a cultivated rather than a creative mind. The slow movement, a duet for the flutes, Frederick wrote in compliment to his favorite instrument, in the manipulation of which he could claim some proficiency Doubtless the court was amused by the performances of the royal composer-flutist, but Frederick took himself and his music seriously—as was, indeed, his right. The world, or any portion thereof, would do well to boast today a sovereign whose talents as a statesman did not preclude such diversions as the composition of symphonies. Of the King's agreeable but slim measures, Mr. Koussewitsky conducted a lively performance.

The concert concluded with the E minor Symphony of Tschaikowsky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

MAR 10

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

A Symphony by Frederick the Great

Mr. Koussevitzky, who is so assiduous in placing before us the music of the future, rested from his labors on the Sabbath, his recreation taking the form of a concert of symphonic music which took account of the middle of the eighteenth century and the dawn of the twentieth. Notwithstanding these familiar and unsensational eras traversed by the Bostonians at yesterday's matinee, Mr. Koussevitzky found it possible to unearth a novelty—without which, of course, a present day orchestral concert is unthinkable.

It was, to be sure, a hoary novelty, this Symphony in D major by Frederick the Great. But it came as a big surprise to those of us who had thought that a little pleasant flute-playing was the extent of the celebrated warrior's affiliation with the art of music. We could not have been more astonished if we had suddenly come upon a sonnet series by Mr. Coolidge in the current issue of the Cosmopolitan Magazine. However, there it was, a genuine symphony for strings, two flutes, two oboes, two horns and a bassoon, sounding like any composition of its time, with its well-defined naive melodies and lucid instrumentation.

The program notes assured us that the King wrote all the parts without assistance, but it is permissable to believe that Frederick, even if possessed of the necessary skill, might have, on account of the press of other business, hired the Ferdie Grofe of the court to do a bit of ghost-writing for him. But whether royalty or a mere hireling fashioned the instrumental clothes for the little symphony, the job seems a fairly good one even in this day and age.

A more baffling opus was Sibelius's Third Symphony. Although the work breathes sincerity in every note it fails, for this listener at least, to image a coherent musical entity. In the first movement, especially, there is an insistence on passages which seem hardly important enough to merit such prodigious underlining.

THIS CLIPPING FROM KALAMAZOO, MICH.
GAZETTE

MAR 10 1929

...s ...it ...GO ...E ...offi... ...ust ...ak... ...stic ...new ...ay ...ed. ...on... ...ght ...ng ...nd ...ge ...ve ...ht ...k, ...he ...ve ...tt, ...nd ...ir ...ce ...ay ...ed ...ed ...ed

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

MAR 10 1929

NWOLIN
G NARROW HEEL
Pruci Blue

..model of two-toned kid....with lizard in chic combinations including the new san souci blue 27.50

THIS CLIPPING FROM ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

MAR 9 1929

President and Mrs. Hoover Enter on Social Life

Washington, March 9.—(AP)—Socially speaking the new administration is finding its bearings without the slightest difficulty. Both the president and Mrs. Hoover are well versed in the intricate labyrinth of official etiquet, the most important event being in arranging for the diplomatic corps to meet the new administration. This the president and Mrs. Hoover have planned for 4 o'clock Monday afternoon, when the ambassadors, ministers and charge d'affaires and their wives, and the counselors and their wives, or where there are no counselors, the first secretaries and their wives will pay their respects.

For the first time since becoming the first lady of the land Mrs. Hoover occupied the White House box in a local theater, going to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra in its program. She created quite a flurry as the White House car drove up and she and her party stepped out. While Mrs. Coolidge added to the fame of her husband's administrations by her spontaneous smile, Mrs. Hoover also smiles, and when she does, she shows dimples in her prettily turned cheeks and her eyes dance.

While there was no real demonstration at the theater, Mrs. Hoover looked out over the large street group with interest. She wore a becoming gown of black velvet very simple in design, a black velvet hat, brimless and quite close fitting, and long white gloves. The coat was the one she wore for the inaugural ceremonies, of black broadtail quite conservative in length and with a broad collar of sable and a deep band of the fur reaching the bottom of the coat. The cuffs of sable were quite deep.

With Mrs. Hoover was her uncle, W. D. Henry of Wahpeton, N. D., her sister, Mrs. Jean Henry Large, Mrs. May Leavitt, the sister of the president, and Mrs. Mark Requa of California.

Everything Mrs. Hoover has done since March 4 has met with unalloyed approval, especially her retention of Miss Mary Randolph as head of the social secretary staff in the White House. Miss Randolph is

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

MAR 9

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, gave concerts in New York on Thursday evening and in Brooklyn on Friday. A program of exceptional interest is being given at the concert in Carnegie hall, New York, this afternoon, at which time the "Third Symphony" by Jean Sibelius is being given.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE

MAR 9 - 1929

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

Sibelius' Violin Concerto at a Boston Symphony Concert—A Symphony by Frederick the Great—Other Music.

THE music of Sibelius is no garden wherein nature is presented under the auspices of art. It is, rather, a vast and primitive acreage across which the sight, expanding, feeds upon vistas desolate and grand,

". . . . Strange places, steppe and firth" inclosed by the arch of the northern sky. A rigorous hospitality it offers, and a Spartan ration of the prettiness we call beauty. For these reasons, it may be, we are seldom invited thither; for these reasons, perhaps, the music of Sibelius is ignored. On the fingers of one hand it would be possible to count the number of performances that the Violin Concerto has received during the past 10 years. Virtuosi, we do not doubt, are repelled by its somber and grueling pages—from which only with prayer and fasting the fruits of triumph may be wrested—seeing in them the promise of much labor and little reward. That they are wrong, Mr. Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, can disclose to such as will attend him.

* * *

Mr. Burgin appeared as soloist with Mr. Koussewitsky's orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening and played the Sibelius Concerto His performance borrowed its largeness of conception, its conquering sweep, from the music—a challenging proclamation, indeed, of an epic song, sacrificing polish and suavity for elemental passion of diction. Listening, one realized the richness lying beneath the sparse configurations of this music, felt its laconic strength. Why should we not hear more of Sibelius, a man of legend, a man of our time, yet isolated from the contemporary world of music, whose art, developed in remote solitude, beyond the corruption of foreign influence, expresses so profoundly, so eloquently the consciousness of an individual and a race?

Here, not in the dilettante scribblings of younger men, opportunists all, is the music of the future; here, a voice that does not presume when it demands silence before it speaks. We court the ridicule of posterity to ignore so impressive a gift as the seven symphonies and other works of Sibelius.

* * *

Mr. Koussewitsky had another but less important surprise for his Brooklyn audience last evening, disclosing to them a Symphony in D major by that unique monarch, Frederick the Great. Composed in 1743 for two flutes, two oboes, bassoon, two horns and strings, and not entirely original in its material, it suggests that the King had a cultivated rather than a creative mind. The slow movement, a duet for the flutes, Frederick wrote in compliment to his favorite instrument, in the manipulation of which he could claim some proficiency Doubtless the court was amused by the performances of the royal composer-flutist, but Frederick took himself and his music seriously—as was, indeed, his right. The world, or any portion thereof, would do well to boast today a sovereign whose talents as a statesman did not preclude such diversions as the composition of symphonies. Of the King's agreeable but slim measures, Mr. Koussewitsky conducted a lively performance.

The concert concluded with the E minor Symphony of Tschaikowsky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

MAR 10

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

A Symphony by Frederick the Great

Mr. Koussevitzky, who is so assiduous in placing before us the music of the future, rested from his labors on the Sabbath, his recreation taking the form of a concert of symphonic music which took account of the middle of the eighteenth century and the dawn of the twentieth. Notwithstanding these familiar and unsensational eras traversed by the Bostonians at yesterday's matinee, Mr. Koussevitzky found it possible to unearth a novelty—without which, of course, a present day orchestral concert is unthinkable.

It was, to be sure, a hoary novelty, this Symphony in D major by Frederick the Great. But it came as a big surprise to those of us who had thought that a little pleasant flute-playing was the extent of the celebrated warrior's affiliation with the art [illegible]. We could not have been more astonished if we had suddenly discovered a sonnet series by Mr. [illegible] in the current issue of the Saturday Evening Magasine. However, there it was, a genuine symphony for strings, two flutes, two oboes, two horns and a bassoon, sounding like any composition of its time, with its well-defined naive melodies and lucid instrumentation.

The program notes assured us that the King wrote all the parts without assistance, but it is permissable to believe that Frederick, even if possessed of the necessary skill, might have, on account of the press of other business, hired the Ferdie Grofe of the court to do a bit of ghost-writing for him. But whether royalty or a mere hireling fashioned the instrumental clothes for the little symphony, the job seems a fairly good one even in this day and age.

A more baffling opus was Sibelius's Third Symphony. Although the work breathes sincerity in every note it fails, for this listener at least, to image a coherent musical entity. In the first movement, especially, there is an insistence on passages which seem hardly important enough to merit such prodigious underlining.

THIS CLIPPING FROM KALAMAZOO, MICH.
GAZETTE

MAR 10 1929

Inaugural Over,

Mrs. Herbert Hoover, Jr., and their two adorable youngsters, Peggy Ann and Herbert, III, and Mr. and Mrs. Mark Requa of California, old-time friends. Allan Hoover, the youngest son, set off Friday for California to pick up his studies where he left off about 10 days ago to come East for the crowning event in the Hoover family history.

STILL "SEEING WASHINGTON."

Up on the hill at the old Hoover home in S street everything is going 100 per cent, with the overflow of relatives and family friends in residence. One of the first lady's good friends, a very generally helpful standby, is playing host for Mrs. Hoover in a family made up of her sister, Mrs. Jean Henry Large, and W. D. Henry, an uncle, and a very great family favorite. During the day there is generally a grand re-assembling about the White House luncheon table and a general dispersal thereafter.

Mr. and Mrs. Hoover, Jr., and their two children will possibly remain for a fortnight longer before going to California, where they will establish a home. As the guests at the White House take leave, those stopping at the S street home will betake themselves to the White House. An elderly personage, full of pep and keenly interested in the grand-sight-seeing tours engineered for the benefit of the visitors, Mr. Henry, who made the trip from North Dakota, may possibly stop for a while with the President and Mrs. Hoover.

Despite the long separation and the transcontinental distances, the Hoover family is a closely-knit group, and there is no dull day when the kinsfolk of both sides foregather for a visit.

At all events no group of "trippers" ever went at the business of "seeing Washington" with greater enthusiasm than does the little company of the White House family, relatives, and old-time friends who journeyed to Washington for the inaugural ceremonies.

Come Monday afternoon and the first state event of the new administration will be staged. The President and Mrs. Hoover will formally receive the chiefs of foreign diplomatic missions and the next ranking officers of the embassies and legations at 4 p. m. This is traditionally the first White House occasion of state and ceremony, it is a brilliant affair.

Meantime, quite an ovation did the new First Lady receive when she appeared in the presidential box at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on Wednesday with Mr. Henry, Mrs. Large, Mrs. Leavitt, and Mr. and Mrs. Requa. She looked distingue in a black velvet one-piece gown, a tight-fitting hat of black velvet, and a lovely full-length coat of broadtail, with collar and hem-border of sable.

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
STAR

MAR 10 1929

MORE ABOUT GOOD RECORDS.

So much interesting music is coming in on the records this year as almost to embarrass the reviewer. Another Wagner album, for one, comes from the Victor foreign studios, directed by Dr. Karl Muck—the overture to "Die Meistersinger," the music to "Siegfried's Rhine Journey," and the gorgeous funeral music on the death of that same hero; finishing with the long prelude to "Parsifal," deliberately played—only Dr. Muck knows how to deliberate.

Then Victor introduces a group which has not played on the records since Dr. Muck took his unfortunate leave for the Fatherland early in the war—the Boston Symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, playing an abbreviated version of Stravinsky's "Petrouchka." A most colorful performance of a most interesting score, by a conductor famous for his playing of such works. It is just as well, perhaps, that Dr. Muck went away—no one who plays "Parsifal" as he does could play Stravinsky as Koussevitzky does. Coupled to one of the Petrouchka records is a fragment from the recent ballet by the same composer called "Apollo, Leader of the Muses," a gem of rare and tender beauty. Except in the berceuse which occurs in the "Fire-Bird" suite, we do not recall catching Stravinsky writing in such a mood of ingratiating repose.

Victor also breaks its long strange silence in regard to Richard Strauss this month. It has employed the composer to conduct, with an augmented opera house orchestra, a suite from his "Rosenkavalier," the vocal high points of which he has agreeably transcribed for the orchestra. This is excellent music, deserving to remain with his tone poems long after the "Salome" and "Elecktra" mistakes have been forgotten. You'll like the waltz music best at first, but there are other treasures hidden away in the score which will

THIS CLIPPING FROM WILMINGTON, DEL.
STAR

HOOVER KINSFOLK SEEING WASHINGTON

Family Group Out in Force for Inaugural Ceremonies

BY JEAN JARVIS

(Copyright, 1929, by The Sunday Star)

Washington, March 9—Just as feverishly busy this week shaking down into its characteristic gait as it has been the last few weeks working up to its inauguration week speed, Washington, by and large, is pretty well frazzled. Oddly enough, the casualties concern not the top-liners, who might readily be expected to be gasping on the brink, but the rank and file of the near-great.

There is a noticeable letting down everywhere but at the White House where, so to speak, things are going double.

At the White House itself, the President and Mrs. Hoover have as house guests Mrs. May Leavitt, of California, sister of the President; Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Hoover, Jr., and their two adorable youngsters, Peggy Ann and Herbert, III; and Mr. and Mrs. Mark Requa, of California, old-time friends. Allan Hoover, the youngest son, set off Friday for California to pick up his studies where he left off about ten days ago to come east for the crowning event in the Hoover family history.

Overflow at Old Hoover Home

Up on the hill at the old Hoover home in S street, everything is going 100%, with the overflow of relatives and family friends in residence. One of the First Lady's good friends, a very generally helpful standby, is playing host for Mrs. Hoover in a family made up of her sister, Mrs. Jean Henry Large, and W. D. Henry, an uncle, and a very great family favorite. During the day, there is generally a grand re-assembling about the White House luncheon table, and a general dispersal thereafter.

Mr. and Mrs. Hoover, Jr., and their two children will possibly remain for a fortnight longer before going to California, where they will establish a home. As the guests at the White House take leave, those stopping at the S street home will betake themselves to the White House. An elderly personage, full of pep and keenly interested in the grand-sight-seeing tours engineered for the benefit of the visitors, Mr. Henry, who made the trip from North Dakota, may possibly stop for a while with the President and Mrs. Hoover.

Despite the long separation and the transcontinental distances, the Hoover family is a closely-knit group, and there is no dull day when the kinsfolk of both sides foregather for a visit.

At all events no group of "trippers" ever went at the business of "seeing Washington" with greater enthusiasm than does the little company of the White House family, relatives, and old-time friends who journeyed to Washington for the inaugural ceremonies.

Come Monday afternoon and the first state event of the new administration will be staged. The President and Mrs. Hoover will formally receive the chiefs of foreign diplomatic missions and the next ranking officers of the embassies and legations at 4 p. m. This is traditionally the first White House occasion of state and ceremony, it is a brilliant affair.

Meantime, quite an ovation did the new First Lady receive when she appeared in the presidential box at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on Wednesday with Mr. Henry, Mrs. Large, Mrs. Leavitt, and Mr. and Mrs. Requa. She looked distingue in a black velvet one-piece gown, a tight-fitting hat of black velvet, and a lovely full-length coat of broadtail, with collar and hem-border of sable.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

MAR 10 1929

NWOLIN
G NARROW HEEL
Prussi Blue
..model of two-toned kid....with lizard in chic combinations including the new san souci blue 27.50

THIS CLIPPING FROM ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

MAR 9 192

President and Mrs. Hoover Enter on Social Life

Washington, March 9.—(AP)—Socially speaking the new administration is finding its bearings without the slightest difficulty. Both the president and Mrs. Hoover are well versed in the intricate labyrinth of official etiquet, the most important event being in arranging for the diplomatic corps to meet the new administration. This the president and Mrs. Hoover have planned for 4 o'clock Monday afternoon, when the ambassadors, ministers and charge d'affaires and their wives, and the counselors and their wives, or where there are no counselors, the first secretaries and their wives will pay their respects.

For the first time since becoming the first lady of the land Mrs. Hoover occupied the White House box in a local theater, going to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra in its program. She created quite a flurry as the White House car drove up and she and her party stepped out. While Mrs. Coolidge added to the fame of her husband's administrations by her spontaneous smile, Mrs. Hoover also smiles, and when she does, she shows dimples in her prettily turned cheeks and her eyes dance.

While there was no real demonstration at the theater, Mrs. Hoover looked out over the large street group with interest. She wore a becoming gown of black velvet very simple in design, a black velvet hat, brimless and quite close fitting, and long white gloves. The coat was the one she wore for the inaugural ceremonies, of black broadtail quite conservative in length and with a broad collar of sable and a deep band of the fur reaching the bottom of the coat. The cuffs of sable were quite deep.

With Mrs. Hoover was her uncle, W. D. Henry of Wahpeton, N. D., her sister, Mrs. Jean Henry Large, Mrs. May Leavitt, the sister of the president, and Mrs. Mark Requa of California.

Everything Mrs. Hoover has done since March 4 has met with unalloyed approval, especially her retention of Miss Mary Randolph as head of the social secretary staff in the White House. Miss Randolph is

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

MAR 9 -

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, gave concerts in New York on Thursday evening and in Brooklyn on Friday. A program of exceptional interest is being given at the concert in Carnegie hall, New York, this afternoon, at which time the "Third Symphony" by Jean Sibelius is being given.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE

MAR 9 - 1929

Forest fires laid waste large tracts of woodland in Suffolk County, Long Island, yesterday. The greatest loss occurred in the vicinity of Central Islip, where the flames destroyed about one square mile of scrub oak and timber. A few abandoned shacks were destroyed but no houses were burned.

The village of Central Islip was in the vicinity of the State Hospital for the Insane, housing about 7,000 patients. The institution was never in any danger, though at one time the flames crept within a half mile of the buildings.

The Central Islip fire started on Thursday. It evaded the outskirts of the game preserve of the South Side Sportsmen's Club, owned by a group of wealthy New Yorkers, but shifted its course without coming near the clubhouse.

The fire began burning itself out late yesterday in the direction of Lake Ronkonkoma. The fire fighters with prayer and fasting the fruits of triumph may be wrested—seeing in them the promise of much labor and little reward. That they are wrong, Mr. Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, can disclose to such as will attend him.

* * *

Mr. Burgin appeared as soloist with Mr. Koussewitsky's orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening and played the Sibelius Concerto His performance borrowed its largeness of conception, its conquering sweep, from the music—a challenging proclamation, indeed, of an epic song, sacrificing polish and suavity for elemental passion of diction. Listening, one realized the richness lying beneath the sparse configurations of this music, felt its laconic strength. Why should we not hear more of Sibelius, a man of legend, a man of our time, yet isolated from the contemporary world of music, whose art, developed in remote solitude, beyond the corruption of foreign influence, expresses so profoundly, so eloquently the consciousness of an individual and a race?

Here, not in the dilettante scribblings of younger men, opportunists all, is the music of the future; here, a voice that does not presume when it demands silence before it speaks. We court the ridicule of posterity to ignore so impressive a gift as the seven symphonies and other works of Sibelius.

* * *

Mr. Koussewitsky had another but less important surprise for his Brooklyn audience last evening, disclosing to them a Symphony in D major by that unique monarch, Frederick the Great. Composed in 1743 for two flutes, two oboes, bassoon, two horns and strings, and not entirely original in its material, it suggests that the King had a cultivated rather than a creative mind. The slow movement, a duet for the flutes, Frederick wrote in compliment to his favorite instrument, in the manipulation of which he could claim some proficiency Doubtless the court was amused by the performances of the royal composer-flutist, but Frederick took himself and his music seriously—as was, indeed, his right. The world, or any portion thereof, would do well to boast today a sovereign whose talents as a statesman did not preclude such diversions as the composition of symphonies. Of the King's agreeable but slim measures, Mr. Koussewitsky conducted a lively performance.

The concert concluded with the E minor Symphony of Tschaikowsky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

A Symphony by Frederick the Great

Mr. Koussevitzky, who is so assiduous in placing before us the music of the future, rested from his labors on the Sabbath, his recreation taking the form of a concert of symphonic music which took account of the middle of the eighteenth century and the dawn of the twentieth. Notwithstanding these familiar and unsensational eras traversed by the Bostonians at yesterday's matinee, Mr. Koussevitzky found it possible to unearth a novelty—without which, of course, a present day orchestral concert is unthinkable.

It was, to be sure, a hoary novelty, this Symphony in D major by Frederick the Great. But it came as a big surprise to those of us who had thought that a little pleasant flute-playing was the extent of the celebrated warrior's affiliation with the art of music. We could not have been more astonished if we had suddenly come upon a sonnet series by Mr. Coolidge in the current issue of the Cosmopolitan Magazine. However, there it was, a genuine symphony for strings, two flutes, two oboes, two horns and a bassoon, sounding like any composition of its time, with its well-defined naive melodies and lucid instrumentation.

The program notes assured us that the King wrote all the parts without assistance, but it is permissable to believe that Frederick, even if possessed of the necessary skill, might have, on account of the press of other business, hired the Ferdie Grofe of the court to do a bit of ghost-writing for him. But whether royalty or a mere hireling fashioned the instrumental clothes for the little symphony, the job seems a fairly good one even in this day and age.

A more baffling opus was Sibelius's Third Symphony. Although the work breathes sincerity in every note it fails, for this listener at least, to image a coherent musical entity. In the first movement, especially, there is an insistence on passages which seem hardly important enough to merit such prodigious underlining.

THIS CLIPPING FROM KALAMAZOO, MICH.
GAZETTE

MAR 10 1929

Inaugural Over, Capital Society's Pace Slows Up Bit

BUT SOCIAL AFFAIRS "GO DOUBLE" AT WHITE HOUSE AND STATE STREET HOME.

By JEAN JARVIS
(Copyright, 1929, by the Consolidated Press Association.)

WASHINGTON, March 9.—Just as feverishly busy this week shaking down into its characteristic gait as it has been the last few weeks working up to its inauguration week speed, Washington, by and large, is pretty well frazzled. Oddly enough, the casualties concern not the top-liners, who might readily be expected to be gasping on the brink, but the rank and file of the near-great.

There is a noticeable letting down everywhere but at the White House where, so to speak, things are going double.

At the White House itself, the President and Mrs. Hoover have as house guests Mrs. May Leavitt, of California, sister of the President; Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Hoover, Jr., and their two adorable youngsters, Peggy Ann and Herbert, III; and Mr. and Mrs. Mark Requa, of California, old time friends. Allan Hoover, the youngest son, set off Friday for California to pick up his studies where he left off about ten days ago to come east for the crowning event in the Hoover family history.

Overflow at Old Hoover Home

Up on the hill at the old Hoover home in S street, everything is going 100 per cent with the overflow of relatives and family friends in residence. One of the First Lady's good friends, a very generally helpful standby, is playing host for Mrs. Hoover in a family made up of her sister, Mrs. Jean Henry Large, and W. D. Henry, her uncle, and a very great family favorite. During the day, there is generally a grand re-assembling about the White House luncheon table, and a general dispersal thereafter.

Mr. and Mrs. Hoover, Jr., and their two children will possibly remain for a fortnight longer before going to California, where they will establish a home. As the guests at the White House take leave, those stopping at the S street home will betake themselves to the White House. An elderly personage, full of pep and keenly interested in the grand-sight-seeing tours engineered for the benefit of the visitors, Mr. Henry, who made the trip from North Dakota, may possibly stop for a while with the President and Mrs. Hoover.

Despite the long separation and the transcontinental distances, the Hoover family is a closely-knit group, and there is no dull day when the kinsfolk of both sides forgather for a visit.

At all events no group of "trippers" ever went at the business of "seeing Washington" with greater enthusiasm than does the little company of the White House family, relatives, and old time friends who journeyed to Washington for the inaugural ceremonies.

Come Monday afternoon and the first state event of the new administration will be staged. The President and Mrs. Hoover will formally receive the chiefs of foreign diplomatic missions and the next ranking officers of the embassies and legations at 4 p. m. This is traditionally the first official function of capital society, and being an occasion of state and ceremony, it is a brilliant affair.

Meantime, quite an ovation did the new First Lady receive when she appeared in the presidential box at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on Wednesday with Mr. Henry, Mrs. Large, Mrs. Leavitt, and Mr. and Mrs. Requa. She looked distingue in a black velvet one-piece gown, a tight-fitting hat of black velvet, and a lovely full-length coat of broadtail, with collar and hem-border of sable.

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
STAR

MAR 10 1929

MORE ABOUT GOOD RECORDS.

So much interesting music is coming in on the records this year as almost to embarrass the reviewer. Another Wagner album, for one, comes from the Victor foreign studios, directed by Dr. Karl Muck—the overture to "Die Meistersinger," the music to "Siegfried's Rhine Journey," and the gorgeous funeral music on the death of that same hero; finishing with the long prelude to "Parsifal," deliberately played. Only Dr. Muck knows how to deliberate.

Then Victor introduces a group which has not played on the records since Dr. Muck took his unfortunate leave for the Fatherland early in the war—the Boston Symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, playing an abbreviated version of Stravinsky's "Petrouchka." A most colorful performance of a most interesting score, by a conductor famous for his playing of such works. It is just as well, perhaps, that Dr. Muck went away—no one who plays "Parsifal" as he does could play Stravinsky as Koussevitzky does. Coupled to one of the Petrouchka records is a fragment from the recent ballet by the same composer called "Apollo, Leader of the Muses," a gem of rare and tender beauty. Except in the berceuse which occurs in the "Fire-Bird" suite, we do not recall catching Stravinsky writing in such a mood of ingratiating repose.

Victor also breaks its long strange silence in regard to Richard Strauss this month. It has employed the composer to conduct, with an augmented opera house orchestra, a suite from his "Rosenkavalier," the vocal high points of which he has agreeably transcribed for the orchestra. This is excellent music, deserving to remain with his tone poems long after the "Salome" and "Elecktra" mistakes have been forgotten. You'll like the waltz music best at first, but there are other treasures hidden away in the score which will rise and displace in affection even these loveliest of operatic waltzes.

C. H. T.

...OOVER KINSFOLK SEEING WASHINGTON

Family Group Out in Force for Inaugural Ceremonies

BY JEAN JARVIS
(Copyright, 1929, by The Sunday Star)

Washington, March 9—Just as feverishly busy this week shaking down into its characteristic gait as it has been the last few weeks working up to its inauguration week speed, Washington, by and large, is pretty well frazzled. Oddly enough, the casualties concern not the top-liners, who might readily be expected to be gasping on the brink, but the rank and file of the near-great.

There is a noticeable letting down everywhere but at the White House where, so to speak, things are going double.

At the White House itself, the President and Mrs. Hoover have as house guests Mrs. May Leavitt, of California, sister of the President; Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Hoover, Jr., and their two adorable youngsters, Peggy Ann and Herbert, III; and Mr. and Mrs. Mark Requa, of California, old time friends. Allan Hoover, the youngest son, set off Friday for California to pick up his studies where he left off about ten days ago to come east for the crowning event in the Hoover family history.

Overflow at Old Hoover Home

Up on the hill at the old Hoover home in S street, everything is going 100 per cent with the overflow of relatives and family friends in residence. One of the First Lady's good friends, a very generally helpful standby, is playing host for Mrs. Hoover in a family made up of her sister, Mrs. Jean Henry Large, and W. D. Henry, her uncle, and a very great family favorite. During the day, there is generally a grand re-assembling about the White House luncheon table, and a general dispersal thereafter.

Mr. and Mrs. Hoover, Jr., and their two children will possibly remain for a fortnight longer before going to California, where they will establish a home. As the guests at the White House take leave, those stopping at the S street home will betake themselves to the White House. An elderly personage, full of pep and keenly interested in the grand-sight-seeing tours engineered for the benefit of the visitors, Mr. Henry, who made the trip from North Dakota, may possibly stop for a while with the President and Mrs. Hoover.

Despite the long separation and the transcontinental distances, the Hoover family is a closely-knit group, and there is no dull day when the kinsfolk of both sides forgather for a visit.

At all events no group of "trippers" ever went at the business of "seeing Washington" with greater enthusiasm than does the little company of the White House family, relatives, and old time friends who journeyed to Washington for the inaugural ceremonies.

Come Monday afternoon and the first state event of the new administration will be staged. The President and Mrs. Hoover will formally receive the chiefs of foreign diplomatic missions and the next ranking officers of the embassies and legations at 4 p. m. This is traditionally the first official function of capital society, and being an occasion of state and ceremony, it is a brilliant affair.

Meantime, quite an ovation did the new First Lady receive when she appeared in the presidential box at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on Wednesday with Mr. Henry, Mrs. Large, Mrs. Leavitt, and Mr. and Mrs. Requa. She looked distingue in a black velvet one-piece gown, a tight-fitting hat of black velvet, and a lovely full-length coat of broadtail, with collar and hem-border of sable.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
MAR 10 1929

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Frederick the Great's Symphony.

A novelty by a composer who has gone neglected these many years was played at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. This composer, as Philip Hale reminded us in his incomparable program notes, was born in Berlin June 24, 1712, and died at Sans Souci, Potsdam, Aug. 17, 1786. The composer was none other than Frederick the Great.

Frederick's fondness for music is historic. His father's grim opposition to his artistic tastes also is history. Lessons on the flute with Quantz, flute virtuoso and composer of the day, had at last to be taken secretly, and on a certain occasion Quantz hid for an hour in a closet when the father all but surprised the son at his lesson. We know that Frederick was hardened for his political career by various means, including the execution of the bosom friend with whom he intended to escape forever the cares of State. But he did not relinquish his passion for music. When he became his own master he practiced performance and composition.

Mr. Hale tells us how he played the flute four times a day, on rising, after the meeting of the Cabinet Council, after dinner and later in the evening—a marvelous passion for the busiest ruler of his day and a man who inaugurated the epoch which closed only with the war of 1914. All music lovers know of the occasion when J. S. Bach, worn and weary, came to Potsdam, and the King put up his flute as a note was handed him, saying, "Gentlemen, old Bach has come."

The composition played yesterday was a Symphony in D major, a score recently pulled out of the Berlin Library, edited by Gustav Lenzewski, and revived by Erich Kleiber at the Staatsoper, Berlin, May 4, 1928. Mr. Koussevitzky, in Boston and New York, has given the first performance of the work in this country.

It has been said that one should be careful of expressing opinions about the music of princes, since it is not possible to be sure who wrote it. We know that Frederick often left to expert musicians the polishing off and filling out of his musical ideas. But in this case he wrote the whole score himself, only submitting the parts to Quantz to make sure of correct notation. The "symphony" is very genial and well-written music. The first movement, especially, is lively and high spirited, in a manner remindful of Handel or his immediate predecessors. In the slow movement Frederick thought of his flute, and the flutes of the orchestra called to mind Mr. Hale's mention of Frederick's talent for the performance of slow movements.

Had Frederick, when he wrote the last part of the symphony, thought of his assembling legions? If so, he had at least a more moderate idea of orchestration than his grandson. Anyhow, he provided a wholly creditable and entertaining composition. Young eagles of the present day who write tone poems and heaven knows what for public performance might not be able to handle simple ideas in major and minor keys with the competency and taste of Frederick. The music was delightfully interpreted.

The Third Symphony of Sibelius was performed, we believe, for the first time in New York since its interpretation by the Russian Symphony Orchestra in 1908. The performance was one of remarkable sympathy and penetration, so far as one could judge from preliminary examination of the score. The symphony itself is the weakest work in this form that Sibelius has written. It has "local color" as a matter of course, and impressive northen mood, which is true of all of his music. But if Sibelius were nothing but a landscape painter in his art he would not be the towering figure that he is.

The ideas of the Third symphony are unimportant. The development is hesitating, tentative, spasmodic. There are magnificent pages, including the last half of the first movement. The slow movement has that unsurpassable simplicity which is peculiarly the attribute of Sibelius, who can accomplish with a few notes and a few instruments what other composers fail to do with an army of players. The last part is probably the finest and strongest of all, but the symphony is principally interesting because of the link it establishes between what could be called the first and second "periods" of Sibelius.

The First and Second Symphonies, products of the earlier period, are characterized by long and superb melodic lines, if by less originality and concentration of style than the later works. With the Fourth Symphony the composer has entered completely in his own domain, and has unfortunately lost the magnificent melodic arch which he had in his youth. The later symphonies are enormously impressive through the individuality of the writing and the intensity and solitariness of mood. Between the Second and Fourth Symphonies comes the Third, which is apparently a transition work and neither fish, flesh, fowl nor good red herring. This work hesitates on the brink of a new style, new formal conceptions and a harmonic originality which is not disclosed till later. There is no comparison for strength, originality and atmosphere between it and the heroic Second or the grim and fantastical Fourth.

The repetition of Strauss's "Zarathustra" was even better in the technical sense and more effective in some interpretive details than the performance of Thursday night. That the effect of the opening was marred by the hideously flat pitch of the organ was no fault of Mr. Koussevitzky's. Organs have a way of being unruly in performances of "Zarathustra." Other instruments of the orchestra, and not only the first trumpet, would also have a right to revolt. But the Boston Symphony performance is exceptionally lucid and clear and technically brilliant. That Mr. Koussevitzky has his own conception of this great work goes without saying, and that his right to his idea is especially secure was demonstrated by the playing of the orchestra and the applause that it received.

It happens that at least one listener differed with him in a few particulars: in certain tempi and articulations and balances. It could not be otherwise with any great composition and any sincere listener or interpreter. For every listener, every interpreter sees a given piece of music in an unavoidably personal light. This writer thinks of a "Zarathustra" less solicitous of detail, and more impassioned, exultant in the Nietzschean spirit—in fact, music gone a little more mad! It was James Huneker who said that "Also Sprach Sarathrusta" should be played only before poets and madmen, and there was sanity in his remark.

It is said that when Emil Paur introduced the work in Boston he soaked himself in Nietzsche for weeks before the concert, that he could think and talk little else in his waking hours and that he performed the work in a frenzy of excitement and exaltation. Mr. Koussevitzky may have played it with precisely the same feelings for all we know. In the section "Joys and Passions" and the "Grave Song" he was extraordinarily eloquent, and in other pages exposed details of unexpected significance and beauty. There are places where Strauss's fantasy carries him to remote realms, where he seems to stand, as it were, and ponder between two worlds, and these mysterious passages were admirably grasped by the conductor. To enumerate such places, to burden the reader with letter as well as chapter and verse and put on listener's ideas against those of a great musician and conductor could fill much space, but would be gratuitous and unnecessary to the reader. The score was heard yesterday in a brilliant interpretive version, and the greatness of the music was deeply felt by the audience. It looks as if this work, which Clemens Kraus will play this week in Philadelphia with the Philadelphia Orchestra, might be on the verge of the recognition and popularity which it deserves. In no other pages is Strauss so heroic, so imaginative, so transcendant.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
MAR 10 1929

129

Washington Diplomats To Be Presented To Nation's New Administration Monday

Congressional Families Return to Homes During Recess.

WASHINGTON, D. C., MARCH 9, 1929 (By the Associated Press.)

SOCIALLY speaking, the new Administration is finding its bearings without the slightest difficulty, both the President and Mrs. Hoover being well versed in the intricate labyrinth of official etiquette, the most important event being in arranging for the diplomatic corps to meet the new Administration. This, the President and Mrs. Hoover have planned for 4 o'clock Monday afternoon, when the ambassadors, ministers and charge d'affaires and their wives, and the counselors and their wives, or, where there are not counselors, the first secretaries and their wives will pay their respects. Officials of the State Department and the full complement of White House aides will be on hand to present and care for the guests. The Marine band will add a lively note and, of course, the diplomats will be in full court dress, while many of the ladies have already rushed off to New York to visit importers' shops and secure new costumes for the occasion.

Aside from this specially arranged formality, both the President and Mrs. Hoover have been busily engaged visiting with their family, receiving delegations and settling their effects in the White House cupboards, bureaus and closets and making themselves at home.

For the first time since becoming the first lady of the land Mrs. Hoover occupied the White House box in a local theater, going to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its program. She created quite a flurry as the White House car drove up and she and her party stepped out. While Mrs. Coolidge added to the fame of her husband's administrations by her spontaneous smile, Mrs. Hoover also smiles, and when she does, she shows dimples in her prettily turned cheeks and her eyes dance. While there was no real demonstration at the theater, Mrs. Hoover looked out over the large street group with interest. She wore a becoming gown of black velvet very simple in design, a black velvet hat, brimless and quite close fitting, and long white gloves. The coat was the one she wore for the inaugural ceremonies, of black broadtail quite conservative in length and with a broad collar of sable and a deep band of the fur reaching the bottom of the coat; the cuffs of sable were quite deep.

With Mrs. Hoover was her uncle, W. D. Henry, of Wahpeton, N. D., her sister, Mrs. Jean Henry Large, Mrs. May Leavitt, the sister of the President, and Mrs. Mark Requa, of California.

The charming brick residence of the President and Mrs. Hoover on S Street is not to be fully dismantled, or rather vacated, until the first of next month, when Senator Frederick C. Walcott, of Connecticut, and Mrs. Walcott, who have leased it, will take possession. Senator Walcott has a suite at the Mayflower where Vice-President Curtis lives and Mrs. Walcott will not come to Washington to stay until they take over the S street residence. Their two sons, William Welch Walcott and Alexander Guthrie Walcott, are students at Yale. It is not likely that many of the new members of official society will become permanently settled for several weeks yet, but the special session of Congress will cause a continuation of social events up to its very close. Wealthy society folk who come here from all sections of the country have no idea of deserting the Capital while there are important officials and diplomats to entertain.

Everything Mrs. Hoover has done since March 4 has met with unalloyed approval, especially her retention of Miss Marie Randolph as head of the social secretary staff in the White House. Miss Randolph is the daughter of the late General Randolph and since her early girlhood days has known Washington society. She is connected with many of the most important families of the East and her elder sister,

(Concluded on Page 4)

Miss Anne Randolph, is social secretary to Secretary of the Treasury Mellon.

Mrs. Coolidge selected Miss Mary Randolph as her secretary about the second year of her residence here as the wife of the Vice-President, and when she became the first lady of the land Miss Randolph accompanied her to the White House, occupying a secondary place under Miss Laura Harlan, who had been secretary to Mrs. Harding. Later she succeeded to the first place and was the friend and companion of Mrs. Coolidge as well as secretary. That Miss Randolph is successful in her position is evidenced by the fact that she made no enemies for the first lady, her position being such that she might at any time cause a social quarrel.

Serving with Miss Randolph as secretary are Miss Ruth Fessler, who not only served Mrs. Hoover but Mr. Hoover as well, and Miss Mildred Hall, who has been with Mrs. Hoover for a lesser time. Miss Fessler is a particular capable woman and was secretary to Dr. Vernon Kellogg, the close friend of Mr. Hoover.

* * *

WHILE many congressional families are rushing off to their respective homes to remain for a few weeks during the recess, others and especially those with children in Washington schools, are remaining on and assisting in the social excitement that follows in the wake of a new administration.

The large house party entertained by Vice-President Curtis and his sister, Mrs. Gann, over March 4 is almost entirely disbanded, Mrs. Charles P. George, wife of Major George, alone remaining until Monday. The Vice-President's son and daughter-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Harry King Curtis, returned to Chicago early in the week, Mr. and Mrs. Webster Knight returned to their home early in the week, and Mrs. Jerome Volvin, the Vice-President's sister, returned to Topeka in midweek. During the recess of Congress the Vice-President and his sister are accepting many invitations and it is expected that Mrs. Gann and all of the new cabinet women now in town will receive informally Wednesday, the regular cabinet day at home.

* * *

NEVER before has Washington enjoyed so familiar an acquaintance with a new executive family, and with Mrs. Frank B. Kellogg, wife of the Secretary of State, remaining in Washington with her husband until the arrival of the new secretary, Henry Lewis Stimson, the newer women feel that they have an experienced pilot into the social shoals. Mrs. Kellogg is a great favorite here and has filled her place with unequaled tact and grace. Mrs. Stimson also knows the ways of Washington cabinet life, and in fact so does Mrs. William Dewitt Mitchell, whose husband is the new Attorney-General.

As the wife of the Solicitor General Mrs. Mitchell figured constantly in society. The new Secretary of War and Mrs. Good have been living in Washington most of the time since 1921, because Mr. Good was in the Lower House of Congress before he retired to enter the practice of law in Chicago.

Mrs. Brown, wife of the new Postmaster General, has spent three years in Washington while her husband was assistant Secretary of Commerce, and Mrs. Ray L. Wilbur, wife of the Secretary of the Interior, has so frequently been a guest here during the incumbency of office of her brother-in-law as Secretary of the Navy, that no part of Capital life is strange to her.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
MAR 11 1929

ON BEING LATE.

Toscanini, eminent conductor of the Metropolitan Opera, has found it necessary to rebuke people who come late to the performances and disturb orchestra, singers and audience. It is an old complaint and has merited discipline from high places many times in the past. A writer in the New York Herald-Tribune, indeed, recalls an occasion in 1872 when the famous Theodore Thomas halted the performance and turned to glare at a chattering box party just arriving. Sometimes it occurs to an early comer that conductors of the present day might emulate Mr. Thomas.

Yet it is not always a sin, because lateness is not always due to carelessness or lack of thought for others. Anyone who attends Boston Symphony concerts in Providence appreciates the difficulties of many who make an honest attempt to be in the theatre on time and yet find the conductor in his place waiting when they reach their seats. They have been caught in the canyon of Westminster street and the jam was too much for their good intentions.

From a residential district of the city or from a suburb, perhaps from Pawtucket, the run by motor to the Albee Theatre where the concerts are held is 10, 15, 20 minutes or longer. But do not try to make it in that time on a concert night. You reach the downtown district of Providence and there you halt. You are hemmed in by a long line of cars in front, in the rear, coming out of side streets. Traffic is under direction, otherwise there would be chaos. The man who has garaged his car far away from the theatre walks unhampered to the scene and gets there in time. On the way he expresses sympathy for the worried people in motors, who are going to be late. He is sincerely sorry for them. He has been in that line.

...work of melodies was great. Secure the audience, the beautiful and tender side of a King, whose name is called Great, was discovered. Listening to the orchestra, and especially to the Andante, it was easy to think of Frederick himself as the second flutist, with Quantz as the first. The King showed fertility of invention in his decorative design, if little originality in his original themes. Though he could not tower over ordinary mortals, gifted with the divine touch of genius, he could at least take a high place with the musicians of his time.

Mr. Koussevitzky, with his genius for program making, is to be congratulated on the enterprise in doing homage to a King, while stimulating an American musical audience. With rare understanding, Koussevitzky invoked the atmosphere of nearly two hundred years past. He brought a hush to the hall and reduced the dynamics of his orchestra.

▼

AFTER this delightful novelty, ...sevitzky used the stimulating ...arousing Sibelius Third Sym... The clean, out-door, open-air ...g of the music, with its novel and ... expression, its unconventional or...stration, its evocation of legendry ... reincarnate memories, makes ...y hearing an incomparable ex...ence. From the crowd of warriors, ...h from the battle or ready for the ...ge, the music sweeps along, un...ing a leaf or a rock, a look or an ...face, which in the simplest, most ...ous way, stir whole torrents of meaning. Koussevitzky has done no finer conducting than that of the first movement, created no lovelier effects than the second.

The program also included a repetition of "Also Sprach Zarathustra" of Strauss.

...ndition. ...ened up ...to stick ...ppy field- ...open better ...each effort.

...whip the ...iers say he ...ths in .35, ...morning the ...t galloping ...fifth. This ...gifted with the ...he could at least take a high place ...with the musicians of his time.

Clear and ...March 9.—

...ride. He was badly ...ANDRA'S last was su...

...EXSER, a well ...the best of the smal... ...sixteenth of the sixth... ...at the meeting, the Chi... ...to his best stuff. A ha... ...his final. He is traine... ...went a mile in 1.44 a... ...fear. On Maryland fo... ...handle. HANKY RICK... ...ter than his public a... ...show. Three-quarters i...

by Herm

Graded Handicap

For Tijuana

ment On Races at Miami

ALD

...States, we may look forward to a resurrection of Frederick, King of Prussia, for it is to be noted that all his military exploits could not give him voice again as his music does.

Yet, on this performance, under the sensitive baton of Koussevitzy, Fred-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
MAR 1 0 1929

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Frederick the Great's Symphony.

A novelty by a composer who has gone neglected these many years was played at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. This composer, as Philip Hale reminded us in his incomparable program notes, was born in Berlin June 24, 1712, and died at Sans Souci, Potsdam, Aug. 17, 1786. The composer was none other than Frederick the Great.

Frederick's fondness for music is historic. His father's grim opposition to his artistic tastes also is history. Lessons on the flute with Quantz, flute virtuoso and composer of the day, had at last to be taken secretly, and on a certain occasion Quantz hid for an hour in a closet when the father all but surprised the son at his lesson. We know that Frederick was hardened for his political career by various means, including the execution of the bosom friend with whom he intended to escape forever the cares of State. But he did not relinquish his passion for music. When he became his own master he practiced performance and composition.

Mr. Hale tells us how he played the flute four times a day, on rising, after the meeting of the Cabinet Council, after dinner and later in the evening—a marvelous passion for the busiest ruler of his day and a man who inaugurated the epoch which closed only with the war of 1914. All music lovers know of the occasion when J. S. Bach, worn and weary, came to Potsdam, and the King put up his flute as a note was handed him, saying, "Gentlemen, old Bach has come."

The composition played yesterday was a Symphony in D major, a score recently pulled out of the Berlin Library, edited by Gustav Lenzewski, and revived by Erich Kleiber at the Staatsoper, Berlin, May 4, 1928. Mr. Koussevitzky, in Boston and New York, has given the first performance of the work in this country.

It has been said that one should be careful of expressing opinions about the music of princes, since it is not possible to be sure who wrote it. We know that Frederick often left to expert musicians the polishing off and filling out of his musical ideas. But in this case he wrote the whole score himself, only submitting the parts to Quantz to make sure of correct notation. The "symphony" is very genial and well-written music. The first movement, especially, is lively and high spirited, in a manner remindful of Handel or his immediate predecessors. In the slow movement Frederick thought of his flute, and the flutes of the orchestra called to mind Mr. Hale's mention of Frederick's talent for the performance of slow movements.

Had Frederick, when he wrote the last part of the symphony, thought of his assembling legions? If so, he had at least a more moderate idea of orchestration than his grandson. Anyhow, he provided a wholly creditable and entertaining composition. Young eagles of the present day who write tone poems and heaven knows what for public performance might not be able to handle simple ideas in major and minor keys with the competency and taste of Frederick. The music was delightfully interpreted.

The Third Symphony of Sibelius was performed, we believe, for the first time in New York since its interpretation by the Russian Symphony Orchestra in 1908. The performance was one of remarkable sympathy and penetration, so far as one could judge from preliminary examination of the score. The symphony itself is the weakest work in this form that Sibelius has written. It has "local color" as a matter of course, and impressive northern mood, which is true of all of his music. But if Sibelius were nothing but a landscape painter in his art he would not be the towering figure that he is.

The ideas of the Third symphony are unimportant. The development is hesitating, tentative, spasmodic. There are magnificent pages, including the last half of the first movement. The slow movement has that unsurpassable simplicity which is peculiarly the attribute of Sibelius, who can accomplish with a few notes and a few instruments what other composers fail to do with an army of players. The last part is probably the finest and strongest of all, but the symphony is principally interesting because of the link it establishes between what could be called the first and second "periods" of Sibelius.

The First and Second Symphonies, products of the earlier period, are characterized by long and superb melodic lines, if by less originality and concentration of style than the later works. With the Fourth Symphony the composer has entered completely in his own domain, and has unfortunately lost the magnificent melodic arch which he had in his youth. The later symphonies are enormously impressive through the individuality of the writing and the intensity and solitariness of mood. Between the Second and Fourth Symphonies comes the Third, which is apparently a transition work and neither fish, flesh, fowl nor good red herring. This work hesitates on the brink of a new style, new formal conceptions and a harmonic originality which is not disclosed till later. There is no comparison for strength, originality and atmosphere between it and the heroic Second or the grim and fantastical Fourth.

The repetition of Strauss's "Zarathustra" was even better in the technical sense and more effective in some interpretive details than the performance of Thursday night. That the effect of the opening was marred by the hideously flat pitch of the organ was no fault of Mr. Koussevitzky's. Organs have a way of being unruly in performances of "Zarathustra." Other instruments of the orchestra, and not only the first trumpet, would also have a right to revolt. But the Boston Symphony performance is exceptionally lucid and clear and technically brilliant. That Mr. Koussevitzky has his own conception of this great work goes without saying, and that his right to his idea is especially secure was demonstrated by the playing of the orchestra and the applause that it received.

It happens that at least one listener differed with him in a few particulars: in certain tempi and articulations and balances. It could not be otherwise with any great composition and any sincere listener or interpreter. For every listener, every interpreter sees a given piece of music in an unavoidably personal light. This writer thinks of a "Zarathustra" less solicitous of detail, and more impassioned, exultant in the Nietzschean spirit—in fact, music gone a little more mad! It was James Huneker who said that "Also Sprach Sarathrusta" should be played only before poets and madmen, and there was sanity in his remark.

It is said that when Emil Paur introduced the work in Boston he soaked himself in Nietzsche for weeks before the concert, that he could think and talk little else in his waking hours and that he performed the work in a frenzy of excitement and exaltation. Mr. Koussevitzky may have played it with precisely the same feelings for all we know. In the section "Joys and Passions" and the "Grave Song" he was extraordinarily eloquent, and in other pages exposed details of unexpected significance and beauty. There are places where Strauss's fantasy carries him to remote realms, where he seems to stand, as it were, and ponder between two worlds, and these mysterious passages were admirably grasped by the conductor. To enumerate such places, to burden the reader with letter as well as chapter and verse and put on listener's ideas against those of a great musician and conductor could fill much space, but would be gratuitous and unnecessary to the reader. The score was heard yesterday in a brilliant interpretive version, and the greatness of the music was deeply felt by the audience. It looks as if this work, which Clemens Kraus will play this week in Philadelphia with the Philadelphia Orchestra, might be on the verge of the recognition and popularity which it deserves. In no other pages is Strauss so heroic, so imaginative, so transcendant.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
MAR 11 1929

ON BEING LATE.

Toscanini, eminent conductor of the Metropolitan Opera, has found it necessary to rebuke people who come late to the performances and disturb orchestra, singers and audience. It is an old complaint and has merited discipline from high places many times in the past. A writer in the New York Herald-Tribune, indeed, recalls an occasion in 1872 when the famous Theodore Thomas halted the performance and turned to glare at a chattering box party just arriving. Sometimes it occurs to an early comer that conductors of the present day might emulate Mr. Thomas.

Yet it is not always a sin, because lateness is not always due to carelessness or lack of thought for others. Anyone who attends Boston Symphony concerts in Providence appreciates the difficulties of many who make an honest attempt to be in the theatre on time and yet find the conductor in his place waiting when they reach their seats. They have been caught in the canyon of Westminster street and the jam was too much for their good intentions.

From a residential district of the city or from a suburb, perhaps from Pawtucket, the run by motor to the Albee Theatre where the concerts are held is 10, 15, 20 minutes or longer. But do not try to make it in that time on a concert night. You reach the downtown district of Providence and there you halt. You are hemmed in by a long line of cars in front, in the rear, coming out of side streets. Traffic is under direction, otherwise there would be chaos. The man who has garaged his car far away from the theatre walks unhampered to the scene and gets there in time. On the way he expresses sympathy for the worried people in motors, who are going to be late. He is sincerely sorry for them. He has been in that line.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
MAR 10 1929

129

Washington Diplomats To Be Presented To Nation's New Administration Monday

Congressional Families Return to Homes During Recess.

WASHINGTON, D. C. MARCH [illegible] 1929
(By the Associated Press.)

SOCIALLY speaking, the new Administration is finding its bearings without the slightest difficulty, both the President and Mrs. Hoover being well versed in the intricate labyrinth of official etiquette, the most important event being in arranging for the diplomatic corps to meet the new Administration. This, the President and Mrs. Hoover have planned for 4 o'clock Monday afternoon, when the ambassadors, ministers and charge d'affaires and their wives, and the counselors and their wives, or, where there are not counselors, the first secretaries and their wives will pay their respects. Officials of the State Department and the full complement of White House aides will be on hand to present and care for the guests. The Marine Band will add a lively note and, of course, the diplomats will be in full court dress, while many of the ladies have already rushed off to New York to visit importers' shops and select new costumes for the occasion.

Aside from this specially arranged formality, both the President and Mrs. Hoover have been busily engaged visiting with their family, receiving delegations and settling their effects in the White House cupboards, bureaus, closets and making themselves at home.

For the first time since becoming the first lady of the land Mrs. Hoover occupied the White House box in a local theater, going to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its program. She created quite a flurry as the White House car drove up and she and her party stepped out. While Mrs. Coolidge added to the fame of her husband's administrations by her spontaneous smile, Mrs. Hoover also smiles, and when she does, she shows dimples in her prettily turned cheeks and her eyes dance. While there was no real demonstration at the theater, Mrs. Hoover looked out over the large street group with interest. She wore a becoming gown of black velvet very simple in design, a black velvet hat, brimless and quite close fitting, and long white gloves. The coat was the one she wore for the inaugural ceremonies, of black broadtail quite conservative in length and with a broad collar of sable and a deep band of the fur reaching the bottom of the coat; the cuffs of sable were quite [illegible]

Frederick C. Walcott, of Connecticut, and Mrs. Walcott, who have leased it will take possession. Senator Walcott has a suite at the Mayflower where Vice-President Curtis lives and Mrs. Walcott will not come to Washington to stay until they take over the S street residence. Their two sons, William Welch Walcott and Alexander Guthrie Walcott, are students at Yale. It is not likely that many of the new members of official society will become permanently settled for several weeks yet, but the special session of Congress will cause a continuation of social events up to its very close. Wealthy society folk who come here from all sections of the country have no idea of deserting the Capital while there are important officials and diplomats to entertain.

Everything Mrs. Hoover has done since March 4 has met with unalloyed approval, especially her retention of Miss Marie Randolph as head of the social secretary staff in the White House. Miss Randolph is the daughter of the late General Randolph and since her early girlhood days has known Washington society. She is connected with many of the most important families of the East and her elder sister,

(Concluded on Page 4)

Miss Anne Randolph, is social secretary to Secretary of the Treasury Mellon.

Mrs. Coolidge selected Miss Mary [illegible] who had been secretary to Mrs. Harding. Later she [illegible] and was

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph

MUSIC

By Charles D. Isaacson

THAT powerful monarch, Frederick the Great, king of Prussia, whose eye was such that by a glance he could dominate other kings, achieved many victories. But it is much to be doubted that the wining of any battle on the field of warfare ever gave him the joy which would have been his, if he might have been present at Carnegie Hall, on Saturday, A. D. 1929, March the 8th.

Frederick the Great, who during the years of 1756 to 1763 was destined, in the Seven Years war, to earn the reputation of being the foremost military strategist of his day, never forgot his music. Indeed, when through the miserable machinations of cruel diplomacy he succeeded in partitioning Poland, with the aid of the profligate Empress Catherine of Russia, he devoted much of the years which followed, to the cultivation of Polish art, along with intelligent plans for the material development of the nation.

▼

IT is said that the king was in the habit of playing the flute, whenever his mind was troubled, and there was a time, about 1743, when he wrote the Symphony in D Major, when he had ample reason to be annoyed. For Maria Theresa and the kings of the Germanic States were, at that period in a way of causing his downfall. History records that Frederick played habitually when he arose in the morning, and then after the morning meeting with his cabinet-council, again after his dinner and finally for his evening diversion.

The King held in great esteem his musician, Johann Joachim Quantz, who along with his fame as flutist, was a composer of distinction. When he was the crown prince, he secretly studied music with Quantz, and showed, that but for his throne, he might have mounted to the heights in art. Always he thought in music. Thus a famous epigram which is attributed to him, at the time he was trying to affect a diplomatic verdict with several monarchs:

"I would as soon write the History of the Jews in madrigsal, as try to bring a decision among three kings, when one of them is a woman."

▼

HIS Majesty wrote many works for voice, flute and for orchestra. He even set down four symphonies. The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the Third Symphony for Strings and Flute on Saturday. Last year, in Berlin, the Symphony Orchestra performed the work. Nearly two hundred years it rested in the closet. Evidently even a king cannot affect the czars of the baton. But since Erich Kleiber capitulated in Berlin and now Koussevitzky in the United States, we may look forward to a resurrection of Frederick, King of Prussia, for it is to be noted that all his military expl its could not give him voice again as his music does.

Yet, on this performance, under the sensitive baton of Koussevitzy, Frederick, Quantz, and all the figures of the Court sprang into being.

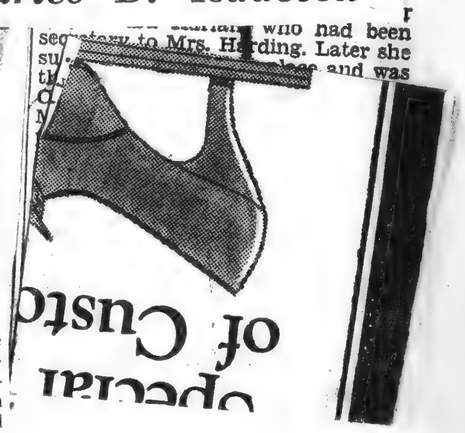
As the fragile and delicate lacework of melodies was spread before the audience, the beautiful and tender side of a King, whose name is called Great, was discovered. Listening to the orchestra, and especially to the Andante, it was easy to think of Frederick himself as the second flutist, with Quantz as the first. The King showed fertility of invention in his decorative design, if little originality in his original themes. Though he could not tower over ordinary mortals, gifted with the divine touch of genius, he could at least take a high place with the musicians of his time.

Mr. Koussevitzky, with his genius for program making, is to be congratulated on the enterprise in doing homage to a King, while stimulating an American musical audience. With rare understanding, Koussevitzky invoked the atmosphere of nearly two hundred years past. He brought a hush to the hall and reduced the dynamics of his orchestra.

▼

AFTER this delightful novelty, Koussevitzky used the stimulating and arousing Sibelius Third Symphony. The clean, out-door, open-air feeling of the music, with its novel and rich expression, its unconventional orchestration, its evocation of legendry and reincarnate memories, makes every hearing an incomparable experience. From the crowd of warriors, fresh from the battle or ready for the voyage, the music sweeps along, unturning a leaf or a rock, a look or an embrace, which in the simplest, most curious way, stir whole torrents of meaning. Koussevitzky has done no finer conducting than that of the first movement, created no lovelier effects than the second.

The program also included a repetition of "Also Sprach Zarathustra" of Strauss.



MAR 11 1929

130

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

A Royal Symphonist Makes His Debut Here With the Boston Orchestra

Fourth matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Symphony in D major, No 3. Frederick the Great (First performance in New York)
2. Symphony in C major, No. 3, Op. 52, Sibelius

Intermission

3. Tone-Poem: "Thus Spake Zarathustra," Op. 30 ..... Strauss

IT IS not likely that a symphony composed by a king was ever played in New York before Mr. Koussevitzky and his Boston orchestra introduced the D major Symphony of Frederick the Great at Saturday's matinee in Carnegie Hall.

Not many kings, to be sure, have written music that remains available for modern use. There was David, King of Israel, but if his compositions were recorded, the present knows them not. There was the late and unlamented Kaiser, who is said to have spoiled good music paper with many imperial notes. Doubtless there have been other composing monarchs. But probably no monarch before or since the mighty Frederick II of Prussia has written symphonies. If so, his identity eludes us.

* * *

FREDERICK THE GREAT, an irrepressible dilettante, dabbled, as we know, in several of the arts. He was not, as Mr. Strachey once observed, content with mere appreciation: he, too, would create. Being a cultivated German of the middle eighteenth century, he was intellectually in love with France, and so he strove passionately to write "Alexandrines on the model of Racine, and madrigals after the manner of Chaulieu: he would burn incense with his own hands upon the inmost shrine"—with the complaisant Voltaire to help him.

But for Frederick, literary creation did not suffice. He must compose music as well—with a Voltaire of sorts to serve as wet nurse to the offspring of the royal Muse. This was Johann Joachim Quantz, composer and musician in ordinary to the Royal chamber. He taught the King to play the flute, and kept a watchful eye upon his scores, clearing his throat tactfully when consecutive fifths made their appearance in the musical texture (the worthy Quantz died at the age of seventy-six, while in the act of completing his 300th flute concerto for the King).

In addition to Quantz, Frederick's musical entourage included Karl Heinrich Graun (one of the great men of German music in those days), who taught him composition, and the gifted C. P. E. Bach, who was his cembalist. Thus guided, the royal feet trudged bravely toward Parnassus.

* * *

FREDERICK appears to have composed remorselessly. He wrote four symphonies, concertos and sonatas for flute, arias, cantatas, marches: on overture for "Il Re Pastore." As if this were not enough, he furnished Graun with the librettos of "Fratelli Nemici" (after Racine), "Merope" (after Voltaire), "Coriolano," "Silla," and "Montezuma"—in the last of which he sought very handsomely to prove, as he wrote Algarotti, "that even the opera may serve to reform morals and destroy superstitions."

You wonder when this remarkable person—ruler, soldier, bon vivant, man of letters (he wrote forty works in one year)—found time to compose music. We know that he rose at dawn, and was at his correspondence before breakfast, fortified by a glass of cold water flavored with fennel leaves; that he took only five or six hours' sleep; that, according to one of his biographers, he "would not endure the presence of any woman"; that he mixed water with his claret; and that on the last night of his life he had ordered that he be called at four, in order that he might set to work without delay. Yet these things do not quite satisfy one's speculations.

* * *

AN AMAZING man! Did he compose his flute concertos as he strolled in the woods about Sans Souci, taking with him that curious flute and walking-stick combined which you may see in the Casadesus Collection of old instruments in Boston (given by the King to Voltaire, who took it back to France)? Or during those two hours following his afternoon coffee, which he "passed in seclusion"; or later, at supper in the oval dining-room, when he may have been bored with the epigrams of Maupertuis and the jests of La Mettrie, and turned his thoughts inward to the naive meditations that passed with him for composition?

A Kingly Symphonist

Courtesy of Frederick Keppel & Co.

Frederick the Great, who made his New York debut as a composer at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinee

For, despite the dutiful assurance of Spitta in his preface to the collection which he edited of Frederick's concertos and sonatas—that this royal music discloses "a charm like the pictures of Watteau," and "German depth of feeling," and "deep insight into a unique soul life"—we confess, with due respect, that we can find nothing of these traits in the Symphony introduced to us by Mr. Koussevitzky.

* * *

FREDERICK was thirty-one when he composed it—the score is supposed to date from 1743. Haydn was then a tow-headed boy of eleven, and Mozart was still playing celestial marbles in the Kingdom of the Future—his first symphony was not to follow for twenty-one years. The symphonic form itself was scarcely more than a fledgling, developing out of the Sinfonia avanti l'opera, the Italian Overture, the Concerto grosso, and its various other progenitors. "Old Bach" (as Frederick called him) was within seven years of his death. Handel had produced his "Messiah" at Dublin the year before.

The symphony of the Prussian King is in three short and exiguous movements—an Allegro, an Andante (a duet for flutes, with string accompaniment), and a final Allegro Scherzando. Frederick is said to have scored it for two oboes, two horns, and strings, with the two flutes of the slow movement. The editor of the score used by Mr. Koussevitzky, Gustav Lenzewski, added bassoons and a piano (Frederick's other three symphonies were written for strings alone).

* * *

IT IS declared that the royal composer wrote his symphonies without assistance. "The King showed me the score," said the devoted Quantz; "in his presence I looked it over, but made no corrections beyond calling his attention to a few notes which were obviously errors in notation and which he himself changed."

We see no reason to doubt the assertion that Frederick was solely responsible for this symphony. The music sounds precisely as if it had been composed by a cultivated dilettante. It echoes faintly the styles of its period, the styles familiar to and admired by the King. It is amiable and pleasant—if you happen to find pleasure in inoffensive musical platitudes. Of ideas, of invention, of strength, of imagination, there is not a trace. There is no need to say of it, as one of his biographers says of Frederick's poetry, that it is "dreary with an unutterable dreariness." It is merely harmless musical flon-flon; pretty good, perhaps, for a King; but the sort of thing that any qualified and really gifted music-maker of Frederick's time—for example, his cembalist, Emanuel Bach—must have laughed at rather bitterly behind his hand.

* * *

WHEN Frederick played the flute at his concerts in Sans Souci, from five to six in the afternoon, the Court was forbidden to betray approval—only the gigantic Quantz, who towered like one of the Prussian Guard, had the privilege of shouting "bravo" to his royal pupil. Let us not usurp the privilege of the faithful Quantz.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
MAR 11 1929

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Thanks to Koussevitzky, Frederick the Great and the Great Sibelius Freshen the Symphonic Repertory

THE DISTINGUISHED AMATEUR whose Symphony in D major, No. 3, was played as the first number of the Boston Symphony's concert in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon was no mean composer, for all of being a great soldier and the King of Prussia. This, in all probability, was the first time the name of Frederick the Great had figured on a symphony program in New York. Composed about 1743, the work played was brought to life again in Germany less than a year ago and is one of three royal symphonies recently re-edited and published. Frederick wrote four such works in all, the D major being the only one to employ other than strings. Flutes, oboes, horns and a bassoon here attest his ability to combine woodwinds and brass with the strings, and it is a matter of record that the King "wrote all the parts without assistance," though graciously permitting Quantz, his mentor on the flute, to do a little correcting. Thanks to Frederick as well as to Quantz, the symphony is nothing if not correct. But it possesses something besides correctness.

Grandiose, imperious, martial it is not, but forthright, spirited, genial, confident, somewhat thin as to substance and treatment, but not tentative or uncertain. Its simplicity, of course, is the lack of complexity of the times. Frederick's musical models were not giants like Gluck and Handel, but Graun, Hasse and Quantz—the Graun who composed the "Tod Jesu" which has been performed annually in Berlin since 1755; Hasse, the husband of the great singer Faustina of Handel's day and for a third of the eighteenth century a composer whose prestige was equal to Handel's, though scarcely a name to conjure with today. If Frederick had possessed loftier models perhaps his gifts of imitation would have enabled him to climb higher. The chief theme of the first movement of the symphony played Saturday was borrowed from Graun. It proved a good theme. One wondered whether the symphony from which it came—Graun's thirty-fifth—would have sounded as well as that of the royal borrower.

The second movement, an Andante, is largely given over to two flutes, often with the barest possible string accompaniment. Frederick not only played the flute, but excelled in slow movements, his ability to express tenderness exceeding his technical skill in rapid passages. This Andante, it may be assumed, was quite close to the royal heart. Doubtless the royal flute lingered lovingly over its cadences in the days of its composition, for it was not until later that shortness of breath compelled Frederick to turn his attention to the harpsichord. Frederick's little symphony would not be in any sense important music if it had come from another composer, nor would it be bad music or music to be listened to without some measure of pleasure and respect. Let the King have his due! Also, give Mr. Koussevitzky the recognition of playing this music quite as beautifully as he might have played a symphony by Haydn or Mozart.

THE THIRD SYMPHONY of Jan Sibelius, Mr. Koussevitzky's second number, is a relatively unfamiliar one, though first played in New York some twenty years ago. If not the loftiest or the most individual of the Finnish giant's six works in this form it is replete with beauties that can ill be spared in these times of endless repetitions of the same standard works in alternation with puerile and transient novelties. Why our conductors have never taken Sibelius more to heart is difficult to understand. Do they believe that our audiences are bored? That of Saturday was amply applausive. Or is it possible that they think first of German, French or Russian composers, because of their own background, and become propagandists for their nationals, leaving the lonely Finn of Tavastehus without any very persistent champion. This symphony is a warm and richly hued work, in no way justifiyng those terms of "bleak," "dour" and "somber" that quite possibly have done Sibelius much harm with audiences that hope to be excited and not depressed. In style, it is transitional, less unified, less personal perhaps than works which preceded and followed it. But its themes are strong and melodius, their treatment that of an artist of great capacity and deep sincerity. The symphony was superbly played, a marvel of clarity, balance and sumptuous tone.

To conclude his program, Mr. Koussevitzky repeated his incandescent performance of Strauss's "Zarathustra." One needs to listen to such playing with caution, not to go over heart and soul, bag and baggage, to music that past experience has placed among the less inspired works of a supreme master of sonorities, a wizard who long since proved his ability to make commonplace material sound like the music of the spheres, given such a performance as this one to work his magic through.

IF THERE are those who still doubt that substantial progress is being made in the training of orchestral musicians in this country, they could have found much that was reassuring in the concert given in Carnegie Hall Friday night by the Curtis Institute of Music Orchestra.

The ensemble which responded smoothly and euphoniously to the baton of Artur Rodzinski, an able conductor who has led the Philadelphia Orchestra on occasion, was chiefly one of students, with a seasoning of professionals—a hundred of the former, sixteen of the latter, six being faculty members in woodwind, brass and double bass.

In the most easily understood sense of the term, it was not student playing, for the standard was sufficiently high to meet pleasurably the basic requirements of the "Meistersinger" Overture, Franck's D Minor Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Eastern." There were dull spots rather than glaring deficiencies; such lack as there was pertained chiefly to the plus qualities of professional virtuosity and long experience rather than to sound musicianship. A student soloist, Tibor de Machula, who acted as first cellist in other numbers, was the soloist, presenting Lalo's D Minor Concerto with good tone and technique and a very promising style.

MAR 11 1929

130

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

A Royal Symphonist Makes His Debut Here With the Boston Orchestra

Fourth matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Symphony in D major, No 3. Frederick the Great (First performance in New York)
2. Symphony in C major, No. 3, Op. 52. Sibelius

Intermission

3. Tone-Poem: "Thus Spake Zarathustra," Op. 30 ..... Strauss

IT IS not likely that a symphony composed by a king was ever played in New York before Mr. Koussevitzky and his Boston orchestra introduced the D major Symphony of Frederick the Great at Saturday's matinee in Carnegie Hall.

Not many kings, to be sure, have written music that remains available for modern use. There was David, King of Israel, but if his compositions were recorded, the present knows them not. There was the late and unlamented Kaiser, who is said to have spoiled good music paper with many imperial notes. Doubtless there have been other composing monarchs. But probably no monarch before or since the mighty Frederick II of Prussia has written symphonies. If so, his identity eludes us.

* * *

FREDERICK THE GREAT, an irrepressible dilettante, dabbled, as we know, in several of the arts. He was not, as Mr. Strachey once observed, content with mere appreciation: he, too, would create. Being a cultivated German of the middle eighteenth century, he was intellectually in love with France, and so he strove passionately to write "Alexandrines on the model of Racine, and madrigals after the manner of Chaulieu: he would burn incense with his own hands upon the inmost shrine"—with the complaisant Voltaire to help him.

But for Frederick, literary creation did not suffice. He must compose music as well—with a Voltaire of sorts to serve as wet nurse to the offspring of the royal Muse. This was Johann Joachim Quantz, composer and musician in ordinary to the Royal chamber. He taught the King to play the flute, and kept a watchful eye upon his scores, clearing his throat tactfully when consecutive fifths made their appearance in the musical texture (the worthy Quantz died at the age of seventy-six, while in the act of completing his 300th flute concerto for the King).

In addition to Quantz, Frederick's musical entourage included Karl Heinrich Graun (one of the great men of German music in those days), who taught him composition, and the gifted C. P. E. Bach, who was his cembalist. Thus guided, the royal feet trudged bravely toward Parnassus.

* * *

FREDERICK appears to have composed remorselessly. He wrote four symphonies, concertos and sonatas for flute, arias, cantatas, marches: on overture for "Il Re Pastore." As if this were not enough, he furnished Graun with the librettos of "Fratelli Nemici" (after Racine), "Merope" (after Voltaire), "Coriolano," "Silla," and "Montezuma"—in the last of which he sought very handsomely to prove, as he wrote Algarotti, "that even the opera may serve to reform morals and destroy superstitions."

You wonder when this remarkable person—ruler, soldier, bon vivant, man of letters (he wrote forty works in one year)—found time to compose music. We know that he rose at dawn, and was at his correspondence before breakfast, fortified by a glass of cold water flavored with fennel leaves; that he took only five or six hours' sleep; that, according to one of his biographers, he "would not endure the presence of any woman"; that he mixed water with his claret; and that on the last night of his life he had ordered that he be called at four, in order that he might set to work without delay. Yet these things do not quite satisfy one's speculations.

* * *

AN AMAZING man! Did he compose his flute concertos as he strolled in the woods about Sans Souci, taking with him that curious flute and walking-stick combined which you may see in the Casadesus Collection of old instruments in Boston (given by the King to Voltaire, who took it back to France)? Or during those two hours following his afternoon coffee, which he "passed in seclusion"; or later, at supper in the oval dining-room, when he may have been bored with the epigrams of Maupertuis and the jests of La Mettrie, and turned his thoughts inward to the naïve meditations that passed with him for composition?

A Kingly Symphonist

Courtesy of Frederick Keppel & Co.

Frederick the Great, who made his New York debut as a composer at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinee

For, despite the dutiful assurance of Spitta in his preface to the collection which he edited of Frederick's concertos and sonatas—that this royal music discloses "a charm like the pictures of Watteau," and "German depth of feeling," and "deep insight into a unique soul life"—we confess, with due respect, that we can find nothing of these traits in the Symphony introduced to us by Mr. Koussevitzky.

* * *

FREDERICK was thirty-one when he composed it—the score is supposed to date from 1743. Haydn was then a tow-headed boy of eleven, and Mozart was still playing celestial marbles in the Kingdom of the Future—his first symphony was not to follow for twenty-one years. The symphonic form itself was scarcely more than a fledgling, developing out of the Sinfonia avanti l'opera, the Italian Overture, the Concerto grosso, and its various other progenitors. "Old Bach" (as Frederick called him) was within seven years of his death. Handel had produced his "Messiah" at Dublin the year before.

The symphony of the Prussian King is in three short and exiguous movements—an Allegro, an Andante (a duet for flutes, with string accompaniment), and a final Allegro Scherzando. Frederick is said to have scored it for two oboes, two horns, and strings, with the two flutes of the slow movement. The editor of the score used by Mr. Koussevitzky, Gustav Lenzewski, added bassoons and a piano (Frederick's other three symphonies were written for strings alone).

* * *

IT IS declared that the royal composer wrote his symphonies without assistance. "The King showed me the score," said the devoted Quantz; "in his presence I looked it over, but made no corrections beyond calling his attention to a few notes which were obviously errors in notation and which he himself changed."

We see no reason to doubt the assertion that Frederick was solely responsible for this symphony. The music sounds precisely as if it had been composed by a cultivated dilettante. It echoes faintly the styles of its period, the styles familiar to and admired by the King. It is amiable and pleasant—if you happen to find pleasure in inoffensive musical platitudes. Of ideas, of invention, of strength, of imagination, there is not a trace. There is no need to say of it, as one of his biographers says of Frederick's poetry, that it is "dreary with an unutterable dreariness." It is merely harmless musical flon-flon; pretty good, perhaps, for a King; but the sort of thing that any qualified and really gifted music-maker of Frederick's time—for example, his cembalist, Emanuel Bach—must have laughed at rather bitterly behind his hand.

* * *

WHEN Frederick played the flute at his concerts in Sans Souci, from five to six in the afternoon, the Court was forbidden to betray approval—only the gigantic Quantz, who towered like one of the Prussian Guard, had the privilege of shouting "bravo" to his royal pupil. Let us not usurp the privilege of the faithful Quantz.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
MAR 11 1929

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Thanks to Koussevitzky, Frederick the Great and the Great Sibelius Freshen the Symphonic Repertory

THE DISTINGUISHED AMATEUR whose Symphony in D major, No. 3, was played as the first number of the Boston Symphony's concert in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon was no mean composer, for all of being a great soldier and the King of Prussia. This, in all probability, was the first time the name of Frederick the Great had figured on a symphony program in New York. Composed about 1743, the work played was brought to life again in Germany less than a year ago and is one of three royal symphonies recently re-edited and published. Frederick wrote four such works in all, the D major being the only one to employ other than strings. Flutes, oboes, horns and a bassoon here attest his ability to combine woodwinds and brass with the strings, and it is a matter of record that the King "wrote all the parts without assistance," though graciously permitting Quantz, his mentor on the flute, to do a little correcting. Thanks to Frederick as well as to Quantz, the symphony is nothing if not correct. But it possesses something besides correctness.

Grandiose, imperious, martial it is not, but forthright, spirited, genial, confident, somewhat thin as to substance and treatment, but not tentative or uncertain. Its simplicity, of course, is the lack of complexity of the times. Frederick's musical models were not giants like Gluck and Handel, but Graun, Hasse and Quantz—the Graun who composed the "Tod Jesu" which has been performed annually in Berlin since 1755; Hasse, the husband of the great singer Faustina of Handel's day and for a third of the eighteenth century a composer whose prestige was equal to Handel's, though scarcely a name to conjure with today. If Frederick had possessed loftier models perhaps his gifts of imitation would have enabled him to climb higher. The chief theme of the first movement of the symphony played Saturday was borrowed from Graun. It proved a good theme. One wondered whether the symphony from which it came—Graun's thirty-fifth—would have sounded as well as that of the royal borrower.

The second movement, an Andante, is largely given over to two flutes, often with the barest possible string accompaniment. Frederick not only played the flute, but excelled in slow movements, his ability to express tenderness exceeding his technical skill in rapid passages. This Andante, it may be assumed, was quite close to the royal heart. Doubtless the royal flute lingered lovingly over its cadences in the days of its composition, for it was not until later that shortness of breath compelled Frederick to turn his attention to the harpsichord. Frederick's little symphony would not be in any sense important music if it had come from another composer, nor would it be bad music or music to be listened to without some measure of pleasure and respect. Let the King have his due! Also, give Mr. Koussevitzky the recognition of playing this music quite as beautifully as he might have played a symphony by Haydn or Mozart.

THE THIRD SYMPHONY of Jan Sibelius, Mr. Koussevitzky's second number, is a relatively unfamiliar one, though first played in New York some twenty years ago. If not the loftiest or the most individual of the Finnish giant's six works in this form it is replete with beauties that can ill be spared in these times of endless repetitions of the same standard works in alternation with puerile and transient novelties. Why our conductors have never taken Sibelius more to heart is difficult to understand. Do they believe that our audiences are bored? That of Saturday was amply applausive. Or is it possible that they think first of German, French or Russian composers, because of their own background, and become propagandists for their nationals, leaving the lonely Finn of Tavastehus without any very persistent champion. This symphony is a warm and richly hued work, in no way justifiyng those terms of "bleak," "dour" and "somber" that quite possibly have done Sibelius much harm with audiences that hope to be excited and not depressed. In style, it is transitional, less unified, less personal perhaps than works which preceded and followed it. But its themes are strong and melodius, their treatment that of an artist of great capacity and deep sincerity. The symphony was superbly played, a marvel of clarity, balance and sumptuous tone.

To conclude his program, Mr. Koussevitzky repeated his incandescent performance of Strauss's "Zarathustra." One needs to listen to such playing with caution, not to go over heart and soul, bag and baggage, to music that past experience has placed among the less inspired works of a supreme master of sonorities, a wizard who long since proved his ability to make commonplace material sound like the music of the spheres, given such a performance as this one to work his magic through.

IF THERE are those who still doubt that substantial progress is being made in the training of orchestral musicians in this country, they could have found much that was reassuring in the concert given in Carnegie Hall Friday night by the Curtis Institute of Music Orchestra.

The ensemble which responded smoothly and euphoniously to the baton of Artur Rodzinski, an able conductor who has led the Philadelphia Orchestra on occasion, was chiefly one of students, with a seasoning of professionals—a hundred of the former, sixteen of the latter, six being faculty members in woodwind, brass and double bass.

In the most easily understood sense of the term, it was not student playing, for the standard was sufficiently high to meet pleasurably the basic requirements of the "Meistersinger" Overture, Franck's D Minor Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Eastern." There were dull spots rather than glaring deficiencies; such lack as there was pertained chiefly to the plus qualities of professional virtuosity and long experience rather than to sound musicianship. A student soloist, Tibor de Machula, who acted as first cellist in other numbers, was the soloist, presenting Lalo's D Minor Concerto with good tone and technique and a very promising style.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN
MAR 11 1929

Plays Prussian Monarch's Work

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Concert Gives Composition of Frederick the Great.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The fourth afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which engrossed the attention of a prosperous looking audience Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, began with the third symphony of no less a personage than his Majesty Frederick the Great of Prussia. This was followed by the third symphony of Jan Sibelius, a humble musician of Finland. The program concluded with Richard Strauss's tone poem "Also Sprach Zarathustra," which had been proclaimed at the Thursday evening concert.

The symphony of the famous Prussian was heard for the first time here. Probably most of those listening to it had not suspected that an occupant of the throne recently vacated by the hermit of Doorn was a musician and aspired to be remembered as one, despite the fact that history insists on celebrating him as a most conspicuous man on horseback. But let us not forget that Frederick bowed before the authority of old Quantz, his flute teacher; that he adored Voltaire, quarreled and made up with him many times; that he introduced French as the court language, and that (in his "Anti-Machiavel") he declared public office to be a public trust.

When he sought a life of intellectual retirement at Sans Souci, surround himself with Mupertins, Lord Tyrconnel, Algarotti, Voltaire and other wise men, and cultivated the sophisticated attitudes of a Parisian salon, he set music upon the altar of his worship. Sophie Wilhelmine of Prussia wrote: "The evenings are consecrated to music. The prince holds his concerts in his own apartments, where nobody may go who is not invited, and indeed such an invitation is a great favor. He generally executes a sonata and a concerto for the flute, an instrument which he plays with the utmost perfection. He mouths it admirably, and his fingers are agile, and his soul is full of music. He composes sonatas himself. I have more than once had the honor to find myself beside him while he played and I was enchanted with his taste, especially for his skill in the adagio. It is a continuous creation of new ideas."

When Frederick grew so old that he could no longer admirably mouth his flute he said very sadly, "I have lost my best friend." Listening to his third symphony Saturday, with its naively charming duet for flutes with accompaniment of violins, which forms the second movement, one felt that here was a gentle and ingratiating echo of a soul which had been harassed by a Seven Years' War, and shaken by a battle of Kunersdorf. Peace and unperturbed flute blowing were his dream. It was this man of whom Voltaire wrote: "It is sometimes Caesar with whom I dine, sometimes Marcus Aurelius or Julian. Here is all the charm of seclusion, the freedom of the fields, together with all those luxuries of life which the lord of the castle, who is a king, can procure for his humble guests." It was the grave wroshiper of music, weary of the cares of kingcraft and refreshing his spirit by playing as seriously as an amateur could at the merciless game of art. The first movement of the symphony disclosed a gallant gentleman putting on a bold front and not afraid to compose with polite vivacity in the approved manner of his time. And to do him justice, he composed his allegro quite as well as a half dozen others whose music has come down to us from that day garbed in some small glories. The audience evidently enjoyed hearing the simple music of the many-sided monarch.

The Sibelius symphony resembles his other orchestral works in that the melodic materials suggest the folk songs of the Finns and some of the rhythms that of the historic ballad of that people. It is a strong symphony, with the deep, brooding emotion which characterizes so much of Sibelius's art and the aggressive advances into broad expansions of its ideas. But it lacks firmness of joint in many places and it wants the relief of a burst of cheerfulness or at least of content. Mr. Koussevitzky interpreted it with compelling sympathy and the orchestra performed it with somber richness of tone.

About Dr. Strauss's philosophical ponderings it is unnecessary to make further comment. The melodic ideas are elementary, but so are many of Beethoven's. Strauss makes gorgeous tonal pictures out of them, but he has said more in some of his other works. Mr. Koussevitzky presented the works with [illegible] effect. We await with equanimity the next conductor's interpretation.

have stood in awe was Quantz, his teacher on the flute. It was true that Sebastian Bach not only complimented Frederick upon a theme submitted by him to the Thomascantor, but used it as the subject for two famous works, the Musicalisches Opfer and the Kunst der Fuge. But this homage has usually been ascribed to Bach's courtiership, or else his desire to further his son's career at Potsdam.

* * *

It was with no small astonishment that the royal symphony was found to be not at all unworthy of revival on its own account as music. The chief theme of the first movement was taken from Graun's 35th Symphony, but we are assured that Frederick scored all the parts with his own hand, and that the only emendations were corrections of a few notes by Quantz. Unlike his other three symphonies, this opus is written not only for string orchestra, but for two flutes, two oboes, two horns and bassoon. The movements are entitled Allegro, Andante and Allegro Scherzando.

Regarding the first and third movements, the same encomiums may be awarded that have been bestowed on Frederick's prose "Memoirs"—that they are marked by clearness, conciseness, good sense and a certain air of simplicity which is singularly graceful in so powerful a sovereign. One even felt that the style was rather in advance of its time. The themes were matter-of-fact rather than imaginative, but they were far from despicable. The part-writing marched with the precision, the distinctness, of a regiment of Brandenburg grenadiers.

* * *

But the surprise of the afternoon was offered by the slow movement. It is in the form of a pastoral for two flutes, accompanied by four violins. One listened to the purl and trilling of the pair of wind instruments, escorting each other faithfully at the interval of a third, with an odd sense that these identical notes were first played by Frederick and the rigorous Quants. We can scarcely doubt that the tutor seized upon the first flute, and that his modest if royal pupil contented himself with the second.

There is no gainsaying the fact that the Andante was actually charming. It was as artificial as a Watteau shepherdess, but also as beguiling. The innocent grace of the music was all the more startling when the circumstances were recalled under which it was written. Ascending the throne in 1740, Frederick had signalized the first year of his reign with a crime of perfidy and brigandage which had caused him to be execrated throughout the world. He had set on foot a war which raged during many years in every quarter of the globe. "In order that he might rob a neighbor whom he had promised to defend," according to Macaulay's energetic indictment, "black men fought on the coast of Coromandel, and red men scalped each other by the Great Lakes of North America."

Having deserted his allies, Frederick returned home with a rich province, Silesia, looted from the German Empire, as his spoils. It was during this interlude, in 1743, that Frederick, triumphant and infamous, wrote his Andante—as fresh, candid and winsome as if it had been penned by the most guileless youth in his realm.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
MAR 11 1929

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL
MAR 11 1929

KOUSSEVITZKY PLAYS SYMPHONY BY FREDERICK THE GREAT

By IRVING WEIL.

It was Brahms, we believe, who was responsible for the waggery that it is unsafe to damn the compositions of royalty, because one never can tell who wrote them. It is scarcely necessary, however, to tread so softly in the case of Frederick the Great of Prussia, probably the most prolific of sceptered composers, whose Third Symphony was played over the week-end by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra at Carnegie Hall. One knows who must have written it if Frederick didn't, but it is handing him no great flattery to believe he did.

The symphony, of course, dates back to the middle of the eighteenth century but this is the first time it ever had been played in New York. Three of Frederick's four symponies have only lately been published and this one, in D-major, attracted little attention last May when Erich Kleiber played it at the Berlin State Opera. Mr. Koussevitzky brought it over with hi mlast Fall and gave it its American premiere a little over a week ago in Boston.

VERSATILE MONARCH.

Frederick, one of the most versatile of monarchs, took up music as something more than a mere avocation, became a tolerable performer on the flute, wrote considerable for that instrument and not a few operatic pieces besides the symphonies. That, in any case, is the legend. He had two remarkably able teachers, in a routine fashion—Johann Joachim Quantz, probably the best flute player of his day, and Karl Heinrich Graun, conductor of the Berlin Opera, and a composer of innumerable forgotten symphonies, among which, if one is an incurable skeptic, may be included four royal ones.

The D-major symphony, however, might just as well hase really been written by Frederick as not, for it is the sort of music with which the eighteenth century bulged. There was a rubber stamp formula for these smphonic works, andcomposers of all degrees of talent turned them out by the dozen.

PLAYED NEATLY.

Frederick's is neat, simple and brief, with a single idea for each of its three movements; when he had reached the end of his rope, he stopped, refusing to tangle himself up in further development, repetition or elaboration, which so often inveigles many less sensible composers. The middle movement is naturally enough little more than a duo for flutes and makes it bow to Glück, notwithsttanding that Frederick didn't like his music. Mr. Koussevitzky played the piece without flourish, as neatly, indeed, as it was written.

The rest of the afternoon was given over to a performance of Jan Sibelius Third Symphony and a repetition of Richard Strauss "Thus Spake Zarathustra." The symphony is Sibelius in one of his most volksthumlich moods, as the Germans would call it—it is full of the folk spirit of Finnish music. It is also Sibelius in one of his simplest aspects, consistently enough; but this simplicity at times verges on the naif. The work as a whole leaves an impression of too deliberate, too complete a lack of sophistication, which is probably one of the reasons why it is so seldom played now-

Sales 2:15	Open	High	L
500	194	194	19
100	128¼	128¼	12
500	71½	71½	7
200	240¼	240¼	24
900	10	10
500	116⅝	117	11
800	68½	68½	6
300	178½	179½	17
100	118	118	11
100	100⅝	100⅝	10
700	8¾	8¾
100	22¼	22¼	2
100	98½	98½	9
700	180	180	17
800	67½	67½	6
200	100	103⅛	10
1100	152	157¾	15
9700	14⅛	15¼	1
10200	62¾	65⅛	6
500	83⅞	84⅝	8
4000	52⅜	52½	5
2900	⅞	1
100	97½	97½	9
800	35⅞	35⅞	3
10200	72⅛	73⅜	7
300	61	61	6
300	58⅞	58⅞	5
600	49½	49½	4
1100	63	63¾	6
200	79	79	7
300†	18⅛	18¼	1
100	105½	105½	10
2600	68	68⅞	6
1000	16¾	16⅞	1
100	68	68	6
2100	72	72½	7
2000	67⅜	67⅜	6
11600	55½	61	5
2600	90	91	9
300	45⅝	45¾	4

— Fisk Rub Tire.
— Fisk R&T cvt pf
½b Fleischmann ...
¼b Follansbee Bros.
— Foundation ...
4 Fox Film A.....
4 Freeport Tex...

music nor dran[illegible] and liked that, too.

But such va[illegible]tions from the usual critical routine [illegible] not meet the issue. What of the [illegible]ek's music and the critic's reaction[illegible]hereto? Did he like anything? Mon[illegible]y brought the season's first "Bori[illegible] Godunoff" and the return of Challa[illegible]n to the opera. The reviewer liked [illegible]e opera as even a critic can like a [illegible]work he regards as a very great mast[illegible]piece. He liked the portrayal of Bo[illegible]s by Challapin as a more normal b[illegible]g would like something thrilling [illegible] magnificent, overwhelming. He [illegible]ted, too, the fine singing of Ezio [illegible]nza as Pimenn, the capital Innkeeper [illegible]f Ina Bourskaya.

Tuesday was [illegible]iladelphia Orchestra night. The revie[illegible]er liked the playing of De Falla's "[illegible]hree Cornered Hat" dances, and if h[illegible] was not equally enthusiastic abou[illegible] the performance he admitted down [illegible]n his heart more than a sneaking l[illegible]ing for the Brahms Fourth Symp[illegible]ony, even the sort of liking one has for a work of imperishable beauty.

THURSDAY [illegible]as marked by several instances [illegible] liking something. In the afternoon [illegible]ame "Siegfried." The reviewer liked w[illegible]h a like that was like enthusiasm the [illegible]nsitive, finely pointed, dramatically just and essentially musical treatme[illegible]t of the orchestral score by Th[illegible] the superb singin[illegible] Friedrich Sch[illegible] the Wanderer and the adroit Alberich Gustav Schuetzendorf. The evening brought Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony. The [illegible], not only with respect to the ignescent performance of Strauss's "Also sprach Zarathustra," the most memorable in the reviewer's experience, and the finely polished projection of Ravel's very apt orchestral arrangement of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," but also Arthur Foote's unpretentious but pleasurable Suite for Strings.

Friday, at "The Tales of Hoffmann," there was occ[illegible]sion to like with a like that might e[illegible]sily be described as admiration th[illegible] Dr. Miracle of Leon Rothier. Mo[illegible]over, unlikely as such a like might s[illegible]m, it was possible to like the very go[illegible]d playing of the student orchestra f[illegible]m the Curtis Institute in Carnegie Ha[illegible].

Saturday, completing the sennight under review, was all likes in that it was confined to the Boston Symphony's second program, with its refreshing little symphony by Frederick the Great, its equally refreshing big symphony by Jan Sibelius and its very welcome repetition of "Zarathustra," all played with a clarity, a glory of tone, a perfection of balance, a virtuosity of utterance to make the reviewer suspect his own ears.

[illegible] of all this, the critic [illegible] Evening Post feels he should not be downhearted over a constitutional or acquired weakness such as the question on the margin of this clipping implies. He will re-mail the same, forthwith, to his esteemed and erudite confrere.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLUB FELLOW
MAR 13 1929

Nietzsche a la Strauss

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky again invaded New York. We do not recall the time when the whole ensemble sounded so rich and uplifting. The strings had their accustomed singing quality and the brass was rich in their beauty of tone.

The prime number of the evening's performance was the "Also sprach Zarathustra," the Strauss tone-poem. Philip Hale in his program note tells us that the "World riddle" has never been solved and we must admit that neither does the tone-poem of Strauss solve anything, either philosophically or musically. When first played some twenty years ago it was criticized as unmusical and uninteresting. However it has weathered the years better than was expected. There are portions of decided beauty though by no means lofty and idealized. It does not, under any circumstances reach the heights of the "superman" that Nietzsche created in his book.

Arthur Foote's Suite in E Major was well handled. The Moussorgsky piano pieces, arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel, were also included in the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
MAR 12 1929

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN
MAR 11 1929

Plays Prussian Monarch's Work

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Concert Gives Composition of Frederick the Great.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The fourth afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which engrossed the attention of a prosperous looking audience Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, began with the third symphony of no less a personage than his Majesty Frederick the Great of Prussia. This was followed by the third symphony of Jan Sibelius, a humble musician of Finland. The program concluded with Richard Strauss's tone poem "Also Sprach Zarathustra," which had been proclaimed at the Thursday evening concert.

The symphony of the famous Prussian was heard for the first time here. Probably most of those listening to it had not suspected that an occupant of the throne recently vacated by the hermit of Doorn was a musician and aspired to be remembered as one, despite the fact that history insists on celebrating him as a most conspicuous man on horseback. But let us not forget that Frederick bowed before the authority of old Quantz, his flute teacher; that he adored Voltaire, quarreled and made up with him many times; that he introduced French as the court language, and that (in his "Anti-Machiavel") he declared public office to be a public trust.

When he sought a life of intellectual retirement at Sans Souci, surround himself with Mupertins, Lord Tyrconnel, Algarotti, Voltaire and other wise men, and cultivated the sophisticated attitudes of a Parisian salon, he set music upon the altar of his worship. Sophie Wilhelmine of Prussia wrote: "The evenings are consecrated to music. The prince holds his concerts in his own apartments, where nobody may go who is not invited, and indeed such an invitation is a great favor. He generally executes a sonata and a concerto for the flute, an instrument which he plays with the utmost perfection. He mouths it admirably, and his fingers are agile, and his soul is full of music. He composes sonatas himself. I have more than once had the honor to find myself beside him while he played and I was enchanted with his taste, especially for his skill in the adagio. It is a continuous creation of new ideas."

When Frederick grew so old that he could no longer admirably mouth his flute he said very sadly, "I have lost my best friend." Listening to his third symphony Saturday, with its naively charming duet for flutes with accompaniment of violins, which forms the second movement, one felt that here was a gentle and ingratiating echo of a soul which had been harassed by a Seven Years' War, and shaken by a battle of Kunersdorf. Peace and unperturbed flute blowing were his dream. It was this man of whom Voltaire wrote: "It is sometimes Caesar with whom I dine, sometimes Marcus Aurelius or Julian. Here is all the charm of seclusion, the freedom of the fields, together with all those luxuries of life which the lord of the castle, who is a king, can procure for his humble guests." It was the grave wroshiper of music, weary of the cares of kingcraft and refreshing his spirit by playing as seriously as an amateur could at the merciless game of art. The first movement of the symphony disclosed a gallant gentleman putting on a bold front and not afraid to compose with polite vivacity in the approved manner of his time. And to do him justice, he composed his allegro quite as well as a half dozen others whose music has come down to us from that day garbed in some small glories. The audience evidently enjoyed hearing the simple music of the many-sided monarch.

The Sibelius symphony resembles his other orchestral works in that the melodic materials suggest the folk songs of the Finns and some of the rhythms that of the historic ballad of that people. It is a strong symphony, with the deep, brooding emotion which characterizes so much of Sibelius's art and the aggressive advances into broad expansions of its ideas. But it lacks firmness of joint in many places and it wants the relief of a burst of cheerfulness or at least of content. Mr. Koussevitzky interpreted it with compelling sympathy and the orchestra performed it with somber richness of tone.

About Dr. Strauss's philosophical ponderings it is unnecessary to make further comment. The melodic ideas are elementary, but so are many of Beethoven's. Strauss makes gorgeous tonal pictures out of them, but he has said more in some of his other works. Mr. Koussevitzky presented the works with imposing effect. We await with equanimity the next conductor's interpretation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
MAR 11

...ach
...ch
...as
...ap-
...man
...m, the Kingdom of whom he seems to have stood in awe was Quantz, his teacher on the flute. It was true that Sebastian Bach not only complimented Frederick upon a theme submitted by him to the Thomascantor, but used it as the subject for two famous works, the Musicalisches Opfer and the Kunst der Fuge. But this homage has usually been ascribed to Bach's courtiership, or else his desire to further his son's career at Potsdam.

* * *

It was with no small astonishment that the royal symphony was found to be not at all unworthy of revival on its own account as music. The chief theme of the first movement was taken from Graun's 35th Symphony, but we are assured that Frederick scored all the parts with his own hand, and that the only emendations were corrections of a few notes by Quantz. Unlike his other three symphonies, this opus is written not only for string orchestra, but for two flutes, two oboes, two horns and bassoon. The movements are entitled Allegro, Andante and Allegro Scherzando.

Regarding the first and third movements, the same encomiums may be awarded that have been bestowed on Frederick's prose "Memoirs"—that they are marked by clearness, conciseness, good sense and a certain air of simplicity which is singularly graceful in so powerful a sovereign. One even felt that the style was rather in advance of its time. The themes were matter-of-fact rather than imaginative, but they were far from despicable. The part-writing marched with the precision, the distinctness, of a regiment of Brandenburg grenadiers.

* * *

But the surprise of the afternoon was offered by the slow movement. It is in the form of a pastoral for two flutes, accompanied by four violins. One listened to the purl and trilling of the pair of wind instruments, escorting each other faithfully at the interval of a third, with an odd sense that these identical notes were first played by Frederick and the rigorous Quantz. We can scarcely doubt that the tutor seized upon the first flute, and that his modest if royal pupil contented himself with the second.

There is no gainsaying the fact that the Andante was actually charming. It was as artificial as a Watteau shepherdess, but also as beguiling. The innocent grace of the music was all the more startling when the circumstances were recalled under which it was written. Ascending the throne in 1740, Frederick had signalized the first year of his reign with a crime of perfidy and brigandage which had caused him to be execrated throughout the world. He had set on foot a war which raged during many years in every quarter of the globe. "In order that he might rob a neighbor whom he had promised to defend," according to Macaulay's energetic indictment, "black men fought on the coast of Coromandel, and red men scalped each other by the Great Lakes of North America."

Having deserted his allies, Frederick returned home with a rich province, Silesia, looted from the German Empire, as his spoils. It was during this interlude, in 1743, that Frederick, triumphant and infamous, wrote his Andante—as fresh, candid and winsome as if it had been penned by the most guileless youth in his realm.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL
MAR 11

KOUSSEVITZKY PLAYS SYMPHONY BY FREDERICK THE GREAT

By IRVING WEIL.

It was Brahms, we believe, who was responsible for the waggery that it is unsafe to damn the compositions of royalty, because one never can tell who wrote them. It is scarcely necessary, however, to tread so softly in the case of Frederick the Great of Prussia, probably the most prolific of sceptered composers, whose Third Symphony was played over the week-end by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra at Carnegie Hall. One knows who must have written it if Frederick didn't, but it is handing him no great flattery to believe he did.

The symphony, of course, dates back to the middle of the eighteenth century but this is the first time it ever had been played in New York. Three of Frederick's four symponies have only lately been published and this one, in D-major, attracted little attention last May when Erich Kleiber played it at the Berlin State Opera. Mr. Koussevitzky brought it over with hi mlast Fall and gave it its American premiere a little over a week ago in Boston.

VERSATILE MONARCH.

Frederick, one of the most versatile of monarchs, took up music as something more than a mere avocation, became a tolerable performer on the flute, wrote considerable for that instrument and not a few operatic pieces besides the symphonies. That, in any case, is the legend. He had two remarkably able teachers, in a routine fashion—Johann Joachim Quantz, probably the best flute player of his day, and Karl Heinrich Graun, conductor of the Berlin Opera, and a composer of innumerable forgotten symphonies, among which, if one is an incurable skeptic, may be included four royal ones.

The D-major symphony, however, might just as well hase really been written by Frederick as not, for it is the sort of music with which the eighteenth century bulged. There was a rubber stamp formula for these smphonic works, andcomposers of all degrees of talent turned them out by the dozen.

PLAYED NEATLY.

Frederick's is neat, simple and brief, with a single idea for each of its three movements; when he had reached the end of his rope, he stopped, refusing to tangle himself up in further development, repetition or elaboration, which so often inveigles many less sensible composers. The middle movement is naturally enough little more than a duo for flutes and makes it bow to Gluck, notwithsttanding that Frederick didn't like his music. Mr. Koussevitzky played the piece without flourish, as neatly, indeed, as it was written.

The rest of the afternoon was given over to a performance of Jan Sibelius Third Symphony and a repetition of Richard Strauss "Thus Spake Zarathustra." The symphony is Sibelius in one of his most volksthemlich moods, as the Germans would call it—it is full of the folk spirit of Finnish music. It is also Sibelius in one of his simplest aspects, consistently enough; but this simplicity at times verges on the naf. The work as a whole leaves an impression of too deliberate, too complete a lack of sophistication, which is probably one of the reasons why it is so seldom played now-

Sales 2:15	Open	High	L
500	194	194	19
100	128¼	128¼	12
500	71½	71½	7
200	240¼	240¼	24
900	10	10
500	116⅝	117	11
800	68½	68½	6
1300	178½	179½	17
100	118	118	11
100	100⅝	100⅝	10
700	8¾	8¾
100	22¼	22¼	2
100	98½	98½	9
700	180	180	17
800	67½	67½	6
200	100	103⅛	10
1100	152	157¾	15
9700	14⅛	15¼	1
10200	62¾	65⅞	6
500	83⅞	84⅜	8
4000	52⅜	52½	5
22900	⅞	1
100	97½	97½	9
800	35⅞	35⅞	3
0200	72⅛	73⅜	7
300	61	61	6
300	58⅞	58⅞	5
600	49½	49½	4
1100	63	63¾	6
200	79	79	7
300†	18⅛	18¼	1
100	105½	105½	10
2600	68	68⅞	6
1000	16¾	16⅞	1
100	68	68	6
2100	72	72½	7
2000	67⅜	67⅜	6
11600	55½	61	5
2600	90	91	8
300	45⅝	45¾	4

— Fisk Rub Tire.
— Fisk R&T cvt pf
½b Fleischmann ...
¼b Follansbee Bros.
— Foundation ...
4 Fox Film A.....
4 Freeport Tex...

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLUB FELLOW

Nietzsche a la Strauss

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky again invaded New York. We do not recall the time when the whole ensemble sounded so rich and uplifting. The strings had their accustomed singing quality and the brass was rich in their beauty of tone.

The prime number of the evening's performance was the "Also sprach Zarathustra," the Strauss tone-poem. Philip Hale in his program note tells us that the "World riddle" has never been solved and we must admit that neither does the tone-poem of Strauss solve anything, either philosophically or musically. When first played some twenty years ago it was criticized as unmusical and uninteresting. However it has weathered the years better than was expected. There are portions of decided beauty though by no means lofty and idealized. It does not, under any circumstances reach the heights of the "superman" that Nietzsche created in his book.

Arthur Foote's Suite in E Major was well handled. The Moussorgsky piano pieces, arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel, were also included in the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
MAR 12 1929

131

music nor dra... and liked that, too.

But such va...tions from the usual critical routine ...o not meet the issue. What of the ...ek's music and the critic's reactions ...hereto? Did he like anything? Mon...y brought the season's first "Bori... Godunoff" and the return of Challia...n to the opera. The reviewer liked ...e opera as even a critic can like a ...work he regards as a very great mast...piece. He liked the portrayal of Bo...s by Chaliapin as a more normal be...ng would like something thrilling ... magnificent, overwhelming. He ...ked, too, the fine singing of Ezio ...nza as Pimenn, the capital Innkeeper ...f Ina Bourskaya.

Tuesday was ...iladelphia Orchestra night. The revie...er liked the playing of De Falla's "...hree Cornered Hat" dances, and if h... was not equally enthusiastic abou... the performance he admitted down ...n his heart more than a sneaking l...ing for the Brahms Fourth Symph...ny, even the sort of liking one has ...for a work of imperishable beauty.

THURSDAY was marked by several instances ...f liking something. In the afternoon ...ame "Siegfried." The reviewer liked w...h a like that was like enthusiasm the ...ensitive, finely pointed, dramatically just and essentially musical treatment of the orchestral score by Tu... ... the superb singing ... Friedrich Sch... the Wanderer and the adroit Alberi... Gustav Schuetzendorf. The evening brought Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony. The likes had it, not only with respect to the ignescent performance of Strauss's "Also sprach Zarathustra," the most memorable in the reviewer's experience, and the finely polished projection of Ravel's very apt orchestral arrangement of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," but also Arthur Foote's unpretentious but pleasurable Suite for Strings.

Friday, at "The Tales of Hoffmann," there was occ...sion to like with a like that might e...sily be described as admiration th... Dr. Miracle of Leon Rothier. Mo...over, unlikely as such a like might s...m, it was possible to like the very go...d playing of the student orchestra f...m the Curtis Institute in Carnegie Hall.

Saturday, completing the sennight under review, was all likes in that it was confined to the Boston Symphony's second program, with its refreshing little symphony by Frederick the Great, its equally refreshing big symphony by Jan Sibelius and its very welcome repetition of "Zarathustra," all played with a clarity, a glory of tone, a perfection of balance, a virtuosity of utterance to make the reviewer suspect his own ears.

In view of all this, the critic of the EVENING POST feels he should not be downhearted over a constitutional or acquired weakness such as the question on the margin of this clipping implies. He will re-mail the same, forthwith, to his esteemed and erudite confrere.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN
MAR 11

ROAD TOUR GOO

By ROBERT HALLIDAY,

Leading man of "The New Moon."

and it is pleasant to remain with and among them. But after all, New York is but a small part of America, and to be really successful an actor's reputation should not be confined entirely to Broadway. An actor enhances his value greatly by having a following throughout the country. People from all over the United States visit New York frequently and they like to attend a show in which some actor whom they have seen at home is appearing. There is hardly a performance that does not bring back a note or a card from some one in the audience telling me that Mr. So-and-so is out front and that he remembers me from "The

The symphony of the famous Sibelian was heard for the first time here. Probably most of those listening to it had not suspected that an occupant of the throne recently vacated by the hermit of Doorn was a musician and aspired to be remembered as one, despite the fact that history insists on celebrating him as a most conspicuous man on horseback. But let us not forget that Frederick bowed before the authority of old Quantz, his flute teacher; that he adored Voltaire, quarreled and made up with him many times; that he introduced French as the court language, and that (in his "Anti-Machiavel") he declared public office to be a public trust.

When he sought a life of intellectual retirement at Sans Souci, surround himself with Mupertins, Lord Tyrconnel, Algarotti, Voltaire and other wise men, and cultivated the sophisticated attitudes of a Parisian salon, he set music upon the altar of his worship. Sophie Wilhelmine of Prussia wrote: "The evenings are consecrated to music. The prince holds his concerts in his own apartments, where nobody may go who is not invited, and indeed such an invitation is a great favor. He generally executes a sonata and a concerto for the flute, an instrument which he plays with the utmost perfection. He mouths it admirably, and his fingers are agile, and his soul is full of music. He composes sonatas himself. I have more than once had the honor to find myself beside him while he played and I was enchanted with his taste, especially for his skill in the adagio. It is a continuous creation of new ideas."

When Frederick grew so old that he could no longer admirably mouth his flute he said very sadly, "I have lost my best friend." Listening to his third symphony Saturday, with its naively charming duet for flutes with accompaniment of violins, which forms the second movement, one felt that here was a gentle and ingratiating echo of a soul which had been harassed by a Seven Years' War, and shaken by a battle of Kunersdorf. Peace and unperturbed flute blowing were his dream. It was this man of whom Voltaire wrote: "It is sometimes Caesar with whom I dine, sometimes Marcus Aurelius or Julian. Here is all the charm of seclusion, the freedom of the fields, together with all those luxuries of life which the lord of the castle, who is a king, can procure for his humble guests." It was the grave wroshiper of music, weary of the cares of kingcraft and refreshing his spirit by playing as seriously as an amateur could at the merciless game of art. The first movement of the symphony disclosed a gallant gentleman putting on a bold front and not afraid to compose with polite vivacity in the approved manner of his time. And to do him justice, he composed his allegro quite as well as a half dozen others whose music has come down to us from that day garbed in some small glories. The audience evidently enjoyed hearing the simple music of the many-sided monarch.

The Sibelius symphony resembles his other orchestral works in that the melodic materials suggest the folk songs of the Finns and some of the rhythms that of the historic ballad of that people. It is a strong symphony, with the deep, brooding emotion which characterizes so much of Sibelius's art and the aggressive advances into broad expansions of its ideas. But it lacks firmness of joint in many places and it wants the relief of a burst of cheerfulness or at least of content. Mr. Koussevitzky interpreted it with compelling sympathy and the orchestra performed it with somber richness of tone.

About Dr. Strauss's philosophical ponderings it is unnecessary to make further comment. The melodic ideas are elementary, but so are many of Beethoven's. Strauss makes gorgeous tonal pictures out of them, but he has said more in some of his other works. Mr. Koussevitzky presented the works with imposing effect. We await with equanimity the next conductor's interpretation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
MAR 11

MUSIC

By Richard L. Stokes

THE poetry of Frederick II. of Prussia is remembered chiefly through Voltaire's jibe that it was "dirty linen, which the King had sent him to wash." Yet it is likely that had some musician offered him a choice, the most regal of the Hohenzollerns would eagerly have surrendered both realm and military glory, if only he might have won rank as one of the masters of French letters. His Majesty was also an industrious composer, and no less than 120 of his musical works have been published. The first of these to reach performance in America, 186 years after its creation, was a Symphony in D, No. 3, which, on the same page with the plebeian names of Sibelius and Strauss on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon, at Carnegie Hall, bore the august inscription of "Frederick the Great."

The victor of Leuthen and Rossbach appears to have entertained no such vanity regarding his musical talent as caused him to put so exorbitant an appraisal upon his doggerel. The one man in his kingdom of whom he seems to have stood in awe was Quantz, his teacher on the flute. It was true that Sebastian Bach not only complimented Frederick upon a theme submitted by him to the Thomascantor, but used it as the subject for two famous works, the Musicalisches Opfer and the Kunst der Fuge. But this homage has usually been ascribed to Bach's courtiership, or else his desire to further his son's career at Potsdam.

* * *

It was with no small astonishment that the royal symphony was found to be not at all unworthy of revival on its own account as music. The chief theme of the first movement was taken from Graun's 35th Symphony, but we are assured that Frederick scored all the parts with his own hand, and that the only emendations were corrections of a few notes by Quantz. Unlike his other three symphonies, this opus is written not only for string orchestra, but for two flutes, two oboes, two horns and bassoon. The movements are entitled Allegro, Andante and Allegro Scherzando.

Regarding the first and third movements, the same encomiums may be awarded that have been bestowed on Frederick's prose "Memoirs"—that they are marked by clearness, conciseness, good sense and a certain air of simplicity which is singularly graceful in so powerful a sovereign. One even felt that the style was rather in advance of its time. The themes were matter-of-fact rather than imaginative, but they were far from despicable. The part-writing marched with the precision, the distinctness, of a regiment of Brandenburg grenadiers.

* * *

But the surprise of the afternoon was offered by the slow movement. It is in the form of a pastoral for two flutes, accompanied by four violins. One listened to the purl and trilling of the pair of wind instruments, escorting each other faithfully at the interval of a third, with an odd sense that these identical notes were first played by Frederick and the rigorous Quantz. We can scarcely doubt that the tutor seized upon the first flute, and that his modest if royal pupil contented himself with the second.

There is no gainsaying the fact that the Andante was actually charming. It was as artificial as a Watteau shepherdess, but also as beguiling. The innocent grace of the music was all the more startling when the circumstances were recalled under which it was written. Ascending the throne in 1740, Frederick had signalized the first year of his reign with a crime of perfidy and brigandage which had caused him to be execrated throughout the world. He had set on foot a war which raged during many years in every quarter of the globe. "In order that he might rob a neighbor whom he had promised to defend," according to Macaulay's energetic indictment, "black men fought on the coast of Coromandel, and red men scalped each other by the Great Lakes of North America."

Having deserted his allies, Frederick returned home with a rich province, Silesia, looted from the German Empire, as his spoils. It was during this interlude, in 1743, that Frederick, triumphant and infamous, wrote his Andante—as fresh, candid and winsome as if it had been penned by the most guileless youth in his realm.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL
MAR 11

who erick no g

Th sprinkle with lemon juice and po back dered sugar and let stand for a fe cent minutes. Then drain. Sift the d ever ingredients into a mixing bowl. Ad
Three the milk slowly and the well-beate have this little attention last May when Erich Kleiber played it at the Berlin State Opera. Mr. Koussevitzky brought it over with hi mlast Fall and gave it its American premiere a little over a week ago in Boston.

VERSATILE MONARCH.

Frederick, one of the most versatile of monarchs, took up music as something more than a mere avocation, became a tolerable performer on the flute, wrote considerable for that instrument and not a few operatic pieces besides the symphonies. That, in any case, is the legend. He had two remarkably able teachers, in a routine fashion—Johann Joachim Quantz, probably the best flute player of his day, and Karl Heinrich Graun, conductor of the Berlin Opera, and a composer of innumerable forgotten symphonies, among which, if one is an incurable skeptic, may be included four royal ones.

The D-major symphony, however, might just as well hase really been written by Frederick as not, for it is the sort of music with which the eighteenth century bulged. There was a rubber stamp formula for these smphonic works, andcomposers of all degrees of talent turned them out by the dozen.

PLAYED NEATLY.

Frederick's is neat, simple and brief, with a single idea for each of its three movements; when he had reached the end of his rope, he stopped, refusing to tangle himself up in further development, repetition or elaboration, which so often inveigles many less sensible composers. The middle movement isnaturally enough little more than a duo for flutes and makes it bow to

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLUB FELLOW

Nietzsche a la Strauss

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky again invaded New York. We do not recall the time when the whole ensemble sounded so rich and uplifting. The strings had their accustomed singing quality and the brass was rich in their beauty of tone.

The prime number of the evening's performance was the "Also sprach Zarathustra," the Strauss tone-poem. Philip Hale in his program note tells us that the "World riddle" has never been solved and we must admit that neither does the tone-poem of Strauss solve anything, either philosophically or musically. When first played some twenty years ago it was criticized as unmusical and uninteresting. However it has weathered the years better than was expected. There are portions of decided beauty though by no means lofty and idealized. It does not, under any circumstances reach the heights of the "superman" that Nietzsche created in his book.

Arthur Foote's Suite in E Major was well handled. The Moussorgsky piano pieces, arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel, were also included in the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
MAR 12 1929

131

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Finding Something to Like in New York's Music Not So Difficult, Even for a Music Critic

"DOES THE CRITIC of the EVENING POST ever like anything?" is asked by some one who has taken the trouble to clip a review of a recent Wagner performance at the Metropolitan and to mail it to the offending reviewer with marginal notations indicating wherein this particular review was indefensible.

Complicating the issue, the review thus traduced was from another newspaper, not the EVENING POST. But since the question was specific in naming the reviewer, whatever the confusion that may have existed in the mind of the indignant opera patron as to the relation of one critic's likes to another critic's criticism, it may dutifully be taken to heart.

Perhaps the shears slipped. Perhaps the other critic got this one's clipping. There will be time enough to compare notes. Sufficient unto the day is the fizzing thereof. Even the wrong reviewer can afford to stop now and then and consider whether he does or does not ever like anything.

Last week was perhaps an average week in New York's music, though the EVENING POST critic drew two blank days, a better average than usual. On one of these, Wednesday, he went to "Street Scene," the play Deems Taylor is to convert into an opera, and liked it immensely. On the other, Sunday, he heard neither music nor drama and liked that, too.

But such variations from the usual critical routine do not meet the issue. What of the week's music and the critic's reactions thereto? Did he like anything? Monday brought the season's first "Boris Godunoff" and the return of Chaliapin to the opera. The reviewer liked the opera as even a critic can like a work he regards as a very great masterpiece. He liked the portrayal of Boris by Chaliapin as a more normal being would like something thrilling magnificent, overwhelming. He liked, too, the fine singing of Ezio Pinza as Pimenn, the capital Innkeeper of Ina Bourskaya.

Tuesday was Philadelphia Orchestra night. The reviewer liked the playing of De Falla's "Three Cornered Hat" dances, and if he was not equally enthusiastic about the performance he admitted down in his heart more than a sneaking liking for the Brahms Fourth Symphony, even the sort of liking one has for a work of imperishable beauty.

THURSDAY was marked by several instances of liking something. In the afternoon came "Siegfried." The reviewer liked with a like that was like enthusiasm the sensitive, finely pointed, dramatically just and essentially musical treatment of the orchestral score by Tullio Serafin, the superb singing of Friedrich Schorr as the Wanderer and the adroit Alberich of Gustav Schuetzendorf. The evening brought Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony. The likes had it, not only with respect to the ignescent performance of Strauss's "Also sprach Zarathustra," the most memorable in the reviewer's experience, and the finely polished projection of Ravel's very apt orchestral arrangement of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," but also Arthur Foote's unpretentious but pleasurable Suite for Strings.

Friday, at "The Tales of Hoffmann," there was occasion to like with a like that might easily be described as admiration that Dr. Miracle of Leon Rothier. Moreover, unlikely as such a like might seem, it was possible to like the very good playing of the student orchestra from the Curtis Institute in Carnegie Hall.

Saturday, completing the sennight under review, was all likes in that it was confined to the Boston Symphony's second program, with its refreshing little symphony by Frederick the Great, its equally refreshing big symphony by Jan Sibelius and its very welcome repetition of "Zarathustra," all played with a clarity, a glory of tone, a perfection of balance, a virtuosity of utterance to make the reviewer suspect his own ears.

In view of all this, the critic of the EVENING POST feels he should not be downhearted over a constitutional or acquired weakness such as the question on the margin of this clipping implies. He will re-mail the same, forthwith, to his esteemed and erudite confrere.

132

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
MAR 15 1929

MUSIC

By Richard L. Stokes

A PROGRAM quaintly compounded was proffered by Arturo Toscanini and the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra last night at Carnegie Hall before a thronging audience. It was bounded at the beginning and end by two masterpieces—Wagner's "A Faust' Overture" and Maurice Ravel's Second Suite from the ballet, "Daphnies et Chloe." They inclosed two works considerably less in eminence—Ernest Schelling's "Impressions of an Artist's Life," with the composer at the piano, and Serge Prokofieff's studied and sterile imitation of Mozart, the "Classical" Symphony in D Major, Op. .

Wagner's overture is one of his few essays of music without text, although it possesses a specific program. It was composed during that miserable sojourn in Paris when Wagner was twenty-seven years old, and was revised somewhat fifteen years later. The unhappy artist identified himself with one phase of Goethe's "Faust"—that of the hero "loving, despairing, cursing." The work was intended to be the first movement of a symphony on the subject of "Faust," the second movement of which was to be devoted to Gretchen. The design was never completed. Wagner at one time had the illuminating idea of entitling the fragment "Faust in Solitude: a Tone-Poem for Orchestra."

The overture has the intense vividness of autobiography, a department which tends to be less mendacious in music than in letters. It, therefore, possesses an aura different from that of the familiar Wagner—one harsh, corrosive and gloomily introspective. Never again did this poet utter music so blackly impassioned. Its outcries of mutiny, like those of Job, storm to the sky; its blasphemies shake the firmament; its dirge of baffled sensuality tears at the heart. And yet, since Beethoven, writers of symphonies have been addicted to "happy endings." So, after the hurricane, the thunder and the lightning, comes the glow of the sun. The hymn of tragedy concludes in a major key and in a mood of solace—or even, in Mr. Newman's felicitous phrase, of "benignity."

This masterwork of the early Wagner, which is rarely performed, was received by the audience with astonishment and enthusiasm. It was profoundly indebted not only to Mr. Toscanini's enterprise in its revival but to a reading combining in sovereign style the most tempestuous energy and a supreme finish of workmanship. In this revelation The Evening World may claim a modest share. It was suggested by Mr. Noel Straus of this department in a recent review that a disinterment of the "Faust" overture would be a worthy exploit. The hint was relayed to Mr. Toscanini by Bruno Zirato, secretary to the late Enrico Caruso, and was converted into action with gratifying promptitude.

It is said that Mr. Schelling, who directs the children's concerts of the Philharmonic-Symphony, is the first performer to appear as a soloist on Mr. Toscanini's programs during his career in New York. The presentation of the "Impressions of an Artist's Life" was also one of the Italian's rare forays into American music. And American music more is to agree all the more illuminating because unaware. It is writing sexless, naïve, superficial and timid beneath its bold front. It is also sturdy, efficient, handsomely organized and on occasion noisily self-assertive. The single trait of sophistication occurs in the passage entitled "August, 1914—The Call to Arms," which burns with the pacifistic irony fulfilling Mr. Schelling's more popular "Victory Ball."

The composition is in the form of nineteen variations—of which Mr. Toscanini omitted three—for orchestra and piano. It consists of portraits of divers celebrities and sketches of memorable scenes encountered by Mr. Schelling during the adventures of his career. Among the personages commemorated are Paderewski, Kreisler, Mengelberg, Mahler, Pfitzer and Georges Longy. There are also group limnings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Flonzaley Quartet. These delineations are, without exception, simple profiles, as the landscapes are drawn in black and white.

The score's merits, of gusto, frankness and strength, together with Mr. Schelling's consummate triumph at the keyboard, won for him a lusty demonstration, with Mr. Toscanini coyly retreating into the orchestra almost as far as the wood-winds to escape joining the composer at the footlights.

Not all of the director's wizardry of finesse could redeem the Prokofieff Symphony, with the possible exception of the Gavotte. But he produced a reading of the Ravel suite to rival the historic one given in the same hall last season by Serge Koussevitzky. The first two sections, "Daybreak" and "Pantomime," are often neglected in favor of the stupendous "Danse Generale" which concludes the excerpts. Not so with the Milanese maestro. The lyrical opening sections were delicious in their sylvan poetry, against which towered in more telling contrast the finale's vertiginous speed, its intoxicating verve of rhythm and its clamor of barbaric ecstasy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
MAR 15 1929

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
TIMES

Boston Symphony Gives Tin Pan Alley Concert

CAMBRIDGE, March 15. (UP)—Music emanating last night from Sanders theatre, where the Boston Symphony orchestra was giving a concert, sounded like a weird cross between a thunder shower and the output of Tin Pan Alley.

Inside the auditorium, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, was struggling bravely through Brahm's Symphony No. 2, but he was unable to eliminate from its interpretation a persistent accompaniment which would have fitted in nicely had he been directing some such selection as "I Faw Down and Go Boom."

It seems that somebody, without being asked, had turned on the steam, and now the webwork of ovation.

steam pipes throughout the theatre was issuing bang-bang noises that re-echoed, cannon-like, in the auditorium.

For five minutes, M. Koussevitsky waged his battle of music, but at least he was forced to surrender.

The orchestra remained silent. So did the pipes.

Then, cautiously, M. Koussevitsky tried it again. But the bombardment of pipe noise also resumed and once more the orchestra was silent.

Finally, when Brahm's Symphony No. 2 had been completed on the installment plan, M. Koussevitsky and his orchestra were given an

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
JOURNAL
Knoxville Tenn.
MAR 15 1929

RECEIVES MEDAL

HAMBURG, Germany, (AP).—Dr. Carl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received the first of the Johannes Brahms medals. The medals commemorate the 100th anniversary of the Hamburg Philharmonic Society founded by Brahms.

Boston Symphony Plays To Steam Pipe Obligato

Serge Koussevitsky Conducts Musicians Through the Passages of Brahm On 'Instalments,' Playing 'Tag' With Embarrassing Interlude of Steam

Cambridge, March 15—Music emanating last night from Sanders theater, where the Boston symphony orchestra was giving a concert, sounded like a weird cross between a thunder shower and the output of Tin Pan alley.

Inside the auditorium, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, was struggling bravely through Brahms's symphony No 2, but he was unable to eliminate from its interpretation a persistent accompaniment which would have fitted in nicely had he been directing some such selection as "I Faw Down and Go Boom."

It seems that somebody, without being asked, had turned on the steam, and the webwork of steam pipes throughout the theater was issuing bang-bang noises that re-echoed, cannon-like, in the auditorium.

For five minutes, M Koussevitsky waged his battle of music, but at least he was forced to surrender.

The orchestra remained silent. So did the pipes.

Then, cautiously, M. Koussevitsky tried it again. But the bombardment of pipe noise also resumed and once more the orchestra was silent.

Finally, when Brahms's symphony No 2 had been completed on the sinstallment plan, M. Koussevitsky and his orchestra were given an ovation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
TIMES UNION
MAR 16 1929

Boston Orchestra Has Music Battle

Noise From Steam Pipes Vie for First Place in Sanders Theatre.

Cambridge, Mass., (U.P.)—Music emanating last night from Sanders Theatre, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra was giving a concert, sounded like a weird cross between a thunder shower and the output of Tin Pan Alley.

Inside the auditorium, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, was struggling bravely through Brahm's Symphony No. 2, but he was unable to eliminate from its interpretation a persistent accompaniment which would have fitted in nicely had he been directing some such selection as "I Faw Down and Go Boom."

It seems that somebody, without being asked, had turned on the steam, and now the webwork of steam pipes throughout the theatre was issuing bang-bang noises that reechoed, cannon-like, in the auditorium.

For five minutes, M. Koussevitsky waged his battle of music, but at last he was forced to surrender.

The orchestra remained silent. So did the pipes.

Then, cautiously, M. Koussevitsky tried it again. But the bombardment of pipe noise also resumed and once more the orchestra was silent.

Finally, when Brahm's Symphony No. 2 had been completed on the installment plan, M. Koussevitsky and his orchestra were given an ovation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
MAR 16 1929

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will make its final visit to Providence of the season for a concert in the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening, March 26. Serge Koussevitzky will then conduct Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor, a score in which the Russian leader reveals his most eloquent powers. The other numbers will be an orchestra concerto of Philip Emanuel Bach, as re-orchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg: Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Sorceror's Apprentice," the humorous scherzo of Dukas, which was inspired by the ballad of Goethe.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TIMES STAR
MAR 16 1929

Concert On Installment Plan As Steam Pipes Vie With Orchestra

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., March 16—(UP)—Music emanating Thursday night from Sanders Theatre where the Boston Symphony Orchestra was giving a concert, sounded like a weird cross between a thunder shower and the output of Tin Pan alley.

Inside the auditorium, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, was struggling bravely through Brahm's Symphony No. 2, but he was unable to eliminate from its interpretation a persistent accompaniment which would have fitted in nicely had he been directing some such selection as "I Faw Down and Go Boom."

It seems that somebody, without being asked, had turned on the steam, and now the webwork of steam pipes throughout the theatre was issuing bang-bang noises that re-echoed, cannon-like, in the auditorium.

For five minutes, M. Koussevitsky waged his battle of music, but at last he was forced to surrender.

The orchestra remained silent. So did the pipes.

Then, cautiously, M. Kossevitsky tried it again. But the bombardment of pipe noise also resumed and once more the orchestra was silent.

Finally, when Brahm's Symphony No. 2 had been completed on the installment plan, M. Koussevitsky and his orchestra were given an ovation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAR 16 1929

FINAL SYMPHONY CONCERT IS MARCH 26

Boston Group to Play Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E-Minor.

Tschaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E Minor, regarded as one of the Russian master's greatest compositions, will be the principal feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth and final concert of the season in the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening, March 26. The symphony is said to be a favorite with Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the orchestra, who will conduct.

The other numbers on the program will be an Orchestral Concerto by Philip Emanuel Bach, reorchestrated by Maxmilian Steinberg; Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin," and the "Sorceror's Apprentice," the humorous scherzo of Dukas, which was inspired by the ballad of Goethe bearing the same name.

TODAY'S classified ads may not appear again—too many people are watching for the special opportunities offered in them.—Better read them today yourself.

THIS CLIPPING FROM AUGUSTA, GA.
CHRONICLE
MAR 16 1929

GETS BRAHMS MEDAL

Hamburg, Germany.—(AP)—Dr. Carl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received the first of the Johannes Brahms medals. The medals commemorate the 100th anniversary of the Hamburg Philharmonic Society founded by Brahms.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 16

STEAM PIPES "ASSIST" BOSTON SYMPHONY

Cambridge, March 15—Music emanating last night from Sanders theater, where the Boston symphony orchestra was giving a concert, sounded like a weird cross between a thunder shower and the output of Tin Pan alley.

Inside the auditorium, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, was struggling bravely through Brahms's symphony No 2, but he was unable to eliminate from its interpretation a persistent accompaniment which would have fitted in nicely had he been directing some such selection as "I Faw Down and Go Boom."

It seems that somebody, without being asked, had turned on the steam, and the webwork of steam pipes throughout the theater was issuing bang-bang noises that re-echoed, cannon-like, in the auditorium.

For five minutes, M Koussevitsky waged his battle of music, but at least he was forced to surrender.

The orchestra remained silent. So did the pipes.

Then, cautiously, M. Koussevitsky tried it again. But the bombardment of pipe noise also resumed and once more the orchestra was silent.

Finally, when Brahms's symphony No 2 had been completed on the sinstallment plan, M. Koussevitsky and his orchestra were given an ovation.

132

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
MAR 15 1929

MUSIC

By Richard L. Stokes

A PROGRAM quaintly compounded was proffered by Arturo Toscanini and the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra last night at Carnegie Hall before a thronging audience. It was bounded at the beginning and end by two masterpieces—Wagner's "A 'Faust' Overture" and Maurice Ravel's Second Suite from the ballet, "Daphnies et Chloe." They inclosed two works considerably less in eminence—Ernest Schelling's "Impressions of an Artist's Life," with the composer at the piano, and Serge Prokofieff's studied and sterile imitation of Mozart, the "Classical" Symphony in D Major, Op. 25.

Wagner's overture is one of his few essays of music without text, although it possesses a specific program. It was composed during that miserable sojourn in Paris when Wagner was twenty-seven years old, and was revised somewhat fifty years later. The unhappy artist identified himself with one phase of Goethe's "Faust"—that of the hero "laboring, despairing, cursing." The work was intended to be the first movement of a symphony on the subject of "Faust," the second movement of which was to be devoted to Gretchen. This design was never completed. Wagner at one time had the illuminating idea of entitling the fragment "Faust in Solitude: a Tone-Poem for Orchestra."

The overture has the intense vividness of autobiography, a department which tends to be less mendacious in music than in letters. It, therefore, possesses an aura different from that of the familiar Wagner—one harsh, corrosive and sombre introspective. Never again did his pen utter music so blackly impassioned. Its outcries of mutiny, like those of Job, storm to the sky; its blasphemies shake the firmament; its dirge of baffled sensuality tears at the heart. And yet, since Beethoven, writers of symphonies have been addicted to "happy endings." So, after the hurricane, the thunder and the lightning, comes the glow of the sun. The hymn of tragedy concludes in a major key and a mood of solace—or even, in Mr. Newman's felicitous phrase, of "benignity."

This masterwork of the early Wagner, which is rarely performed, was received by the audience with astonishment and enthusiasm. It was profoundly indebted not only to Mr. Toscanini's enterprise in its revival but to a reading compelling in sovereign style the most tempestuous energy and a supreme finish of workmanship. In this revelation The Evening World may claim a modest share. It was suggested by Mr. Noel Straus of this department in a recent review that a disinterment of the "Faust" overture would be a worthy exploit. The hint was relayed to Mr. Toscanini by Bruno Zirato, secretary to the late Enrico Caruso, and was converted into action with gratifying promptitude.

* * *

It is said that Mr. Schelling, who directs the children's concerts of the Philharmonic-Symphony, is the first performer to appear as a soloist on Mr. Toscanini's programs during his career in New York. The presentation of the "Impressions of an Artist's Life" was also one of the Italian's rare forays into American music. And American this score is to a degree all the more illuminating because unaware. It is writing sexless, naive, superficial and timid beneath its bold front. It is also sturdy, efficient, handsomely organized and on occasion noisily self-assertive. The single trait of sophistication occurs in the passage entitled "August, 1914—The Call to Arms," which burns with the pacifistic irony fulfilling Mr. Schelling's more popular "Victory Ball."

The composition is in the form of nineteen variations—of which Mr. Toscanini omitted three—for orchestra and piano. It consists of portraits of divers celebrities and sketches of memorable scenes encountered by Mr. Schelling during the adventures of his career. Among the personages commemorated are Paderewski, Kreisler, Mengelberg, Mahler, Pfitzer and Georges Longy. There are also group limnings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Flonzaley Quartet. These delineations are, without exception, simple profiles, as the landscapes are drawn in black and white.

The score's merits, of gusto, frankness and strength, together with Mr. Schelling's consummate triumph at the keyboard, won for him a lusty demonstration, with Mr. Toscanini coyly retreating into the orchestra almost as far as the second violins to escape joining the composer at the footlights.

* * *

Not all of the director's wizardry of finesse could redeem the Prokofieff Symphony, with the possible exception of the Gavotte. But he produced a reading of the Ravel suite to rival the historic one given in the same hall last season by Serge Koussevitzky. The first two sections, "Daybreak" and "Pantomime," are often neglected in favor of the stupendous "Danse Generale" which concludes the excerpts. Not so with the Milanese maestro. The lyrical opening sections were delicious in their sylvan poetry, against which towered in more telling contrast the finale's vertiginous speed, its intoxicating verve of rhythm and its clamor of barbaric ecstasy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

Boston Symphony Gives Tin Pan Alley Concert

CAMBRIDGE, March 15. (UP)—Music emanating last night from Sanders theatre, where the Boston Symphony orchestra was giving a concert, sounded like a weird cross between a thunder shower and the output of Tin Pan Alley.

Inside the auditorium, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, was struggling bravely through Brahm's Symphony No. 2, but he was unable to eliminate from its interpretation a persistent accompaniment which would have fitted in nicely had he been directing some such selection as "I Faw Down and Go Boom."

It seems that somebody, without being asked, had turned on the steam, and now the webwork of ovation.

steam pipes throughout the theatre was issuing bang-bang noises that re-echoed, cannon-like, in the auditorium.

For five minutes, M. Koussevitsky waged his battle of music, but at least he was forced to surrender.

The orchestra remained silent. So did the pipes.

Then, cautiously, M. Koussevitsky tried it again. But the bombardment of pipe noise also resumed and once more the orchestra was silent.

Finally, when Brahm's Symphony No. 2 had been completed on the installment plan, M. Koussevitsky and his orchetsra were given an

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE JOURNAL
Knoxville
12
MAR 15 1929

RECEIVES MEDAL

HAMBURG, Germany, (AP).—Dr. Carl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received the first of the Johannes Brahms medals. The medals commemorate the 100th anniversary of the Hamburg Philharmonic Society founded by Brahms.

Boston Symphony Plays To Steam Pipe Obligato

Serge Koussevitsky Conducts Musicians Through the Passages of Brahm On 'Instalments,' Playing 'Tag' With Embarrassing Interlude of Steam

Cambridge, March 15—Music emanating last night from Sanders theater, where the Boston symphony orchestra was giving a concert, sounded like a weird cross between a thunder shower and the output of Tin Pan alley.

Inside the auditorium, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, was struggling bravely through Brahms's symphony No 2, but he was unable to eliminate from its interpretation a persistent accompaniment which would have fitted in nicely had he been directing some such selection as "I Faw Down and Go Boom."

It seems that somebody, without being asked, had turned on the steam, and the webwork of steam pipes throughout the theater was issuing bang-bang noises that re-echoed, cannon-like, in the auditorium.

For five minutes, M Koussevitsky waged his battle of music, but at least he was forced to surrender.

The orchestra remained silent. So did the pipes.

Then, cautiously, M. Koussevitsky tried it again. But the bombardment of pipe noise also resumed and once more the orchestra was silent.

Finally, when Brahms's symphony No 2 had been completed on the installment plan, M. Koussevitsky and his orchestra were given an ovation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
TIMES UNION

Boston Orchestra Has Music Battle

Noise From Steam Pipes Vie for First Place in Sanders Theatre.

Cambridge, Mass., (U.P.)—Music emanating last night from Sanders Theatre, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra was giving a concert, sounded like a weird cross between a thunder shower and the output of Tin Pan Alley.

Inside the auditorium, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, was struggling bravely through Brahm's Symphony No. 2, but he was unable to eliminate from its interpretation a persistent accompaniment which would have fitted in nicely had he been directing some such selection as "I Faw Down and Go Boom."

It seems that somebody, without being asked, had turned on the steam, and now the webwork of steam pipes throughout the theatre was issuing bang-bang noises that reechoed, cannon-like, in the auditorium.

For five minutes, M. Koussevitsky waged his battle of music, but at last he was forced to surrender.

The orchestra remained silent. So did the pipes.

Then, cautiously, M. Koussevitsky tried it again. But the bombardment of pipe noise also resumed and once more the orchestra was silent.

Finally, when Brahm's Symphony No. 2 had been completed on the installment plan, M. Koussevitsky and his orchestra were given an ovation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
MAR 16 1929

Organlogue, A Medley of Irish Airs.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will make its final visit to Providence of the season for a concert in the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening, March 26. Serge Koussevitzky will then conduct Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor, a score in which the Russian leader reveals his most eloquent powers. The other numbers will be an orchestra concerto of Philip Emanuel Bach, as re-orchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg; Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Sorceror's Apprentice," the humorous scherzo of Dukas, which was inspired by the ballad of Goethe.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TIMES STAR
MAR 16 1929

Concert On Installment Plan As Steam Pipes Vie With Orchestra

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., March 16—(UP)—Music emanating Thursday night from Sanders Theatre where the Boston Symphony Orchestra was giving a concert, sounded like a weird cross between a thunder shower and the output of Tin Pan alley.

Inside the auditorium, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, was struggling bravely through Brahm's Symphony No. 2, but he was unable to eliminate from its interpretation a persistent accompaniment which would have fitted in nicely had he been directing some such selection as "I Faw Down and Go Boom."

It seems that somebody, without being asked, had turned on the steam, and now the webwork of steam pipes throughout the theatre was issuing bang-bang noises that re-echoed, cannon-like, in the auditorium.

For five minutes, M. Koussevitsky waged his battle of music, but at last he was forced to surrender.

The orchestra remained silent. So did the pipes.

Then, cautiously, M. Kossevitsky tried it again. But the bombardment of pipe noise also resumed and once more the orchestra was silent.

Finally, when Brahm's Symphony No. 2 had been completed on the installment plan, M. Koussevitsky and his orchestra were given an ovation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FINAL SYMPHONY CONCERT IS MARCH 26

Boston Group to Play Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E-Minor.

Tschaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E Minor, regarded as one of the Russian master's greatest compositions, will be the principal feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth and final concert of the season in the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening, March 26. The symphony is said to be a favorite with Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the orchestra, who will conduct.

The other numbers on the program will be an Orchestral Concerto by Philip Emanuel Bach, reorchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg; Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin," and the "Sorceror's Apprentice," the humorous scherzo of Dukas, which was inspired by the ballad of Goethe bearing the same name.

TODAY'S classified ads may not appear again—too many people are watching for the special opportunities offered in them.—Better read them today yourself.

THIS CLIPPING FROM AUGUSTA, GA.
CHRONICLE
MAR 16 1929

GETS BRAHMS MEDAL

Hamburg, Germany.—(AP)—Dr. Carl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received the first of the Johannes Brahms medals. The medals commemorate the 100th anniversary of the Hamburg Philharmonic Society founded by Brahms.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

STEAM PIPES "ASSIST" BOSTON SYMPHONY

Cambridge, March 15—Music emanating last night from Sanders theater, where the Boston symphony orchestra was giving a concert, sounded like a weird cross between a thunder shower and the output of Tin Pan alley.

Inside the auditorium, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, was struggling bravely through Brahms's symphony No 2, but he was unable to eliminate from its interpretation a persistent accompaniment which would have fitted in nicely had he been directing some such selection as "I Faw Down and Go Boom."

It seems that somebody, without being asked, had turned on the steam, and the webwork of steam pipes throughout the theater was issuing bang-bang noises that re-echoed, cannon-like, in the auditorium.

For five minutes, M Koussevitsky waged his battle of music, but at least he was forced to surrender.

The orchestra remained silent. So did the pipes.

Then, cautiously, M. Koussevitsky tried it again. But the bombardment of pipe noise also resumed and once more the orchestra was silent.

Finally, when Brahms's symphony No 2 had been completed on the sinstallment plan, M. Koussevitsky and his orchestra were given an ovation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph
MAR 16 1929

MUSIC

By Charles D. Isaacson

THE King can do no wrong. Nor can Toscanini. In ancient monarchies lese majeste was punishable by death. In America only the public can foretell what is meted out to those who would criticize the kings, whom popularity has crowned.

Toscanini, the mighty, the incomparable, the genius touched by the gods! So we hear him lauded, and with justice. Curiously, many who now can see only perfection in the Italian some years ago were among his cruelest enemies.

For myself, who has knelt before Toscanini since first these ears heard his sublime music, admiring him as I do, it is not impossible to know when he is at his best, and when he is not.

Thus, on Thursday night when he conducted the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra despite the fact that no other performances by any other conductor are at all thrilling, I felt that Toscanini was not at his own standards. He has not the same inner joy which he felt last year; his own satisfaction and ecstasy do not compare with what he felt during his previous season. He is fulfilling a contract this time; something is drawing his heart elsewhere.

▼

ANOTHER and more serious matter. Somebody has been telling Mr. Toscanini that the way to "get" American audiences is to shiver them with a cyclonic noise. For the master Italian, until last year, is aiming always to bewilder the listeners with a series of thunderous climaxes.

During the performance of "Impressions From an Artist's Life," of Ernest Schelling, one felt that Toscanini was fulfilling an obligation, returning a courtesy. He did not believe in it. So he made it what he wanted. The Schelling Variations for Orchestra and Piano, illustrated a point we made recently in a review of the Boston Symphony and a comment on Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor.

▼

KOUSSEVITSKY could do no better than the music he played. Toscanini bettered everything he touched. I have heard Schelling's works three times; on each previous occasion it appeared to have been written, rather than inspired; it appeared to have been patterned, planned, devised, made to fit. On this occasion, the Impressions emerged another work! In the Variation XVIIA, "The Call to Arms," the familiar Toscanini alarum sounded, and one listened tremblingly. But it was in the Ninth Variation, dedicated to Paderewski, that the lovelier moments ensued, and in the exquisite Sixth Variation, dedicated to the Flonzaleys, and in the quaint and haunting Seventh, dedicated to the oboist, Georges Longy.

Mr. Schelling participated and looked like a great boy before his idol.

Again in point on Koussevitsky: We heard him play the Prokofeiff "Classic Symphony." He made it of marble, chaste, Grecian, cold, but beautiful. Toscanini brought the work to life, it turned to flesh, it breathed of Springtime and youth. It whirled and pirouetted and danced. A dazzling and lovely thing, Italianate in spirit and mood.

The Wagner "Faust" Overture of his earlier days, and the glorious Ravel "Daphnis and Chloe" completed the brilliant program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR 17 192

◈ ◈ ◈

FINAL PROGRAM BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

For the fourth and final concert of its Providence series a week from next Tuesday night in the Albee Theatre, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony as its major offering. This work of the Russian composer is considered one of Mr. Koussevitzky's most eloquent interpretations and, coming at the end of the program, will say the farewells of conductor and his musicians to Providence for the year.

The first part of the program holds the Concerto for Orchestra in D-major, by Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach, third son of the great Johann Sebastian, as reorchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg; Wagner's familiar prelude to "Lohengrin" and Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a humorous scherzo which was inspired by the ballad of Goethe.

This is the arrangement: Concerto for Orchestra in D-major, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg. C. P. E. Bach, Allegro moderato, Andante lento molto, Allegro; Prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner; "L'Apprenti Sorcier" ("The Sorcerer's Apprentice") Scherzo (after a ballad by Goethe), Dukas; Symphony No. 5 in E-minor, opus 64, Tschaikowski, Andante, Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza, Valse (Allegro moderato), Finale: Andante maestoso; Allegro vivace.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
MAR 17 1929

Boston Symphony Plays King's Work

By Joan King.

[Chicago Tribune Press Service.]

NEW YORK, March 16.—[Special.]—Gothamites, fortunate enough to possess subscription seatings for the New York season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, were presented with something rare recently by that indefatigable innovator, Serge Koussevitsky. In fact, insofar as this [illegible] musical annals disclose, the occasion was the first of its kind hereabouts, the introduction of a musical work from the pen of a king. Entitled Symphony in D major, number 3, the Koussevitsky offering presented an example of the musical genius of no less a historical personage than Frederick the Great, one of the few examples of kingly effort available for modern use.

Frederick the Great's fondness for music is a matter of historical record, as is his father's opposition to this artistic bent. Lessons which he managed to obtain from Quantz, flute virtuoso and composer of the day, were gotten in secret. When he became king he did not give up his music, but, as Philip Hale's program notes upon the Boston Symphony's concert related, he played the flute four times daily throughout his entire régime.

* *

Unearthed in Berlin.

The symphony in D major was recently unearthed in the Berlin library and edited by Gustav Lenzewski, for revival by Erich Kleiber at the Staatsoper, Berlin, May 4, 1928. Mr. Koussevitsky was responsible for its first American performance in Boston, not long ago.

Contrary to the general belief that music supposed to have been composed by princes was in reality the work of the expert musicians of the times, it is said that Frederick the Great's D major symphony was all his own, some few parts having been submitted to Quantz for correction in notation.

The symphony in question is likable music, in three short movements, scored for two oboes, two horns, and strings and solo flutes. The first movement is lively and high spirited; the slow movement [a duet for two flutes] accompanied by strings; the third, a final allegro scherzando.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER PRESS
MAR 17 1929

Toscanini's Art At Pinnacle in 'Tannhaeuser'

By Frances Boardman.

New York, March 16.—It has been possible of late to hear the Philadelphia Symphony orchestra under Eugene Goossens, the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky, and the Philharmonic - Symphony orchestra under Arturo Toscanini, all within the space of six days.

This writer has already forwarded comment on the first-named of the three events, which, for all the virtuosity of the Philadelphia men, was very positively eclipsed in interpretative force and beauty by each of the other programs in the trio.

There is one striking characteristic which MM. Toscanini and Koussevitzky share—the ability to exert tremendous force, and exercise meticulous control, with a minimum of physical demonstration. Somewhat unlike the posturing and undulating Mr. Goossens, they seem to regard themselves merely as agencies for guiding the performance, and not as star performers.

As the New York musical Nestors have repeatedly said, Koussevitzky is one of the two conductors—Stokowski is the other—whom they quite willingly group with Toscanini in an outstanding triune. His performance of Saturday easily justified such a rating. Never has this writer heard the music of Richard Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra" so magnificently elucidated, nor its technical difficulties so magically resolved into sheer, thrilling beauty.

The orchestra, which fell on unhappy and disorganizing days during the post-Muck and pre-Koussevitzky interval, has retrieved its former fame, and gives an extraordinarily fine account of itself. The strings, especially, are superb in their luscious homogeneity of tone, and there is a sensitivity of response throughout the ensemble which is almost uncannily acute.

It is a curious and interesting fact that the manner in which Toscanini is greeted on his appearances in Carnegie hall might well impress the

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
MAR 17 1929

PIPES OF PANDEMONIUM

Every season the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives several concerts at Harvard in the Sanders Theater, in whose unfavorable acoustics not a few Phi Beta Kappa orations have been muffled. The most recent of these concerts was the occasion of a form of interruption more suited to compositions since Respighi than to Brahms' Second Symphony. The Boston Transcript describes the occasion:

Mr. Koussevitzky had no more than begun the symphony when radiators and steam pipes began to make noises. Involuntarily one wished for Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" or Prokofiev's "Pas d'Acier." Instead, Mr. Koussevitzky signaled his men to stop, descended from his little platform, began smilingly to walk about among his players. Audience, orchestra, conductor "registered" nothing but amusement. When there was an interval of silence longer than the most, causing the audience to grow silent and the conductor to approach his post, another crash renewed amusement. After this there were no more attempts at starting until the proper official of Harvard University had notified Mr. Koussevitzky that he might proceed in peace.

Every graduate of the university will recall the steam pipes of Harvard which Prof. Charles Townsend Copeland was wont to denounce with Elizabethan epithets. They have disturbed the tranquillity of many a lecture and caused young men busy taking notes to digress into the delineation of feminine heads and professorial profiles. But to have driven Mr. Koussevitzky from his eminence is an accomplishment for steam pipes which cannot be duplicated by some Boston music lovers who occasionally interrupt a notoriously modern composition with howls.

Perhaps in the above-recorded episode a modernist had taken his revenge by turning the steam on poor Brahms.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST-DISPATCH
MAR 17 1929

Brahms Medal for Karl Muck.

By the Associated Press.

HAMBURG, Germany, March 16.—Dr. Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received the first of the Johannes Brahms medals. The medals commemorate the hundredth anniversary of the Hamburg Philharmonic Society founded by Brahms.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
MAR 17 1929

Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony orchestra went to New York the other night and presented a symphony composed by Frederick the Great. What is more, it was the third in the series of four composed by that monarch. The critics found it amiable and pleasant, without much of any independent invention, and rather agreeable without reference to its royal source.

THIS CLIPPING FROM OMAHA
WORLD HERALD
MAR 17 1929

HONOR DIRECTOR

Dr. Muck Gets First of Johannes Brahms Medals.

Hamburg, Germany, March 16 (AP).—Dr. Carl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, received the first of the Johannes Brahms medals. The medals commemorate the one hundredth anniversary of the Hamburg Philharmonic society founded by Brahms.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MACON, GA.
TELEGRAPH
MAR 17 1929

HAMBURG, Germany (AP). — Dr. Carl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received the first of the Johannes Brahms medals. The medals commemorate the 100th anniversary of Hamburg Philharmonic Society founded by Brahms.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILA., PA.
INQUIRER
17 192

CARL MUCK HONORED

Former Conductor of Boston Orchestra Gets Brahms Medal

HAMBURG, Germany, March 16 (A. P.).—Dr. Carl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received the first of the Johannes Brahms medals.

The medals commemorate the 100th anniversary of the Hamburg Philharmonic Society founded by Brahms.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
JOURNAL
Knoxville, Tenn.
MAR 17 1929

Last Concert

Last week in Washington the concluding concert of a series by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given under direction of Sergei Koussevitsky. Ernest Bloch's "America" was appropriately used as the opening number.

In one of the boxes a notable party included Mrs. Herbert Hoover and her sister, Mrs. J. H. Large; President Hoover's sister, Mrs. May Leavitt, and the president's uncle, W. D. Henry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD
MAR 18 1929

BY THE WAY

By C. G.

Some things are very puzzling, and admit of no explanation except the very lame one, "Oh, well, it makes a difference, you know." In Cambridge the other evening, when the Boston Symphony orchestra was giving a performance, the steam pipes went on the rampage in the middle of a Brahms number. You know how steam pipes can bang when the janitor, having glanced at the thermometer in the early morning hours, says to himself: "Down to zero, eh? Well, I suppose I had better give those guys some heat"; and, suiting the action to the word, as the saying is, tosses a shovelful of coal under the boiler and opens the drafts. If he really does a good job of it, the pipes are apt to start an anvil chorus about the time folks are getting in their best licks. I never heard steam pipes on the rampage at a concert, but I can imagine it would be more obtrusive than the nine o'clock bell in the Stone church used to be in the old days when something very sweet and low was being played or sung at a concert in the Odd Fellows building. According to all accounts, the pipes in Cambridge proved too much for the symphony artists, and the performance had to be suspended.

* * * *

And yet I wonder. It seems to me that a resourceful conductor would have silenced the instruments just long enough to announce that through an error in the printed program the number being played was represented to be a piece of Brahms, when it really was the new Boiler Factory Symphony in F minor by a modern composer. With that explanation, he could have continued the performance, and the audience, instead of being annoyed, would have raved over the marvelous verisimilitude of the effects produced. In an age when composers are dealing with such themes as a locomotive and a steam hammer, a combination of wind and string instruments with banging steam pipes ought to be a popular success. Some people, no doubt, would prefer the pipes—modernized pipes of Pan—suited to the age of steam—to the [illegible] or the horns with plugs in the openings.

134

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ENTERPRISE
BROCKTON, MASS.
MAR 18 1929

By the Way

ST. PATRICK'S DAY.

It was celebrated on the air
With lilting Irish tunes,
With all the tender cradle songs
An Irish mother croons,
But to-night the celebration
Will be merriest we've seen,
When saxophones all syncopate
The Wearing of the Green.

ARTHUR T. COLE of Whitman, reading that the steam pipes went on a bust when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was doing Brahms' Symphony No. 2, throwing the band for a loss, was moved to write to the Herald suggesting: "What they should have done is to wait until Papa Koussevitzky started to wind up some of the stuff put out by one of the so-called modern composers, Stravinski, Ravel or old man Popover or what ever his name is—suffering cats what an effect would have been produced.

"Papa Koussevitzky would never have had to quit cold as he did with the Brahms number. When the banging and booming commenced he would have probably thought to himself. 'Well, well, here's a brand new noise I never heard before; I sure never rehearsed this lovely harmony and I'm giggled if I know which of the bunch is making this beautiful coloring but when I find out I'm going to present him with an extra ration of vodka—suffering Pete but this is good.'"

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 20 1929

There are criticisms in both Boston and New York of current offerings in orchestral music. In Boston the ground of complaint is the large proportion of "modernist" music in the Symphony programs selected by Mr Koussevitzky. The objectors recognize the notable quality of the Symphony orchestra and the talent of the conductor, but they do not like so-called "ultramodern" music and do not wish to hear so much of it. This position, whether or not unduly conservative, is at least intelligent. In New York, however, as has been said, people do not go to concerts to hear music, but to indulge their enthusiasm for conductors, and much of this is mere hero-worship, to which, perhaps, some of the music critics are contributing. A letter writer in the Times stupidly condemns Mr Mengelberg as a "mere time-beater" and sighs for the return of Mr Furwaengler, yet, when Mr Furwaengler was in New York some years ago, another letter writer declared that the tone quality of the orchestra had deteriorated in a few months.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR 20 1929

Appetizing Fare for Symphony Folk

Koussevitzky Selects Tchaikovsky, C. P. E. Bach, Dukas and Wagner For His Season's Farewell Here Tuesday.—Some Program Notes

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present [redacted] in the fourth and last concert of the season, to be given the evening of March 26 at the E. F. Albee Theatre.

Symphony audiences here within the last two years have heard two of the compositions. The prelude to "Lohengrin" was given last year, while the arrangement of the concerto by the "Hamburg Bach" seems due for an appearance here every other season. Introduced here in the 1924-25 season, it was repeated two years ago.

Concerning the latter composition, which opens Tuesday's concert, we find in the Symphony's program notes for Jan. 18, 1927, the folowing remarks:

"Mr. Koussevitzky heard this concerto played by violin, quinton, viol d'amour, viola de gamba and bass viol at a concert of the Society of Ancient Instruments in Paris. He was so pleased that he took the music and proposed to make an orchestral arrangement; but he finally entrusted the task to Steinberg, who arranged it for these instruments: flute, two oboes, bassoon, horn, and strings. The concerto was probably composed by Bach at Hamburg. It was performed in Boston at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, on Oct. 24, 1924." The arrangement keeps faith with the original's 18th century spirit.

As Wagner Explained It

Wagner's own explanation of the Prelue to "Lohengrin" follows: "Love seemed to have vanished from a world of hatred and quarrelling; as a lawgiver she was no longer to be found among the communities of men. Emancipating itself from barren care for gain and possession, the sole arbiter of all worldly intercourse, the human heart's unquenchable love-longing again at length craved to appease a want, which, the more warmly and intensely it made itself felt under the pressure of reality, was the less easy to satisfy, on account of this very reality.

"It was beyond the confines of the actual world that man's ecstatic imaginative power fixed the source as well as the outflow of this incomprehensible impulse of love, and from the desire of a comforting sensuous conception of this supersensuous idea invested it with a wonderful form, which, under the name of the 'Holy Grail,' though conceived as actually existing, yet unapproachably far off, was believed in, longed for, and sought for.

"The Holy Grail was the costly vessel out of which, at the Last Supper, our Savior drank with his disciples, and in which His blood was received when out of love for His brethren He suffered upon the cross, and which till this day has been preserved with lively zeal as the source of undying love; albeit at one time this cup of salvation was taken away from unworthy mankind, but at length was brought back again from the heights of heaven by a band of angels, and delivered into the keeping of fervently loving, solitary men, who, wondrously strengthened and blessed by its presence, and purified in heart, were consecrated as the earthly champions of eternal love."

"This miraculous delivery of the Holy Grail, escorted by an angelic host, and the handing of over into the custody of highly favored men, was selected by the author of "Lohengren," a knight of the Grail, for the introduction of his drama, as the subject to be musically portrayed, just as here, for the sake of explanation, he may be allowed to bring it forward as an object for the mental receptive power of his hearers."—(Boston Symphony program for March 20, 1928.)

In the Sorcerer's Absence

"In 1796, Goethe in one of his lighter moods wrote "Der Zauberlehrling," the material of the poem being drawn from Lucian's "Philopseudes," Lie-monger. In it he details the sad experience of a youth, who in the absence of his master, a sorcerer to whom he was apprenticed, proceeded to employ the magic formula commanding the broom to take to itself a head and legs, and then directing it to bring water from a near-by stream. But when all the pitchers and tubs are full to overflowing the youth in desperation cuts the broom in two with an ax, only to find that he has created two water-carriers whose frenetic industry bids fair to cause a veritable inundation. As he loudly screams for help the master appears, restores the broom to its pristine condition, and in all probability belabors the unlucky youth with it." This is the theme of Dukas's delightful work.

Tchaikovsky is always interesting; his work is Germanic enough to insure a sound structure, and at the same time Slavic enough to engage the mind with the unusual and the unexpected.

The first movement of the Fifth Symphony opens with a slow introduction, Andante in E-minor (4-4 time), where two clarinets announce and develop a mournful Slavic theme, to an accompaniment of strings. This is followed by the main part of the movement, Allegro con anima, filled with lights and shadows almost without end. The first theme is given unusual development, and comes to a close with an uproarious double-fortissimo, full orchestra. Then follows a cantabile theme, first in the strings, and then overflowing until it fills the whole orchestra. After this the wood wind take up the matter and debate with the strings through the Piu animato and the Molto tranquillo to the very dramatic free fantasia that closes the movement.

The Famous Second Movement.

The second movement, Andante cantabile con alcuna licenza, consists of strongely contrasted dialogues—the lower strings, the lovely horn melody, the fluent comment of the clarinet, and, under it all, the fine harmonic accompaniment in the strings. The oboe, imitated by the horn, introduces the principal theme, to be followed by the violins and violas in octaves, against a triplet accompaniment in the wind. Then the clarinet sets the theme of the Moderato con anima, a melody full of passion, which rises to a climax on the voices of various instruments, and leads up to a double-fortissimo, where the theme of the slow introduction to the first movement returns. Then, after some strange harmonization, the second part of the movement begins. The violins play a G string air to the delight of the oboe, who immediately imitates it; and it then blazes through the full orchestra, returning, as usual, after a strong fortissimo, to the opening theme of the first Andante.

The third movement is a Valse, a rather unusual form for the third movement, in spite of the fact that the old third movements were usually minuets. Toward its close, the theme of the slow introduction to the first movement returns like a ghost and comments with grim humor, through the clarinets and basscons, on the frivolity of such sounds and movements.

The fourth movement is a sort of Pomp and Circumstance development of the theme of the introduction to the first movement, Andante maestoso, and leads to the Allegro vivace in E-minor which is essentially in sonata form. The strings voice the strong first theme which, after a considerable extension, is followed by a more joyous second theme in the woodwind over a string accompaniment, then shifting to the violins. Then the affair grows fast and furious, inviting the return of the second theme, then, after a sudden pause, comes the beautiful and triumphant Moderato assai, which leads to the presto with its double-fortissimo again in full orchestra. The final Meno mosso is a sort of benediction that sets free the restless spirits from their wanderings.

M. C. W.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

C. P. E. Bach—
Concerto for Orchestra in D-major.
(Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg)
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante lento molto.
III. Allegro.
Wagner.....Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Dukas.."L'Apprenti Sorcier," scherzo (after a ballad by Goethe)

Tchaikovsky—
Symphony No. 5 in E-minor, Op. 64.
I. Andante.
II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
III. Valse (Allegro moderato).
IV. Finale: Andante maestoso, Allegro vivace.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS
MAR 25 1929

CLOSING SYMPHONY PROGRAM TUESDAY

The visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence for a concert in the Albee theatre Tuesday evening at 8:15, will close the Providence season.

Serge Koussevitsky has put, as the principal [redacted] on the program, the Fifth Symphony of Tchvaikovsky, in E-minor. This popular score has had an extraordinary reception under the Russian conductor's eloquent interpretation as heard in Boston and other cities.

The first part of the program will consist of a concerto for orchestra by Philip Emanuel Bach, which has been rescored by Maximilian Steinberg, the son-in-law of Rimsky-Korsakov. It contains a particularly beautiful andante, in which the melody is introduced by the English horn solo.

Wagner will be represented by the prelude to "Lohengrin," and the modern French school by Paul Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." This piece was inspired by the humorous ballad of Goethe, in which the Sorcerer's boy slucceeded in starting things by use of his master's magic incantations, but did not know enough to stop them. The results were humorously disastrous.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAM
MAR 20 1929

CLEMENS KRAUSS AS GUEST OF THE PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA

Viennese Batonist Leads Compositions by Richard Strauss, Mozart, Max Reger and Wagner.

By PITTS SANBORN.

IN disheartening succession the guest batonists of the Philadelphian season arrived last evening at Clemens Krauss. He made his New York debut as director of the eighth Carnegie Hall concert of the gentlemen from Quakerdom. Leopold Stokowski will return to his own for the concluding Carnegie Hall concerts of April 2 and 16, and then we shall hear what we shall hear!

Mr. Krauss, who is still under 40, has come to this country after successes in his native Vienna and reported triumphs in Frankfort-on-the-Main, and with no less a further honor imminent than the directorship of the Vienna State Opera. He has recently been conducting the Philadelphia Orchestra in Philadelphia as guest.

So much is certain. Much else that regards this young musician of romance is legend. The legend, however, is true in so far as his looks go. He does resemble an overgrown Spanish torero (the typical fighter of bulls boasts less than his stature and weight).

His podium manner last night was scarcely a miracle of grace, but it fell appreciably short in demonstrativeness of the behaviour before a band exhibited by Mr. Gabrilowitsch or Mr. Goossens. One suspects that Mr. Krauss' beat had its difficulties for his bandsmen. However, he at least did not scorn the aid of desk and score.

Proceedings began with the "Thus Spake Zaranthustra" of Richard Strauss. Thanks to Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall has enjoyed lately quite an exhaustive course in that particular tone poem. After the splendors of the Bostonian expositions, the Krauss-Quaker version, to employ the ancient verbal play, proved more exhausting than exhaustive. A good deal of it, indeed, was a persuasive invitation from Morpheus.

Never in my experience had the stupendous opening produced such a small effect, and what followed was so uncertain in design, so injudicious in the emphasis or the overemphasis of detail, so turbid in its tormented flow as to sound incoherent fragmentary, dull. Even the waltz section, in which great things had been expected from a Viennese, seemed cheaply trivial.

The remainder of the program dealt with divers matters. An early serenade by Mozart, composed for two small orchestras of strings and timpani, you might find at least as well done in many a German beer garden. Could these sawers on strings really be the Quaker players of great renown? Next Mr. Krauss resurrected the tiresome "ballet suite" of Max Reger for an additional dispensation of boredom. For a grand finale his choice fell upon the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

Unless this cruelly battered masterpiece can receive more humane treatment in the concert room it ought to be left to the tender mercies of the opera house. Ill advised tempi, distorted rhythms and a murkiness of tone which in the past was the last thing one would associate with the Philadelphia orchestra made of this performance a pretty discouraging affair.

An orchestra worthy the name—and what orchestra has borne a better name than that of the city on the Schuylkill?—deserves the uninterrupted ministrations of a competent trainer and conductor.

Last night's capacity audience accepted the concert with equanimity.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
MAR 23 1929

Boston Symphony.

The visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra to Providence for a concert in the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening at 8:15 will close this orchestra's Providence season.

Serge Koussevitzky has put, as the principal number on the programme, the Fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsky in E minor. This popular score has had an extraordinary reception under the Russian conductor's eloquent interpretation, as heard in Boston and other cities.

The first part of the programme will consist of a concerto for orchestra by Philip Emanuel Bach, which has been rescored by Maximilian Steinberg, the son-in-law of Rimsky-Korsakov. It contains a particularly beautiful andante, in which the melody is introduced by the English horn solo.

Wagner will be represented by the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the modern French, school by Paul Dukas' scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." This piece was inspired by the humorous ballad of Goethe, in which the sorcerer's boy succeeded in starting things by use of his master's magic incantations, but did not know enough to stop them. The results were humorously disastrous.

134

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ENTERPRISE
BROCKTON, MASS.
MAR 18 1929

By the Way

ST. PATRICK'S DAY.

It was celebrated on the air
With lilting Irish tunes,
With all the tender cradle songs
An Irish mother croons,
But to-night the celebration
Will be merriest we've seen,
When saxophones all syncopate
The Wearing of the Green.

ARTHUR T. COLE of Whitman, reading that the steam pipes went on a bust when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was doing Brahms' Symphony No. 2, throwing the band for a loss, was moved to write to the Herald suggesting: "What they should have done is to wait until Papa Koussevitzky started to wind up some of the stuff put out by one of the so-called modern composers, Stravinski, Ravel or old man Popover or what ever his name is—suffering cats what an effect would have been produced.

"Papa Koussevitzky would never have had to quit cold as he did with the Brahms number. When the banging and booming commenced he would have probably thought to himself. 'Well, well, here's a brand new noise I never heard before; I sure never rehearsed this lovely harmony and I'm giggled if I know which of the bunch is making this beautiful coloring but when I find out I'm going to present him with an extra ration of vodka—suffering Pete but this is good.'"

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

There are criticisms in both Boston and New York of current offerings in orchestral music. In Boston the ground of complaint is the large proportion of "modernist" music in the Symphony programs selected by Mr Koussevitzky. The objectors recognize the notable quality of the Symphony orchestra and the talent of the conductor, but they do not like so-called "ultramodern" music and do not wish to hear so much of it. This position, whether or not unduly conservative, is at least intelligent. In New York, however, as has been said, people do not go to concerts to hear music, but to indulge their enthusiasm for conductors, and much of this is mere hero-worship, to which, perhaps, some of the music critics are contributing. A letter writer in the Times stupidly condemns Mr Mengelberg as a "mere time-beater" and sighs for the return of Mr Furwaengler, yet, when Mr Furwaengler was in New York some years ago, another letter writer declared that the tone quality of the orchestra had deteriorated in a few months.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR 20 1929

Appetizing Fare for Symphony Folk

Koussevitzky Selects Tchaikovsky, C. P. E. Bach, Dukas and Wagner For His Season's Farewell Here Tuesday.—Some Program Notes

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present [redacted] in the fourth and last concert of the season, to be given the evening of March 26 at the E. F. Albee Theatre.

Symphony audiences here within the last two years have heard two of the compositions. The prelude to "Lohengrin" was given last year, while the arrangement of the concerto by the "Hamburg Bach" seems due for an appearance here every other season. Introduced here in the 1924-25 season, it was repeated two years ago.

Concerning the latter composition, which opens Tuesday's concert, we find in the Symphony's program notes for Jan. 18, 1927, the folowing remarks:

"Mr. Koussevitzky heard this concerto played by violin, quinton, viol d'amour, viola de gamba and bass viol at a concert of the Society of Ancient Instruments in Paris. He was so pleased that he took the music and proposed to make an orchestral arrangement; but he finally entrusted the task to Steinberg, who arranged it for these instruments: flute, two oboes, bassoon, horn, and strings. The concerto was probably composed by Bach at Hamburg. It was performed in Boston at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, on Oct. 24, 1924." The arrangement keeps faith with the original's 18th century spirit.

As Wagner Explained It

Wagner's own explanation of the Prelue to "Lohengrin" follows: "Love seemed to have vanished from a world of hatred and quarrelling; as a lawgiver she was no longer to be found among the communities of men. Emancipating itself from barren care for gain and possession, the sole arbiter of all worldly intercourse, the human heart's unquenchable love-longing again at length craved to appease a want, which, the more warmly and intensely it made itself felt under the pressure of reality, was the less easy to satisfy, on account of this very reality.

"It was beyond the confines of the actual world that man's ecstatic imaginative power fixed the source as well as the outflow of this incomprehensible impulse of love, and from the desire of a comforting sensuous conception of this supersensuous idea invested it with a wonderful form, which, under the name of the 'Holy Grail,' though conceived as actually existing, yet unapproachably far off, was believed in, longed for, and sought for.

"The Holy Grail was the costly vessel out of which, at the Last Supper, our Savior drank with his disciples, and in which His blood was received when out of love for His brethren He suffered upon the cross, and which till this day has been preserved with lively zeal as the source of undying love; albeit at one time this cup of salvation was taken away from unworthy mankind, but at length was brought back again from the heights of heaven by a band of angels, and delivered into the keeping of fervently loving, solitary men, who, wondrously strengthened and blessed by its presence, and purified in heart, were consecrated as the earthly champions of eternal love."

"This miraculous delivery of the Holy Grail, escorted by an angelic host, and the handing of over into the custody of highly favored men, was selected by the author of "Lohengren," a knight of the Grail, for the introduction of his drama, as the subject to be musically portrayed, just as here, for the sake of explanation, he may be allowed to bring it forward as an object for the mental receptive power of his hearers."—(Boston Symphony program for March 20, 1928.)

In the Sorcerer's Absence

"In 1796, Goethe in one of his lighter moods wrote "Der Zauberlehrling," the material of the poem being drawn from Lucian's "Philopseudes," Lie-monger. In it he details the sad experience of a youth, who in the absence of his master, a sorcerer to whom he was apprenticed, proceeded to employ the magic formula commanding the broom to take to itself a head and legs, and then directing it to bring water from a near-by stream. But when all the pitchers and tubs are full to overflowing the youth in desperation cuts the broom in two with an ax, only to find that he has created two water-carriers whose frenetic industry bids fair to cause a veritable inundation. As he loudly screams for help the master appears, restores the broom to its pristine condition, and in all probability belabors the unlucky youth with it." This is the theme of Dukas's delightful work.

Tchaikovsky is always interesting; his work is Germanic enough to insure a sound structure, and at the same time Slavic enough to engage the mind with the unusual and the unexpected.

The first movement of the Fifth Symphony opens with a slow introduction, Andante in E-minor (4-4 time), where two clarinets announce and develop a mournful Slavic theme, to an accompaniment of strings. This is followed by the main part of the movement, Allegro con anima, filled with lights and shadows almost without end. The first theme is given unusual development, and comes to a close with an uproarious double-fortissimo, full orchestra. Then follows a cantabile theme, first in the strings, and then overflowing until it fills the whole orchestra. After this the wood wind take up the matter and debate with the strings through the Piu animato and the Molto tranquillo to the very dramatic free fantasia that closes the movement.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

C. P. E. Bach—
Concerto for Orchestra in D-major.
(Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg)
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante lento molto.
III. Allegro.
Wagner.....Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Dukas.."L'Apprenti Sorcier," scherzo (after a ballad by Goethe)

Tchaikovsky—
Symphony No. 5 in E-minor, Op. 64.
I. Andante.
II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
III. Valse (Allegro moderato).
IV. Finale: Andante maestoso, Allegro vivace.

The Famous Second Movement.

The second movement, Andante cantabile con alcuna licenza, consists of strongely contrasted dialogues—the lower strings, the lovely horn melody, the fluent comment of the clarinet, and, under it all, the fine harmonic accompaniment in the strings. The oboe, imitated by the horn, introduces the principal theme, to be followed by the violins and violas in octaves, against a triplet accompaniment in the wind. Then the clarinet sets the theme of the Moderato con anima, a melody full of passion, which rises to a climax on the voices of various instruments, and leads up to a double-fortissimo, where the theme of the slow introduction to the first movement returns. Then, after some strange harmonization, the second part of the movement begins. The violins play a G string air to the delight of the oboe, who immediately imitates it; and it then blazes through the full orchestra, returning, as usual, after a strong fortissimo, to the opening theme of the first Andante.

The third movement is a Valse, a rather unusual form for the third movement, in spite of the fact that the old third movements were usually minuets Toward its close, the theme of the slow introduction to the first movement returns like a ghost and comments with grim humor, through the clarinets and basscons, on the frivolity of such sounds and movements.

The fourth movement is a sort of Pomp and Circumstance development of the theme of the introduction to the first movement, Andante maestoso, and leads to the Allegro vivace in E-minor which is essentially in sonata form. The strings voice the strong first theme which, after a considerable extension, is followed by a more joyous second theme in the woodwind over a string accompaniment, then shifting to the violins Then the affair grows fast and furious inviting the return of the second theme then, after a sudden pause, comes the beautiful and triumphant Moderato assai, which leads to the presto with its double-fortissimo again in full orchestra. The final Meno mosso is a sort of benediction that sets free the restless spirits from their wanderings.

M. C. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS

CLOSING SYMPHONY PROGRAM TUESDAY

The visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence for a concert in the Albee theatre Tuesday evening at 8:15, will close the Providence season.

Serge Koussevitsky has put, as the principal [redacted] on the program, the Fifth Symphony of Tchvaikovsky, in E-minor. This popular score has had an extraordinary reception under the Russian conductor's eloquent interpretation as heard in Boston and other cities.

The first part of the program will consist of a concerto for orchestra by Philip Emanuel Bach, which has been rescored by Maximilian Steinberg, the son-in-law of Rimsky-Korsakov. It contains a particularly beautiful andante, in which the melody is introduced by the English horn solo.

Wagner will be represented by the prelude to "Lohengrin," and the modern French school by Paul Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." This piece was inspired by the humorous ballad of Goethe, in which the Sorcerer's boy siucceeded in starting things by use of his master's magic incantations, but did not know enough to stop them. The results were humorously disastrous.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAM
MAR 20 1929

CLEMENS KRAUSS AS GUEST OF THE PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA

Viennese Batonist Leads Compositions by Richard Strauss, Mozart, Max Reger and Wagner.

By PITTS SANBORN.

IN disheartening succession the guest batonists of the Philadelphian season arrived last evening at Clemens Krauss. He made his New York debut as director of the eighth Carnegie Hall concert of the gentlemen from Quakerdom. Leopold Stokowski will return to his own for the concluding Carnegie Hall concerts of April 2 and 16, and then we shall hear what we shall hear!

Mr. Krauss, who is still under 40, has come to this country after successes in his native Vienna and reported triumphs in Frankfort-on-the-Main, and with no less a further honor imminent than the directorship of the Vienna State Opera. He has recently been conducting the Philadelphia Orchestra in Philadelphia as guest.

So much is certain. Much else that regards this young musician of romance is legend. The legend, however, is true in so far as his looks go. He does resemble an overgrown Spanish torero (the typical fighter of bulls boasts less than his stature and weight).

His podium manner last night was scarcely a miracle of grace, but it fell appreciably short in demonstrativeness of the behaviour before a band exhibited by Mr. Gabrilowitsch or Mr. Goossens. One suspects that Mr. Krauss' beat had its difficulties for his bandsmen. However, he at least did not scorn the aid of desk and score.

Proceedings began with the "Thus Spake Zaranthustra" of Richard Strauss. Thanks to Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall has enjoyed lately quite an exhaustive course in that particular tone poem. After the splendors of the Bostonian expositions, the Krauss-Quaker version, to employ the ancient verbal play, proved more exhausting than exhaustive. A good deal of it, indeed, was a persuasive invitation from Morpheus.

Never in my experience had the stupendous opening produced such a small effect, and what followed was so uncertain in design, so injudicious in the emphasis or the overemphasis of detail, so turbid in its tormented flow as to sound incoherent fragmentary, dull. Even the waltz section, in which great things had been expected from a Viennese, seemed cheaply trivial.

The remainder of the program dealt with divers matters. An early serenade by Mozart, composed for two small orchestras of strings and timpani, you might find at least as well done in many a German beer garden. Could these sawers on strings really be the Quaker players of great renown? Next Mr. Krauss resurrected the tiresome "ballet suite" of Max Reger for an additional dispensation of boredom. For a grand finale his choice fell upon the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

Unless this cruelly battered masterpiece can receive more humane treatment in the concert room it ought to be left to the tender mercies of the opera house. Ill advised tempi, distorted rhythms and a murkiness of tone which in the past was the last thing one would associate with the Philadelphia orchestra made of this performance a pretty discouraging affair.

An orchestra worthy the name—and what orchestra has borne a better name than that of the city on the Schuylkill?—deserves the uninterrupted ministrations of a competent trainer and conductor.

Last night's capacity audience accepted the concert with equanimity.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
MAR 23 1929

Boston Symphony.

The visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra to Providence for a concert in the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening at 8:15 will close this orchestra's Providence season.

Serge Koussevitzky has put, as the principal number on the programme, the Fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsky in E minor. This popular score has had an extraordinary reception under the Russian conductor's eloquent interpretation, as heard in Boston and other cities.

The first part of the programme will consist of a concerto for orchestra by Philip Emanuel Bach, which has been rescored by Maximilian Steinberg, the son-in-law of Rimsky-Korsakov. It contains a particularly beautiful andante, in which the melody is introduced by the English horn solo.

Wagner will be represented by the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the modern French, school by Paul Dukas' scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." This piece was inspired by the humorous ballad of Goethe, in which the sorcerer's boy succeeded in starting things by use of his master's magic incantations, but did not know enough to stop them. The results were humorously disastrous.

REDUCTION

RATIO

13x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
MAR 23 1929

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Major Orchestras and Their Conductors; Guests and the Lesson of the Bostonians Under Koussevitzky

WITH A MONTH of orchestral concerts remaining, it is still possible that some unpredictable circumstance will add yet another to the thirteen, fourteen, fifteen, sixteen or seventeen symphony conductors who have led orchestras in Manhattan's concert halls this season, the number depending on whether the Philharmonic-Symphony's children's concerts, the incidental appearance of a Philharmonic violinist in the role of dirigent at a Honegger concert and a program or two by the orchestras not of established place and reputation are included. Stopping at thirteen, however, it is to be noted that two organizations, the Philharmonic-Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra, contrived between them to make use of all but three of the total in their regular subscription concerts for adult symphony patrons in Carnegie Hall. The three whose distinction or misfortune it was to be otherwise associated were Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony, Nikolai Sokoloff of the Cleveland Orchestra and Georges Zaslawsky of the now impressively silent Beethoven Symphonists who six months ago were announcing largely expanded activities.

There may be some profit in checking the record with a view to corroborating the growing conviction that the guest system is a bad one for our foremost American orchestras, however much it may please conductors and the friends of conductors and ward off stalemate for listeners more concerned with personalities than with qualities of performance. Undoubtedly the most consistent good playing of the season has been that of the Boston Symphony under Mr. Koussevitzky. At its best it has played no better than the Philharmonic-Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra at their best. The Philadelphia Orchestra's first concert of the year, that which marked the return of Leopold Stokowski, and the concerts of the Philharmonic-Symphony under Mr. Toscanini, not to forget several really superb programs by Mr. Mengelberg, would leave this commentator without a choice in this very dubious matter of what is best among the best. But both the Philharmonic-Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra have sagged between their peaks of superb playing in a manner and to a degree that most certainly has not been true of the Boston visitors.

Granting the different personalities not only of the conductors but of the orchestras and the purely personal preference that any one listener may have for the Philadelphia or the Philharmonic tone, or for Mr. Toscanini's or Mr. Stokowski's particular results with a particular work, it must be admitted without question that the Koussevitzky-Boston standard has been a higher one than the Mengelberg-Damrosch-Reiner-Honegger-Gabrilowitsch-Toscanini standard of the Philharmonic-Symphony, or the Stokowski-Gabrilowitsch-Goossens-Kraus standard of the Philadelphians. It is not to be expected that the addition of Mr. Kraus to the Philharmonic list will perceptibly alter the average, for better or worse.

NOTHING has been more apparent during the season than that the superior achievements of Mr. Koussevitzky with the Boston band were the result not merely of one-man leadership this season but of one-man leadership in the preceding seasons. He did not accomplish his ends in his first year or his second in Boston, even without the interruptions and distractions of a divided command. Indeed, Mr. Koussevitzky's earlier seasons in Boston may be said, on the basis of the orchestra's playing in New York this year, to have been preparatory. At the close of last season there was a clear indication of what was to be. There were those who felt then that the Boston Symphony had "come back—all the way back"; though with a very different personality from that of the days when it was the basis of comparison for all American orchestras.

Even those who have most admired the Bostonians' performances this year would hesitate to put this orchestra ahead of the Philharmonic or the Philadelphia in basic quality; probably the most discriminating still would favor one or the other of the latter, or both, over Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestra, as an orchestra, and it is more than possible that they would in some measure agree that the potentialities of the present Philharmonic-Symphony under Toscanini or the present Philadelphia Orchestra under Stokowski are greater than those of the present Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky. Assuming this as so (and it would be rash not to admit that the assumption is open to attack from those who have become devout partisans of the Boston ensemble), the fact remains that the Boston Orchestra has played more consistently well in New York, this year, than its rivals. If it has done this without being clearly the best orchestra, the reason plainly is to be found in the circumstances surrounding its leadership.

Those who would be ready to argue that Mr. Koussevitzky is a superior conductor to Mr. Toscanini or Mr. Stokowski are probably fewer in New York than those who would argue the contrary. This is a hazardous subject, at best, shot through with personal preferences and prejudices that may hinge upon some such insignificant detail as the tempo of a single work or the conductor's particular way of holding the baton. Of the four chief conductors appearing in New York, surface indications of their popularity would appear to rank Mr. Toscanini first, Mr. Stokowski second, Mr. Koussevitzky third and Mr. Mengelberg fourth, but the correctness or this or the justness of it is about as provable as the relative beauty of as many fair women.

LITTLE ROOM for dispute exists, however, over the consistent and remarkable progress the Boston Symphony has made under Mr. Koussevitzky. There was as little for doubt last season with respect to the deterioration of the Philadelphia Orchestra in the absence of Mr. Stokowski. What had been built up there by the same process as that observed more latterly in Boston began to decline when the mainspring of this progress was temporarily detached. Nothing could have been more startling than the superb playing of the Philadelphia Orchestra when Mr. Stokowski returned to it last fall, in view of its inferior performance the year before under Mr. Reiner and Mr. Monteux. Subsequently, it relapsed into much the same condition as a year ago, when Mr. Stokowski passed it on to Mr. Gabrilowitsch. Mr. Goossens's single concert was a little better, that of Mr. Kraus was one of the most unsatisfactory New York has known from this orchestra. Given a similar situation in Boston, like results might be taken for granted.

As the superlative playing of the Philadelphia and the Boston Orchestras at their best this year is to be attributed in each instance to the hard work of a conductor in other years quite as much as to anything that conductor may have achieved in the current season, so it is only fair and logical to give Mr. Mengelberg the credit for much that is of the highest order in the playing of the Philharmonic-Symphony. His was the problem this year of fusing the new blood from the Symphony Society with the old Philharmonic men, and while the task may not have been so formidable a one as was assumed at the first of the season when the orchestra played a little uncouthly (for the Philharmonic) it must be said without equivocation that the ensemble was completely itself before Mr. Mengelberg departed. Such differences as individuals may find between Toscanini performances and Mengelberg performances are the differences between the two men. The orchestra has given both what they wanted, without stint and with a superb virtuosity. But the period of guesting between the departure of Mengelberg and the coming of Toscanini was another story. Mr. Reiner and Mr. Gabrilowitsch had much the same difficulties—or perhaps it should be said the orchestra had much the same deficiencies—as were only too evident in the Philadelphia orchestra concerts of these same guests.

Mr. Toscanini no doubt would give us marvelous concerts with either the Philadelphia or the Boston orchestra. If he were the sole conductor of any one of the three leading ensembles for a number of years he might surpass the present Philharmonic-Symphony concerts because of an organization as much more responsive to his genius as the present superb ensemble is when compared to his Scala orchestra. But such speculation is a little remote from the true situation.

New York could consider itself the most fortunate of cities if it could maintain a level not necessarily that of Toscanini's most conflagratory eloquence, but one that can be described as a Mengelberg-Stokowski-Koussevitzky-Toscanini level.

It is not likely to be content with less.

Serge Koussevitzky
Leads Final Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert in Providence This Season Next Tuesday Night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
MAR 24 1929

Mrs. Hoover Attends Boston Orchestra Concert

Mrs. Herbert Hoover made her first public appearance after the inauguration ceremonies on Wednesday afternoon, March 6, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra visited Washington to give a concert there, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The First Lady occupied a stage box. She was accompanied by her sister, Mrs. J. Large; the President's sister, Mrs. May Leavitt, of Long Beach, Cal., and her uncle, W. D. Henry, of North Dakota, all of whom were house guests at the White House.

"Appropriately enough," says the "Washington Post," "the principal feature of the program was the first presentation in Washington of 'America,' the epic 'rhapsody of Ernest' Bloch, a new symphony which won the musical America prize in 1928.

"Mrs. Hoover led the applause which followed the conclusion of the Rhapsody and did not leave her box until the conductor had bowed his acknowledgment of several distinct ovations."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE
MAR 24

Closing Symphony Program.

The visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence for a concert in the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening at 8:15, will close this orchestra's Providence season.

Serge Koussevitzky has put as the principal number on the program, the Fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsky in E-minor. This popular score has had an extraordinary reception under the Russian conductor's eloquent interpretation, as heard in Boston and other cities.

The first part of the program will consist of a concerto for orchestra by Philip Emanuel Bach, which has been re-scored by Maximilian Steinberg, the son-in-law of Rimsky-Korsakov. It contains a particularly beautiful Andante, in which the melody is introduced by the English horn solo.

Wagner will be represented by the prelude to "Lohengrin," and the modern French school by Paul Dukas's screrzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." This piece was inspired by the humorous ballad of Goethe, in which the Sorcerer's boy succeeded in starting things by use of his master's magic incantations, but did not know enough to stop them. The results were humorously disastrous.

Boston Symphony Will Present Popular Orchestral Music

WRITTEN FOR THE SUNDAY JOURNAL BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Save for the Concerto of Philipp Emanuel Bach as revised by Maximilian Steinberg, the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present in the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening is composed of familiar and, in the better sense, popular orchestral music. There is the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," Paul Dukas's brilliant and witty Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and the Fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsky.

Although he has been dead these thirty-five years, Tchaikovsky still stands too near to us to make possible a just balancing of his merits and defects as composer. His "Symphonie Pathetique" continues to fill a concert hall, but those whose self-assigned function it is to weigh such matters are not yet agreed as to whether or not this highly colored, somewhat morbid composition is to be accepted as a great work of art. The Fifth Symphony is, however, in somewhat different case. Less sensational, less hysterical than its successor, it can be appraised more coolly, with less danger of over-enthusiasm on the one hand or of unwarranted superciliousness on the other.

Whatever else may be said of him, Tchaikovsky was no bungler with his tools. Each of his last three symphonies was soundly constructed and in the matter of form the Fifth is not merely correct and substantial; it is original in its use of the same subject-matter in different movements. It is possible to accuse Tchaikovsky of writing tunes rather than themes in his symphonies. Yet this reproach is but slightly applicable to the chief subjects of the first and final movements of the Fifth Symphony, even if it does apply to thoses of the lush, sensuous and passionate Andante and of the charming waltz that serves in lieu of a scherzo.

In the case of the Fourth and the Sixth Symphonies Tchaikovsky admitted a program, and that of the former he described in detail in a letter written to his benefactress, Mrs. von Meck. Obviously the Fifth Symphony, too, has a meaning behind the tones. Some spiritual struggle and experience is here portrayed, nor is its general character too subtle or elusive to be guessed. For beginning to the Symphony comes a solemn, foreboding motto in the key of E minor, the chief tonality of the work. This fateful theme bursts angrily upon the songful ecstacies of the Andante and it sounds ominously in the final pages of the waltz, only to reappear at the end of the Finale in an heroically affirmative major. And with it comes, in similar transformation, the melancholy chief subject of the first movement.

Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach, son of the great Johann Sebastian Bach, occupies in music a position of more historical than actual importance. In matters of form he served as a model for Mozart and Haydn, and in the freedom of his harmony he forecast composers of an even later day. Little of his music has survived, but among his works are a few that have a message even for us of the twentieth century.

The Concerto to be played next Tuesday evening was heard by Mr. Koussevitzky at a concert in Paris, performed by a violin, quinton, viola d'amore, viola da gamba and bass viol. Much impressed with the music, Mr. Koussevitzky himself considered making an orchestral arrangement, but finally gave over that task to Maximilian Steinberg, a pupil of Rimsky-Korsakov. Mr. Steinberg's version is for flute, two oboes, bassoon, horn and strings. While undeniably attractive and not without distinction, the first and third movements of this Concerto are written in what might be styled a conventional eighteenth-century manner. In the slow movement, however, is to be found the greater, harmonically prophetic Emanuel Bach. This movement, at least as presented in Mr. Steinberg's instrumentation, might have been written a half-century later.

Not many pieces of program music can equal Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice" in successfully filling, at one and the same time, a delineative and a purely musical function. Based on the ballad of Goethe, this Scherzo tells in tones the story of the apprentice who had learned how to make a broom fetch water, but had forgotten the formula for commanding it to stop, and was saved from catastrophe only by the timely reappearance of his master. With a knowledge of the program the listener can hear in Dukas's music every detail of the story. Yet were such knowledge altogether lacking the piece would still make its appeal.

There is a programmatic idea, too, in the Prelude that Wagner wrote for his opera "Lohengrin." On the composer's own authority we are to hear in its pages the descent to earth of a company of angels bearing the Holy Grail and their subsequent ascension to the skies. This poetic idea Wagner has represented by the repetition of a single theme that occurs first in the ethereal reaches of divided violins and, descending lower and lower in the orchestra, each time with richer instrumentation, is finally proclaimed in a mighty climax by the brass choir.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
MAR 28 1929

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Rhode Island lovers of music will not fail to grasp the significance and importance of the announcement made by President Faunce of Brown University at the closing concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Providence on Tuesday evening. To those who have been devotees of the highest in music, given to the state by the great Boston orchestra through the years, it was somewhat startling to hear Dr. Faunce say that the fate of these concerts had been more than uncertain. A little more than a week ago it seemed certain that there would be no visits of the orchestra next year, but through the public spirit and helpful co-operation of Edward F. Albee the theatre which bears Mr. Albee's name will again be available next season.

This means that the concerts will be assured provided that further co-operation is extended by the public. The sum of $4000 remains to be subscribed, and it is certain that it will be furnished. Members of the audience on Tuesday night were reminded through a circular inserted in the programme books that in Boston a fund of $135,000 is being raised for a similar purpose. Rhode Island music lovers and citizens alive to the cultural needs of the state will not permit these concerts to lapse.

Under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky the orchestra has held its place among the foremost musical organizations in the world. It is recognized as one of the first four or five of such bodies, and there is high authority for the statement that it stands as the very first. Its splendid performances in Providence in this and past seasons have made for it such a host of friends that to lose its concerts would be to lose a valuable cultural asset.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
MAR 23 1929

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Major Orchestras and Their Conductors; Guests and the Lesson of the Bostonians Under Koussevitzky

WITH A MONTH of orchestral concerts remaining, it is still possible that some unpredictable circumstance will add yet another to the thirteen, fourteen, fifteen, sixteen or seventeen symphony conductors who have led orchestras in Manhattan's concert halls this season, the number depending on whether the Philharmonic-Symphony's children's concerts, the incidental appearance of a Philharmonic violinist in the role of dirigent at a Honegger concert and a program or two by the orchestras not of established place and reputation are included. Stopping at thirteen, however, it is to be noted that two organizations, the Philharmonic-Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra, contrived between them to make use of all but three of the total in their regular subscription concerts for adult symphony patrons in Carnegie Hall. The three whose distinction or misfortune it was to be otherwise associated were Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony, Nikolai Sokoloff of the Cleveland Orchestra and Georges Zaslawsky of the now impressively silent Beethoven Symphonists who six months ago were announcing largely expanded activities.

There may be some profit in checking the record with a view to corroborating the growing conviction that the guest system is a bad one for our foremost American orchestras, however much it may please conductors and the friends of conductors and ward off stalemate for listeners more concerned with personalities than with qualities of performance. Undoubtedly the most consistent good playing of the season has been that of the Boston Symphony under Mr. Koussevitzky. At its best it has played no better than the Philharmonic-Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra at their best. The Philadelphia Orchestra's first concert of the year, that which marked the return of Leopold Stokowski, and the concerts of the Philharmonic-Symphony under Mr. Toscanini, not to forget several really superb programs by Mr. Mengelberg, would leave this commentator without a choice in this very dubious matter of what is best among the best. But both the Philharmonic-Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra have sagged between their peaks of superb playing in a manner and to a degree that most certainly has not been true of the Boston visitors.

Granting the different personalities not only of the conductors but of the orchestras and the purely personal preference that any one listener may have for the Philadelphia or the Philharmonic tone, or for Mr. Toscanini's or Mr. Stokowski's particular results with a particular work, it must be admitted without question that the Koussevitzky-Boston standard has been a higher one than the Mengelberg-Damrosch-Reiner-Honegger-Gabrilowitsch-Toscanini standard of the Philharmonic-Symphony, or the Stokowski-Gabrilowitsch-Goossens-Kraus standard of the Philadelphians. It is not to be expected that the addition of Mr. Kraus to the Philharmonic list will perceptibly alter the average, for better or worse.

NOTHING has been more apparent during the season than that the superior achievements of Mr. Koussevitzky with the Boston band were the result not merely of one-man leadership this season but of one-man leadership in the preceding seasons. He did not accomplish his ends in his first year or his second in Boston, even without the interruptions and distractions of a divided command. Indeed, Mr. Koussevitzky's earlier seasons in Boston may be said, on the basis of the orchestra's playing in New York this year, to have been preparatory. At the close of last season there was a clear indication of what was to be. There were those who felt then that the Boston Symphony had "come back—all the way back"; though with a very different personality from that of the days when it was the basis of comparison for all American orchestras.

Even those who have most admired the Bostonians' performances this year would hesitate to put this orchestra ahead of the Philharmonic or the Philadelphia in basic quality; probably the most discriminating still would favor one or the other of the latter, or both, over Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestra, as an orchestra, and it is more than possible that they would in some measure agree that the potentialities of the present Philharmonic-Symphony under Toscanini or the present Philadelphia Orchestra under Stokowski are greater than those of the present Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky. Assuming this as so (and it would be rash not to admit that the assumption is open to attack from those who have become devout partisans of the Boston ensemble), the fact remains that the Boston Orchestra has played more consistently well in New York, this year, than its rivals. If it has done this without being clearly the best orchestra, the reason plainly is to be found in the circumstances surrounding its leadership.

Those who would be ready to argue that Mr. Koussevitzky is a superior conductor to Mr. Toscanini or Mr. Stokowski are probably fewer in New York than those who would argue the contrary. This is a hazardous subject, at best, shot through with personal preferences and prejudices that may hinge upon some such insignificant detail as the tempo of a single work or the conductor's particular way of holding the baton. Of the four chief conductors appearing in New York, surface indications of their popularity would appear to rank Mr. Toscanini first, Mr. Stokowski second, Mr. Koussevitzky third and Mr. Mengelberg fourth, but the correctness or this or the justness of it is about as provable as the relative beauty of as many fair women.

LITTLE ROOM for dispute exists, however, over the consistent and remarkable progress the Boston Symphony has made under Mr. Koussevitzky. There was as little for doubt last season with respect to the deterioration of the Philadelphia Orchestra in the absence of Mr. Stokowski. What had been built up there by the same process as that observed more latterly in Boston began to decline when the mainspring of this progress was temporarily detached. Nothing could have been more startling than the superb playing of the Philadelphia Orchestra when Mr. Stokowski returned to it last fall, in view of its inferior performance the year before under Mr. Reiner and Mr. Monteux. Subsequently, it relapsed into much the same condition as a year ago, when Mr. Stokowski passed it on to Mr. Gabrilowitsch. Mr. Goossens's single concert was a little better, that of Mr. Kraus was one of the most unsatisfactory New York has known from this orchestra. Given a similar situation in Boston, like results might be taken for granted.

As the superlative playing of the Philadelphia and the Boston Orchestras at their best this year is to be attributed in each instance to the hard work of a conductor in other years quite as much as to anything that conductor may have achieved in the current season, so it is only fair and logical to give Mr. Mengelberg the credit for much that is of the highest order in the playing of the Philharmonic-Symphony. His was the problem this year of fusing the new blood from the Symphony Society with the old Philharmonic men, and while the task may not have been so formidable a one as was assumed at the first of the season when the orchestra played a little uncouthly (for the Philharmonic) it must be said without equivocation that the ensemble was completely itself before Mr. Mengelberg departed. Such differences as individuals may find between Toscanini performances and Mengelberg performances are the differences between the two men. The orchestra has given both what they wanted, without stint and with a superb virtuosity. But the period of guesting between the departure of Mengelberg and the coming of Toscanini was another story. Mr. Reiner and Mr. Gabrilowitsch had much the same difficulties—or perhaps it should be said the orchestra had much the same deficiencies—as were only too evident in the Philadelphia orchestra concerts of these same guests.

Mr. Toscanini no doubt would give us marvelous concerts with either the Philadelphia or the Boston orchestra. If he were the sole conductor of any one of the three leading ensembles for a number of years he might surpass the present Philharmonic-Symphony concerts because of an organization as much more responsive to his genius as the present superb ensemble is when compared to his Scala orchestra. But such speculation is a little remote from the true situation.

New York could consider itself the most fortunate of cities if it could maintain a level not necessarily that of Toscanini's most conflagratory eloquence, but one that can be described as a Mengelberg-Stokowski-Koussevitzky-Toscanini level.

It is not likely to be content with less.

Serge Koussevitzky
Leads Final Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert in Providence This Season Next Tuesday Night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
MAR 24 1929

Mrs. Hoover Attends Boston Orchestra Concert

Mrs. Herbert Hoover made her first public appearance after the inauguration ceremonies on Wednesday afternoon, March 6, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra visited Washington to give a concert there, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The First Lady occupied a stage box. She was accompanied by her sister, Mrs. J. Large; the President's sister, Mrs. May Leavitt, of Long Beach, Cal., and her uncle, W. D. Henry, of North Dakota, all of whom were house guests at the White House.

"Appropriately enough," says the "Washington Post," "the principal feature of the program was the first presentation in Washington of 'America,' the epic 'rhapsody of Ernest' Bloch, a new symphony which won the musical America prize in 1928.

"Mrs. Hoover led the applause which followed the conclusion of the Rhapsody and did not leave her box until the conductor had bowed his acknowledgment of several distinct ovations."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

Closing Symphony Program.

The visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence for a concert in the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening at 8:15, will close this orchestra's Providence season.

Serge Koussevitzky has put as the principal number on the program, the Fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsky in E minor. This popular score has had an extraordinary reception under the Russian conductor's eloquent interpretation, as heard in Boston and other cities.

The first part of the program will consist of a concerto for orchestra by Philip Emanuel Bach, which has been re-scored by Maximilian Steinberg, the son-in-law of Rimsky-Korsakov. It contains a particularll beautiful Andante, in which the melody is introduced by the English horn solo.

Wagner will be represented by the prelude to "Lohengrin," and the modern French school by Paul Dukas's screrzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." This piece was inspired by the humorous ballad of Goethe, in which the Sorcerer's boy succeeded in starting things by use of his master's magic incantations, but did not know enough to stop them. The results were humorously disastrous.

Boston Symphony Will Present Popular Orchestral Music

WRITTEN FOR THE SUNDAY JOURNAL BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Save for the Concerto of Philipp Emanuel Bach as revised by Maximilian Steinberg, the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present in the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening is composed of familiar and, in the better sense, popular orchestral music. There is the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," Paul Dukas's brilliant and witty Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and the Fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsky.

Although he has been dead these thirty-five years, Tchaikovsky still stands too near to us to make possible a just balancing of his merits and defects as composer. His "Symphonie Pathetique" continues to fill a concert hall, but those whose self-assigned function it is to weigh such matters are not yet agreed as to whether or not this highly colored, somewhat morbid composition is to be accepted as a great work of art. The Fifth Symphony is, however, in somewhat different case. Less sensational, less hysterical than its successor, it can be appraised more coolly, with less danger of over-enthusiasm on the one hand or of unwarranted superciliousness on the other.

Whatever else may be said of him, Tchaikovsky was no bungler with his tools. Each of his last three symphonies was soundly constructed and in the matter of form the Fifth is not merely correct and substantial; it is original in its use of the same subject-matter in different movements. It is possible to accuse Tchaikovsky of writing tunes rather than themes in his symphonies. Yet this reproach is but slightly applicable to the chief subjects of the first and final movements of the Fifth Symphony, even if it does apply to thoses of the lush, sensuous and passionate Andante and of the charming waltz that serves in lieu of a scherzo.

In the case of the Fourth and the Sixth Symphonies Tchaikovsky admitted a program, and that of the former he described in detail in a letter written to his benefactress, Mrs. von Meck. Obviously the Fifth Symphony, too, has a meaning behind the tones. Some spiritual struggle and experience is here portrayed, nor is its general character too subtle or elusive to be guessed. For beginning to the Symphony comes a solemn, foreboding motto in the key of E minor, the chief tonality of the work. This fateful theme bursts angrily upon the songful ecstacies of the Andante and it sounds ominously in the final pages of the waltz, only to reappear at the end of the Finale in an heroically affirmative major. And with it comes, in similar transformation, the melancholy chief subject of the first movement.

Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach, son of the great Johann Sebastian Bach, occupies in music a position of more historical than actual importance. In matters of form he served as a model for Mozart and Haydn, and in the freedom of his harmony he forecast composers of an even later day. Little of his music has survived, but among his works are a few that have a message even for us of the twentieth century.

The Concerto to be played next Tuesday evening was heard by Mr. Koussevitzky at a concert in Paris, performed by a violin, quinton, viola d'amore, viola da gamba and bass viol. Much impressed with the music, Mr. Koussevitzky himself considered making an orchestral arrangement, but finally gave over that task to Maximilian Steinberg, a pupil of Rimsky-Korsakov. Mr. Steinberg's version is for flute, two oboes, bassoon, horn and strings. While undeniably attractive and not without distinction, the first and third movements of this Concerto are written in what might be styled a conventional eighteenth-century manner. In the slow movement, however, is to be found the greater, harmonically prophetic Emanuel Bach. This movement, at least as presented in Mr. Steinberg's instrumentation, might have been written a half-century later.

Not many pieces of program music can equal Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice" in successfully filling, at one and the same time, a delineative and a purely musical function. Based on the ballad of Goethe, this Scherzo tells in tones the story of the apprentice who had learned how to make a broom fetch water, but had forgotten the formula for commanding it to stop, and was saved from catastrophe only by the timely reappearance of his master. With a knowledge of the program the listener can hear in Dukas's music every detail of the story. Yet were such knowledge altogether lacking the piece would still make its appeal.

There is a programmatic idea, too, in the Prelude that Wagner wrote for his opera "Lohengrin." On the composer's own authority we are to hear in its pages the descent to earth of a company of angels bearing the Holy Grail and their subsequent ascension to the skies. This poetic idea Wagner has represented by the repetition of a single theme that occurs first in the ethereal reaches of divided violins and, descending lower and lower in the orchestra, each time with richer instrumentation, is finally proclaimed in a mighty climax by the brass choir.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
MAR 28 1929

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Rhode Island lovers of music will not fail to grasp the significance and importance of the announcement made by President Faunce of Brown University at the closing concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Providence on Tuesday evening. To those who have been devotees of the highest in music, given to the state by the great Boston orchestra through the years, it was somewhat startling to hear Dr. Faunce say that the fate of these concerts had been more than uncertain. A little more than a week ago it seemed certain that there would be no visits of the orchestra next year, but through the public spirit and helpful co-operation of Edward F. Albee the theatre which bears Mr. Albee's name will again be available next season.

This means that the concerts will be assured provided that further co-operation is extended by the public. The sum of $4000 remains to be subscribed, and it is certain that it will be furnished. Members of the audience on Tuesday night were reminded through a circular inserted in the programme books that in Boston a fund of $135,000 is being raised for a similar purpose. Rhode Island music lovers and citizens alive to the cultural needs of the state will not permit these concerts to lapse.

Under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky the orchestra has held its place among the foremost musical organizations in the world. It is recognized as one of the first four or five of such bodies, and there is high authority for the statement that it stands as the very first. Its splendid performances in Providence in this and past seasons have made for it such a host of friends that to lose its concerts would be to lose a valuable cultural asset.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

2.0

2.2

2.5

2.8

3.2

3.6

4.0

4.5

5.0

5.6

6.3

7.1

8.0

9.0

10.0

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

136

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAM
MAR 28 1929

BEETHOVEN'S NINTH SYMPHONY BY BOSTONIANS AT CARNEGIE

Serge Koussevitzky and His Orchestra Will Give Renowned Masterpiece Here with the Aid of the Choir of the Schola Cantorum of New York.

By PITTS SANBORN.

FOR the first time in many years of annual series of concerts in New York the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give here Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Two performances are projected—on Thursday evening, April 11, and on Saturday afternoon, April 13, both in Carnegie Hall.

Serge Koussevitzky will, of course, conduct, and the assisting chorus will be that of the Schola Cantorum of New York. The names of the quartet of soloists are still to be announced.

OPENING TONIGHT

SECURITY (Maxine Elliott)—Lee Shubert presents Margaret Anglin in a play by [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR 28 [illegible]

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

It would be a public misfortune if the Boston Symphony were to omit its regular visits to Providence in 1930.

For many years this premier organization has been coming to this city, and, as a result, not only has our sum total of musical knowledge and attainment been increased, but there has been a general enlargement of our cultural outlook. This is one of the happy effects of artistic or intellectual progress along any one line—we are stimulated to excursions along other cultural paths as well.

Boston, which hears the Symphony 65 times in a season, is taking steps to complete a fund of $132,000 for the continuation of that privilege; we in Providence are asked to pledge the small sum of $4000 to insure the coming of these fine musicians to this city five times next fall, winter and spring. The needed amount should be given at once and willingly.

It used to be said that "Providence is not a musical city." If that was ever true it is true no longer. Every Boston Symphony concert nowadays packs the Albee Theatre, with its seating capacity of 2400, and on Tuesday evening many lovers of music stood at the rear of the house. Mr. Albee has agreed to permit the Symphony to appear in the theatre again next season, and it would be highly unfortunate if the opportunity were neglected. But we do not believe it will be neglected; there are too many people in Providence who depend upon this exceptional group of musicians to help them keep in touch with the best that has been produced in symphonic music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS
MAR 27 1929

$4000 Sought to Insure Symphony Concerts in 1930

Efforts are being made by the Providence Music Association to raise $4000 to insure the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here next season. The use of the Albee Theatre has again been obtained.

While at one time it looked as though this city would be without concerts next year, Dr. William H. P. Faunce, honorary president of the Music Association, last night assured those present at the concert that Dr. Koussevitzky would bring back his musicians if $4000 were guaranteed to underwrite the series.

A written appeal was enclosed in each program. The statement accompanying the subscription blanks was made for the association by these officers in addition to Dr. Faunce: Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, president; William S. Innis, vice president; Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer; Hugh F. MacColl, secretary, and Berrick Schloss, assistant secretary and manager.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR 27 1929

Finale: the Symphony Ends Its Year

Promising a Return Next Winter, Koussevitzky Gives Us The Rare Legerdemain Of Dukas And The Tchaikovsky E-Minor And Leaves Us

Those who prefer straight forward music played with great zest, fared better than usual at the Albee Theatre last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, played its fourth and last concert of the season. For the program was, in great part, a solid one, made up of representative works of great composers, and played with lightness of heart and sureness of touch.

In fact much of its work had the finish of its New York performances, when it goes out to show the great City's orchestras how such things should be done. The strings were in particularly fine mood: the silken shimmer of the violins, the sombre pathos of the violas, the gleaming unction of the 'cellos, and the callipered profundity of the basses, were all of the very first order; while the double reeds carried their unusual burdens with a certainty born of power and a faultless sense of direction.

The bassoon in particular showed what a versatile instrument he is when he sang the cold sinister song in the "Sorcier" and repeated it almost verbally in the first movement of the Symphony, where he lifted it from a mock heroic travesty to an eminence of pure nobility. And the horn, too, made himself a high place among the players; if we have ever heard it sing with a more finished phrase or more delightful utterance, we cannot recall the place nor the time.

The Bach Concerto

Dr. Koussevitzky played the Bach concerto as though he liked it, and we all agree; but just how near the performance represented the idea of the composer we shall probably never know. The Society of Ancient Instruments, who introduced the composition to Dr. Koussevitzky, might have enlightened us, but it did not, so we can but stake our faith on Mr. Steinberg's arrangement and the conductor's interpretation. The flute, two oboes, bassoon, and horn can doubtless do much for a string composition for good or ill; and in this case it is well to assume that it was good.

The first movement, rotund and rolling, was introduced by the strings in strophic form, and the wind followed with the antistrophe. The lovely counterpoint, the smooth, definite violins, that seemed at times to be whispering the theme to the oboes, as though they were prompting them, and the whole a moving narrative, all showed Bach the son of his sire.

The Andante made even more use of the wind. It is a work of great power, featuring the 'cellos and violas, sweeping on with the lapse and surge of the sea, the flute and oboe calling across the swell of the strings like mournful birds in the shifting lights.

The third movement showed, like a Greek tragedy, the superiority of the old forms, where there lies a depth and significance that all the froth and elaborate embellishment of the modern can never displace. And when the end comes, it is final; Bach finished his piece and stopped then and there. But Tchaikovsky, although he wanted to sit down and weep by the waters of Babylon, had to look long before he could find a stone soft enough for a seat.

Wagner's prelude to "Lohengren," after a not very comfortable beginning, went on serenely enough, the upper strings making a fine substitution for the voices of angels, and so lacking in human emotion. The glow and the coruscation of light, that both Karl Muck and Anton Seidl felt that Wagner demanded, were somewhat dim. There was also less of the reverent air—the call to the profane to keep back—than one expects to feel in this number. But if applause is the proof of the efficacy of the performance, then this number deserved to bear off the palm.

In Praise of Dukas.

Constant Lambert has said that "there are so many composers of today whose lack of style is only equalled by their monstrous fluency that one is more than ever grateful for a man like Dukas, who has produced a few works only, but those few marked by an extraordinary finish and precision of workmanship. Though clearly not a great master, Dukas will probably live long through one or two exquisitely wrought works like L'Apprenti Sorcier."

A translation of Goethe's poem in the program notes gave the curious an opportunity to know what was going on throughout the piece. The long introduction seems to be a creation of the musician, who tried to project ahead of the action the wonder and excitement of a boy who was going to make the ghosts obey his will also. The Hexenmeister theme was strongly marked, and through the music ran the shrill resentful cry of the spirits, indignant at having to serve an underling of the master.

The translation misses the onomatopoetic effect of the German too often to be of any great help in bringing forward the pictures. "Walle, Walle," is not quite "Wander, wander." Getting a little closer to the incantation, we might say

"Boil and bubble.
Streamlets herpous,
With a purpose
Wildly roaring,
With a bounteous surging double
Onward to the bath a-pouring."

There was a little less of the terror of the boy in the music than one would [illegible] the pauses seemed more nu[illegible] the ballad demands. But [illegible] piece of program music with [illegible] instrumentation and a great [illegible] effect, even if that is mock [illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

C. P. E. Bach—
Concerto for Orchestra in D-major. (Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg.)
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante lento molto.
III. Allegro.
Wagner.....Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Dukas..."L'Apprenti Sorcier," scherzo (after a ballad by Goethe)

Tchaikovsky—
Symhony No. 5 in E-minor, Op 64.
I. Andante.
II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
III. Valse (Allegro moderato)
IV. Finale: Andante maestoso, Allegro vivace.

man for what he had done, by showing him what a noble and tender theme he had taken to make ridiculous. Possibly Dukas had no such idea, but many who heard the two compositions must have been struck by the ridiculous and the sublime, their proximity—and the triumph of the latter and the humiliation of the former.

But apart from that, the Symphony was shown to be a remarkable work and the playing was no less remarkable. There were flashes of real divinity across its pages—religious themes perhaps, or super-sensuous ecstasy of some sort. The wonderful organ effects of the second movement competed with the horn, and the 'cellos entered the competition a little later with a tone like thick incense going upward to the god of things as they are. When the violins repeated the air of the 'cellos, playing it on the G string, they showed their inability at once to compete. The 'cello glow became a vitreous glitter.

Tschaikovsky brings out in the third movement his great humanity; he portrays men as they are, their hope, and at last their despair. Bach on the other hand paints mankind as it will be when men are like gods.

M. C. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
MAR 27 1929

Dr. Faunce Announces Symphony Fund Drive

PROVIDENCE, March 27—Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, honorary president of the Music Association, announced a campaign to raise $4000 to insure Boston Symphony concerts next year at [illegible]ncert of the orchestra in the Albee Theatre last night.

If the fund is raised, the concerts will be given in the Albee Theatre, due to the public spirit manifested by Edward F. Albee, owner of the theatre, who notified Dr. Faunce that the theatre will suspend regular programmes on concert nights.

Dr. Faunce announced that checks may be mailed to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., Box 1536, Providence.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS
MAR

THE SYMPHONY FUND

Dr. Faunce's appeal, made last night, for a fund of $4000 to guarantee the appearances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city next season should be speedily answered by the people of Providence. Nor have we any doubt that it will be so answered. Well-to-do citizens of Providence are not, as a matter of fact, asked to do very much each year for the arts, and it would be a civic disgrace if any real difficulty were encountered in raising the Symphony guarantee fund.

There has been considerable doubt as to whether the Symphony would come here next year. For several reasons, those who control the famous organization were opposed to playing in Infantry Hall. In fact we understand that the Music Association was given the alternative of either procuring the Albee Theatre again or dropping the Symphony for a year. Fortunately the association, through Dr. Faunce, has again been generously treated by Mr. E. F. Albee, and the concerts next year will be given in his leading playhouse. There is still some doubt as to when the new Masonic Hall will be finished; it is to have an auditorium that will provide ample seating room for the largest audience likely to attend the concerts.

This problem of securing a suitable auditorium again forces on our attention the lack of wisdom which determined the nature of the war memorial. Some $300,000 has been expended on a memorial that is, and always will be, an eyesore. That money might well have gone toward the building of a beautiful memorial hall which would have included an auditorium where the arts of civilization would be fostered.

However, there is no use crying over spilt milk or spent millions. The thing needed now is help for the Symphony Fund. We hope that within forty-eight hours, as Dr. Faunce asked, the large and the small guarantor will come forward and make available the $4000 sought. This is really very little for the Symphony to ask; in Boston itself the citizens are asked to guarantee about twice as much per concert as we are asked to guarantee; moreover they have to pay more for their tickets at the box office. All guarantees should be sent to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., Box 1536, Providence.

THE SOUTHERN REPUBLICANS

136

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAM

BEETHOVEN'S NINTH SYMPHONY BY BOSTONIANS AT CARNEGIE

Serge Koussevitzky and His Orchestra Will Give Renowned Masterpiece Here with the Aid of the Choir of the Schola Cantorum of New York.

By PITTS SANBORN.

FOR the first time in many years of annual series of concerts in New York the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give here Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Two performances are projected—on Thursday evening, April 11, and on Saturday afternoon, April 13, both in Carnegie Hall.

Serge Koussevitzky will, of course, conduct, and the assisting chorus will be that of the Schola Cantorum of New York. The names of the quartet of soloists are still to be announced.

OPENING TONIGHT

SECURITY (Maxine Elliott)—Lee Shubert presents Margaret Anglin in a play by [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR 27

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

It would be a public misfortune if the Boston Symphony were to omit its regular visits to Providence in 1930.

For many years this premier organization has been coming to this city, and, as a result, not only has our sum total of musical knowledge and attainment been increased, but there has been a general enlargement of our cultural outlook. This is one of the happy effects of artistic or intellectual progress along any one line—we are stimulated to excursions along other cultural paths as well.

Boston, which hears the Symphony 65 times in a season, is taking steps to complete a fund of $132,000 for the continuation of that privilege; we in Providence are asked to pledge the small sum of $4000 to insure the coming of these fine musicians to this city five times next fall, winter and spring. The needed amount should be given at once and willingly.

It used to be said that "Providence is not a musical city." If that was ever true it is true no longer. Every Boston Symphony concert nowadays packs the Albee Theatre, with its seating capacity of 2400, and on Tuesday evening many lovers of music stood at the rear of the house. Mr. Albee has agreed to permit the Symphony to appear in the theatre again next season, and it would be highly unfortunate if the opportunity were neglected. But we do not believe it will be neglected; there are too many people in Providence who depend upon this exceptional group of musicians to help them keep in touch with the best that has been produced in symphonic music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS

$4000 Sought to Insure Symphony Concerts in 1930

Efforts are being made by the Providence Music Association to raise $4000 to insure the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here next season. The use of the Albee Theatre has again been obtained.

While at one time it looked as though this city would be without concerts next year, Dr. William H. P. Faunce, honorary president of the Music Association, last night assured those present at the concert that Dr. Koussevitzky would bring back his musicians if $4000 were guaranteed to underwrite the series.

A written appeal was enclosed in each program. The statement accompanying the subscription blanks was made for the association by these officers in addition to Dr. Faunce: Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, president; William S. Innis, vice president; Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer; Hugh F. MacColl, secretary, and Berrick Schloss, assistant secretary and manager.

Finale: the Symphony Ends Its Year

Promising a Return Next Winter, Koussevitzky Gives Us The Rare Legerdemain Of Dukas And The Tchaikovsky E-Minor And Leaves Us

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR 27 1929

Those who prefer straight forward music played with great zest, fared better than usual at the Albee Theatre last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, played its fourth and last concert of the season. For the program was, in great part, a solid one, made up of representative works of great composers, and played with lightness of heart and sureness of touch.

In fact much of its work had the finish of its New York performances, when it goes out to show the great City's orchestras how such things should be done. The strings were in particularly fine mood: the silken shimmer of the violins, the sombre pathos of the violas, the gleaming unction of the 'cellos, and the callipered profundity of the basses, were all of the very first order; while the double reeds carried their unusual burdens with a certainty born of power and a faultless sense of direction.

The bassoon in particular showed what a versatile instrument he is when he sang the cold sinister song in the "Sorcier" and repeated it almost verbally in the first movement of the Symphony, where he lifted it from a mock heroic travesty to an eminence of pure nobility. And the horn, too, made himself a high place among the players; if we have ever heard it sing with a more finished phrase or more delightful utterance, we cannot recall the place nor the time.

The Bach Concerto

Dr. Koussevitzky played the Bach concerto as though he liked it, and we all agree; but just how near the performance represented the idea of the composer we shall probably never know. The Society of Ancient Instruments, who introduced the composition to Dr. Koussevitzky, might have enlightened us, but it did not, so we can but stake our faith on Mr. Steinberg's arrangement and the conductor's interpretation. The flute, two oboes, bassoon, and horn can doubtless do much for a string composition for good or ill; and in this case it is well to assume that it was good.

The first movement, rotund and rolling, was introduced by the strings in strophic form, and the wind followed with the antistrophe. The lovely counterpoint, the smooth, definite violins, that seemed at times to be whispering the theme to the oboes, as though they were prompting them, and the whole a moving narrative, all showed Bach the son of his sire.

The Andante made even more use of the wind. It is a work of great power, featuring the 'cellos and violas, sweeping on with the lapse and surge of the sea, the flute and oboe calling across the swell of the strings like mournful birds in the shifting lights.

The third movement showed, like a Greek tragedy, the superiority of the old forms, where there lies a depth and significance that all the froth and elaborate embellishment of the modern can never displace. And when the end comes, it is final; Bach finished his piece and stopped then and there. But Tchaikovsky, although he wanted to sit down and weep by the waters of Babylon, had to look long before he could find a stone soft enough for a seat.

Wagner's prelude to "Lohengren," after a not very comfortable beginning, went on serenely enough, the upper strings making a fine substitution for the voices of angels, and so lacking in human emotion. The glow and the coruscation of light, that both Karl Muck and Anton Seidl felt that Wagner demanded, were somewhat dim. There was also less of the reverent air—the call to the profane to keep back—than one expects to feel in this number. But if applause is the proof of the efficacy of the performance, then this number deserved to bear off the palm.

In Praise of Dukas.

Constant Lambert has said that "there are so many composers of today whose lack of style is only equalled by their monstrous fluency that one is more than ever grateful for a man like Dukas, who has produced a few works only, but those few marked by an extraordinary finish and precision of workmanship. Though clearly not a great master, Dukas will probably live long through one or two exquisitely wrought works like L'Apprenti Sorcier."

A translation of Goethe's poem in the program notes gave the curious an opportunity to know what was going on throughout the piece. The long introduction seems to be a creation of the musician, who tried to project ahead of the action the wonder and excitement of a boy who was going to make the ghosts obey his will also. The Hexenmeister theme was strongly marked, and through the music ran the shrill resentful cry of the spirits, indignant at having to serve an underling of the master.

The translation misses the onomatopoetic effect of the German too often to be of any great help in bringing forward the pictures. "Walle, Walle," is not quite "Wander, wander." Getting a little closer to the incantation, we might say

"Boil and bubble.
Streamlets herpous,
With a purpose
Wildly rearing,
With a bounteous surging double
Onward to the bath a-pouring."

There was a little less of the terror of the boy in the music than one would [illegible] and the pauses seemed more numerous than the ballad demands. But [illegible] piece of program music with [illegible] instrumentation and a great [illegible] effect, even if that is mock

Ridiculous and Sublime

[illegible] some strange turn of chance, [illegible]derful Tchaikovsky Symphony [illegible]cely got under way when that [illegible] turned up. It seemed that [illegible] was reproving the French-

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

C. P. E. Bach—
Concerto for Orchestra in D-major. (Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg.)
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante lento molto.
III. Allegro.
Wagner.....Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Dukas.."L'Apprenti Sorcier," scherzo (after a ballad by Goethe)

Tchaikovsky—
Symhony No. 5 in E-minor, Op 64.
I. Andante.
II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
III. Valse (Allegro moderato)
IV. Finale: Andante maestoso, Allegro vivace.

man for what he had done, by showing him what a noble and tender theme he had taken to make ridiculous. Possibly Dukas had no such idea, but many who heard the two compositions must have been struck by the ridiculous and the sublime, their proximity—and the triumph of the latter and the humiliation of the former.

But apart from that, the Symphony was shown to be a remarkable work and the playing was no less remarkable. There were flashes of real divinity across its pages—religious themes perhaps, or super-sensuous ecstasy of some sort. The wonderful organ effects of the second movement competed with the horn, and the 'cellos entered the competition a little later with a tone like thick incense going upward to the god of things as they are. When the violins repeated the air of the 'cellos, playing it on the G string, they showed their inability at once to compete. The 'cello glow became a vitreous glitter.

Tschaikovsky brings out in the third movement his great humanity; he portrays men as they are, their hope, and at last their despair. Bach on the other hand paints mankind as it will be when men are like gods.

M. C. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
MAR 27 1929

Dr. Faunce Announces Symphony Fund Drive

PROVIDENCE, March 27—Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, honorary president of the Music Association, announced a campaign to raise $4000 to insure Boston Symphony concerts next year at the final concert of the orchestra in the Albee Theatre last night.

If the fund is raised, the concerts will be given in the Albee Theatre, due to the public spirit manifested by Edward F. Albee, owner of the theatre, who notified Dr. Faunce that the theatre will suspend regular programmes on concert nights.

Dr. Faunce announced that checks may be mailed to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., Box 1536, Providence.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS
MAR

THE SYMPHONY FUND

Dr. Faunce's appeal, made last night, for a fund of $4000 to guarantee the appearances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city next season should be speedily answered by the people of Providence. Nor have we any doubt that it will be so answered. Well-to-do citizens of Providence are not, as a matter of fact, asked to do very much each year for the arts, and it would be a civic disgrace if any real difficulty were encountered in raising the Symphony guarantee fund.

There has been considerable doubt as to whether the Symphony would come here next year. For several reasons, those who control the famous organization were opposed to playing in Infantry Hall. In fact we understand that the Music Association was given the alternative of either procuring the Albee Theatre again or dropping the Symphony for a year. Fortunately the association, through Dr. Faunce, has again been generously treated by Mr. E. F. Albee, and the concerts next year will be given in his leading playhouse. There is still some doubt as to when the new Masonic Hall will be finished; it is to have an auditorium that will provide ample seating room for the largest audience likely to attend the concerts.

This problem of securing a suitable auditorium again forces on our attention the lack of wisdom which determined the nature of the war memorial. Some $300,000 has been expended on a memorial that is, and always will be, an eyesore. That money might well have gone toward the building of a beautiful memorial hall which would have included an auditorium where the arts of civilization would be fostered.

However, there is no use crying over spilt milk or spent millions. The thing needed now is help for the Symphony Fund. We hope that within forty-eight hours, as Dr. Faunce asked, the large and the small guarantor will come forward and make available the $4000 sought. This is really very little for the Symphony to ask; in Boston itself the citizens are asked to guarantee about twice as much per concert as we are asked to guarantee; moreover they have to pay more for their tickets at the box office. All guarantees should be sent to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., Box 1536, Providence.

THE SOUTHERN REPUBLICANS

136

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TELEGRAM

BEETHOVEN'S NINTH SYMPHONY BY BOSTONIANS AT CARNEGIE

Serge Koussevitzky and His Orchestra Will Give Renowned Masterpiece Here with the Aid of the Choir of the Schola Cantorum of New York.

By PITTS SANBORN.

FOR the first time in many years of annual series of concerts in New York the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give here Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Two performances are projected—on Thursday evening, April 11, and on Saturday afternoon, April 13, both in Carnegie Hall.

Serge Koussevitzky will, of course, conduct, and the assisting chorus will be that of the Schola Cantorum of New York. The names of the quartet of soloists are still to be announced.

OPENING TONIGHT

SECURITY (Maxine Elliott)—Lee Shubert presents Margaret Anglin in a play by [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR [illegible]

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

It would be a public misfortune if the Boston Symphony were to omit its regular visits to Providence in 1930.

For many years this premier organization has been coming to this city, and, as a result, not only has our sum total of musical knowledge and attainment been increased, but there has been a general enlargement of our cultural outlook. This is one of the happy effects of artistic or intellectual progress along any one line—we are stimulated to excursions along other cultural paths as well.

Boston, which hears the Symphony 65 times in a season, is taking steps to complete a fund of $132,000 for the continuation of that privilege; we in Providence are asked to pledge the small sum of $4000 to insure the coming of these fine musicians to this city five times next fall, winter and spring. The needed amount should be given at once and willingly.

It used to be said that "Providence is not a musical city." If that was ever true it is true no longer. Every Boston Symphony concert nowadays packs the Albee Theatre, with its seating capacity of 2400, and on Tuesday evening many lovers of music stood at the rear of the house. Mr. Albee has agreed to permit the Symphony to appear in the theatre again next season, and it would be highly unfortunate if the opportunity were neglected. But we do not believe it will be neglected; there are too many people in Providence who depend upon this exceptional group of musicians to help them keep in touch with the best that has been produced in symphonic music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS

$4000 Sought to Insure Symphony Concerts in 1930

Efforts are being made by the Providence Music Association to raise $4000 to insure the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here next season. The use of the Albee Theatre has again been obtained.

While at one time it looked as though this city would be without concerts next year, Dr. William H. P. Faunce, honorary president of the Music Association, last night assured those present at the concert that Dr. Koussevitzky would bring back his musicians if $4000 were guaranteed to underwrite the series.

A written appeal was enclosed in each pro[illegible] companyi[illegible] was ma[illegible] these of[illegible] Faunce: president[illegible] president[illegible] Jr., treas[illegible] retary, ar[illegible] secretary

ALBER[illegible]
LAWYE[illegible]
DEAD [illegible]

Finale: the Symphony Ends Its Year

Promising a Return Next Winter, Koussevitzky Gives Us The Rare Legerdemain Of Dukas And The Tchaikovsky E-Minor And Leaves Us

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR 27 1929

Those who prefer straight forward music played with great zest, fared better than usual at the Albee Theatre last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, played its fourth and last concert of the season. For the program was, in great part, a solid one, made up of representative works of great composers, and played with lightness of heart and sureness of touch.

In fact much of its work had the finish of its New York performances, when it goes out to show the great City's orchestras how such things should be done. The strings were in particularly fine mood: the silken shimmer of the violins, the sombre pathos of the violas, the gleaming unction of the 'cellos, and the callipered profundity of the basses, were all of the very first order; while the double reeds carried their unusual burdens with a certainty born of power and a faultless sense of direction.

The bassoon in particular showed what a versatile instrument he is when he sang the cold sinister song in the "Sorcier" and repeated it almost verbally in the first movement of the Symphony, where he lifted it from a mock heroic travesty to an eminence of pure nobility. And the horn, too, made himself a high place among the players; if we have ever heard it sing with a more finished phrase or more delightful utterance, we cannot recall the place nor the time.

The Bach Concerto

Dr. Koussevitzky played the Bach concerto as though he liked it, and we all agree; but just how near the performance represented the idea of the composer we shall probably never know. The Society of Ancient Instruments, who introduced the composition to Dr. Koussevitzky, might have enlightened us, but it did not, so we can but stake our faith on Mr. Steinberg's arrangement and the conductor's interpretation. The flute, two oboes, bassoon, and horn can doubtless do much for a string composition for good or ill; and in this case it is well to assume that it was good.

The first movement, rotund and rolling, was introduced by the strings in strophic form, and the wind followed with the antistrophe. The lovely counterpoint, the smooth, definite violins, that seemed at times to be whispering the theme to the oboes, as though they were prompting them, and the whole a moving narrative, all showed Bach the son of his sire.

The Andante made even more use of the wind. It is a work of great power, featuring the 'cellos and violas, sweeping on with the lapse and surge of the sea, the flute and oboe calling across the swell of the strings like mournful birds in the shifting lights.

The third movement showed, like a Greek tragedy, the superiority of the old forms, where there lies a depth and significance that all the froth and elaborate embellishment of the modern can never displace. And when the end comes, it is final: Bach finished his piece and stopped then and there. But Tchaikovsky, although he wanted to sit down and weep by the waters of Babylon, had to look long before he could find a stone soft enough for a seat.

Wagner's prelude to "Lohengren," after a not very comfortable beginning, went on serenely enough, the upper strings making a fine substitution for the voices of angels, and so lacking in human emotion. The glow and the coruscation of light, that both Karl Muck and Anton Seidl felt that Wagner demanded, were somewhat dim. There was also less of the reverent air—the call to the profane to keep back—than one expects to feel in this number. But if applause is the proof of the efficacy of the performance, then this number deserved to bear off the palm.

In Praise of Dukas.

Constant Lambert has said that "there are so many composers of today whose lack of style is only equalled by their monstrous fluency that one is more than ever grateful for a man like Dukas, who has produced a few works only, but those few marked by an extraordinary finish and precision of workmanship. Though clearly not a great master, Dukas will probably live long through one or two exquisitely wrought works like L'Apprenti Sorcier."

A translation of Goethe's poem in the program notes gave the curious an opportunity to know what was going on throughout the piece. The long introduction seems to be a creation of the musician, who tried to project ahead of the action the wonder and excitement of a boy who was going to make the ghosts obey his will also. The Hexenmeister theme was strongly marked, and through the music ran the shrill resentful cry of the spirits, indignant at having to serve an underling of the master.

The translation misses the onomatopoetic effect of the German too often to be of any great help in bringing forward the pictures. "Walle, Walle," is not quite "Wander, wander." Getting a little closer to the incantation, we might say

"Boil and bubble.
Streamlets herpous,
With a purpose
Wildly roaring,
With a bounteous surging double
Onward to the bath a-pouring."

There was a little less of the terror of the boy in the music than one would expect, and the pauses seemed more numerous than the ballad demands. But it is a fine piece of program music with a gorgeous instrumentation and a great dramatic effect, even if that is mock heroic.

Ridiculous and Sublime

And by some strange turn of chance, the wonderful Tchaikovsky Symphony had scarcely got under way when that Dukas theme turned up. It seemed that the Russian was reproving the French-man for what he had done, by showing him what a noble and tender theme he had taken to make ridiculous. Possibly Dukas had no such idea, but many who heard the two compositions must have been struck by the ridiculous and the sublime, their proximity—and the triumph of the latter and the humiliation of the former.

But apart from that, the Symphony was shown to be a remarkable work and the playing was no less remarkable. There were flashes of real divinity across its pages—religious themes perhaps, or super-sensuous ecstasy of some sort. The wonderful organ effects of the second movement competed with the horn, and the 'cellos entered the competition a little later with a tone like thick incense going upward to the god of things as they are. When the violins repeated the air of the 'cellos, playing it on the G string, they showed their inability at once to compete. The 'cello glow became a vitreous glitter.

Tschaikovsky brings out in the third movement his great humanity; he portrays men as they are, their hope, and at last their despair. Bach on the other hand paints mankind as it will be when men are like gods.

M. C. W.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

C. P. E. Bach—
Concerto for Orchestra in D-major. (Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg.)
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante lento molto.
III. Allegro.
Wagner.....Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Dukas..."L'Apprenti Sorcier," scherzo (after a ballad by Goethe)

Tchaikovsky—
Symhony No. 5 in E-minor, Op 64.
I. Andante.
II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
III. Valse (Allegro moderato)
IV. Finale: Andante maestoso, Allegro vivace.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

MAR 27 1929

Dr. Faunce Announces Symphony Fund Drive

PROVIDENCE, March 27—Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, honorary president of the Music Association, announced a campaign to raise $4000 to insure Boston Symphony concerts next year at the final concert of the orchestra in the Albee Theatre last night.

If the fund is raised, the concerts will be given in the Albee Theatre, due to the public spirit manifested by Edward F. Albee, owner of the theatre, who notified Dr. Faunce that the theatre will suspend regular programmes on concert nights.

Dr. Faunce announced that checks may be mailed to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., Box 1536, Providence.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS

MAR [illegible]

THE SYMPHONY FUND

Dr. Faunce's appeal, made last night, for a fund of $4000 to guarantee the appearances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city next season should be speedily answered by the people of Providence. Nor have we any doubt that it will be so answered. Well-to-do citizens of Providence are not, as a matter of fact, asked to do very much each year for the arts, and it would be a civic disgrace if any real difficulty were encountered in raising the Symphony guarantee fund.

There has been considerable doubt as to whether the Symphony would come here next year. For several reasons, those who control the famous organization were opposed to playing in Infantry Hall. In fact we understand that the Music Association was given the alternative of either procuring the Albee Theatre again or dropping the Symphony for a year. Fortunately the association, through Dr. Faunce, has again been generously treated by Mr. E. F. Albee, and the concerts next year will be given in his leading playhouse. There is still some doubt as to when the new Masonic Hall will be finished; it is to have an auditorium that will provide ample seating room for the largest audience likely to attend the concerts.

This problem of securing a suitable auditorium again forces on our attention the lack of wisdom which determined the nature of the war memorial. Some $300,000 has been expended on a memorial that is, and always will be, an eyesore. That money might well have gone toward the building of a beautiful memorial hall which would have included an auditorium where the arts of civilization would be fostered.

However, there is no use crying over spilt milk or spent millions. The thing needed now is help for the Symphony Fund. We hope that within forty-eight hours, as Dr. Faunce asked, the large and the small guarantor will come forward and make available the $4000 sought. This is really very little for the Symphony to ask; in Boston itself the citizens are asked to guarantee about twice as much per concert as we are asked to guarantee; moreover they have to pay more for their tickets at the box office. All guarantees should be sent to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., Box 1536, Providence.

THE SOUTHERN REPUBLICANS

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAR 27 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAY COME IN 1930; $4000 IS NEEDED

Will Return Next Year if Fund is Guaranteed to Underwrite Series.—Dr. Faunce Asks Audience at Farewell Concert to Co-operate With Money.

A week ago it looked as though the Boston Symphony Orchestra would not be able to return to Providence next year, Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, honorary president of the Music Association, told the audience last night at the farewell concert of the season in the E. F. Albee Theatre.

Now, however, he assured his hearers, Dr. Koussevitzky would bring back his musicians if $4000 were guaranteed to underwrite the 1929-30 series. With the plea voiced from the stage by Dr. Faunce, and a written appeal inserted in each program, the Music Association set out last night to raise that sum.

The Association has undertaken to secure the Albee Theatre for the concerts next year, the printed announcement said, at the request of the orchestra.

"The new Masonic Auditorium is not yet ready," it continued, "and the number of season ticket holders for these concerts exceeds the capacity of Infantry Hall. The Association and the management of the orchestra agree that it is impossible to eliminate several hundred subscribers.

"Last year the Music Association undertook to raise $4800. For the coming season the orchestra has volunteered to increase its share of the rental by $800. The association therefore asks the support of the music lovers of Providence in securing subscriptions for $4000.

"It may be of interest to Providence subscribers to know that the rates of season tickets for the Boston concerts are considerably in excess of the average price for the Providence concerts. It will be of further interest to know that Boston, which has annually about 65 Symphony concerts, is raising $135,000 to meet this season's deficit, or approximately $2000 a concert, whereas Providence is being asked for $4000 or approximately $1000 a concert."

Dr. Faunce made his appeal for guarantors during the interval before the Tchaikovsky symphony. "The talking picture seems to be with us," he said, "but save us from the talking symphony. A week ago it looked as though there would be no symphony here next year. But to lose it for one year was to lose it for 10, and an irremediable damage would have been done to the culture of the city.

"I wrote to Mr. Albee in New York, asking him if we might have the use of his theatre here for five concerts. He replied that on any five dates we shall select he will suspend his regular program and let us come in. To enable us to do this we shall need an underwriting of $4000. Within 48 hours that sum should be subscribed. When it comes to the culture of Providence, it must and shall be done."

The statement accompanying the subscription blanks in the programs was made for the Music Association by the following officers in addition to Dr. Faunce: Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, president; William S. Innis, vice president; Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer; Hugh F. MacColl, secretary and Berrick Schloss, assistant secretary and manager. Subscriptions should be forwarded or checks mailed to Mrs. Gammell, Box 1536, Providence, or to the Providence Journal.

Boston Symphony

Those who prefer straight forward music played with great zest, fared better than usual at the Albee Theatre last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, played its fourth and last concert of the season. For the program was, in great part, a solid one, made up of representative works of great composers, and played with lightness of heart and sureness of touch.

In fact much of the orchestra's work had the finish of its New York performance, when it goes out to show the great City's orchestras how such things should be done. The strings were in particularly fine mood: the silken shimmer of the violins, the sombre pathos of the violas, the gleaming unction of the 'cellos, and the callipered profundity of the basses, were all of the very first order; while the double reeds carried their unusual burdens with a certainty born of power and a faultless sense of direction.

The bassoon in particular showed what a versatile instrument he is when he sang the cold sinister song in the "Sorcier" and repeated it almost verbally in the first movement of the Symphony, where he lifted it from a mock heroic travesty to an eminence of pure nobility. And the horn, too, made himself a high place among the players; if we have ever heard it sing with a more finished phrase or more delightful utterance, we cannot recall the place nor the time.

C. P. E. Bach—
Concerto for Orchestra in D-major.
(Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg.)
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante lento molto.
III. Allegro.
Wagner.....Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Dukas..."L'Apprenti Sorcier," scherzo (after a ballad by Goethe)

Tchaikovsky—
Symhony No. 5 in E-minor, Op 64.
I. Andante.
II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
III. Valse (Allegro moderato)
IV. Finale: Andante maestoso, Allegro vivace.

Dr. Koussevitzky played the Bach concerto as though he liked it, and we all agree; but just how near the performance represented the idea of the composer we shall probably never know. The Society of Ancient Instruments, who introduced the composition to Dr. Koussevitzky, might have enlightened us, but it did not, so we can but stake our faith on Mr. Steinberg's arrangement and the conductor's interpretation. The flute, two oboes, bassoon, and horn can doubtless do much for a string composition for good or ill; and in this case it is well to assume that it was good.

The first movement, rotund and rolling, was introduced by the strings in strophic form, and the wind followed with the antistrophe. The lovely counterpoint, the smooth, definite violins, that seemed at times to be whispering the theme to the oboes, as though they were prompting them, and the whole a moving narrative, all showed Bach the son of his sire.

The Andante made even more use of the wind. It is a work of great power, featuring the 'cellos and violas, sweeping on with the lapse and surge of the sea, the flute and oboe calling across the swell of the strings like mournful birds in the shifting lights.

The third movement showed, like a Greek tragedy, the superiority of the old forms, where there lies a depth and significance that all the froth and elaborate embellishment of the modern can never displace. And when the end comes, it is final; Bach finished his piece and stopped then and there. But Tchaikovsky, although he wanted to sit down and weep by the waters of Babylon, had to look long before he could find a stone soft enough for a seat.

Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin," after a not very comfortable beginning, went on serenely enough, the upper strings making a fine substitution for the voices of angels, and so lacking in human emotion. The glow and the coruscation of light, that both Karl Muck and Anton Seidl felt that Wagner demanded, were somewhat dim. There was also less of the reverent air—the call to the profane to keep back—than one expects to feel in this number. But if applause is the proof of the efficacy of the performance, then this number deserved to bear off the palm.

In Praise of Dukas.

Constant Lambert has said that "there are so many composers of today whose lack of style is only equalled by their monstrous fluency that one is more than ever grateful for a man like Dukas, who has produced a few works only, but those few marked by an extraordinary finish and precision of workmanship. Though clearly not a great master, Dukas will probably live long through one or two exquisitely wrought works like L'Apprenti Sorcier."

A translation of Goethe's poem in the program notes gave the curious an opportunity to know what was going on throughout the piece. The long introduction seems to be a creation of the musician, who tried to project ahead of the action the wonder and excitement of a boy who was going to make the ghosts obey his will also. The Hexenmeister theme was strongly marked, and through the music ran the shrill resentful cry of the spirits, indignant at having to serve an underling of the master.

The translation misses the onomatopoetic effect of the German too often to be of any great help in bringing forward the pictures. "Walle, Walle," is not quite "Wander, wander." Getting a little closer to the incantation, we might say

"Boil and bubble,
Streamlets herpous,
With a purpose
Wildly roaring,
With a bounteous surging double
Onward to the bath a-pouring."

There was a little less of the terror of the boy in the music than one would expect, and the pauses seemed more numerous than the ballad demands. But it is a fine piece of program music with a gorgeous instrumentation and a great dramatic effect, even if that is mock heroic.

Ridiculous and Sublime

And by some strange turn of chance, the wonderful Tchaikovsky Symphony had scarcely got under way when that Dukas theme turned up. It seemed that the Russian was reproving the Frenchman for what he had done, by showing him what a noble and tender theme he had taken to make ridiculous. Possibly Dukas had no such idea, but many who heard the two compositions must have been struck by the ridiculous and the sublime, their proximity—and the triumph of the latter and the humiliation of the former.

But apart from that, the Symphony was shown to be a remarkable work and the playing was no less remarkable. There were flashes of real divinity across its pages—religious themes perhaps, or super-sensuous ecstasy of some sort. The wonderful organ effects of the second movement competed with the horn, and the 'cellos entered the competition a little later with a tone like thick incense going upward to the god of things as they are. When the violins repeated the air of the 'cellos, playing it on the G string, they showed their inability at once to compete. The 'cello glow became a vitreous glitter.

Tschaikovsky brings out in the third movement his great humanity; he portrays men as they are, their hope, and at last their despair. Bach on the other hand paints mankind as it will be when men are like gods.

M. C. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
MAR 27 1929

Boston Symphony in Last Contest

Tchaikowsky's Fifth Brings Providence Season of Concerts to End.

One of his own Russians, Tchaikowsky, greatest of them all, was chosen by Serge Koussevitzky to close the Providence series of the Boston Symphony orchestra last night. It was a programme appealing to the lover of the conventional in music as well as the follower of the moderns, for although one of the numbers was a work of the younger Bach it was a "translated" Bach. Then, also, the director had chosen Paul Abraham Dukas, "now living in Paris," as the programme book reminded the audience, for the offering immediately preceding the symphony. And in between, majestic and with all its grandeur, came the prelude to "Lohengrin." Surely no real music lover could fail to find something in this programme meeting his own particular approval.

The concerto by C. P. E. Bach, written in another age, so appealed to Mr. Koussevitzky on one occasion when he heard it played by the Society of Ancient Instruments in Paris that he determined to arrange it for a modern orchestra, but he decided to entrust the task to other hands, and the work played last night was produced by Maximilian Steinberg. It was played last evening as if the orchestra liked it; certainly Mr. Koussevitzky showed a marked interest in the piece, which was an effective opening for the concert.

The Wagner number was of course splendidly played, repeated applause affording testimony of the approval of the audience. It was followed by the Dukas number, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," affording striking contrast to Wagner and again to the symphony, which came immediately after it on the programme.

Mr. Koussevitzky lacks no enthusiasm in his playing of Wagner and there is in his interpretation of the newer composers a verve and finish which manifest his extraordinary interest. But when he plays the Russians, particularly Tchaikowsky, new spirit seems born in him. One wonders if in future years the work of Tchaikowsky will not be universally played as Koussevitzky plays them. His reading with his whole soul thrown into the work, inspires the whole orchestra and finds response in every hearer. The playing of the Fifth Symphony on this occasion was a thrilling achievement.

The programme follows:

C. P. E. Bach—
Concerto for Orchestra in D-major.
(Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg.)
I. Allegro moderato.
II Andante lento molto.
III. Allegro.
Wagner....Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Dukas "L'Apprenti Sorcier," scherzo
(After a ballad by Goethe)
Tchaikowsky—
Symphony No. 5 in E-minor, Op. 64.
I. Andante.
II. Andante cantabile, con alcouna licenza.
III. Valse (Allegro moderato)
IV. Finale: Andante maestoso, Allegro vivace.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR 27 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAY COME IN 1930

Will Return Next Year if $4000 is Guaranteed to Underwrite Series.

DR. FAUNCE MAKES APPEAL

Asks Audience at Farewell Concert to Co-operate in Bringing Back Bay State Ensemble

A week ago it looked as though the Boston Symphony Orchestra would not be able to return to Providence next year, Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, honorary president of the Music Association, told the audience last night at the farewell concert of the season in the E. F. Albee Theatre.

Now, however, he assured his hearers, Dr. Koussevitzky would bring back his musicians if $4000 were guaranteed to underwrite the 1929-30 series. With the plea voiced from the stage by Dr. Faunce, and a written appeal inserted in each program, the Music Association set out last night to raise that sum.

The Association has undertaken to secure the Albee Theatre for the concerts next year, the printed announcement said, at the request of the orchestra.

"The new Masonic Auditorium is not yet ready," it continued, "and the number of season ticket holders for these concerts exceeds the capacity of Infantry Hall. The Association and the management of the orchestra agree that it is impossible to eliminate several hundred subscribers.

"Last lear the Music Association undertook to raise $4800. For the coming season the orchestra has volunteered to increase its share of the rental by $800. The association therefore asks the support of the music lovers of Providence in securing subscriptions for $4000.

"It may be of interest to Providence subscribers to know that the rates of season tickets for the Boston concerts are considerably in excess of the average price for the Providence concerts. It will be of further interest to know that Boston, which has annually about 65 Symphony concerts, is raising $135,000 to meet this season's deficit, or approximately $2000 a concert, whereas Providence is being asked for $4000 or approximately $1000 a concert."

Dr. Faunce made his appeal for guarantors during the interval before the Tchaikovsky symphony. "The talking picture seems to be with us," he said, "but save us from the talking symphony. A week ago it looked as though there would be no symphony here next year. But to lose it for one year was to lose it for 10, and an irremediable damage would have been done to the culture of the city.

"I wrote to Mr. Albee in New York, asking him if we might have the use of his theatre here for five concerts. He replied that on any five dates we shall select he will suspend his regular program and let us come in. To enable us to do this we shall need an underwriting of $4000. Within 48 hours that sum should be subscribed. When it comes to the culture of Providence, it must and shall be done."

Continued from Page 1, Col. 7.

The statement accompanying the subscription blanks in the programs was made for the Music Association by the following officers in addition to Dr. Faunce: Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, president; William S. Innis, vice president; Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer; Hugh F. MacColl, secretary and Berrick Schloss, assistant secretary and manager. Subscriptions should be forwarded or checks mailed to Mrs. Gammell, Box 1536, Providence, or to the Providence Journal.

A review of last night's concert appears on Page 13.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE
MAR 27 19

SYMPHONY ENDS ITS SEASON HERE

Final Concert of Boston Orchestra Leaves Pleasant Memories for Music Lovers

At the fourth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1928-29 held in the E. F. Albee Theatre last night, Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, honorary president of the Music Association, announced that the orchestra would return next season if the music lovers of Providence subscribed $4000 to underwrite another series of concerts.

About a week ago, Dr. Faunce said, it appeared that the Boston Symphony would not return for another year. "But," he continued, "to lose it for one year was to lose it for 10, and an irremediable damage would have been done to the culture of the city." He said that he had written to E. F. Albee, who assured him that on the dates that were to be used for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra he would gladly suspend the regular performances. The generous spirit of Mr. Albee was vigorously applauded.

A printed announcement in the concert program said that the association had been prompted to secure the Albee Theatre for the next season at the request of the orchestra.

"The new Masonic Auditorium is not yet ready," it continued, "and the number of season ticket holders for these concerts exceeds the capacity of Infantry Hall. The association and the management of the orchestra agree that it is impossible to eliminate several hundred subscribers.

"Last year the Music Association undertook to raise $4800. For the coming season the orchestra has volunteered to increase its share of the rental by $800. The association therefore asks the support of the music lovers of Providence in securing subscriptions for $4000.

"It may be of interest to Providence subscribers to know that the rates of season tickets for the Boston concerts are considerably in excess of the average price for the Providence concerts. It will be of further interest to know that Boston, which has annually about 65 Symphony concerts, is raising $135,000 to meet the season's deficit, or approximately $2000 a concert, whereas Providence is being asked for $4000 or approximately $1000 a concert."

The Concerto for Orchestra in D-major C. P. E. Bach, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg, was played by the ensemble under M. Koussevitsky's loving baton with a richness and tenderness that carried out the composer's idea of touching the heart of men by the beauty of his writing rather than astounding by the cacophony of harsh sound. Bach was the second son of the illustrious Johann Sebastian Bach and was known as the "Hamburg" or "Berlin" Bach. He had not the fire and the genius of his father and was more the technician and student. Frederick the Great, to whom he was chamber musician, admired him as a great musician. The Dukas piece was inspired by a ballad of Goethe, a weird work that had to do with the ambition of the sorcerer's apprentice to bring the spirit world under his control. Throughout the number one could hear the eerie shrieks of the ghosts protesting at the demonology of the understrapper. M. Koussevitsky played it with zest and bounce, apparently enjoying himself with the theme. The audience caught his pleasure and applauded vigorously at the close. The Wagner Prelude, a wheelhorse of the symphony circuits, never becomes tiresome, and it was appreciated by the audience, who had heard its different interpretation by Muck and by Monteux. The Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 5 in E-minor, which contains the lovely second movement, andante cantabile, a thing of beauteous melody, sensuous, soft and entrancing, showed M. Koussevitsky at his best. There is dispute among the conductors and masters as to the worth of Tchiakovsky, Toscannini, for example, going into a rage even at the mention of the Russian. He is called meretricious, flashy and superficial. But under M. Koussevitsky's certain touch last night the symphony seemed to most of us there to contain a fine and rare beauty, and it closed the series with pleasant memories.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAR 27 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAY COME IN 1930; $4000 IS NEEDED

Will Return Next Year if Fund is Guaranteed to Underwrite Series.—Dr. Faunce Asks Audience at Farewell Concert to Co-operate With Money.

A week ago it looked as though the Boston Symphony Orchestra would not be able to return to Providence next year, Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, honorary president of the Music Association, told the audience last night at the farewell concert of the season in the E. F. Albee Theatre.

Now, however, he assured his hearers, Dr. Koussevitzky would bring back his musicians if $4000 were guaranteed to underwrite the 1929-30 series. With the plea voiced from the stage by Dr. Faunce, and a written appeal inserted in each program, the Music Association set out last night to raise that sum.

The Association has undertaken to secure the Albee Theatre for the concerts next year, the printed announcement said, at the request of the orchestra.

"The new Masonic Auditorium is not yet ready," it continued, "and the number of season ticket holders for these concerts exceeds the capacity of Infantry Hall. The Association and the management of the orchestra agree that it is impossible to eliminate several hundred subscribers.

"Last year the Music Association undertook to raise $4800. For the coming season the orchestra has volunteered to increase its share of the rental by $800. The association therefore asks the support of the music lovers of Providence in securing subscriptions for $4000.

"It may be of interest to Providence subscribers to know that the rates of season tickets for the Boston concerts are considerably in excess of the average price for the Providence concerts. It will be of further interest to know that Boston, which has annually about 65 Symphony concerts, is raising $135,000 to meet this season's deficit, or approximately $2000 a concert, whereas Providence is being asked for $4000 or approximately $1000 a concert."

Dr. Faunce made his appeal for guarantors during the interval before the Tchaikovsky symphony. "The talking picture seems to be with us," he said, "but save us from the talking symphony. A week ago it looked as though there would be no symphony here next year. But to lose it for one year was to lose it for 10, and an irremediable damage would have been done to the culture of the city.

"I wrote to Mr. Albee in New York, asking him if we might have the use of his theatre here for five concerts. He replied that on any five dates we shall select he will suspend his regular program and let us come in. To enable us to do this we shall need an underwriting of $4000. Within 48 hours that sum should be subscribed. When it comes to the culture of Providence, it must and shall be done."

The statement accompanying the subscription blanks in the programs was made for the Music Association by the following officers in addition to Dr. Faunce: Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, president; William S. Innis, vice president; Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer; Hugh F. MacColl, secretary and Berrick Schloss, assistant secretary and manager. Subscriptions should be forwarded or checks mailed to Mrs. Gammell, Box 1536, Providence, or to the Providence Journal.

Boston Symphony

Those who prefer straight forward music played with great zest, fared better than usual at the Albee Theatre last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Kousevitzky, conductor, played its fourth and last concert of the season. For the program was, in great part, a solid one, made up of representative works of great composers, and played with lightness of heart and sureness of touch.

In fact much of the orchestra's work had the finish of its New York performance, when it goes out to show the great City's orchestras how such things should be done. The strings were in particularly fine mood: the silken shimmer of the violins, the sombre pathos of the violas, the gleaming unction of the 'cellos, and the callipered profundity of the basses, were all of the very first order; while the double reeds carried their unusual burdens with a certainty born of power and a faultless sense of direction.

The bassoon in particular showed what a versatile instrument he is when he sang the cold sinister song in the "Sorcier" and repeated it almost verbally in the first movement of the Symphony, where he lifted it from a mock heroic travesty to an eminence of pure nobility. And the horn, too, made himself a high place among the players; if we have ever heard it sing with a more finished phrase or more delightful utterance, we cannot recall the place nor the time.

C. P. E. Bach—
Concerto for Orchestra in D-major.
(Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg.)
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante lento molto.
III. Allegro.
Wagner.....Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Dukas..."L'Apprenti Sorcier," scherzo (after a ballad by Goethe)

Tchaikovsky—
Symhony No. 5 in E-minor, Op 64.
I. Andante.
II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
III. Valse (Allegro moderato)
IV. Finale: Andante maestoso, Allegro vivace.

Dr. Koussevitzky played the Bach concerto as though he liked it, and we all agree; but just how near the performance represented the idea of the composer we shall probably never know. The Society of Ancient Instruments, who introduced the composition to Dr. Koussevitzky, might have enlightened us, but it did not, so we can but stake our faith on Mr. Steinberg's arrangement and the conductor's interpretation. The flute, two oboes, bassoon, and horn can doubtless do much for a string composition for good or ill; and in this case it is well to assume that it was good.

The first movement, rotund and rolling, was introduced by the strings in strophic form, and the wind followed with the antistrophe. The lovely counterpoint, the smooth, definite violins, that seemed at times to be whispering the theme to the oboes, as though they were prompting them, and the whole a moving narrative, all showed Bach the son of his sire.

The Andante made even more use of the wind. It is a work of great power, featuring the 'cellos and violas, sweeping on with the lapse and surge of the sea, the flute and oboe calling across the swell of the strings like mournful birds in the shifting lights.

The third movement showed, like a Greek tragedy, the superiority of the old forms, where there lies a depth and significance that all the froth and elaborate embellishment of the modern can never displace. And when the end comes, it is final; Bach finished his piece and stopped then and there. But Tchaikovsky, although he wanted to sit down and weep by the waters of Babylon, had to look long before he could find a stone soft enough for a seat.

Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin," after a not very comfortable beginning, went on serenely enough, the upper strings making a fine substitution for the voices of angels, and so lacking in human emotion. The glow and the coruscation of light, that both Karl Muck and Anton Seidl felt that Wagner demanded, were somewhat dim. There was also less of the reverent air—the call to the profane to keep back—than one expects to feel in this number. But if applause is the proof of the efficacy of the performance, then this number deserved to bear off the palm.

In Praise of Dukas.

Constant Lambert has said that "there are so many composers of today whose lack of style is only equalled by their monstrous fluency that one is more than ever grateful for a man like Dukas, who has produced a few works only, but those few marked by an extraordinary finish and precision of workmanship. Though clearly not a great master, Dukas will probably live long through one or two exquisitely wrought works like L'Apprenti Sorcier."

A translation of Goethe's poem in the program notes gave the curious an opportunity to know what was going on throughout the piece. The long introduction seems to be a creation of the musician, who tried to project ahead of the action the wonder and excitement of a boy who was going to make the ghosts obey his will also. The Hexenmeister theme was strongly marked, and through the music ran the shrill resentful cry of the spirits, indignant at having to serve an underling of the master.

The translation misses the onomatopoetic effect of the German too often to be of any great help in bringing forward the pictures. "Walle, Walle," is not quite "Wander, wander." Getting a little closer to the incantation, we might say

"Boil and bubble,
Streamlets herpous,
With a purpose
Wildly roaring,
With a bounteous surging double
Onward to the bath a-pouring."

There was a little less of the terror of the boy in the music than one would expect, and the pauses seemed more numerous than the ballad demands. But it is a fine piece of program music with a gorgeous instrumentation and a great dramatic effect, even if that is mock heroic.

Ridiculous and Sublime

And by some strange turn of chance, the wonderful Tchaikovsky Symphony had scarcely got under way when that Dukas theme turned up. It seemed that the Russian was reproving the Frenchman for what he had done, by showing him what a noble and tender theme he had taken to make ridiculous. Possibly Dukas had no such idea, but many who heard the two compositions must have been struck by the ridiculous and the sublime, their proximity—and the triumph of the latter and the humiliation of the former.

But apart from that, the Symphony was shown to be a remarkable work and the playing was no less remarkable. There were flashes of real divinity across its pages—religious themes perhaps, or super-sensuous ecstasy of some sort. The wonderful organ effects of the second movement competed with the horn, and the 'cellos entered the competition a little later with a tone like thick incense going upward to the god of things as they are. When the violins repeated the air of the 'cellos, playing it on the G string, they showed their inability at once to compete. The 'cello glow became a vitreous glitter.

Tschaikovsky brings out in the third movement his great humanity; he portrays men as they are, their hope, and at last their despair. Bach on the other hand paints mankind as it will be when men are like gods.

M. C. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
MAR 27 1929

Boston Symphony in Last Contest

Tchaikowsky's Fifth Brings Providence Season of Concerts to End.

One of his own Russians, Tchaikowsky, greatest of them all, was chosen by Serge Koussevitzky to close the Providence series of the Boston Symphony orchestra last night. It was a programme appealing to the lover of the conventional in music as well as the follower of the moderns, for although one of the numbers was a work of the younger Bach it was a "translated" Bach. Then, also, the director had chosen Paul Abraham Dukas, "now living in Paris," as the programme book reminded the audience, for the offering immediately preceding the symphony. And in between, majestic and with all its grandeur, came the prelude to "Lohengrin." Surely no real music lover could fail to find something in this programme meeting his own particular approval.

The concerto by C. P. E. Bach, written in another age, so appealed to Mr. Koussevitzky on one occasion when he heard it played by the Society of Ancient Instruments in Paris that he determined to arrange it for a modern orchestra, but he decided to entrust the task to other hands, and the work played last night was produced by Maximilian Steinberg. It was played last evening as if the orchestra liked it; certainly Mr. Koussevitzky showed a marked interest in the piece, which was an effective opening for the concert.

The Wagner number was of course splendidly played, repeated applause affording testimony of the approval of the audience. It was followed by the Dukas number, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," affording striking contrast to Wagner and again to the symphony, which came immediately after it on the programme.

Mr. Koussevitzky lacks no enthusiasm in his playing of Wagner and there is in his interpretation of the newer composers a verve and finish which manifest his extraordinary interest. But when he plays the Russians, particularly Tchaikowsky, new spirit seems born in him. One wonders if in future years the work of Tchaikowsky will not be universally played as Koussevitzky plays them. His reading with his whole soul thrown into the work, inspires the whole orchestra and finds response in every hearer. The playing of the Fifth Symphony on this occasion was a thrilling achievement.

The programme follows:

C. P. E. Bach—
Concerto for Orchestra in D-major.
(Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg.)
I. Allegro moderato.
II Andante lento molto.
III. Allegro.
Wagner....Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Dukas "L'Apprenti Sorcier," scherzo
(After a ballad by Goethe)
Tchaikowsky—
Symphony No. 5 in E-minor, Op. 64.
I. Andante.
II.Andante cantabile, con alcouna licenza.
III. Valse (Allegro moderato)
IV. Finale: Andante maestoso, Allegro vivace.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR 27 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAY COME IN 1930

Will Return Next Year if $4000 is Guaranteed to Underwrite Series.

DR. FAUNCE MAKES APPEAL

Asks Audience at Farewell Concert to Co-operate in Bringing Back Bay State Ensemble

A week ago it looked as though the Boston Symphony Orchestra would not be able to return to Providence next year, Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, honorary president of the Music Association, told the audience last night at the farewell concert of the season in the E. F. Albee Theatre.

Now, however, he assured his hearers, Dr. Koussevitzky would bring back his musicians if $4000 were guaranteed to underwrite the 1929-30 series. With the plea voiced from the stage by Dr. Faunce, and a written appeal inserted in each program, the Music Association set out last night to raise that sum.

The Association has undertaken to secure the Albee Theatre for the concerts next year, the printed announcement said, at the request of the orchestra.

"The new Masonic Auditorium is not yet ready," it continued, "and the number of season ticket holders for these concerts exceeds the capacity of Infantry Hall. The Association and the management of the orchestra agree that it is impossible to eliminate several hundred subscribers.

"Last lear the Music Association undertook to raise $4800. For the coming season the orchestra has volunteered to increase its share of the rental by $800. The association therefore asks the support of the music lovers of Providence in securing subscriptions for $4000.

"It may be of interest to Providence subscribers to know that the rates of season tickets for the Boston concerts are considerably in excess of the average price for the Providence concerts. It will be of further interest to know that Boston, which has annually about 65 Symphony concerts, is raising $135,000 to meet this season's deficit, or approximately $2000 a concert, whereas Providence is being asked for $4000 or approximately $1000 a concert."

Dr. Faunce made his appeal for guarantors during the interval before the Tchaikovsky symphony. "The talking picture seems to be with us," he said, "but save us from the talking symphony. A week ago it looked as though there would be no symphony here next year. But to lose it for one year was to lose it for 10, and an irremediable damage would have been done to the culture of the city.

"I wrote to Mr. Albee in New York, asking him if we might have the use of his theatre here for five concerts. He replied that on any five dates we shall select he will suspend his regular program and let us come in. To enable us to do this we shall need an underwriting of $4000. Within 48 hours that sum should be subscribed. When it comes to the culture of Providence, it must and shall be done."

Continued from Page 1, Col. 7.

The statement accompanying the subscription blanks in the programs was made for the Music Association by the following officers in addition to Dr. Faunce: Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, president; Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer; Hugh F. MacColl, secretary and Berrick Schloss, assistant secretary and manager. Subscriptions should be forwarded or checks mailed to Mrs. Gammell, Box 1536, Providence, or to the Providence Journal.

A review of last night's concert appears on Page 13.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE
MAR 27

SYMPHONY ENDS ITS SEASON HERE

Final Concert of Boston Orchestra Leaves Pleasant Memories for Music Lovers

At the fourth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1928-29 held in the E. F. Albee Theatre last night, Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, honorary president of the Music Association, announced that the orchestra would return next season if the music lovers of Providence subscribed $4000 to underwrite another series of concerts.

About a week ago, Dr. Faunce said, it appeared that the Boston Symphony would not return for another year. "But," he continued, "to lose it for one year was to lose it for 10, and an irremediable damage would have been done to the culture of the city." He said that he had written to E. F. Albee, who assured him that on the dates that were to be used for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra he would gladly suspend the regular performances. The generous spirit of Mr. Albee was vigorously applauded.

A printed announcement in the concert program said that the association had been prompted to secure the Albee Theatre for the next season at the request of the orchestra.

"The new Masonic Auditorium is not yet ready," it continued, "and the number of season ticket holders for these concerts exceeds the capacity of Infantry Hall. The association and the management of the orchestra agree that it is impossible to eliminate several hundred subscribers.

"Last year the Music Association undertook to raise $4800. For the coming season the orchestra has volunteered to increase its share of the rental by $800. The association therefore asks the support of the music lovers of Providence in securing subscriptions for $4000.

"It may be of interest to Providence subscribers to know that the rates of season tickets for the Boston concerts are considerably in excess of the average price for the Providence concerts. It will be of further interest to know that Boston, which has annually about 65 Symphony concerts, is raising $135,000 to meet the season's deficit, or approximately $2000 a concert, whereas Providence is being asked for $4000 or approximately $1000 a concert."

The Concerto for Orchestra in D-major C. P. E. Bach, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg, was played by the ensemble under M. Koussevitsky's loving baton with a richness and tenderness that carried out the composer's idea of touching the heart of men by the beauty of his writing rather than astounding by the cacophony of harsh sound. Bach was the second son of the illustrious Johann Sebastian Bach and was known as the "Hamburg" or "Berlin" Bach. He had not the fire and the genius of his father and was more the technician and student. Frederick the Great, to whom he was chamber musician, admired him as a great musician. The Dukas piece was inspired by a ballad of Goethe, a weird work that had to do with the ambition of the sorcerer's apprentice to bring the spirit world under his control. Throughout the number one could hear the eerie shrieks of the ghosts protesting at the demonology of the understrapper. M. Koussevitsky played it with zest and bounce, apparently enjoying himself with the theme. The audience caught his pleasure and applauded vigorously at the close. The Wagner Prelude, a wheelhorse of the symphony circuits, never becomes tiresome, and it was appreciated by the audience, who had heard its different interpretation by Muck and by Monteux. The Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 5 in E-minor, which contains the lovely second movement, andante cantabile, a thing of beauteous melody, sensuous, soft and entrancing, showed M. Koussevitsky at his best. There is dispute among the conductors and masters as to the worth of Tchiakovsky, Toscannini, for example, going into a rage even at the mention of the Russian. He is called meretricious, flashy and superficial. But under M. Koussevitsky's certain touch last night the symphony seemed to most of us there to contain a fine and rare beauty, and it closed the series with pleasant memories.

138

"Thus Spake Zarathustra" Is Dominating Boston Offering

By PITTS SANBORN.

IT is unprofitable business labelling and pigeon-holing a work of art and supposing its future settled so far as one's own self is concerned. I had fondly believed that the Nietzschean tone poem of Richard Strauss, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," had taken its definitive place in my musical cosmos—forever dead and done with except for the overpowering splendor of the colossal opening; the graceful, gently ironic "Dance Song," and the mysterious bi-tonal conclusion. Then along came Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night and knocked my smug little theory to smithereens.

"Thus Spake Zarathustra" was the principal offering of the visiting Bostonians at their Carnegie Hall concert of yesterday, and as they presented it every bar stood forth in glowing, pulsing life. For perfection of orchestral style and execution, for rich, warm, encompassing beauty, this performance was without a parallel in my experience. And the breadth, the poise, the measured grandeur, the vivifying imaginative insight of Mr. Koussevitzky's reading made that of Richard Strauss himself seem in comparison pale and shallow.

The Strauss composition shared the program with two other numbers—Arthur Foote's E major suite for strings and Ravel's orchestral version of Moussorgsky's familiar piano suite, "Pictures at an Exhibition." In Mr. Foote's work the justly famed Bostonian string choir was heard to radiant advantage. The suite itself, composed over twenty years ago, possesses qualities which in these piping times of atonality, polytonality, "new" counterpoint, and minor second regnant are mercilessly "dated."

Yet any one who still hankers after the outmoded flesh pots of winsome melody, orthodox workmanship, euphony, grace and even—horror of horrors!—elegance will here find meats seasoned to his liking. Mr. Foote's suite is charming music — discreetly reminiscent in parts, but none the worse for that. It was a pleasure to listen to it last evening—a pleasure alike for its own "dated" self and for the dateless excellence of the setting forth.

A huge audience received this concert with deserved enthusiasm.

N. Y. TELEGRAM MAR. 29

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR 31 1929

City Should Keep Symphony Concerts

Boston Musicians Provide Opportunities Unrivalled in Many Larger Cities and Fill a Void in the Cultural Life of Providence and Environs.

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

I hope that by the time this letter reaches you the $4000 needed to underwrite the series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts next year will have been obtained. If the money has not been raised by that time, possibly the letter may remind some of those who have been putting off this action.

As Dr. Faunce so truthfully stated the other evening, losing the symphony orchestra for one year would undoubtedly mean its loss to Providence for 10 years. Any other city which once substituted for Providence would be unwilling to give up its good fortune

To one who attended the last concert of the year at the Albee Theatre it seems impossible that Providence will falter in coming forward with the small amount necessary. That evening every seat in the theatre was taken, and as many were standing as fire regulations would permit. With a popularity such as this, it is unlikely that the necessity of pledging attendance in advance will be allowed to interrupt this long series.

Both the orchestra and E. F. Albee have shown the greatest generosity in co-operating to make the guaranteed amount as small as possible. With every one doing everything possible in this direction, there undoubtedly will be no lack of public co-operation as well.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra each year provides an opportunity unrivalled in many cities larger than Providence for the enjoyment of the finest music, interpreted by a master and played by the finest musicians obtainable. Without the Boston Symphony there would be a void in the cultural life of the city the seriousness of which might not be realized until too late.

"When it comes to the culture of Providence, it must and shall be done," declared Dr. Faunce.

Quite enough harm has been done the series of Boston Symphony concerts already by forcing them into such unsuitable quarters as those provided by Infantry Hall. The surroundings there are not conducive to the enjoyment of anything artistic, to say the least. There was a lack, not only of the things catering to the aesthetic taste, but to ordinary comfort as well. Even more recently the noise with which the symphony had to compete seriously curtailed, if it did not prevent, the enjoyment of the concert by the audience.

With the completion of Masonic Hall a splendid place will be provided for these concerts. Not that the Albee Theatre is not admirably suitable, in every way. Possibly it is superior. But use of the Albee entails some sacrifice on the part of the management, seriously interferes with the ordinary conduct of theatrical productions there and involves considerable extra expense.

However, unless the music loving public of Providence comes forward immediately with the money required to guarantee the financial backing necessary for next year's concerts, there will be no occasion to wonder where the symphonies will be played for many years.

This is not a matter of putting off the concert series for a year. It is a matter of either keeping the Boston Symphony as a periodical and welcome and valued visitor to the city, or of turning it loose to the profit of some other city which, naturally, will not want to sacrifice its advantage, once it is gained.

Nor is there any reason why it should. If Providence does not want the Boston Symphony Orchestra badly enough to provide the small guarantee necessary, it should not complain if the orchestra goes to a city where, undoubtedly, a far greater sum would instantly be forthcoming.

H. E. B.

Providence, March 27.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
MAR 29 1929

DEBATE IN BOSTON

Boston and Baltimore have much in common so far as devotion to music is concerned, but it is in the New England city that programs of the symphony orchestra become the occasion for widespread public controversy, by which is meant that letters on the subject appear in the Transcript with considerable frequency. The eminent Mr. Koussevitsky is not above precipitating a shower of protests, not to mention hisses and catcalls, when a composition of the "new music" appears to him worthy of Symphony Hall.

Evidently these letters in the newspapers are widely discussed. A Mr. Clayton Johns, who wrote to the Transcript on the matter, dispatched a second letter to the editor to report occasions upon which he was accosted in the street by people who had read his first communication and desired to express their concurrence. His experiences were of this sort:

Monday morning I went to Symphony Hall to get my ticket for Rachmaninoff's recital. After a lady had bought her seat she turned to me and said "You are Mr. Johns and I want to thank you for your letters about the programs." I then said to the lady "I am glad you agree with me." "Oh," said she, "there are so many who agree with you!" The lady then left and I asked at the box office the lady's name, which proved to be Mrs. Ginn, the widow of the publisher.

What Mrs. Ginn thought of this revelation of her opinions is left to the imagination. Perhaps she would have preferred to come into the controversy, so to say, under her own steam. Nevertheless, she—or somebody who was [illegible]ken for her—is in it, and few Bost[illegible]ct to being in a controversy.

[illegible]ppear that the fight is all in favor o[illegible]n, it should be recorded that subse[illegible]tters have reminded Mr. Johns that [illegible] and Bach and Wagner were "mod[illegible] their day and that Mr. Koussevitsky [illegible]merely giving Boston a chance to hear musicians whom the future will immortalize. Long life, therefore, to Mr. Koussevitsky. He has demonstrated beyond a doubt that music is worth arguments, hisses and letters to the newspapers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL
MAR 30 1929

KOUSSEVITSKY PLAYS THE NINTH SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play Beethoven's Ninth Symphony for the first time in its regular New York series, when Serge Koussevitzky and his men visit Carnegie Hall for the final concerts of the season on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, April 11 and 13. The choral part will be sung by the New York Schola Cantorum, Hugh Ross, conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 31 1929

Boston Orchestra's Deficit

The estimated deficit of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the current season is $135,000, of which $89,680 has been subscribed. There have apparently been deficits from the earliest years of the organization. During the life of Maj Henry L. Higginson, the orchestra's founder, deficits were paid by him and the public heard nothing about them. The orchestra is now under the control of a board of trustees and its administration is a semi-public matter.

This year's deficit is presumably the largest in the orchestra's history. Costs have been advancing in recent years, and this year the orchestra is bereft of the $32,000 revenue received in each of the past two seasons for sale of the broadcasting privilege. Few persons who heard the Boston Symphony concerts by radio knew that W. S. Quinby paid the orchestra's trustees $1000 a week for broadcasting the concerts in connection with an advertisement of his business. Royalties to composers or performers frequently meant an additional cost of several hundred dollars.

Mr Quinby discontinued the broadcasting—reluctantly, it is understood — because his associates convinced him that the ultramodern music so frequently played by the orchestra did not appeal to the mass of radio listeners. Sooner or later, the broadcasting might have been stopped for some other reason, but the character of the programs—about which there is debate at present in Boston—was the principal reason for discontinuing the broadcasts this season.

While it seems probable that the entire deficit will ultimately be subscribed, it will be desirable to reduce the loss another year, if possible. One suggestion that is receiving consideration is to have the orchestra give three or four concerts a year at extemely low prices in the Boston garden, as the North station sports arena is now called. The auditorium there has a capacity of 18,000, and tickets could be sold for as little as 25 cents if the public response were large enough. There is, however, a question of acoustics. And the public's attitude would have to be tested. If this suggestion were put into effect and proved successful, Boston would gain in prestige as a progressive community, the orchestra would make new friends and the public's musical eduction would be benefited.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
News
Salem, Mass.
1 MAR 29 1929

[illegible] wise ones.

Although the Boston symphony orchestra draws crowded houses for a long series of concerts, it needs help additional to the ticket sale, and there is a sum of $44,000 yet to be raised to cover the deficit of the year. Boston and vicinity have reason for the utmost pride in this great institution, and whatever is needed for adequate support should be cheerfully furnished by music lovers and public spirited people.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
MAR 31 192[illegible]

Toscanini's Last Concert Monday; Stokowski Returns on Tuesday

Arturo Toscanini ends his season as conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra with to-morrow night's concert for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. This Carnegie Hall program also will serve as a testimonial to Leo Schulz, who retires this spring after thirty years as first cellist of the Philharmonic and Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestras. Mr. Schulz will be the soloist in the Schumann concerto and will conduct his own American Overture, composed for the Chicago World's Fair of 1893.

Mr. Toscanini's last subscription appearance of the season will be this afternoon at the Metropolitan Opera House in a Beethoven-Wagner program. The Philharmonic-Symphony offers consolation for the Italian conductor's early departure in the announcement that he will be here for sixteen weeks next season.

Clemens Krauss, who conducted the Philadelphia Orchestra here on March 19, will make his first appearance as guest conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra next Thursday evening and Friday afternoon in Carnegie Hall with a program which also will be offered Saturday night in the students' series. Two Sunday afternoon concerts at Carnegie Hall, a Thursday afternoon and Friday evening pair of concerts and one more Saturday night students' concert complete the Philharmonic-Symphony season of 1928-'29.

Leopold Stokowski has returned to his post at the head of the Philadelphia Orchestra and will conduct a program including works by three American composers next Tuesday night in Carnegie Hall. Sandor Harmati, born in Budapest, came to America in 1914 and was a violinist of the Letz and Lenox Quartets before becoming conductor of the Omaha Symphony Orchestra in 1925. As a composer he won a Pulitzer prize and a prize offered by the Chamber Music Association of Philadelphia. His "Prelude to a Drama," to be heard Tuesday, is a study for a one-act play on a Chinese-Californian story.

Wallingford Riegger, born in this country, graduated from the Institute of Musical Art in 1907 as a cellist. In 1922 he received the Paderewski prize for a piano trio; in 1923 his "American Polonaise" received honorable mention and a performance at a Stadium concert; in 1924 he received the Coolidge Prize for "La Belle Dame sans Merci." His "Study in Sonority for Forty Violins" on Mr. Stokowski's program was first performed at Ithaca in August, 1927, as a caprice for ten violins. It has since been partly revised and the name changed in accordance with a suggestion from Mr. Stokowski.

Frederick Jacobi's Indian Dances, "Buffalo Dance," "Butterfly Dance," "Rain Chant" and "War Dance" are intended as impressions of ritualistic dances of the Pueblos and Navajos of New Mexico and Arizona. The work was first performed by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky last November.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will give its last Carnegie Hall concerts of the season on Thursday night, April 11, and Saturday afternoon, April 13. On both these occasions Mr. Koussevitzky will give Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in its first performance by this orchestra in its regular New York series. The Schola Cantorum will sing the chorus with Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van der Veer, Paul Althouse and Fraser Gange as soloists. In both concerts C. P. E. Bach's concerto in D major for orchestra, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg, will precede the symphony.

The Bostonians' last program at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, Friday evening, April 12, consists of Shubert's Unfinished Symphony, Duke's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" and the second symphony of Brahms.

Mr. Stokowski will conduct the last New York concert this season of the Philadelphia Orchestra on April 16, and the conductorless American Symphony Ensemble's concert of April 18 will close the regular New York orchestral season of 1928-'29.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN
MAR 31 192[illegible]

KING'S SYMPHONY HEARD.

NEW YORK, March 30.—No less an exalted personage than his majesty Frederick the Great, king of Prussia, was before an audience—in spirit—in a recent Carnegie-hall concert. His work was heard, a symphony in D minor No. 3, played by the Boston Symphony orchestra, composed about the year 1748. It is a matter of record that his majesty wrote all the parts of the symphony without assistance, although he graciously allowed Quantz, his flute teacher, to make minor corrections.

It will not do to poke fun at a king. We must approach the symphony—of little originality—with respect due to its royal composer. The work is of fair merit, and the second movement, an andante, has many pleasant, tender moments. Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting was able, and his interpretation of the music brought cordial applause.

Two other numbers played included the third symphony of Jan Sibelius and the Strauss' "Zarathustra." The last was an orchestral gem.

138

"Thus Spake Zarathustra" Is Dominating Boston Offering

By PITTS SANBORN.

IT is unprofitable business labelling and pigeon-holing a work of art and supposing its future settled so far as one's own self is concerned. I had fondly believed that the Nietzschean tone poem of Richard Strauss, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," had taken its definitive place in my musical cosmos—forever dead and done with except for the overpowering splendor of the colossal opening; the graceful, gently ironic "Dance Song," and the mysterious bi-tonal conclusion. Then along came Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night and knocked my smug little theory to smithereens.

"Thus Spake Zarathustra" was the principal offering of the visiting Bostonians at their Carnegie Hall concert of yesterday, and as they presented it every bar stood forth in glowing, pulsing life. For perfection of orchestral style and execution, for rich, warm, encompassing beauty, this performance was without a parallel in my experience. And the breadth, the poise, the measured grandeur, the vivifying imaginative insight of Mr. Koussevitzky's reading made that of Richard Strauss himself seem in comparison pale and shallow.

The Strauss composition shared the program with two other numbers—Arthur Foote's E major suite for strings and Ravel's orchestral version of Moussorgsky's familiar piano suite, "Pictures at an Exhibition." In Mr. Foote's work the justly famed Bostonian string choir was heard to radiant advantage. The suite itself, composed over twenty years ago, possesses qualities which in these piping times of atonality, polytonality, "new" counterpoint, and minor second regnant are mercilessly "dated."

Yet any one who still hankers after the outmoded flesh pots of winsome melody, orthodox workmanship, euphony, grace and even—horror of horrors!—elegance will here find meats seasoned to his liking. Mr. Foote's suite is charming music — discreetly reminiscent in parts, but none the worse for that. It was a pleasure to listen to it last evening—a pleasure alike for its own "dated" self and for the dateless excellence of the setting forth.

A huge audience received this concert with deserved enthusiasm.

N. Y. TELEGRAM MAR. 28 '29

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

City Should Keep Symphony Concerts

Boston Musicians Provide Opportunities Unrivalled in Many Larger Cities and Fill a Void in the Cultural Life of Providence and Environs.

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

I hope that by the time this letter reaches you the $4000 needed to underwrite the series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts next year will have been obtained. If the money has not been raised by that time, possibly the letter may remind some of those who have been putting off this action.

As Dr. Faunce so truthfully stated the other evening, losing the symphony orchestra for one year would undoubtedly mean its loss to Providence for 10 years. Any other city which once substituted for Providence would be unwilling to give up its good fortune

To one who attended the last concert of the year at the Albee Theatre it seems impossible that Providence will falter in coming forward with the small amount necessary. That evening every seat in the theatre was taken, and as many were standing as fire regulations would permit. With a popularity such as this, it is unlikely that the necessity of pledging attendance in advance will be allowed to interrupt this long series.

Both the orchestra and E. F. Albee have shown the greatest generosity in co-operating to make the guaranteed amount as small as possible. With every one doing everything possible in this direction, there undoubtedly will be no lack of public co-operation as well.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra each year provides an opportunity unrivalled in many cities larger than Providence for the enjoyment of the finest music, interpreted by a master and played by the finest musicians obtainable. Without the Boston Symphony there would be a void in the cultural life of the city the seriousness of which might not be realized until too late.

"When it comes to the culture of Providence, it must and shall be done," declared Dr. Faunce.

Quite enough harm has been done the series of Boston Symphony concerts already by forcing them into such unsuitable quarters as those provided by Infantry Hall. The surroundings there are not conducive to the enjoyment of anything artistic, to say the least. There was a lack, not only of the things catering to the aesthetic taste, but to ordinary comfort as well. Even more recently the noise with which the symphony had to compete seriously curtailed, if it did not prevent, the enjoyment of the concert by the audience.

With the completion of Masonic Hall a splendid place will be provided for these concerts. Not that the Albee Theatre is not admirably suitable, in every way. Possibly it is superior. But use of the Albee entails some sacrifice on the part of the management, seriously interferes with the ordinary conduct of theatrical productions there and involves considerable extra expense.

However, unless the music loving public of Providence comes forward immediately with the money required to guarantee the financial backing necessary for next year's concerts, there will be no occasion to wonder where the symphonies will be played for many years.

This is not a matter of putting off the concert series for a year. It is a matter of either keeping the Boston Symphony as a periodical and welcome and valued visitor to the city, or of turning it loose to the profit of some other city which, naturally, will not want to sacrifice its advantage, once it is gained.

Nor is there any reason why it should. If Providence does not want the Boston Symphony Orchestra badly enough to provide the small guarantee necessary, it should not complain if the orchestra goes to a city where, undoubtedly, a far greater sum would instantly be forthcoming.

H. E. B.

Providence, March 27.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
MAR 29 1929

DEBATE IN BOSTON

Boston and Baltimore have much in common so far as devotion to music is concerned, but it is in the New England city that programs of the symphony orchestra become the occasion for widespread public controversy, by which is meant that letters on the subject appear in the Transcript with considerable frequency. The eminent Mr. Koussevitsky is not above precipitating a shower of protests, not to mention hisses and catcalls, when a composition of the "new music" appears to him worthy of Symphony Hall.

Evidently these letters in the newspapers are widely discussed. A Mr. Clayton Johns, who wrote to the Transcript on the matter, dispatched a second letter to the editor to report occasions upon which he was accosted in the street by people who had read his first communication and desired to express their concurrence. His experiences were of this sort:

Monday morning I went to Symphony Hall to get my ticket for Rachmaninoff's recital. After a lady had bought her seat she turned to me and said "You are Mr. Johns and I want to thank you for your letters about the programs." I then said to the lady "I am glad you agree with me." "Oh," said she, "there are so many who agree with you!" The lady then left and I asked at the box office the lady's name, which proved to be Mrs. Ginn, the widow of the publisher.

What Mrs. Ginn thought of this revelation of her opinions is left to the imagination. Perhaps she would have preferred to come into the controversy, so to say, under her own steam. Nevertheless, she—or somebody who was [illegible]ken for her—is in it, and few Bost[illegible]ct to being in a controversy.

[illegible]ppear that the fight is all in favor o[illegible]n, it should be recorded that subse[illegible]tters have reminded Mr. Johns that [illegible] and Bach and Wagner were "mod[illegible] their day and that Mr. Koussevitsky is merely giving Boston a chance to hear musicians whom the future will immortalize. Long life, therefore, to Mr. Koussevitsky. He has demonstrated beyond a doubt that music is worth arguments, hisses and letters to the newspapers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL
MAR 30 1929

KOUSSEVITSKY PLAYS THE NINTH SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play Beethoven's Ninth Symphony for the first time in its regular New York series, when Serge Koussevitzky and his men visit Carnegie Hall for the final concerts of the season on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, April 11 and 13. The choral part will be sung by the New York Schola Cantorum, Hugh Ross, conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
APR 1

Boston Orchestra's Deficit

The estimated deficit of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the current season is $135,000, of which $89,680 has been subscribed. There have apparently been deficits from the earliest years of the organization. During the life of Maj Henry L. Higginson, the orchestra's founder, deficits were paid by him and the public heard nothing about them. The orchestra is now under the control of a board of trustees and its administration is a semi-public matter.

This year's deficit is presumably the largest in the orchestra's history. Costs have been advancing in recent years, and this year the orchestra is bereft of the $32,000 revenue received in each of the past two seasons for sale of the broadcasting privilege. Few persons who heard the Boston Symphony concerts by radio knew that W. S. Quinby paid the orchestra's trustees $1000 a week for broadcasting the concerts in connection with an advertisement of his business. Royalties to composers or performers frequently meant an additional cost of several hundred dollars.

Mr Quinby discontinued the broadcasting—reluctantly, it is understood — because his associates convinced him that the ultramodern music so frequently played by the orchestra did not appeal to the mass of radio listeners. Sooner or later, the broadcasting might have been stopped for some other reason, but the character of the programs—about which there is debate at present in Boston—was the principal reason for discontinuing the broadcasts this season.

While it seems probable that the entire deficit will ultimately be subscribed, it will be desirable to reduce the loss another year, if possible. One suggestion that is receiving consideration is to have the orchestra give three or four concerts a year at extemely low prices in the Boston garden, as the North station sports arena is now called. The auditorium there has a capacity of 18,000, and tickets could be sold for as little as 25 cents if the public response were large enough. There is, however, a question of acoustics. And the public's attitude would have to be tested. If this suggestion were put into effect and proved successful, Boston would gain in prestige as a progressive community, the orchestra would make new friends and the public's musical eduction would be benefited.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
[illegible]
Salem, Mass.
1
MAR 29 1929

[illegible]wise cities.

Although the Boston symphony orchestra draws crowded houses for a long series of concerts, it needs help additional to the ticket sale, and there is a sum of $44,000 yet to be raised to cover the deficit of the year. Boston and vicinity have reason for the utmost pride in this great institution, and whatever is needed for adequate support should be cheerfully furnished by music lovers and public spirited people.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
MAR 31 [illegible]

Toscanini's Last Concert Monday; Stokowski Returns on Tuesday

Arturo Toscanini ends his season as conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra with to-morrow night's concert for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. This Carnegie Hall program also will serve as a testimonial to Leo Schulz, who retires this spring after thirty years as first cellist of the Philharmonic and Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestras. Mr. Schulz will be the soloist in the Schumann concerto and will conduct his own American Overture, composed for the Chicago World's Fair of 1893.

Mr. Toscanini's last subscription appearance of the season will be this afternoon at the Metropolitan Opera House in a Beethoven-Wagner program. The Philharmonic-Symphony offers consolation for the Italian conductor's early departure in the announcement that he will be here for sixteen weeks next season.

Clemens Krauss, who conducted the Philadelphia Orchestra here on March 19, will make his first appearance as guest conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra next Thursday evening and Friday afternoon in Carnegie Hall with a program which also will be offered Saturday night in the students' series. Two Sunday afternoon concerts at Carnegie Hall, a Thursday afternoon and Friday evening pair of concerts and one more Saturday night students' concert complete the Philharmonic-Symphony season of 1928-'29.

Leopold Stokowski has returned to his post at the head of the Philadelphia Orchestra and will conduct a program including works by three American composers next Tuesday night in Carnegie Hall. Sandor Harmati, born in Budapest, came to America in 1914 and was a violinist of the Letz and Lenox Quartets before becoming conductor of the Omaha Symphony Orchestra in 1925. As a composer he won a Pulitzer prize and a prize offered by the Chamber Music Association of Philadelphia. His "Prelude to a Drama," to be heard Tuesday, is a study for a one-act play on a Chinese-Californian story.

Wallingford Riegger, born in this country, graduated from the Institute of Musical Art in 1907 as a cellist. In 1922 he received the Paderewski prize for a piano trio; in 1923 his "American Polonaise" received honorable mention and a performance at a Stadium concert; in 1924 he received the Coolidge Prize for "La Belle Dame sans Merci." His "Study in Sonority for Forty Violins" on Mr. Stokowski's program was first performed at Ithaca in August, 1927, as a caprice for ten violins. It has since been partly revised and the name changed in accordance with a suggestion from Mr. Stokowski.

Frederick Jacobi's Indian Dances, "Buffalo Dance," "Butterfly Dance," "Rain Chant" and "War Dance" are intended as impressions of ritualistic dances of the Pueblos and Navajos of New Mexico and Arizona. The work was first performed by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky last November.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will give its last Carnegie Hall concerts of the season on Thursday night, April 11, and Saturday afternoon, April 13. On both these occasions Mr. Koussevitzky will give Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in its first performance by this orchestra in its regular New York series. The Schola Cantorum will sing the chorus with Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van der Veer, Paul Althouse and Fraser Gange as soloists. In both concerts C. P. E. Bach's concerto in D major for orchestra, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg, will precede the symphony.

The Bostonians' last program at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, Friday evening, April 12, consists of Shubert's Unfinished Symphony, Duke's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" and the second symphony of Brahms.

Mr. Stokowski will conduct the last New York concert this season of the Philadelphia Orchestra on April 16, and the conductorless American Symphony Ensemble's concert of April 18 will close the regular New York orchestral season of 1928-'29.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN
MAR 31

KING'S SYMPHONY HEARD.

NEW YORK, March 30.—No less an exalted personage than his majesty Frederick the Great, king of Prussia, was before an audience—in spirit—in a recent Carnegie-hall concert. His work was heard, a symphony in D minor No. 3, played by the Boston Symphony orchestra, composed about the year 1748. It is a matter of record that his majesty wrote all the parts of the symphony without assistance, although he graciously allowed Quantz, his flute teacher, to make minor corrections.

It will not do to poke fun at a king. We must approach the symphony—of little originality—with respect due to its royal composer. The work is of fair merit, and the second movement, an andante, has many pleasant, tender moments. Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting was able, and his interpretation of the music brought cordial applause.

Two other numbers played included the third symphony of Jan Sibelius and the Strauss' "Zarathustra." The last was an orchestral gem.

Koussevitzky, Gretchaninov, And Beethoven

TRANS. APRIL 1 '29

Week-End Among the Russians From The Ninth Symphony To Grateful Songs

THERE is no advocate so fervent as he who has been persuaded against his own will. . . .

Some of us took our places in Symphony Hall on Saturday evening strong in the current belief hereabouts that a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony should be made an occasion. It must not be played too often lest it become repertory piece for conductor and orchestra. It must not be heard too often lest it make like routined impression upon the ordinary listener. It should not have place upon a program in the regular course of subscription concerts. Rather, it should be isolated as an event for a purpose—say to crown a Beethoven Centenary Festival or to win exceptional audiences to the increase of an orchestral Pension Fund. Anticipating the Choral Symphony as rare experience, they would assemble expectant, listen tense-keyed, depart elated.

And now Mr. Koussevitzky, putting by these precedents and predilections, was including that selfsame Ninth in the twenty-first program of the current season. Two years ago it had been climax to the Centenary Festival—and here it was in regular course. Exceptional audiences had previously heard it—and on this Friday and Saturday, outside the upper balcony, there would be room, for subscribers only. Since there could be no outbuilding of the stage into the auditorium, the chorus must be reduced in numbers and Beethoven's mighty climax would sound dwarfed. In short, to lift the Ninth Symphony out of a concert virtually devoted to it was to diminish its magnitude and lessen its potency. Before long, it would be, like the Fifth or the Seventh, all in the day's playing and the day's hearing.

As a matter of record, the performance on Saturday belied everyone of these anticipations. As a matter of fact, to produce the Ninth at a pair of "regular" Symphony Concerts was no more than return to custom before Dr. Muck's time. The conductor came fresher to his task than was possible at the end of a long festival; renewed the renown that in this particular piece he has long enjoyed in London and in Paris. The orchestra, richer-voiced and more resilient than it was two years ago, played above itself. The audience could hardly have been more intent and responsive.

In particular, the Harvard-Radcliffe Choir, though it numbered only 125, left no impression of diminished sonority. It has attained such surety and freedom with Beethoven's measures that it can take pace, rhythm, intervals as they come; bring its whole will and intelligence to bear upon the volume, the coloring, the projecting quality of its tone. Accustomed, yet not routined, to Mr. Koussevitzky, from him it catches fire. These young voices are indeed light; but the conductor so maintained the orchestral and choral balance that not once did the tonal mass sound thin. Out of this lightness, moreover, sprang a quickness and plasticity of motion essential to Beethoven's swiftly changing periods; while in the youth of the choir was the very spirit that could summon his elation. Each by itself, in the course of its own concerts, the Harvard Glee Club or the Radcliffe Choral Society is pleasure to hear. Joined to the Symphony Orchestra as chorus in this or that masterpiece, it rises no less to the greater occasion.

The outcome was transcendent performance. The singing splendor of the strings pervaded the Symphony, in the slow movement plumbed depths of beauty. The richness of the horns companioned them. The other brass added to sonority that modern incisiveness which Beethoven, had he known it, would hardly have spared. In the trio of the Scherzo the wood-winds dazzled the ear as light dazzles the eye. The whole orchestra was an ever-changeful instrument, speaking not only what was written and accented and colored, but what within was most certain and most true. For his part, Mr. Koussevitzky achieved the epic vastness of the first movement, making Titanic round of man and fate; flung off the Scherzo as in winds of tone to the thunder of those drum-beats; held the slow movement to exalted contemplation, with one melody to scale the heavens, while in the other they serenely open; wrought the finale so that exactions, excesses, even commonplaces, melted into solemnities, ecstasies, omnipotence. The end was dithyrambic, with the black and white of the staves whirled into the frenzy of the passion. The purists may say, having in mind what they call a "classic," that Mr. Koussevitzky overpassions the whole Symphony. They forget what surged also in Beethoven as he wrote.

APR 3 -1929
TRANSCRIPT.

Concert-Chronicle

Pleasures Renewed

FAMILIAR and satisfying . . . was the phrase that came first to mind following the fourth concert of the Tuesday series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. César Franck's Symphony, with which the concert began, has been heard before during the season both at Cambridge and at Symphony Hall. It was scarcely a stranger to the concerts of the past two seasons. The recent Pension Fund concert devoted entirely to excerpts from the music dramas of Wagner. Three of these excerpts again found place on the program of yesterday, including "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," the prelude and closing scene from "Tristan and Isolde" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg. The present favor of the prelude to "The Mastersingers" is interesting. Mr. Arbos played it on his visit. Mr. Koussevitzky played it at the Pension Fund concert and twice placed it on the Cambridge program. The audience heard these pieces contentedly, clapped in similar mood and left the hall with reluctance. Seeming to have suddenly realized its pleasure when the players were about to leave the stage at the close of the concert, it increased its previously diminishing applause and recalled Mr. Koussevitzky to the stage.

Mr. Koussevitzky's way with the Symphony of Franck is to draw together and compact the composer's luxuriant and organically generating melodies; to draw out every lifting, compelling or exalting mood to which the music aspires; to neglect nothing that will make it sound richer, more firm-knit, more sonorous; to reveal as much logic and inevitability as possible in the composer's transition from one theme to another, or his combining, recalling and developing of them; to lavish upon the more barren connecting measures of the piece as much convincing orchestral color as may be obtained from the sensuous strings and noble brasses of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With few pieces is Mr. Koussevitzky so constant in his interpretative style. One performance of this symphony differs from another not so much in interpretative attitude and insight as in the degree of intensity which the conductor is able to invoke at the occasion.

Is an intensive revival of Wagner under way? Looking backward, one recalls that only a few years back compositions of this acknowledged master of the orchestra were relatively scarce upon symphony programs. Youngsters and oldsters alike are fortunate for this renewed interest. The ears with which we have heard things of late will receive fresh pleasure from this ageless music. It is a discovery for some; a rediscovery for others. Of the excerpts on yesterday's program, "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfriend" are less familiar than the others. In their pastoral beauty, the gently tremuluos measures of this piece leave a lasting impression with the listener. With the Prelude and Closing Scene of "Tristan," Mr. Koussevitzky seemed more painstaking, more slow of pace than is his usual wont. It was as though he wished this passion to be irresistible through its gradual unfolding rather than through any dramatic revelation. The Prelude to "The Mastersingers" once more went its genial and benevolently majestic course.

N. M. J.

Intelligence in Variety

APR 3 '29

TRANSCRIPT, WEDNESDAY

The Nomad

Just the same, the hylas and all the other frogs trust her. While the Radcliffe girls, at the Symphony, were screwing their voices up to the screaming point in Schiller's "Hymn of Joy," the frogs were already chanting in the swamp, without the slightest strain or difficulty, their own high Hymn of Joy. (By Shriller.) What a chorus the Nomad heard on Sunday evening, standing at twilight on the edge of the shallow pond! No difficulty there about reaching that clear, high tone, and repeating it and sustaining it with delightfullest purity for hours at a time! When he composed the Ninth Symphony, and ventured his genius upon the seraphic altitudes of the Hymn of Joy, Beethoven must have been listening to the chanting of the frogs—or he would never have held onto that high note so long. No doubt it was unreasonable in him to expect human beings to do as much. But anyhow the frogs are always here, at this time of year, fearless and careless of April's possible frigid furies, to render easily what womankind finds so hard to sing.

+ + +

FOURTH TUESDAY SYMPHONY CONCERT

Cesar Franck's Symphony and Wagner Excerpts

Globe Apr. 3

The program of the fourth of the Boston Symphony Tuesday concerts yesterday afternoon included Cesar Franck's Symphony and three Wagner excerpts, the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," the prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The usual very large audience seemed greatly pleased with Mr Koussevitzky's interpretations and the orchestra's playing.

One of the announced purposes of this series of concerts is to offer to such relatively inexperienced listeners as college students an introduction to the masterpieces of orchestral music. Mr Koussevitzky's programs are always made up with this idea in mind. Although he has not this season announced a systematic scheme for a historical survey of music, such as the Tuesday series has offered in former years, Mr Koussevitzky is apparently following a chronological order.

He began the series with 18th century classics. The last concert was devoted to Schubert, Berlioz and Schumann, all early 19th century romantic writers. Yesterday's concert fell to Wagner and Franck, two of the most notable late romantic composers. The final concert, April 23, will no doubt include examples of modern music.

It is to many listeners agreeable to know in advance that no untried novelties will occur on the programs. People who subscribe for but five concerts in a season are likely toprefer to hear only recognized master pieces and to wish these chosen on some diversified scheme.

The standard of performance at both the Monday and the Tuesday series benefits by the fact that nearly always the pieces on the programs have already been heard in the Friday and Saturday series of the same season.

Yesterday's concert was no exception to this rule. Mr Koussevitzky got from the players fuller and freer cooperation in his highly personal reading of the Franck Symphony. There were fewer moments when tone grew harsh and when the ensemble failed to attain absolute precision than at the performances some weeks ago in the regular series. The dramatic, the theatrical element in the music, which Mr Koussevitzky stressed to the elimination of the mystic contemplation many admirers of Franck have found there, had full sway. The result was stirring and won hearty applause.

It is harder to like Mr Koussevitzky's way with Wagner than it is to accept his version of Franck. There is no need to repeat the extended discussion lately printed in Globe reviews of the ways in which the conductor departs from the scores and from the tradition. But grant Mr Koussevitzky the privilege of conducting the music not as it is written, but as he feels it, and yesterday's performance becomes an impressive success. The music sounded well, again illustrating the greatly improved quality of the orchestra, which as a musical instrument is now once more what it so long was, unsurpassed the world over.

The "Meistersinger" prelude yesterday sounded much better than it did the other day at the Pension Fund concert. Only at the beginning did the brass blare away too hard for clarity and euphony. In the latter sections of the piece the pace was this time quicker than before, to the manifest improvement of the performance.

P. R.

SYMPHONY IN FOURTH TUES.

Post Apr 3

Franck and Wagner Divide List of Pieces

Yesterday afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fourth of the present series of Tuesday afternoon concerts. The Symphony of Franck and three selections from the music-dramas of Wagner, "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," were the chosen pieces.

To the Symphony of Franck Mr. Koussevitzky gave his usual very personal reading, approaching in the second movement most nearly to the accepted interpretation of this music. But however just or unjust Mr. Koussevitzky's version of the Symphony may be, however faithful or unfaithful to the composer's intentions, it is in its own right undeniably effective. And if he takes the Finale at a pace faster than that suggested by the composer's Allegro ma non troppo, he is not the first to do so.

As at the recent Pension Fund concert, the Wagnerian excerpts received yesterday an exceptionally eloquent performance, the Meistersinger Prelude particularly, pleasing the audience. In acknowledgment of the hearty applause

INFORMATION OBSCURED

140

TRANS. APR 4 1926 PLAY

Round of The Concert-Halls, News-Gathering

Dr. Hanson's New Symphony, Honors for Leo Schulz, Items of The Day

ONCE AGAIN, at the Symphony Concerts of this week, the American composer has an inning. This time he is Dr. Howard Hanson, Director of the Eastman School of Music in Rochester. The work to be played is his Nordic Symphony, Op. 21, in E minor. He himself will be the conductor. Dr. Hanson is still a young man in his early thirties. He came out of Nebraska, born of Swedish-American stock. East and West, from the Institute of Musical Art in New York city to the College of The Pacific in California, he made his musical studies and practised his calling as musician-teacher. In 1921 he received a fellowship in the American Academy at Rome where he dwelt and worked through three years. Then and there he began his career as composer and from this Roman residence date the compositions which have been oftenest played and by which he is best known. Upon his return to the United States he was appointed Director of the Eastman School where he has done not a little to encourage and enlighten the younger American composers by test-performances of their larger works. Northwestern University gave him the honorary degree, Doctor of Music.

The Nordic Symphony is the first of three symphonic pieces written during the stay at Rome. The other two are entitled "North and West" and "Lux Æterna." The Nordic Symphony was first played at Rome in the spring of 1923. It has since been heard in Rochester, St. Louis, Kansas City, San Francisco. There are three movements: I.—Andante solenne—Allegro con forza; II.—Andante teneramente con semplicita. III.—Allegro con fuoco—Finale. They are dedicated respectively to Frederick Lamond, the eminent pianist, of the elder generation, to the composer's mother, to his father. Dr. Hanson has characterized the three movements as follows: The first "austere, a movement of struggle, of dramatic intensity"; the second in a "mood of gentle sadness and yearning"; the third, with four measures reminiscent of a motif out of "Die Walküre" for introduction, "energetic, powerful." The ensuing Finale serves as epitome and climax to the whole Symphony. All the themes appear; the orchestration grows in magnificence; the close spares neither the pomp nor the power of sound.

Further informative description is contained in a review from the San Francisco Examiner, written by Mr. Redfern Mason, the leading commentator and chronicler of music on the Pacific Coast: "Recent use of the word 'Nordic' has seemed to imply a rather unjust discrimination against Southrons. But Hanson's ideal is racially specific. Its music sings the experience, the longings and the spirit of the people from whom he sprang. Beginning it in Rome before he had ever seen the Sweeden of his forefathers, when he came to visit the old home of his people he found to his delight that his dreams were true.

"The land of lake and mountain and shaggy pine forests, seen under the gray of that northern mist which makes the sunlight pallid, breathes its spirit through the opening movement, and breathes it with a rare eloquence. The composer is establishing his milieu, as a playwright would say, and the grave notes of the 'cello tell their story of loveliness and brooding persuasively. The horns speak their sense of distance and mystery; the reeds were full of echoes of tarn and woodland: the strings shimmered.

"The slow movement is in the mood of sentiment. The composer has dedicated it to his mother, and it tells of the things a child learns in his mother's arms, at the chimney corner in the twilight. Then comes an Allegro con fuoco, ushered in by a quotation from 'The Valkyrs' Ride.' Here you get the sense of the toil of the race, the work it has to do among the peoples of the world. The music is energetic, almost Berserk; and Hanson, a long, athletic figure of a man, hung [illegible] players till he made one think of some viking of long ago urging on the towers of a pirate ship. Hanson's music is strong, vital, impregnated with the spirit of a man desperately in earnest It is written because the composer had something to say, which it was important for him to utter. It is virile, stern, but with moments of lyric ecstasy and tenderness that go straight to the heart."

A. H. M.

Leo Schulz Takes Leave

Years ago, when Arthur Nikisch [illegible] conductor, Leo Schulz began [illegible] violoncellist of the Boston Orchestra. He played for [illegible] seasons; then departed to New York to be first violoncellist of the Philharmonic Society. Since the turn of the century he has filled this chair—until on Monday last he took formal leave of the orchestra, withdrawing at his own request into modest retirement. In the tours of the Philharmonic Society he has often revisited Boston; at each return a remembered and recognized figure.

Down They Go

The unamiable but amusing process of putting other eminent conductors in their place beside the "incomparable" Toscanini continues briskly in New York. The other day, as noted in these columns, it was the turn of Mr. Koussevitzky and whoever heeded might learn how inferior is his version of Prokoffiev's "Classical Symphony" to that brought to pass by the Italian master. Mr. Koussevitzky, at least, is in the prime of his powers and at the full flood of his career. Now it appears that even the gray head of Dr. Muck is not to be spared. Last week Mr. Toscanini led the Philharmonic Society through the Prelude and the "Good-Friday Music" out of "Parsifal," joining the two with one of the motivs, sounded off-stage by the brass. The distinguished reviewer for The Times remembered "no performance of the 'Parsifal' music characterized by such mysterious beauty and poignancy of feeling, none in which every slightest suggestion of color and nuance in the score was so completely realized in performance."

Then came the ominous recollection of the music-drama from the hands of Dr. Muck at Baireuth and there [illegible] of adjustments, viz.: "The writer has been fortunate in hearing performances of 'Parsifal' by Karl Muck, and had deemed these performances almost the ne plus ultra of interpfetation as regards this particular work. And indeed Dr. Muck's 'Parsifal' is an achievement that stands wholly by itself among the great musical deeds of the period. Reference is made to it in order to emphasize the nobility, the spirituality, the haunting beauty of tone and loftiness of conception which characterized the interpretation of the excerpts played last night by Mr. Toscanini."

Fortunate Muck thus to enhance the greater glory of the illustrious Italians! . . . Next season, if present arrangements hold, he will lead the Philharmonic Society through sixteen weeks. Inevitably during that time he will be heard in music in which other eminent conductors have sought, as best they might, to excel. And one by one, if the present fashion holds, it will be their lot to stand in humble but illuminating background around Mr. Toscanini. Why not begin with Dr. Mengelberg of Amsterdam, whose hapless fate it is to be locum tenens until "the master" arrives?

Incidents and Prospects

Next week Mr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra make their final journey, for the season, to New York. At both the concerts there, they will be heard in Beethoven's Choral Symphony with the choir of the Schola Cantorum assisting. Emanuel Bach's Concerto for Orchestra will be preface. In forty years, never before have the Bostonians carried the Symphony to New York.

On its autumn tour next season the Symphony Orchestra will revisit Chicago where two years ago conductor and band carried all before them. For the first time since Dr. Muck's day these journeys to Chicago promise to become an established item in the Bostonian itinerary. On the other side of the account, it is

TRANS APR 5 1926

Programs to Hand

From Mr. Koussevitzky for the final supplementary matinée of the Symphony on Tuesday, April 23:

Suite in E minor for String Orchestra . . . F[illegible]
Prelude to Mallarmé's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of A Faun" . . . . . Debussy
Scherzo, after Goethe, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" . . . . . Dukas
Symphony in E minor, No. 5 . . . . . Tschaikowsky

Symphony

Considerable Glory for One, Doktor Strauss

TRANS.—APR [illegible] 6

With Mr. Koussevitzky Aiding, He Effaces Chaikovsky And Another

THEN CAME Richard Strauss; by no means the Strauss of the greater tone-poems; only the Strauss of "Death and Transfiguration." Yet over a Symphony Concert that began with Chaikovsky's Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" and proceeded with Mr. Howard Hanson's "Nordic Symphony," the lesser Strauss loomed large. Beside his last three Symphonies, the Russian's fantasia as tone-poem seemed thin and faded—a music out of which vitality has steadily ebbed. Though Mr. Hanson conducting, and the orchestra with him, lashed themselves, his tonal homage to Scandinavia proved neither individual nor impressive. Modernism or no modernism, he scores as neither elder nor younger composers write in this present day. Through two-thirds of the concert, it was as though we listeners had been thrust back into the end of the nineteenth century and had found the experience none too enjoyable. Then along came Strauss with "Death and Transfiguration" (1888-89) and, at last that distant time vindicated itself.

Nowadays, it is rather the fashion to write deprecatingly of this tone-poem. As some say, with "The Domestica" and the "Alpine Symphony," it is wearing least well of that far-spreading line. Certainly, it lacks the fire, the pungency, the sense of a young musical athlete trying and proving his mettle, that the earlier "Don Juan" and "Till Eulenspiegel" still diffuse. Nor does it attain the breadth of design and variety of accomplishment, the wealth of creative energy, the scope and power of musical characterization, that endure through "Zarathustra," "Heldenleben" and "Don Quixote." If the hearer will, he may believe "Death and Transfiguration," the last of the Lisztian tone-poems; whereas he following three were the breeding ground of the cosmic swarm that in the fullness of time set the modernists in revolt against such form and substance. Certainly the music of transfiguration might have made Liszt, who loved apotheoses, turn in an envious grave. Certainly, again, Strauss's eye is as firmly fastened upon the object—or rather the scene and moment—to be charactered, as it was upon Don Juan or Till. Not yet had he acquired the habit of writing about himself, or of thinking in the terms of the universe, that are not always to the good in "Zarathustra" and "Heldenleben." Again, if the hearer will, he may count "Death and Transfiguration" the rounding-out of a Straussian as well as a Lisztian period. Of course there are "weak passages." Bülow discovered them as long ago as 1889 when Strauss took him to his rooms in Munich and "played over" the unpublished score. Others have been indicating them ever since; while some of our more rampageous youngsters would have the whole tone-poem such. We moderates may find them where we choose—as likely as not upon some of the pages of the delirious struggle with death. At this late day a fury of fifths rends neither the ear nor the heart.

Enough, however, remains, especially when, as yesterday, "Death and Transfiguration" stood compared. There is no questioning the hushed, mordant, ominous power of the beginning. In those first pages, even as in "Don Juan," Strauss lays irresistible hold upon his hearers. The pages of childhood remembered are of the Strauss who out of simplicities could then distill a touching beauty. The pages of the struggle to achieve are already sounding with the high heroic Strauss who was to flower in the more knightly passages of "Don Quixote"; while not yet do personal excesses—as on occasion in "Heldenleben" and "The Domestica"—distort them. To these purple passages yesterday, the hearer had reason to add the music of transfiguration. It can be made to sound as a mere brazen pomp of tone—an orchestra over-blowing and over-scraping in C major. It can also seem a heaven-scaling, heaven-opening music with feet tethered to immediate and "tremendous" effect in the concert-hall. Mr. Koussevitzky chose to subdue it; to give it an inner breadth and strength, exaltation and nobility. It hymned not an orchestral melodrama; but the passing and the transfiguring of a hero, his life lived, his work done, both as best he might. And now the sweat of battle washed from his hands, the tears of defeat from his eyes, he enters into the peace of the Divine Justice, without which men may not go on with living. The tone of the orchestra was like the glow of sunset uppiled in the red and gold, the blue and white, of a windless West. In his days in Boston Mr. Koussevitzky has seldom seemed a conductor of more discerning and accomplishing imagination. For by his mingled force and measure he was here transforming a music into something above itself.

Throughout the tone-poem that measure did it equal service, though some, no doubt, will judge Mr. Koussevitzky's version subdued and reticent. Death need not smite the great drum or shriek out of muted trumpets to be dreadsome. It also stalks in the wainscot and pads across the floor, to be known by the mortal chill. Dying men dream to themselves of boyhood, and there are only tears to turn their eyes more misty. They fight over their good fights and may clench only tremulous hands. Even so with Strauss's tone-poem. There are conductors who will have it melodrama and assail the skies; conductors also, like Mr. Koussevitzky, who prefer it as poetry. And with reason. Play "Death and Transfiguration" in the melodramatic vein—and the listener says to himself "Ah yes! the last of the Lisztians" and begins to turn the essay with which the editor has diversified the program-book. Play it in Mr. Koussevitzky's vein—and then comes the greater than Liszt, who is Strauss.

Upon the prefatory numbers, as they seemed, when this ending of the concert had nearly effaced them, it is not necessary to descant. The elderly gentlemen and the elect ladies of these matinées, accustomed to receive anything signed Peter Iljitsch Chaikovsky with transport, heard his Fantasia elate; would not stay their hands until they had fetched the conductor in and out and brought the orchestra to its feet. Students of applause, however, remarked that rather little of this clapping proceeded from the upper balcony, where such youth as frequents these Fridays most foregathers. Perhaps they also were wrestling with a problem besetting some of their elders. Play the Fourth, Fifth or the Sixth Symphony of Chaikovsky—and not much more of him is seriously played nowadays—and they are still warmly alive. Like or dislike them, they remain complete and full-bodied musical entities. The composer fulfills his design; bends the chosen medium to his purpose. The tonal vesture accords with the musical and emotional content; from it takes shape, body, color.

Not so, with the two moribund orchestral fantasias—"Romeo and Juliet" and "Francesca da Rimini"—when, as yesterday, some devoted conductor on occasion revives them. Then—and to more than one who listens—the harmonic dress seems thin and characterless; the instrumental coloring, pale and sapless. Transitions creak; melodies labor at their song; measures of tumult beat the empty air; hollow within are not only the emotional climaxes, but the whole course and body of the music. To such listeners the fantasia of yesterday seemed a Romeo and Juliet become tonal phantoms skurrying this way and that across a void, tinged only for interest and salvation with the Chaikovskian melancholy. From first measure to last there is nothing in it to compare with the entrance and the substance of the love-theme that out of "Francesca"—thin, halting stuff as it also has become—still haunts the ear. Between two stools, the Fantasias fall. They are not in themselves romantic masterpieces; nor like the three Symphonies are they intensive and lasting expression of a temperament and an imagination that have touched, world-wide, human ears and hearts.

By all odds conductors should foster native composers and the indomitable Koussevitzky has yet to flag at the task. Yet would to Euterpe, who may still preside over the exercise of the tone-art, that these composers rose oftener to the measure of opportunity. Undoubtedly Mr. Hanson's Nordic Symphony sounds; through far too much of it he keeps the orchestra going full tilt, for contrast breaking off abruptly into the stripped sonorities of a few voices; then as suddenly returning to the tonal mass. Clearly enough it is well-made, gaining symphonic form by the cyclic process, much in vogue ten or fifteen years back in which time Mr. Hanson seems curiously to have his musical being. His harmonies, timbres, sonorities, all belong to that day when a thick, luxuriant, tonal texture was current and seldom questioned mode. Taking thought and experiencing emotion, he dips plentifully and unconcealingly into the common stock of music. Unless they are frank modernists, it is the way of the younger men; while, for the most part, the modernists themselves cannot keep their fingers out of Stravinsky and Schönberg.

Between dips, however, Mr. Hanson fails to distribute as many and as suggestive musical inventions of his own as he well might do; while in the best of them Swedish folk-song avowedly aids him. As for Nordic moods—solemn, austere, surging, battling, peaceful, wistful, what not—it is rather a pity that the common musical mind associates them, from a Second Symphony even through a Seventh, with one, Jan Sibelius, solitary maker and master of music in our time, between whom and Mr. Hanson there is inevitably a great gulf fixed. . . . Yet the production of the Nordic Symphony brought, or should have brought, to the audience one desirable enlightenment. It outdid itself in zeal for Mr. Hanson. Yet how differently it plays under Mr. Koussevitzky!

H. T. P.

"Request Program"

Innovation for the Final Pair of Symphony Concerts

THE first audience at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon discovered in the program-books, as the second audience will this evening, a leaflet of invitation to assist in the framing of the final program of the orchestral year. Under three heads—Symphonies, Tone-Poems, Music in Other Forms — were listed most of the numbers played during the current season. Under each head, the subscriber was bidden to check whatever piece he would most willingly hear again; then deposit or post his ballot. From the results of the vote Mr. Koussevitzky will assemble the four items for the concerts of April 26 and 27.

Such balloting is innovation at Symphony Hall and no one yesterday seemed to know who had proposed it. Of old it was an annual incident in the concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra. More recently it was discarded there as unbecoming a full-grown, high-placed orchestra and its audiences. How it will fare in Boston and what the balloting may imply will be watched with curiosity and amusement.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

140

TRANS. APR 4 1923

Round of The Concert-Halls, News-Gathering

Dr. Hanson's New Symphony, Honors for Leo Schulz, Items of The Day

ONCE AGAIN, at the Symphony Concerts of this week, the American composer has an inning. This time he is Dr. Howard Hanson, Director of the Eastman School of Music in Rochester. The work to be played is his Nordic Symphony, Op. 21, in E minor. He himself will be the conductor. Dr. Hanson is still a young man in his early thirties. He came out of Nebraska, born of Swedish-American stock. East and West, from the Institute of Musical Art in New York city to the College of The Pacific in California, he made his musical studies and practised his calling as musician-teacher. In 1921 he received a fellowship in the American Academy at Rome where he dwelt and worked through three years. Then and there he began his career as composer and from this Roman residence date the compositions which have been oftenest played and by which he is best known. Upon his return to the United States he was appointed Director of the Eastman School where he has done not a little to encourage and enlighten the younger American composers by test-performances of their larger works. Northwestern University gave him the honorary degree, Doctor of Music.

The Nordic Symphony is the first of three symphonic pieces written during the stay at Rome. The other two are entitled "North and West" and "Lux Æterna." The Nordic Symphony was first played at Rome in the spring of 1923. It has since been heard in Rochester, St. Louis, Kansas City, San Francisco. There are three movements: I.—Andante solenne—Allegro con forza: II.—Andante teneramente con semplicita. III.—Allegro con fuoco—Finale. They are dedicated respectively to Frederick Lamond, the eminent pianist, of the elder generation, to the composer's mother, to his father. Dr. Hanson has characterized the three movements as follows: The first "austere, a movement of struggle, of dramatic intensity"; the second in a "mood of gentle sadness and yearning"; the third, with four measures reminiscent of a motif out of "Die Walküre" for introduction, "energetic, powerful." The ensuing Finale serves as epitome and climax to the whole Symphony. All the themes appear; the orchestration grows in magnificence; the close spares neither the pomp nor the power of sound.

Further informative description is contained in a review from the San Francisco Examiner, written by Mr. Redfern Mason, the leading commentator and chronicler of music on the Pacific Coast: "Recent use of the word 'Nordic' has seemed to imply a rather unjust discrimination against Southrons. But Hanson's ideal is racially specific. Its music sings the experience, the longings and the spirit of the people from whom he sprang. Beginning it in Rome before he had ever seen the Sweeden of his forefathers, when he came to visit the old home of his people he found to his delight that his dreams were true.

"The land of lake and mountain and shaggy pine forests, seen under the gray of that northern mist which makes the sunlight pallid, breathes its spirit through the opening movement, and breathes it with a rare eloquence. The composer is establishing his milieu, as a playwright would say, and the grave notes of the 'cello tell their story of loveliness and brooding persuasively. The horns speak their sense of distance and mystery; the reeds were full of echoes of tarn and woodland; the strings shimmered.

"The slow movement is in the mood of sentiment. The composer has dedicated it to his mother, and it tells of the things a child learns in his mother's arms, at the chimney corner in the twilight. Then comes an Allegro con fuoco, ushered in by a quotation from 'The Valkyrs' Ride.' Here you get the sense of the toil of the race, the work it has to do among the peoples of the world. The music is energetic, almost Berserk; and Hanson, a long, athletic figure of a man, hung [illegible] he players till he made one think of some viking of long ago urging on the rowers of a pirate ship. Hanson's music is strong, vital, impregnated with the spirit of a man desperately in earnest It is written because the composer had something to say, which it was important for him to utter. It is virile, stern, but with moments of lyric ecstasy and tenderness that go straight to the heart." A. H. M.

Leo Schulz Takes Leave

Years ago, when Arthur Nikisch [illegible] conductor, Leo Schulz began [illegible] as violoncellist in the Boston Orchestra. There he played for sundry seasons; then departed to New York to be first violoncellist of the Philharmonic Society. Since the turn of the century he has filled this chair—until on Monday last he took formal leave of the orchestra, withdrawing at his own request into modest retirement. In the tours of the Philharmonic Society he has often revisited Boston; at each return a remembered and recognized figure.

Down They Go

The unamiable but amusing process of putting other eminent conductors in their place beside the "incomparable" Toscanini continues briskly in New York. The other day, as noted in these columns, it was the turn of Mr. Koussevitzky and whoever heeded might learn how inferior is his version of Prokoffiev's "Classical Symphony" to that brought to pass by the Italian master. Mr. Koussevitzky, at least, is in the prime of his powers and at the full flood of his career. Now it appears that even the gray head of Dr. Muck is not to be spared. Last week Mr. Toscanini led the Philharmonic Society through the Prelude and the "Good-Friday Music" out of "Parsifal," joining the two with one of the motivs, sounded off-stage by the brass. The distinguished reviewer for The Times remembered "no performance of the 'Parsifal' music characterized by such mysterious beauty and poignancy of feeling, none in which every slightest suggestion of color and nuance in the score was so completely realized in performance."

Then came the ominous recollection of the music-drama from the hands of Dr. Muck at Baireuth and there [illegible] of adjustments, viz.: "The writer has been fortunate in hearing performances of 'Parsifal' by Karl Muck, and had deemed these performances almost the ne plus ultra of interpretation as regards this particular work. And indeed Dr. Muck's 'Parsifal' is an achievement that stands wholly by itself among the great musical deeds of the period. Reference is made to it in order to emphasize the nobility, the spirituality, the haunting beauty of tone and loftiness of conception which characterized the interpretation of the excerpts played last night by Mr. Toscanini."

Fortunate Muck thus to enhance the greater glory of the illustrious Italians! . . . Next season, if present arrangements hold, he will lead the Philharmonic Society through sixteen weeks. Inevitably during that time he will be heard in music in which other eminent conductors have sought, as best they might, to excel. And one by one, if the present fashion holds, it will be their lot to stand in humble but illuminating background around Mr. Toscanini. Why not begin with Dr. Mengelberg of Amsterdam, whose hapless fate it is to be locum tenens until "the master" arrives?

Incidents and Prospects

Next week Mr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra make their final journey, for the season, to New York. At both the concerts there, they will be heard in Beethoven's Choral Symphony with the choir of the Schola Cantorum assisting. Emanuel Bach's Concerto for Orchestra will be preface. In forty years, never before have the Bostonians carried the Symphony to New York.

On its autumn tour next season the Symphony Orchestra will revisit Chicago where two years ago conductor and band carried all before them. For the first time since Dr. Muck's day these journeys to Chicago promise to become an established item in the Bostonian itinerary. On the other side of the account, it is

Programs to Hand

TRANS APR 5 1923

From Mr. Koussevitzky for the final supplementary matinée of the Symphony on Tuesday, April 23:

Suite in E minor for String Orchestra . . . Foote
Prelude to Mallarmé's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of A Faun" . . . . . Debussy
Scherzo, after Goethe "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" . . . . . Dukas
Symphony in E minor, No. 5 . . . . . Tchaikovsky

Symphony

Considerable Glory for One, Doktor Strauss

TRANS.—APR 6

With Mr. Koussevitzky Aiding, He Effaces Chaikovsky And Another

THEN CAME Richard Strauss; by no means the Strauss of the greater tone-poems; only the Strauss of "Death and Transfiguration." Yet over a Symphony Concert that began with Chaikovsky's Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" and proceeded with Mr. Howard Hanson's "Nordic Symphony," the lesser Strauss loomed large. Beside his last three Symphonies, the Russian's fantasia as tone-poem seemed thin and faded—a music out of which vitality has steadily ebbed. Though Mr. Hanson conducting, and the orchestra with him, lashed themselves, his tonal homage to Scandinavia proved neither individual nor impressive. Modernism or no modernism, he scores as neither elder nor younger composers write in this present day. Through two-thirds of the concert, it was as though we listeners had been thrust back into the end of the nineteenth century and had found the experience none too enjoyable. Then along came Strauss with "Death and Transfiguration" (1888-89) and, at last that distant time vindicated itself.

Nowadays, it is rather the fashion to write deprecatingly of this tone-poem. As some say, with "The Domestica" and the "Alpine Symphony," it is wearing least well of that far-spreading line. Certainly, it lacks the fire, the pungency, the sense of a young musical athlete trying and proving his mettle, that the earlier "Don Juan" and "Till Eulenspiegel" still diffuse. Nor does it attain the breadth of design and variety of accomplishment, the wealth of creative energy, the scope and power of musical characterization, that endure through "Zarathustra," "Heldenleben" and "Don Quixote." If the hearer will, he may believe "Death and Transfiguration," the last of the Lisztian tone-poems; whereas the following three were the breeding ground of the cosmic swarm that in the fullness of time set the modernists in revolt against such form and substance. Certainly the music of transfiguration might have made Liszt, who loved apotheoses, turn in an envious grave. Certainly, again, Strauss's eye is as firmly fastened upon the object—or rather the scene and moment—to be charactered, as it was upon Don Juan or Till. Not yet had he acquired the habit of writing about himself, or of thinking in the terms of the universe, that are not always to the good in "Zarathustra" and "Heldenleben." Again, if the hearer will, he may count "Death and Transfiguration" the rounding-out of a Straussian as well as a Lisztian period. Of course there are "weak passages." Bülow discovered them as long ago as 1889 when Strauss took him to his rooms in Munich and "played over" the unpublished score. Others have been indicating them ever since; while some of our more rampageous youngsters would have the whole tone-poem such. We moderates may find them where we choose—as likely as not upon some of the pages of the delirious struggle with death. At this late day a fury of fifths rends neither the ear nor the heart.

Enough, however, remains, especially when, as yesterday, "Death and Transfiguration" stood compared. There is no questioning the hushed, mordant, ominous power of the beginning. In those first pages, even as in "Don Juan," Strauss lays irresistible hold upon his hearers. The pages of childhood remembered are of the Strauss who out of simplicities could then distill a touching beauty. The pages of the struggle to achieve are already sounding with the high heroic Strauss who was to flower in the more knightly passages of "Don Quixote"; while not yet do personal excesses—as on occasion in "Heldenleben" and "The Domestica"—distort them. To these purple passages yesterday, the hearer had reason to add the music of transfiguration. It can be made to sound as a mere brazen pomp of tone—an orchestra over-blowing and over-scraping in C major. It can also seem a heaven-scaling, heaven-opening music with feet tethered to immediate and "tremendous" effect in the concert-hall. Mr. Koussevitzky chose to subdue it; to give it an inner breadth and strength, exaltation and nobility. It hymned not an orchestral melodrama; but the passing and the transfiguring of a hero, his life lived, his work done, both as best he might. And now the sweat of battle washed from his hands, the tears of defeat from his eyes, he enters into the peace of the Divine Justice, without which men may not go on with living. The tone of the orchestra was like the glow of sunset uppiled in the red and gold, the blue and white, of a windless West. In his days in Boston Mr. Koussevitzky has seldom seemed a conductor of more discerning and accomplishing imagination. For by his mingled force and measure he was here transforming a music into something above itself.

Throughout the tone-poem that measure did it equal service, though some, no doubt, will judge Mr. Koussevitzky's version subdued and reticent. Death need not smite the great drum or shriek out of muted trumpets to be dreadsome. It also stalks in the wainscot and pads across the floor, to be known by the mortal chill. Dying men dream to themselves of boyhood, and there are only tears to turn their eyes more misty. They fight over their good fights and may clench only tremulous hands. Even so with Strauss's tone-poem. There are conductors who will have it melodrama and assail the skies; conductors also, like Mr. Koussevitzky, who prefer it as poetry. And with reason. Play "Death and Transfiguration" in the melodramatic vein—and the listener says to himself "Ah yes! the last of the Lisztians" and begins to turn the essay with which the editor has diversified the program-book. Play it in Mr. Koussevitzky's vein—and then comes the greater than Liszt, who is Strauss.

Upon the prefatory numbers, as they seemed, when this ending of the concert had nearly effaced them, it is not necessary to descant. The elderly gentlemen and the elect ladies of these matinées, accustomed to receive anything signed Peter Iljitsch Chaikovsky with transport, heard his Fantasia elate; would not stay their hands until they had fetched the conductor in and out and brought the orchestra to its feet. Students of applause, however, remarked that rather little of this clapping proceeded from the upper balcony, where such youth as frequents these Fridays most foregathers. Perhaps they also were wrestling with a problem besetting some of their elders. Play the Fourth, Fifth or the Sixth Symphony of Chaikovsky—and not much more of him is seriously played nowadays—and they are still warmly alive. Like or dislike them, they remain complete and full-bodied musical entities. The composer fulfills his design; bends the chosen medium to his purpose. The tonal vesture accords with the musical and emotional content; from it takes shape, body, color.

Not so, with the two moribund orchestral fantasias—"Romeo and Juliet" and "Francesca da Rimini"—when, as yesterday, some devoted conductor on occasion revives them. Then—and to more than one who listens—the harmonic dress seems thin and characterless; the instrumental coloring, pale and sapless. Transitions creak; melodies labor at their song; measures of tumult beat the empty air; hollow within are not only the emotional climaxes, but the whole course and body of the music. To such listeners the fantasia of yesterday seemed a Romeo and Juliet become tonal phantoms skurrying this way and that across a void, tinged only for interest and salvation with the Chaikovskian melancholy. From first measure to last there is nothing in it to compare with the entrance and the substance of the love-theme that out of "Francesca"—thin, halting stuff as it also has become—still haunts the ear. Between two stools, the Fantasias fall. They are not in themselves romantic masterpieces; nor like the three Symphonies are they intensive and lasting expression of a temperament and an imagination that have touched, world-wide, human ears and hearts.

By all odds conductors should foster native composers and the indomitable Koussevitzky has yet to flag at the task. Yet would to Euterpe, who may still preside over the exercise of the tone-art, that these composers rose oftener to the measure of opportunity. Undoubtedly Mr. Hanson's Nordic Symphony sounds; through far too much of it he keeps the orchestra going full tilt, for contrast breaking off abruptly into the stripped sonorities of a few voices; then as suddenly returning to the tonal mass. Clearly enough it is well-made, gaining symphonic form by the cyclic process, much in vogue ten or fifteen years back in which time Mr. Hanson seems curiously to have his musical being. His harmonies, timbres, sonorities, all belong to that day when a thick, luxuriant, tonal texture was current and seldom questioned mode. Taking thought and experiencing emotion, he dips plentifully and unconcealingly into the common stock of music. Unless they are frank modernists, it is the way of the younger men; while, for the most part, the modernists themselves cannot keep their fingers out of Stravinsky and Schönberg.

Between dips, however, Mr. Hanson fails to distribute as many and as suggestive musical inventions of his own as he well might do; while in the best of them Swedish folk-song avowedly aids him. As for Nordic moods—solemn, austere, surging, battling, peaceful, wistful, what not—it is rather a pity that the common musical mind associates them, from a Second Symphony even through a Seventh, with one, Jan Sibelius, solitary maker and master of music in our time, between whom and Mr. Hanson there is inevitably a great gulf fixed. . . . Yet the production of the Nordic Symphony brought, or should have brought. to the audience one desirable enlightenment. It outdid itself in zeal for Mr. Hanson. Yet how differently it plays under Mr. Koussevitzky' H. T. P.

"Request Program"

Innovation for the Final Pair of Symphony Concerts

THE first audience at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon discovered in the program-books, as the second audience will this evening, a leaflet of invitation to assist in the framing of the final program of the orchestral year. Under three heads—Symphonies, Tone-Poems, Music in Other Forms — were listed most of the numbers played during the current season. Under each head, the subscriber was bidden to check whatever piece he would most willingly hear again; then deposit or post his ballot. From the results of the vote Mr. Koussevitzky will assemble the four items for the concerts of April 26 and 27.

Such balloting is innovation at Symphony Hall and no one yesterday seemed to know who had proposed it. Of old it was an annual incident in the concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra. More recently it was discarded there as unbecoming a full-grown, high-placed orchestra and its audiences. How it will fare in Boston and what the balloting may imply will be watched with curiosity and amusement.

HANSON CONDUCTS HIS OWN SYMPHONY

American Composer Guest at Symphony Concert

Koussevitzky Leads Tchaikovsky and Strauss Pieces

Globe Apr. 6

Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, N Y, conducted his own "Nordic Symphony" as guest at yesterday's Symphony concert. Mr Koussevitzky led the other pieces on the program, Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantasia; and Richard Strauss' "Tod und Verklaerung."

The programs included a ballot for request numbers for the final concerts in the series, when Mr Koussevitzky plans to repeat pieces played this season. Such a request program has long been a feature of the Pop concert programs, but this is the first time one has been offered at the regular Symphony concerts. Mr Stokowski offers such a program in Philadelphia, however.

Born at Wahoo, Neb, in 1896, of Swedish ancestry, Mr Hanson has studied at the Institute of Musical Art in New York, at Northwestern University and at the American Academy in Rome. He holds the degree of doctor of music from Northwestern University, Syracuse University and the Horner Institute in Kansas City. His favorite composers are Grieg and Handel. This information is gleaned from a program note he furnished Mr Hale for this week's program books.

"Nordic Symphony"

The "Nordic Symphony," written at the age of 22, is less modern in idiom than the tone poem, "Pan and the Priest," played here by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra in 1926. The composer describes its form as "freely classical." The freedom is more noticeable than the classicism. He writes of the first movement that it is "strongly Nordic in character," speaks of the "wistful sadness" of the slow movement, acknowledges the borrowing of a Swedish folk tune in the third movement, "rugged and fiery in spirit," and explains that the finale completes the cyclical character of the whole work and serves as a coda.

This symphony obviously pleased many in yesterday's audience. The composer was recalled three times, and brought the orchestra to its feet to share the hearty and prolonged applause. Its general style recalls the music of Henry Hadley. There is much emphasis on musical material seldom striking or memorable in itself. Arranged for string quartet, most of the work would sound insignificant. It is the sonority and power of the orchestra that carry it. There are, however, some genuinely poetic and imaginative passages, such as the coda of the first movement, a portion of the third movement, and the close of the whole work.

Mr Hanson, tall, slender, clumsy in gestures, conducts with earnestness and enthusiasm. One wondered whether his failure to establish and preserve tempo was intentional. One could not feel that this symphony had great musical interest. Its style is influenced too strongly by Grieg in the slower, softer portions and by Tchaikovsky in the febrile allegros. As the work of a boy of 22 it shows talent and promise. But why did not Mr Hanson, more than a decade later, have something better and more up-to-date to offer us?

Unified Program

Yesterday's turned out to be one of the few unified programs Mr Koussevitzky has offered here. Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet," with which the concert began, set the tone. Its violent contrasts, emotional outbursts, voluptuous melodies alternating with passages of sound and fury, have a spiritual affinity with the music of Hanson and Strauss that followed. This is "fin de siecle" music, coming at the end of the 19th century rather than the beginning of the 20th, following in the wake of Beethoven and Wagner, rather than anticipating Stravinsky and Bartok.

Strauss' tone poem of "Death and Transfiguration," written in 1888 at the age of 24, is a mature and powerful work which yesterday sounded better than it really is. The history of music offers so many instances of young geniuses like Strauss, who, when they grow old, no longer compose works that stir the human heart, that one wondered rather idly yesterday whether the customary lamentations over the premature death of Schubert, Chopin, Mozart and so many others are justified. They at least died before, like Strauss, they wrote themselves out. Turn to literature for an analogy. Would not Wordsworth's fame as a poet be even greater had he only died in 1815 instead of in 1850?

Next week the orchestra goes away on tour. The program now announced for April 19 and 20 includes a new tone poem by Werner Josten, Faure's "Elegy" for 'cello solo and orchestra, Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson" and Schumann's Rhenish Symphony.

P. R.

HANSON AT HELM WITH SYMPHONY

Post Apr. 6

His Nordic Symphony Played Under His Direction

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

By way of incident and novelty the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon offered the first Boston performance of Howard Hanson's Nordic Symphony with the composer conducting. The rest, under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction, was a glorification of the familiar; in other words, Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet," and "Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" in performances of superb eloquence and tonal magnificence.

A TRIBUTE TO SWEDES

Dr. Hansen, director of the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, and previously known to Boston as composer by a performance of his "Pan and the Priest," at the hands of a visiting orchestra, is now in his 33d year. His Nordic Symphony was written some eight years ago at Rome, where the composer was enjoying the benefits of fellowship at the American academy. The piece may then be set down as a youthful effort, even though some composers, Richard Strauss among them, have reached maturity with the turning of the quarter century mark.

In this Symphony in which, on his own authority, he pays tribute to the race of his fathers, (Dr. Hansen, although a Nebraskan by birth, is of Swedish descent), he writes as a young man in the pride and joy of his youth, with a prodigious gusto, with a love of orchestral sound and fury, with an enthusiasm that carries him through many a ticklish situation, and with a pardonable lack of self-criticism. Giving himself up to the expression of sentiment in his Andante, Dr. Hansen does not escape sentimentality. And if in his music he would be consciously Nordic, he yet cannot exclude from his musical consciousness the Czech Dvorak, let us say, or the Slavic Tchaikovsky.

Cordially Received

Not a piece to live with is Dr. Hansen's Symphony, but the first impression of it is, on the whole, not unagreeable despite occasional ineptitudes and banalities. Tall, spare and angular, Dr. Hansen conducts somewhat effusively, but not ineffectually, and the orchestra yesterday met his ardors halfway. A pleased audience returned Dr. Hansen more than once to the stage. He in his turn bade the players rise and bow.

More than once in the past Mr. Koussevitzky had given us a reading of Tchaikovsky's Overture-Fantasy as impassioned as that of yesterday. But not before had he so completely realized the possibilities and potentialities of Strauss' tone-poem.

Technically the performance of "Death and Transfiguration" was notable for its lucid exposition of the musical structure, the never-failing beauty of the instrumental tone. Emotionally this performance drained the music dry, made vivid and gripping its drama. And yesterday, for the first time since Dr. Muck took his departure, an audience in Symphony Hall heard the climax of the transfiguration section reared and cumulated as the composer imagined it, with sonority heaped upon sonority till the listening mind and ear could hold no more.

In cool reflection "Death and Transfiguration" may be set down as of the less distinguished, less individual Strauss. Before a performance such as that of yesterday such criticism is stilled, place the credit where you will.

Boston Hears Hanson Lead "Nordic" Symphony

No conductor, probably, is more receptive to the work of American composers than Serge Koussevitzky. A check-up of the current season happens to be facilitated by a slip inserted in the program book of the twenty-second pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, announcing that the final program of the season will be chosen by the audiences. For this purpose the roster of composers represented during the season is printed thereon. In a list of 55, there are 10 Americans; surely a generous proportion.

Number nine of those thus honored was introduced yesterday afternoon as conductor of one of his own compositions. This was Dr. Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music in Rochester, N. Y., and the work he had elected to submit was his "Nordic" Symphony, the earliest of his major products, having been composed when he was but 21 years old, and first performed under his direction by the orchestra of the Augusteo in Rome, where he resided three years as fellow of the American Academy in Rome.

The symphony, which was heard yesterday for the first time in Boston, emerged as a full-voiced piece of music excellently put together according to the cyclical form. Although so young when he wrote it, Dr. Hanson evidently had not lent his ear to the blandishments of the modernists, for there is nothing in the work which could offend the dignity of a Friday afternoon audience in Symphony Hall. Not only is it exceedingly tuneful, but it reveals a familiarity with the sonorous possibilities of the several instrumental choirs. Furthermore, it contains no trace of the attitude of elegant disdain which might have been expected from a youth of the twentieth century. On the contrary, the composer obviously has carried enthusiastically into his score the motto on its flyleaf, "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of Life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God."

It is not unnatural that there should be elements reminiscent not only of Wagner, whose "Walküre" is quoted, but also of other of the great composers of the past. These merely go to show that Dr. Hanson at the time had learned well his lessons. He has added to these elements an emotional quality of his own which by virtue of its sincerity and its fluent expression is bound to carry a strong appeal. It did so yesterday, when the composer was recalled several times to the stage by applause which he finally shared with the orchestra—a fitting tribute, for it is doubtful if Dr. Hanson ever before had secured or heard so eloquent an utterance of his measures. Nor should we omit to say that the composer proved himself an uncommonly efficient conductor.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who thus graciously yielded up his dais for the central item of the program, occupied it for the opening number, Tchaikovsky's Overture - Fantasia, "Roméo et Juliette," and for the closing contribution, the Strauss "Tod und Verklärung." These two works were read with astute regard to their several natures, and published both subtly and brilliantly. The conductor's fidelity to the composer's intention was particularly in evidence in the Strauss, where any possible temptation to theatricalism was sternly put aside in favor of a restraint that achieved a far more telling effect.

L. A. S.

MONITOR APR 6 '29

1410

Herald Apr 6

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The 22nd concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 48th season, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Tchaikovsky, Overture—Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" (after Shakespeare). Hanson, Nordic Symphony, E minor. Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration."

Mr. Hanson, who conducted his symphony, which was played for the first time in Boston, was born at Wahoo, Nebraska, in 1896. He studied composition in this country and at Rome, having won a fellowship in the American Academy of that city. He is now the director of the Eastman School of Music of the University of Rochester, N. Y.

This symphony, the first of his larger compositions, was first performed at Rome by the orchestra of the Augusteo under his direction. It has been played by leading orchestras of this country. It has a motto: "To him that overcometh will I give. To eat out of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God." There is little in the music that suggests the Fields of the Blessed, but the strenuous character of the composition, one may fairly say its violence, may be intended to portray a struggle after the manner of Jacob wrestling with the angel, though they perhaps were quieter in the control of their breath. There were boisterous moments yesterday when the composer almost overcame the audience.

He was a young man when he wrote this symphony. Young composers often mistake noise for strength and constant feverishness for emotion. It has been said that the first movement is "strongly Nordic in character, singing of the solemnity, austerity and grandeur of the north, of its restless surging and strife, of its sombreness and melancholy." It was a large undertaking to express all this in tones. One wished that Mr. Hanson had chosen to "Mediterraneanize" his music (to borrow Nietzsche's pet word). It is not necessary to ask whether the workmanship displayed the thematic invention and development is of an individual character; it is enough to say that we found little that is imaginative, poetic or eloquent in this first movement or in those that followed; and in the second movement inscribed to the composer's mother and in the third dedicated to his father there is little that is truly emotional. The whole symphony is yeasty. It lacks significantly contrasting pages. There is little relief from the prevailing storm and stress, either in the musical contents or in the orchestral dress. The symphony was favorably received by the audience which was no doubt impressed by the orchestral bombardment; by the Bombastes Furioro spirit of the composer.

Mr. Hanson was unfortunate in this: His symphony was placed between the superb fantasia of Tchaikovsky and the dramatic tone-poem of Strauss. Perhaps the latter has aged a little. The death of the sufferer is long delayed; the fever chart shows surprising variations in temperature. The "Transfiguration" section is nobly planned; yet this tone-poem will no doubt be forgotten in the concert hall when "Till Eulenspiegel" and "Don Juan" will still be fresh, brilliant and entrancing.

"Romeo and Juliet" has been performed here many times since Arthur Nikisch brought it out in 1890. Even his interpretation was less poetic and compelling than Mr. Koussevitzky's yesterday, an incomparable performance by its dramatic intensity; by its singing of the appealing, haunting Love Theme, from its announcement to the amorous frenzy that took no heed of earthly woes and inevitable death; by the sombreness of the introductory foreboding measures; by the fiery street scenes in Verona with the clashing of rival houses and their sword thrusts; by the overwhelming climaxes so skilfully prepared by Mr. Koussevitzky. There was infinite care in the treatment of details, without interruption of the tragic development to the simple, pathetic final measure.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program of April 19-20 will be as follows: Josten, "Concerto Sacro" for strings and piano (Mr. Josten is of the music department at Smith College); G. Faure, Elegy for violoncello and orchestra (Mr. Bedetti, violoncellist); Loeffler, "La Bonne Chanson." Schumann, Symphony No. 3, E flat major "Rhenish."

For the final program of the season (the Boston Symphony concerts of Friday afternoon, April 26, and Saturday evening, April 27) Mr. Koussevitzky will repeat those pieces, played in the course of the season, which the public of these concerts signify as their choice. The program books of yesterday and tonight contain classified lists of the works performed. Those wishing to vote should check one number in each list. The slips will serve as ballots—they may be signed or not as the voters please—and may be dropped in a box which has been placed in a box which has been placed in the corridor for the purpose, or may be mailed to Serge Koussevitzky, Symphony hall, Boston, not later than April 13.

SYMPHONY IN BRILLIANT CONCERT

By MOSES SMITH

Bos. Amer 6-1929

The opening number of this week's Symphony program is Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliette" Overture-Fantasia, which is given a superb performance by the orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky. He succeeds in wringing out the last emotional drop from the score without overdoing things, somehow; and the listener, under the spell of this glowing performance, cannot help but place this score almost at the very top among Tchaikovsky's works.

The one flaw is that Koussevitzky takes the earlier, noisy, vulgar ending, rather than the later, more artistic, quieter one. Furthermore so intensely is the listener affected by the beauty and power of the rendition that he has little taste for settling down to an unfamiliar symphony, even though it is by an American composer, Howard Hanson, and its performance is conducted by its creator.

This "Nordic" Symphony is an ambitious, rather romantic project, written by Hanson when he was only 22 years old. As a sort of museum exhibit, showing the talent of a young composer, it is an excellent thing. As a work of art, standing on its own legs, it has considerably less merit. But it was sincere, which most contemporary music is not, and it was not a bore. The composer was saying something—relatively unimportant, but something. He conducted with extraordinary enthusiasm, and the audience applauded him enthusiastically.

Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" was the second half of the program, with Mr. Koussevitzky at the top of his mettle again. His interpretation emphasized the poetic content of the music. The orchestra played brilliantly, as it did throughout the concert.

HANSON CONDUCTS HIS OWN SYMPHONY

American Composer Guest at Symphony Concert

Koussevitzky Leads Tchaikovsky and Strauss Pieces

Globe Apr. 6

Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, N Y, conducted his own "Nordic Symphony" as guest at yesterday's Symphony concert. Mr Koussevitzky led the other pieces on the program, Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantasia; and Richard Strauss' "Tod und Verklaerung."

The programs included a ballot for request numbers for the final concerts in the series, when Mr Koussevitzky plans to repeat pieces played this season. Such a request program has long been a feature of the Pop concert programs, but this is the first time one has been offered at the regular Symphony concerts. Mr Stokowski offers such a program in Philadelphia, however.

Born at Wahoo, Neb, in 1896, of Swedish ancestry, Mr Hanson has studied at the Institute of Musical Art in New York, at Northwestern University and at the American Academy in Rome. He holds the degree of doctor of music from Northwestern University, Syracuse University and the Horner Institute in Kansas City. His favorite composers are Grieg and Handel. This information is gleaned from a program note he furnished Mr Hale for this week's program books.

"Nordic Symphony"

The "Nordic Symphony," written at the age of 22, is less modern in idiom than the tone poem, "Pan and the Priest," played here by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra in 1926. The composer describes its form as "freely classical." The freedom is more noticeable than the classicism. He writes of the first movement that it is "strongly Nordic in character," speaks of the "wistful sadness" of the slow movement, acknowledges the borrowing of a Swedish folk tune in the third movement, "rugged and fiery in spirit," and explains that the finale completes the cyclical character of the whole work and serves as a coda.

This symphony obviously pleased many in yesterday's audience. The composer was recalled three times, and brought the orchestra to its feet to share the hearty and prolonged applause. Its general style recalls the music of Henry Hadley. There is much emphasis on musical material seldom striking or memorable in itself. Arranged for string quartet, most of the work would sound insignificant. It is the sonority and power of the orchestra that carry it. There are, however, some genuinely poetic and imaginative passages, such as the coda of the first movement, a portion of the third movement, and the close of the whole work.

Mr Hanson, tall, slender, clumsy in gestures, conducted with earnestness and enthusiasm. One wondered whether his failure to establish and preserve tempo was intentional. One could not feel that this symphony had great musical interest. Its style is influenced too strongly by Grieg in the slower, softer portions and by Tchaikovsky in the febrile allegros. As the work of a boy of 22 it shows talent and promise. But why did not Mr Hanson, more than a decade later, have something better and more up-to-date to offer us?

Unified Program

Yesterday's turned out to be one of the few unified programs Mr Koussevitzky has offered here. Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet," with which the concert began, set the tone. Its violent contrasts, emotional outbursts, voluptuous melodies alternating with passages of sound and fury, have a spiritual affinity with the music of Hanson and Strauss that followed. This is "fin de siecle" music, coming at the end of the 19th century rather than the beginning of the 20th, following in the wake of Beethoven and Wagner, rather than anticipating Stravinsky and Bartok.

Strauss' tone poem of "Death and Transfiguration," written in 1888 at the age of 24, is a mature and powerful work which yesterday sounded better than it really is. The history of music offers so many instances of young geniuses like Strauss, who, when they grow old, no longer compose works that stir the human heart, that one wondered rather idly yesterday whether the customary lamentations over the premature death of Schubert, Chopin, Mozart and so many others are justified. They at least died before, like Strauss, they wrote themselves out. Turn to literature for an analogy. Would not Wordsworth's fame as a poet be even greater had he only died in 1815 instead of in 1850?

Next week the orchestra goes away on tour. The program now announced for April 19 and 20 includes a new tone poem by Werner Josten, Faure's "Elegy" for 'cello solo and orchestra, Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson" and Schumann's Rhenish Symphony.

P. R.

HANSON AT HELM WITH SYMPHONY

Post Apr. 6

His Nordic Symphony Played Under His Direction

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

By way of incident and novelty the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon offered the first Boston performance of Howard Hanson's Nordic Symphony with the composer conducting. The rest, under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction, was a glorification of the familiar; in other words, Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet," and "Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" in performances of superb eloquence and tonal magnificence.

A TRIBUTE TO SWEDES

Dr. Hansen, director of the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, and previously known to Boston as composer by a performance of his "Pan and the Priest," at the hands of a visiting orchestra, is now in his 33d year. His Nordic Symphony was written some eight years ago at Rome, where the composer was enjoying the benefits of fellowship at the American academy. The piece may then be set down as a youthful effort, even though some composers, Richard Strauss among them, have reached maturity with the turning of the quarter century mark.

In this Symphony in which, on his own authority, he pays tribute to the race of his fathers, (Dr. Hansen, although a Nebraskan by birth, is of Swedish descent), he writes as a young man in the pride and joy of his youth, with a prodigious gusto, with a love of orchestral sound and fury, with an enthusiasm that carries him through many a ticklish situation, and with a pardonable lack of self-criticism. Giving himself up to the expression of sentiment in his Andante, Dr. Hansen does not escape sentimentality. And if in his music he would be consciously Nordic, he yet cannot exclude from his musical consciousness the Czech Dvorak, let us say, or the Slavic Tchaikovsky.

Cordially Received

Not a piece to live with is Dr. Hansen's Symphony, but the first impression of it is, on the whole, not unagreeable despite occasional ineptitudes and banalities. Tall, spare and angular, Dr. Hansen conducts somewhat effusively, but not ineffectually, and the orchestra yesterday met his ardors halfway. A pleased audience returned Dr. Hansen more than once to the stage. He in his turn bade the players rise and bow.

More than once in the past Mr. Koussevitzky had given us a reading of Tchaikovsky's Overture-Fantasy as impassioned as that of yesterday. But not before had he so completely realized the possibilities and potentialities of Strauss' tone-poem.

Technically the performance of "Death and Transfiguration" was notable for its lucid exposition of the musical structure, the never-failing beauty of the instrumental tone. Emotionally this performance drained the music dry, made vivid and gripping its drama. And yesterday, for the first time since Dr. Muck took his departure, an audience in Symphony Hall heard the climax of the transfiguration section reared and cumulated as the composer imagined it, with sonority heaped upon sonority till the listening mind and ear could hold no more.

In cool reflection "Death and Transfiguration" may be set down as of the less distinguished, less individual Strauss. Before a performance such as that of yesterday such criticism is stilled, place the credit where you will.

Boston Hears Hanson Lead "Nordic" Symphony

No conductor, probably, is more receptive to the work of American composers than Serge Koussevitzky. A check-up of the current season happens to be facilitated by a slip inserted in the program book of the twenty-second pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, announcing that the final program of the season will be chosen by the audiences. For this purpose the roster of composers represented during the season is printed thereon. In a list of 55, there are 10 Americans; surely a generous proportion.

Number nine of those thus honored was introduced yesterday afternoon as conductor of one of his own compositions. This was Dr. Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music in Rochester, N. Y., and the work he had elected to submit was his "Nordic" Symphony, the earliest of his major products, having been composed when he was but 21 years old, and first performed under his direction by the orchestra of the Augusteo in Rome, where he resided three years as fellow of the American Academy in Rome.

The symphony, which was heard yesterday for the first time in Boston, emerged as a full-voiced piece of music excellently put together according to the cyclical form. Although so young when he wrote it, Dr. Hanson evidently had not lent his ear to the blandishments of the modernists, for there is nothing in the work which could offend the dignity of a Friday afternoon audience in Symphony Hall. Not only is it exceedingly tuneful, but it reveals a familiarity with the sonorous possibilities of the several instrumental choirs. Furthermore, it contains no trace of the attitude of elegant disdain which might have been expected from a youth of the twentieth century. On the contrary, the composer obviously has carried enthusiastically into his score the motto on its flyleaf, "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of Life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God."

It is not unnatural that there should be elements reminiscent not only of Wagner, whose "Walküre" is quoted, but also of other of the great composers of the past. These merely go to show that Dr. Hanson at the time had learned well his lessons. He has added to these elements an emotional quality of his own which by virtue of its sincerity and its fluent expression is bound to carry a strong appeal. It did so yesterday, when the composer was recalled several times to the stage by applause which he finally shared with the orchestra—a fitting tribute, for it is doubtful if Dr. Hanson ever before had secured or heard so eloquent an utterance of his measures. Nor should we omit to say that the composer proved himself an uncommonly efficient conductor.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who thus graciously yielded up his dais for the central item of the program, occupied it for the opening number, Tchaikovsky's Overture - Fantasia, "Roméo et Juliette," and for the closing contribution, the Strauss "Tod und Verklärung." These two works were read with astute regard to their several natures, and published both subtly and brilliantly. The conductor's fidelity to the composer's intention was particularly in evidence in the Strauss, where any possible temptation to theatricalism was sternly put aside in favor of a restraint that achieved a far more telling effect.

L. A. S.

MONITOR APR 6 '29

Herald Apr 6

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The 22nd concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 48th season, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Tchaikovsky, Overture—Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" (after Shakespeare). Hanson, Nordic Symphony, E minor. Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration."

Mr. Hanson, who conducted his symphony, which was played for the first time in Boston, was born at Wahoo, Nebraska, in 1896. He studied composition in this country and at Rome, having won a fellowship in the American Academy of that city. He is now the director of the Eastman School of Music of the University of Rochester, N. Y.

This symphony, the first of his larger compositions, was first performed at Rome by the orchestra of the Augusteo under his direction. It has been played by leading orchestras of this country. It has a motto: "To him that overcometh will I give. To eat out of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God." There is little in the music that suggests the Fields of the Blessed, but the strenuous character of the composition, one may fairly say its violence, may be intended to portray a struggle after the manner of Jacob wrestling with the angel, though they perhaps were quieter in the control of their breath. There were boisterous moments yesterday when the composer almost overcame the audience.

He was a young man when he wrote this symphony. Young composers often mistake noise for strength and constant feverishness for emotion. It has been said that the first movement is "strongly Nordic in character, singing of the solemnity, austerity and grandeur of the north, of its restless surging and strife, of its sombreness and melancholy." It was a large undertaking to express all this in tones. One wished that Mr. Hanson had chosen to "Mediterraneanize" his music (to borrow Nietzsche's pet word). It is not necessary to ask whether the workmanship displayed the thematic invention and development is of an individual character; it is enough to say that we found little that is imaginative, poetic or eloquent in this first movement or in those that followed; and in the second movement inscribed to the composer's mother and in the third dedicated to his father there is little that is truly emotional. The whole symphony is yeasty. It lacks significantly contrasting pages. There is little relief from the prevailing storm and stress, either in the musical contents or in the orchestral dress. The symphony was favorably received by the audience which was no doubt impressed by the orchestral bombardment; by the Bombastes Furioro spirit of the composer.

Mr. Hanson was unfortunate in this: His symphony was placed between the superb fantasia of Tchaikovsky and the dramatic tone-poem of Strauss. Perhaps the latter has aged a little. The death of the sufferer is long delayed; the fever chart shows surprising variations in temperature. The "Transfiguration" section is nobly planned; yet this tone-poem will no doubt be forgotten in the concert hall when "Till Eulenspiegel" and "Don Juan" will still be fresh, brilliant and entrancing.

"Romeo and Juliet" has been performed here many times since Arthur Nikisch brought it out in 1890. Even his interpretation was less poetic and compelling than Mr. Koussevitzky's yesterday, an incomparable performance by its dramatic intensity; by its singing of the appealing, haunting Love Theme, from its announcement to the amorous frenzy that took no heed of earthly woes and inevitable death; by the sombreness of the introductory foreboding measures; by the fiery street scenes in Verona with the clashing of rival houses and their sword thrusts; by the overwhelming climaxes so skilfully prepared by Mr. Koussevitzky. There was infinite care in the treatment of details, without interruption of the tragic development to the simple, pathetic final measure.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program of April 19-20 will be as follows: Josten, "Concerto Sacro" for strings and piano (Mr. Josten is of the music department at Smith College); G. Faure, Elegy for violoncello and orchestra (Mr. Bedetti, violoncellist); Loeffler, "La Bonne Chanson." Schumann, Symphony No. 3, E flat major "Rhenish."

For the final program of the season (the Boston Symphony concerts of Friday afternoon, April 26, and Saturday evening, April 27) Mr. Koussevitzky will repeat those pieces, played in the course of the season, which the public of these concerts signify as their choice. The program books of yesterday and tonight contain classified lists of the works performed. Those wishing to vote should check one number in each list. The slips will serve as ballots—they may be signed or not as the voters please—and may be dropped in a box which has been placed in a box which has been placed in the corridor for the purpose, or may be mailed to Serge Koussevitzky, Symphony hall, Boston, not later than April 13.

SYMPHONY IN BRILLIANT CONCERT

Bos. Amer 6-1929

By MOSES SMITH

The opening number of this week's Symphony program is Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliette" Overture-Fantasia, which is given a superb performance by the orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky. He succeeds in wringing out the last emotional drop from the score without overdoing things, somehow; and the listener, under the spell of this glowing performance, cannot help but place this score almost at the very top among Tchaikovsky's works.

The one flaw is that Koussevitzky takes the earlier, noisy, vulgar ending, rather than the later, more artistic, quieter one. Furthermore so intensely is the listener affected by the beauty and power of the rendition that he has little taste for settling down to an unfamiliar symphony, even though it is by an American composer, Howard Hanson, and its performance is conducted by its creator.

This "Nordic" Symphony is an ambitious, rather romantic project, written by Hanson when he was only 22 years old. As a sort of museum exhibit, showing the talent of a young composer, it is an excellent thing. As a work of art, standing on its own legs, it has considerably less merit. But it was sincere, which most contemporary music is not, and it was not a bore. The composer was saying something—relatively unimportant, but something. He conducted with extraordinary enthusiasm, and the audience applauded him enthusiastically.

Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" was the second half of the program, with Mr. Koussevitzky at the top of his mettle again. His interpretation emphasized the poetic content of the music. The orchestra played brilliantly, as it did throughout the concert.

142

MUSIC AND MUS

GLOBE APR 7 1929

Music Notes and Comment

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be out of town this week, paying its last visit of the season to New York, where Mr Koussevitzky has put Beethoven's Ninth Symphony on the programs. The soloists will be the same as those heard in the recent performances here, but the chorus will be from the Schola Cantorum, trained by Hugh Ross. For the 23d pair of concerts here, April 19 and 20, Mr Koussevitzky now proposes a program including a piece for string orchestra by Werner Josten, Faure's "Elegie," with cello solo by Jean Bedetti, Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson"; and Schumann's Third Symphony, in E flat, called "Rhenish." This list is subject to change with or without notice, as the railway timetables have it.

The 44th season of Pop concerts will begin at Symphony Hall, Wednesday, May 1, with Alfredo Casella returning for his third season as conductor. The orchestra is to number 80 players. This announcement in the Symphony programs apparently disposes of the recurrent rumors that the Boston Symphony and Koussevitzky would make a European tour this season, such as the one to be made by the New York Philharmonic Symphony under Toscanini.

The program announced for the final Tuesday Symphony concert, April 23, includes Arthur Foote's suite for strings, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

Koussevitzky Leads Here Saturday

Boston Orchestra's Last Visit Features Ninth of Beethoven

N.Y. World APR 7 -

BEETHOVEN'S "Choral" symphony, in which Serge Koussevitzky will be heard for the first time in New York, will be the feature of both concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. This will be this orchestra's last visit to New York of the season. In the performance of this work, the choral part will be taken by the Schola Cantorum, which has been trained by Hugh Ross. The quartet of soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van Der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, bass.

At each performance the symphony will be preceded by an orchestral concerto in D major by Philip Emanuel Bach, which has been reorchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK AMERICAN
APR 2 - 19..

Serge Koussevitzky Dined by Bohemians

At the Hotel Commodore, The Bohemians gave a dinner, smoker, and concert last evening for Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. About 200 members and guests were present, the only ladies being Mme. Josef Lhevinne, Mme. Lea Luboschutz, and Mme. Nina Koshetz, all of whom participated in the programme.

Boston Symphony Deficit

The programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are carrying, week by week, an appeal from the trustees of the orchestra for contributions to the annual deficit, estimated at $135,000 on the current season. Up to the end of March $89,682.67 had been pledged, leaving a balance of more than $45,000 still to be raised.

The trustees' appeal follows:

"The trustees are gratified with the greatly increased number of subscribers to the annual deficit fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Since printing an appeal in the Symphony program book of Feb 8-9, there have been 239 additional subscribers, making a total of 594 subscribers up to this time.

"This is still a small part of the total number of those who enjoy the symphony concerts and it is sincerely hoped that during the coming month this number will be materially increased.

Frederick P. Cabot, president; Ernest B. Dane, M. A. DeWolfe Howe, Frederick E. Lowell, Edward M. Pickman, N. Penrose Hallowell, John E. Lodge, Arthur Lyman, Henry B. Sawyer, Bentley W. Warren.

The trustees also ask for gifts to the permanent endowment fund of the orchestra. This fund amounts all told to $379,550.15, carried on the books under four heads, three of which perpetuate the names of individual benefactors. The income of this sum is far short of the amount needed to make up the difference between annual income and annual expenses. Until the endowment reaches a figure many times the present sum, Boston's greatest musical institution will go on living from hand to mouth.

Endowment Needed

The tickets for the subscription series here and in New York invariably sell out at the prices asked, which amount to from about 75 cents to over $3 per single ticket. But to secure seats one must subscribe for the season. The deficit is not caused by any lack of popular support for the concerts. The waiting list for next season is already long enough to absorb most, if not all, of the limited number of tickets that will be released by failure of the present holders to renew their annual subscription.

The audiences number well over 5000 subscribers to the Friday-Saturday series of 24 Boston concerts, the same number to the five Monday and five Tuesday concerts and a similar number in New York. If only the 5000 subscribers to the 24 Boston concerts would each contribute a $10 gift, the deficit could now be met for this season, thanks to the generosity of the 594 donors who have already shouldered the major portion of the burden.

There is no doubt that the deficit on the present season will somehow be met. But while the orchestra lives from hand to mouth there will always be doubt of its permanence. Suppose Mr Koussevitzky should leave, something he has no present intention of doing, and it should then be impossible to replace him by a conductor of equal drawing power at the box office, what would happen?

If Mr Stokowski should leave the Philadelphia Orchestra and no equally popular conductor took his place, the future of that organization would still be assured by the endowment fund of over $2,000,000, raised some years ago.

Perhaps in times to come the Boston Symphony will also boast an adequate permanent endowment.

Meanwhile, subscriptions to the annual deficit and to the endowment fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should be sent to E. B. Dane, treasurer, at 6 Beacon st, Boston.

29, 1928 Globe Dec 21

TOCH CONCERTO AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Sanroma Applauded in Difficult Solo Part

J. A. Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" and Sibelius' Third Symphony Heard

Jesus Maria Sanroma, young Porto Rican pianist who received most of his musical education in Boston, was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert. He was warmly applauded for his brilliant and musicianly playing of the exacting solo part in Ernst Toch's Concerto, new to Boston.

Mr Koussevitzky repeated his eloquent interpretation of Sibelius' Third Symphony, first heard at the concerts of Nov 9 and 10. The concluding number was the excerpts from John Alden Carpenter's ballet "Skyscrapers," played here a year ago. The incidental solos were sung by Marie Sundelius and Joseph Lautner.

Mr Sanroma spent last season in Europe studying under Cortot and Schnabel and giving recitals in various cities. It was apparent from the opening measures of the concerto yesterday that his art has matured. He has always played deftly, with a fine command of rhythm, and a cultivated feeling for melody. To these gifts he has now added the ability to dramatize music. His style has gained breadth and depth. He is now an artist to be reckoned with, on the threshold of what should prove a notable career.

Toch's concerto, written in 1926, has been played in Berlin and Chicago by Elly Ney, at the Frankfort music festival by Walter Frey, and in Paris by Mr Sanroma. It has the conventional three movements, an allegro in first movement form, a romantic slow movement strongly recalling Debussy, and a scherzo finale, entitled by the composer "rondino disturbato."

Toch's music is original without freakishness, the work of a modernist who knows the best that has been written by his predecessors and contemporaries, yet has something of his own to say which he utters convincingly. A seeker for reminiscences could readily trace the influence of a dozen masters in this score, Bach, Wagner, Schoenberg, Debussy, Brahms, Bartok, Stravinsky, and so on. Yet there is no borrowed material. Toch, like Handel and many another of the great classics, has merely taken his own where he found it, fusing many styles into a new one.

The first movement stimulates the listener by its powerfully built climaxes in which the piano part is interwoven with the orchestra. The development recalls Bach rather than Beethoven. Toch uses polyharmony and polytonality that Bach would never have ventured or approved, but his working out of his material is polyphonic.

The slow movement has the whole tone scale, with the shimmering evanescent harmonies that to a modern listener now always recall Debussy. Yet very little of the music is actually like Debussy. Toch has borrowed the idiom to express his own emotions, his own ideas.

The finale is a sprightly and amusing little rondo, in which the final statement of the chief theme is delayed and disturbed by a mock heroic interruption. As a whole, this concerto is unusually interesting music, which ought to become part of the standard orchestral repertory. It is not a mere show piece, yet it affords a pianist ample opportunity to display his prowess. The performance was eloquent.

Mr Koussevitzky's genius for creative interpretation has never been better illustrated than by his reading of Sibelius' Third Symphony, dismissed as a failure by other conductors these 20 years past. Out of a rather baffling score he produces brilliant, glowing music, with a plaintive folk tune slow movement between two sonorous allegros. He probably achieves this triumph by taking liberties with Sibelius' directions about tempi, dynamics, and so so.

But it is Koussevitzky quite as much as Sibelius who is here the creator. In this instance a listener who intensely dislikes Koussevitzky's creative talents when they are displayed in the form of new readings of Beethoven, Mozart and Schubert can only praise, admire, and be grateful. The classics can and should speak for themselves. But Sibelius in his Third Symphony couldn't, without Koussevitzky's help.

The excerpts from "Skyscrapers" heard yesterday again proved Mr Carpenter's talent for writing "highbrow jazz," a talent akin to and perhaps equal to that shown by Mr Geshwin in his now celebrated "Rhapsody in Blue." Koussevitzky strove valiantly to get the orchestra into the swing of the rhythms.

The orchestra will be away next week. The composer Honegger will conduct as guest Jan 11 and 12 a program of his works.

P. R.

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, gave the 11th concert of its 48th season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Sibelius, Symphony No. 3; Toch, concerto for piano and orchestra, op 38 (First time in Boston); Carpenter, "Skyscrapers", (A ballet of modern American life). Mr. Sanroma was the solo pianist. The few measures for soprano and tenor in "Skyscrapers," were sung by Marie Sundelius and Joseph Lautner.

Toch's concerto, composed in the spring of 1926 was performed for the first time in this country at a concert of the Chicago Symphony orchestra on Feb. 3, 1928. Elly Ney was the pianist. She had played the piano part in Berlin on April 23, 1927. This is said to have been the first performance; but it is also said that there was a prior one at Duesseldorf in October of the year before, when Mr. Gieseking was the pianist.

The concerto is intensely modern. Not because the piano is only an instrument in a symphonic ensemble, for the piano has often been treated in this manner; but because the composer is of the "atonal and polytonal" school, shunning every musical expression that is obvious and might be anticipated; not anxious about sensuous measures that would please the ladies; reckless in his employment of dissonances. Changing the pace at will and snapping his fingers at traditional form. For all this the concerto, no doubt, will shock those characterized by Mr. Daniel Gregory Mason as "moronic conservatives" and throw the "moronic radicals" into spasms of delight.

It is an interesting work, not impressive, not beautiful, in the accepted meaning of the word, though the second movement contains pages of wild, irregular, desultory beauty, not emotional in any deep or sentimental way; it is interesting if only for its frenzied recklessness, for its agreeable impudence, for curious tricks in the instrumentation. The first movement is not an easy nut for any audience to crack unless it should be a special one composed exclusively of those who regard even Debussy and Ravel as old fogies; despise all inventors of tunes from Mozart to Bax, and applaud rapturously music that secretly bores them or rasps their nerves. There is poetry in the second movement; humor in the riotously jolly finale, the "allegro disturbato." The composer calls on the conductor to join in his practical joke, by stopping the performance and saying a few words to the players.

Mr. Sanroma played here in public for the first time since his return from Europe, where he studied with Schnabel of Berlin and Cortot of Paris. He was coached for this concerto by Toch and was the pianist when Mr. Koussevitzky produced the concerto in Paris last May. Mr. Sanroma's excellence as a musical pianist was gratefully acknowledged in Boston before he went abroad for further study. Yesterday the composer gave him only the opportunity of displaying brilliant technical proficiency, and a charming touch in the less robust or screaming measures. There was little or no opportunity for emotional display.

The repetition of the symphony already performed this season, was welcome, for the music has an imaginative quality that was not dissipated by a second hearing. The admiration that the symphony excited last November for the originality of the thought and the expression was yesterday increased not diminished, but the third movement still seemed an inadequate ending of the noble work; a movement not so firmly knit, not planned on so high a plane as those that precede it.

Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" fares better when it is taken from the theatre into the concert hall than many ballets; it is less dependent apparently on action, scenery and costumes. It is an amusing work, amusing in the best sense; exterior music when deprived of the action, adroitly conceived and executed, with the introduction of a few sentimental pages and many of "near-jazz," with the joyous strains for saxophones. Would Mr. Carpenter have written the music that gives the impression of building, riveting and all that, had he not had Stravinsky in mind? If it were so, it would detract from the general effect of the work. The performance was greatly enjoyed by the audience, and with good cause.

This interesting concert, interesting by reason of the compositions and the high quality of interpretation and technical performance, will be repeated tonight.

As the orchestra will give concerts in New York, Brooklyn and Springfield next week, the 12th pair in Boston will be on Jan. 11, 12, when Arthur Honegger will conduct, as a guest. The program will comprise these works by him: Chant de Nigumon, Pastorale d'Ete, Horace Victorieux, Concertino for piano (Mme. Andree Vaurabourg Honegger, pianist) and orchestra; Nocturne from the opera "Judith" (Mme. Cobina Wright, soprano) and "Rugby."

CON. FROM PAGE 52

Wilfrid Goldsmith

SYMPHONY SPRINGS A SENSATION

Tock's Concerto With Sansoma at Piano Arouses

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

From three moderns: the Finnish Sibelius, the Austrian Toch and the American Carpenter came the programme of yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert. Of the three pieces from these contemporary hands one was new to Boston, namely, Toch's Piano Concerto, in which Jesus Sanroma bore the solo part, and which created the sensation that it has everywhere made during its bare two years of existence.

VITALITY OF TOCH'S MUSIC

For a time it seemed that the long maintained musical supremacy of the Teutonic countries had passed to some other lands, to France, perhaps, to Italy or to Russia, according to one's point of view. But in Paul Hindemith of Frankfurt, and in Ernest Toch, who now lives and works at Mannheim, Germany, has two composers who bid fair to win back for her the musical crown. Certainly in the five seasons that he has been conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, who is more assiduous than most in his devotion to the music of our own time, has brought forward no modernist piece more significant, more indicative of a great creative energy than Toch's Concerto of yesterday.

Even those to whom the modern tonal speech is as yet not wholly intelligible could not have failed to feel yesterday the enormous vitality that resides in Toch's music, its tremendous driving power, or have been deaf, for that matter, to the charm of his Adagio, in which the composer, for all his audacity, his impatience and independence of rules and formulas, seems not to have forgotten the heritage of beauty and expressiveness that is rightfully his.

Studied With Composer

Greatly exacting of conductor, orchestra and soloist, the Concerto received yesterday what may be safely termed a superb performance. Absent from Boston for 18 months, during which time he has studied with European teachers, incidentally studying this particular Concerto with Toch himself, Mr. Sanroma has returned to us a pianist of uncommon ability.

There was far more than mere competence in his playing yesterday of this exceedingly difficult composition; there was authority and mastery, intellectual as well as technical. An unusual display of enthusiasm rewarded his efforts.

Sibelius' Third

The noble Third Symphony of Sibelius, belatedly introduced to Boston earlier in the present season and repeated yesterday in a performance that, if possible, excelled its predecessors, began the concert, and Mr. Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," ballet of American work and play, brought it to a close. The voices of the colored singers in the "jazzy" Coney Island episode were safely entrusted yesterday to Marie Sundelius and Joseph Lautner. Better even than before the orchestra caught the spirit of this music which is authentically the voice of present-day America, palpitatingly alive and not a little vulgar.

1421

MUSIC AND MUS

29, 1928 Globe Jan 29

GLOBE APR 7 1929

Music Notes and Comment

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be out of town this week, paying its last visit of the season to New York, where Mr Koussevitzky has put Beethoven's Ninth Symphony on the programs. The soloists will be the same as those heard in the recent performances here, but the chorus will be from the Schola Cantorum, trained by Hugh Ross. For the 23d pair of concerts here, April 19 and 20, Mr Koussevitzky now proposes a program including a piece for string orchestra by Werner Josten, Faure's "Elegie," with cello solo by Jean Bedetti, Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson"; and Schumann's Third Symphony, in E flat, called "Rhenish." This list is subject to change with or without notice, as the railway timetables have it.

The 44th season of Pop concerts will begin at Symphony Hall, Wednesday, May 1, with Alfredo Casella returning for his third season as conductor. The orchestra is to number 80 players. This announcement in the Symphony programs apparently disposes of the recurrent rumors that the Boston Symphony and Koussevitzky would make a European tour this season, such as the one to be made by the New York Philharmonic Symphony under Toscanini.

The program announced for the final Tuesday Symphony concert, April 23, includes Arthur Foote's suite for strings, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

Boston Symphony Deficit

The programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are carrying, week by week, an appeal from the trustees of the orchestra for contributions to the annual deficit, estimated at $135,000 on the current season. Up to the end of March $89,682.67 had been pledged, leaving a balance of more than $45,000 still to be raised.

The trustees' appeal follows:

"The trustees are gratified with the greatly increased number of subscribers to the annual deficit fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Since printing an appeal in the Symphony program book of Feb 8-9, there have been 239 additional subscribers, making a total of 594 subscribers up to this time.

"This is still a small part of the total number of those who enjoy the symphony concerts and it is sincerely hoped that during the coming month this number will be materially increased.

Frederick P. Cabot, president; Ernest B. Dane, M. A. DeWolfe Howe, Frederick E. Lowell, Edward M. Pickman, N. Penrose Hallowell, John E. Lodge, Arthur Lyman, Henry B. Sawyer, Bentley W. Warren.

The trustees also ask for gifts to the permanent endowment fund of the orchestra. This fund amounts all told to $379,550.15, carried on the books under four heads, three of which perpetuate the names of individual benefactors. The income of this sum is far short of the amount needed to make up the difference between annual income and annual expenses. Until the endowment reaches a figure many times the present sum, Boston's greatest musical institution will go on living from hand to mouth.

Endowment Needed

The tickets for the subscription series here and in New York invariably sell out at the prices asked, which amount to from about 75 cents to over $3 per single ticket. But to secure seats one must subscribe for the season. The deficit is not caused by any lack of popular support for the concerts. The waiting list for next season is already long enough to absorb most, if not all, of the limited number of tickets that will be released by failure of the present holders to renew their annual subscription.

The audiences number well over 5000 subscribers to the Friday-Saturday series of 24 Boston concerts, the same number to the five Monday and five Tuesday concerts and a similar number in New York. If only the 5000 subscribers to the 24 Boston concerts would each contribute a $10 gift, the deficit could now be met for this season, thanks to the generosity of the 594 donors who have already shouldered the major portion of the burden.

There is no doubt that the deficit on the present season will somehow be met. But while the orchestra lives from hand to mouth there will always be doubt of its permanence. Suppose Mr Koussevitzky should leave, something he has no present intention of doing, and it should then be impossible to replace him by a conductor of equal drawing power at the box office, what would happen?

If Mr Stokowski should leave the Philadelphia Orchestra and no equally popular conductor took his place, the future of that organization would still be assured by the endowment fund of over $2,000,000, raised some years ago.

Perhaps in times to come the Boston Symphony will also boast an adequate permanent endowment.

Meanwhile, subscriptions to the annual deficit and to the endowment fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should be sent to E. B. Dane, treasurer, at 6 Beacon st, Boston.

Koussevitzky Leads Here Saturday

Boston Orchestra's Last Visit Features Ninth of Beethoven

N.Y. WORLD APR 7 -

BEETHOVEN'S "Choral" symphony, in which Serge Koussevitzky will be heard for the first time in New York, will be the feature of both concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. This will be this orchestra's last visit to New York of the season. In the performance of this work, the choral part will be taken by the Schola Cantorum, which has been trained by Hugh Ross. The quartet of soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van Der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, bass.

At each performance the symphony will be preceded by an orchestral concerto in D major by Philip Emanuel Bach, which has been reorchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK AMERICAN

Serge Koussevitzky Dined by Bohemians

At the Hotel Commodore, The Bohemians gave a dinner, smoker, and concert last evening for Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. About 200 members and guests were present, the only ladies being Mme. Josef Lhevinne, Mme. Lea Luboscnutz, and Mme. Nina Koshetz, all of whom participated in the programme.

TOCH CONCERTO AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Sanroma Applauded in Difficult Solo Part

J. A. Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" and Sibelius' Third Symphony Heard

Jesus Maria Sanroma, young Porto Rican pianist who received most of his musical education in Boston, was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert. He was warmly applauded for his brilliant and musicianly playing of the exacting solo part in Ernst Toch's Concerto, new to Boston.

Mr Koussevitzky repeated his eloquent interpretation of Sibelius' Third Symphony, first heard at the concerts of Nov 9 and 10. The concluding number was the excerpts from John Alden Carpenter's ballet "Skyscrapers," played here a year ago. The incidental solos were sung by Marie Sundelius and Joseph Lautner.

Mr Sanroma spent last season in Europe studying under Cortot and Schnabel and giving recitals in various cities. It was apparent from the opening measures of the concerto yesterday that his art has matured. He has always played deftly, with a fine command of rhythm, and a cultivated feeling for melody. To these gifts he has now added the ability to dramatize music. His style has gained breadth and depth. He is now an artist to be reckoned with, on the threshold of what should prove a notable career.

Toch's concerto, written in 1926, has been played in Berlin and Chicago by Elly Ney, at the Frankfort music festival by Walter Frey, and in Paris by Mr Sanroma. It has the conventional three movements, an allegro in first movement form, a romantic slow movement strongly recalling Debussy, and a scherzo finale, entitled by the composer "rondino disturbato."

Toch's music is original without freakishness, the work of a modernist who knows the best that has been written by his predecessors and contemporaries, yet has something of his own to say which he utters convincingly. A seeker for reminiscences could readily trace the influence of a dozen masters in this score, Bach, Wagner, Schoenberg, Debussy, Brahms, Bartok, Stravinsky, and so on. Yet there is no borrowed material. Toch, like Handel and many another of the great classics, has merely taken his own where he found it, fusing many styles into a new one.

The first movement stimulates the listener by its powerfully built climaxes in which the piano part is interwoven with the orchestra. The development recalls Bach rather than Beethoven. Toch uses polyharmony and polytonality that Bach would never have ventured or approved, but his working out of his material is polyphonic.

The slow movement has the whole tone scale, with the shimmering evanescent harmonies that to a modern listener now always recall Debussy. Yet very little of the music is actually like Debussy. Toch has borrowed the idiom to express his own emotions, his own ideas.

The finale is a sprightly and amusing little rondo, in which the final statement of the chief theme is delayed and disturbed by a mock heroic interruption. As a whole, this concerto is unusually interesting music, which ought to become part of the standard orchestral repertory. It is not a mere show piece, yet it affords a pianist ample opportunity to display his prowess. The performance was eloquent.

Mr Koussevitzky's genius for creative interpretation has never been better illustrated than by his reading of Sibelius' Third Symphony, dismissed as a failure by other conductors these 20 years past. Out of a rather baffing score he produces brilliant, glowing music, with a plaintive folk tune slow movement between two sonorous allegros. He probably achieves this triumph by taking liberties with Sibelius' directions about tempi, dynamics, and so so.

But it is Koussevitzky quite as much as Sibelius who is here the creator. In this instance a listener who intensely dislikes Koussevitzky's creative talents when they are displayed in the form of new readings of Beethoven, Mozart and Schubert can only praise, admire, and be grateful. The classics can and should speak for themselves. But Sibelius in his Third Symphony couldn't, without Koussevitzky's help.

The excerpts from "Skyscrapers" heard yesterday again proved Mr Carpenter's talent for writing "high-brow jazz," a talent akin to and perhaps equal to that shown by Mr Gershwin in his now celebrated "Rhapsody in Blue." Koussevitzky strove valiantly to get the orchestra into the swing of the rhythms.

The orchestra will be away next week. The composer Honegger will conduct as guest Jan 11 and 12 a program of his works. P. R.

MUSIC

Globe Jan 29

BOSTON SYMPHONY

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, gave the 11th concert of its 48th season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Sibelius, Symphony No. 3; Toch, concerto for piano and orchestra, op 38 (First time in Boston); Carpenter, "Skyscrapers" (A ballet of modern American life). Mr. Sanroma was the solo pianist. The few measures for soprano and tenor in "Skyscrapers," were sung by Marie Sundelius and Joseph Lautner.

Toch's concerto, composed in the spring of 1926 was performed for the first time in this country at a concert of the Chicago Symphony orchestra on Feb. 3, 1923. Elly Ney was the pianist. She had played the piano part in Berlin on April 23, 1927. This is said to have been the first performance; but it is also said that there was a prior one at Duesseldorf in October of the year before, when Mr. Gieseking was the pianist.

The concerto is intensely modern. Not because the piano is only an instrument in a symphonic ensemble, for the piano has often been treated in this manner; but because the composer is of the "atonal and polytonal" school, shunning every musical expression that is obvious and might be anticipated; not anxious about sensuous measures that would please the ladies; reckless in his employment of dissonances. Changing the pace at will and snapping his fingers at traditional form. For all this the concerto, no doubt, will shock those characterized by Mr. Daniel Gregory Mason as "moronic conservatives" and throw the "moronic radicals" into spasms of delight.

It is an interesting work, not impressive, not beautiful, in the accepted meaning of the word, though the second movement contains pages of wild, irregular, desultory beauty, not emotional in any deep or sentimental way; it is interesting if only for its frenzied recklessness, for its agreeable impudence, for curious tricks in the instrumentation. The first movement is not an easy nut for any audience to crack unless it should be a special one composed exclusively of those who regard even Debussy and Ravel as old fogies; despise all inventors of tunes from Mozart to Bax, and applaud rapturously music that secretly bores them or rasps their nerves. There is poetry in the second movement; humor in the riotously jolly finale, the "allegro disturbato." The composer calls on the conductor to join in his practical joke, by stopping the performance and saying a few words to the players.

Mr. Sanroma played here in public for the first time since his return from Europe, where he studied with Schnabel of Berlin and Cortot of Paris. He was coached for this concerto by Toch and was the pianist when Mr. Koussevitzky produced the concerto in Paris last May. Mr. Sanroma's excellence as a musical pianist was gratefully acknowledged in Boston before he went abroad for further study. Yesterday the composer gave him only the opportunity of displaying brilliant technical proficiency, and a charming touch in the less robust or screaming measures. There was little or no opportunity for emotional display.

The repetition of the symphony already performed this season, was welcome, for the music has an imaginative quality that was not dissipated by a second hearing. The admiration that the symphony excited last November for the originality of the thought and the expression was yesterday increased not diminished, but the third movement still seemed an inadequate ending of the noble work; a movement not so firmly knit, not planned on so high a plane as those that precede it.

Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" fares better when it is taken from the theatre into the concert hall than many ballets; it is less dependent apparently on action, scenery and costumes. It is an amusing work, amusing in the best sense; exterior music when deprived of the action, adroitly conceived and executed, with the introduction of a few sentimental pages and many of "near-jazz," with the joyous strains for saxophones. Would Mr. Carpenter have written the music that gives the impression of building, riveting and all that, had he not had Stravinsky in mind? If it were so, it would detract from the general effect of the work. The performance was greatly enjoyed by the audience, and with good cause.

This interesting concert, interesting by reason of the compositions and the high quality of interpretation and technical performance, will be repeated tonight.

As the orchestra will give concerts in New York, Brooklyn and Springfield next week, the 12th pair in Boston will be on Jan. 11, 12, when Arthur Honegger will conduct, as a guest. The program will comprise these works by him: Chant de Nigumon, Pastorale d'Ete, Horace Victorieux, Concertino for piano (Mme. Andree Vaurabourg Honegger, pianist) and orchestra; Nocturne from the opera "Judith" (Mme. Cobina Wright, soprano) and "Rugby."

SEE FROM PAGE 52

Globe Jan 29

Walter Goldsmith

SYMPHONY SPRINGS A SENSATION

Tock's Concerto With Sansoma at Piano Arouses

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

From three moderns: the Finnish Sibelius, the Austrian Toch and the American Carpenter came the programme of yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert. Of the three pieces from these contemporary hands one was new to Boston, namely, Toch's Piano Concerto, in which Jesus Sanroma bore the solo part, and which created the sensation that it has everywhere made during its bare two years of existence.

VITALITY OF TOCH'S MUSIC

For a time it seemed that the long maintained musical supremacy of the Teutonic countries had passed to some other lands, to France, perhaps, to Italy or to Russia, according to one's point of view. But in Paul Hindemith of Frankfurt, and in Ernest Toch, who now lives and works at Mannheim, Germany, has two composers who bid fair to win back for her the musical crown. Certainly in the five seasons that he has been conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, who is more assiduous than most in his devotion to the music of our own time, has brought forward no modernist piece more significant, more indicative of a great creative energy than Toch's Concerto of yesterday.

Even those to whom the modern tonal speech is as yet not wholly intelligible could not have failed to feel yesterday the enormous vitality that resides in Toch's music, its tremendous driving power, or have been deaf, for that matter, to the charm of his Adagio, in which the composer, for all his audacity, his impatience and independence of rules and formulas, seems not to have forgotten the heritage of beauty and expressiveness that is rightfully his.

Studied With Composer

Greatly exacting of conductor, orchestra and soloist, the Concerto received yesterday what may be safely termed a superb performance. Absent from Boston for 18 months, during which time he has studied with European teachers, incidentally studying this particular Concerto with Toch himself, Mr. Sanroma has returned to us a pianist of uncommon ability.

There was far more than mere competence in his playing yesterday of this exceedingly difficult composition; there was authority and mastery, intellectual as well as technical. An unusual display of enthusiasm rewarded his efforts.

Sibelius' Third

The noble Third Symphony of Sibelius, belatedly introduced to Boston earlier in the present season and repeated yesterday in a performance that, if possible, excelled its predecessors, began the concert, and Mr. Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," ballet of American work and play, brought it to a close. The voices of the colored singers in the "jazzy" Coney Island episode were safely entrusted yesterday to Marie Sundelius and Joseph Lautner. Better even than before the orchestra caught the spirit of this music which is authentically the voice of present-day America, palpitatingly alive and not a little vulgar.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Pop Concerts Commence Wednesday, May 1

AMER. APR 13

Wednesday, May 1, will be opening night of the Pop Concerts for the 44th season at Symphony Hall. The serious musical season then being over, this auditorium will be made festive with tables covering the floor, at which refreshments are to be served.

Alfredo Casella is now returning from his native Italy to conduct the Pops season. There will be light and varied programs and many nights of special interest.

Music Notes and Comment

GLOBE APR 14

Mr Koussevitzky has chosen as the novelty on this week's Symphony program a "Concerto Sacro" for string orchestra, by Werner Josten, now a member of the faculty at Smith College. He has not carried out the intention he confided to an interviewer at the beginning of the season of playing all of Schumann's symphonies, of which the first, in B flat, has alone figured on the programs. He will, however, play the third this week. The program for the final pair of concerts next week is to be made up of pieces requested by the subscribers, who are limited to numbers already played this season. One is willing to venture the guess that Tchaikovsky's Fifth will be the chosen symphony, though there are others one would rather hear.

Ninth in New York

Prelude APR 15 TRANS.

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY'S interpretation of the Ninth Symphony has long been a critical storm-center in Europe. For some, it is too emotional, suffers from "an attempt at more 'expression' than the music will bear," is over-stressed and over-romanticized. For others, it is a just revaluation of Beethoven—a "genuinely classic" reading, "since it places Beethoven before us in the composer's own image."

The critical air would be cleared if we should candidly admit that this whole question of the interpretation of masterworks is to a surprisingly large extent a matter of personal feeling and preference. . . . There is neither map nor guide, nor any certain path to follow, for the musical interpreter confronting a masterwork. The impressiveness of the account that he gives us will depend, for each of us, upon the extent to which we happen to share his temperamental and imaginative point of view. [Herald Tribune.

Essence

The special virtue of Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of The Ninth was that it gave us a curiously vivid sense of the subliminal quality of the greater portions of the work. Even though the tremendous first movement was somewhat reduced to scale and impact, the mysteriousness and the awe of the music spoke from the orchestra, and these things are of its essence. . . . The Nonth Symphony is full of the sense of that mystical real world, and of the quality of utterance that is proper to its perception. Like Paul, Beethoven uttered words that we had thought unspeakable. We are aware of Beethoven's travail, of his despair over the consciousness that what he perceived was unutterable; yet we, who listen, know that those words did actually pass his lips. Perhaps because he approached these great mysteries and clarities of Beethoven's imaginative world with simplicity of spirit, with honesty of purpose, with affection and with awe, Mr. Koussevitzky was able last night to give us so often a sense of the special quality of The Ninth—its strange blend of fatefulness and transport, wild humor and superterrestrial beauty, mystery and exaltation, its tragical despair and its shouting among the stars. [Herald Tribune

Climax

The slow movement was gloriously sung. Some prefer a broader tempo here, but it would be hard to surpass the warmth and expressiveness of the strings and the radiance of the coloring. The triumph of the performance was certainly the finale. Here the conductor's dramatic temperament, his personal ability to bring response from his interpretators, his instinct for effect, welded all the forces of interpretation into a single unit of will and feeling. Here again, Mr. Koussevitzky has his own ideas of tempo, nuance and the like. He conveyed them with such logic, such conviction, such imperious command of the other interpretors, that the finale had a wonderful sweep and length of line and cumulative power. It was not a series of episodes, an ineffectual warbling of the quartet one moment, then an instrumental interlude, then shouts from the chorus, then a variation for orchestra, and onward. The listeners did not gasp at the simple grandeur of Beethoven's "vor Gott," and marvel the next moment at the thinness of a passage of instrumentation.

Surely and grandly, and with the most dramatic punctuation, this movement gathered to its close. The chorus did not sing what it could sing, but what it had to sing. The quartet was a firmly sustained and adjusted part of a mighty ensemble, and under the circumstances acquitted itself with uncommon credit. Temperament, leadership, a dramatic vision conveyed the finale of the Ninth Symphony, and, assent or dissent of individuals to the contrary, profoundly impressed the audience. [Times

Cohesion

I have never heard a performance of the Ninth more persuasive of its merits than the one Mr. Koussevitzky gave us. The customary interpretation leaves the various movements so disjointed and of uneven development as to confirm the statement, said to have been made by Beethoven, that only his poverty compelled him to write it. Mr. Koussevitzky lent a homogeneity to the third movement which almost made one forget the sharp break in the score which makes that movement a strange marriage of two entirely unrelated themes. His deft embroidery of the three themes of the delightful Scherzo in the "dotted triplet" rhythm was good to hear, and his despotic direction of the vocal chorus seemed to impress unity and cohesion on the entire performance. [The Evening Post

Weary Titans

There is nothing to be said about the Ninth Symphony that has not been said many times. [W. J. Henderson in The Sun

Mr. Toscanini has set a standard for The Ninth which cannot be easily effaced. [Samuel Chotzinoff in The World

TRANS APR 16

Orchestral Plans

Announcement in New York, Also of Passing Interest to Boston

THE New York Times prints this summary of plans for the Boston Symphony Orchestra not all of which has been confided to its public at home:

> The Boston season of the orchestra will end April 27, and Mr. Koussevitzky will return to New York to sail May 1 on the Mauretania for Paris. There he is to direct performances of "Boris Godunov," later in the month at the Opéra. Musorgsky's music-drama will be performed, as hitherto, in the version arranged by Rimsky-Korsakov.
>
> Alfredo Casella, for the third time, is to conduct the Boston Symphony Pop Concerts, which will run from May 1 to July 2. The orchestra's next season will begin in Boston on Oct. 11 and in New York on Nov. 21. A season after that, in the winter of 1930-31, Koussevitzky and his men will celebrate the Boston Symphony's golden jubilee year.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HONORS ITS BAGGAGE-MAN

At the Symphony Orchestra rehearsal in Symphony Hall yesterday morning an unusual honor was bestowed upon Neil J. Patterson, baggage and property man of the orchestra for the last 40 years.

On this, his birthday, he was summoned to the stage by Serge Koussevitzky. He came, expecting to be asked to move the piano, but was surprised by a trumpet salute and a round of applause from the assembled orchestra.

GLOBE APR 16.

Full Report of Symphonic Poll

Subscribers Vote a Program, The Ballots, The Count, The Signs

TRANS APR 18

THE subscribers' ballots for a program at the final Symphony Concerts of the year have been cast and counted. The pieces played at twenty-two pairs of concerts, less one or two, like Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, requiring choral assistance, were divided into three categories: Symphonies; Tone-Poems; Pieces in Other Forms. From each category the voting subscriber was to designate one; from the total vote Mr. Koussevitzky would assemble the final program. Here it is:

Prelude to the Opera, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ..... Wagner
Prelude to Mallarmé's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of A Faun" ..... Debussy
Choreographic Poem, "The Waltz" ..... Ravel
Symphony, No. 5, in E minor ..... Chaikovsky

Bedtime stories all, too significant of the familiar fact that many a subscriber would sit contentedly at the Symphony Concerts, if no more than twenty or thirty-odd pieces, all familiar, were heard over and over again. At these final concerts Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony will be played for the fifth and sixth times in this town within two months. Year in and year out "The Waltz" has been persistent repertory piece. Between last January and this present April, Symphony Hall has already reverberated four times to the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." For Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," there is more excuse. For it has not been worn threadbare by repetition and in it abides a rare and undiminished beauty. Yet those other three, while a hundred deserving pieces, ancient, classic, modern and modernist, European or American, await performance for which there is no room in lists already brimful.

On that score a pair of Symphony Concerts is practically wasted, possibly because a too familiar delusion is again infecting Symphony Hall. Once in so often it returns—the notion that the Symphony Orchestra and as many as possible of its works should be popularized. As though such a thing were possible, with symphonic music and symphonic performance what they have been, intrinsically are, and ever shall be. The last attack eventuated in 1918 in a rather silly concert—Henri Rabaud, conductor—of national hymns and other pieces to the greater glory of the recently victorious Allies. Now it returns in a "Request Program," such as the rival Philadelphia Orchestra long since put by as unbecoming its dignity, or in strange yarns about possible concerts in a huge auditorium where even the volume of a brass and wind band dwindles away. No doubt, the powers that be will make a good recovery, but such caprices are not too desirable for an orchestra that only recently topped the summit of regained prestige.

The Full Poll

More encouraging as to the temper of the subscribing public is the full poll as listed hereunder. When seventy-six subscribers wished another hearing of Sibelius's Third Symphony; 157 would have listened cheerfully to his Concerto of Violin; 103 to Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition; eighty-two to Stravinsky's "Apollo;" eighty to a Brandenburg Concerto of Bach; 285 to Strauss's "Zarathustra" which won a place in the final program but could not be fitted into it; 116 to Mr. Carpenter's "Skyscrapers;" when even "Horace Victorieux" and "Háry János" had discoverable votes—then there is reason to take heart of subscribers' grace and press resolutely forward, as Mr. Koussevitzky does, toward programs of the widest possible range. The world do move and the art of music with it. Nor upon that movement has Symphony Hall yet shut its gates; by

Wednesday evening, May 1, in Symphony Hall, first of a new series of Pop Concerts with the long-standing arrangements of tables, sittings and refreshments; freedom to smoke; other "off season" indulgences. Mr. Casella will return as conductor. His band will number eighty men from the Symphony Orchestra. The program:

Wedding March from the Opera, "The Golden Cockerel" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Song without Words ..... Chaikovsky
Valse Triste ..... Sibelius
Overture to the Opera "La Forza del Destino" ..... Verdi
Symphonic Poem, "Les Préludes" ..... Liszt
Pavane pour une Infante défunte ..... Ravel
Rhapsody, "Italia" ..... Casella
Overture to the Opera "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Largo ..... Handel
Ride of the Valkyrs ..... Wagner

TRANS APR 15

you.

Incidents and Prospects

The poll of subscribers for the program of the final pair of Symphony Concerts is already declaring itself. Chaikovsky's Fifth will certainly be the chosen Symphony, with Franck's as a respectable "runner-up." Ravel's "Waltz" is also looming large. The triter the better seems the guiding principle of many voters.

The Radcliffe Musical Club announces its fifth annual concert for next Wednesday evening at 8.15 in Paine Hall at Harvard. Miss Sally Dodge, as guest, and two members of the club will be heard in two movements of a Concerto for two violins and piano; Miss Nancy Loring will sing songs of Schubert and folk-pieces; Miss Dorothea Cheney will play Schumann's "Papillons" and Franck's

WHY THE HIGH COST OF BEST IN MUSIC

Symphony Orchestras Do Not Pay Because of Limit on Attendance at Concerts

Bos. Post APR. 18

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Symphony orchestras do not pay. This sad fact, although it has long been proclaimed at regular intervals by orchestras threatened with disaster, still seems not to be generally realized by the man on the street. Yet even though the charge for tickets is "all the traffic will bear," symphony orchestras, unless they enjoy State or municipal support or have behind them some Maecenas with a long purse, must each and every one appeal once in so often for funds with which to carry on.

In New York the Society of the Friends of Music is now endeavoring to complete the guarantee fund for a new orchestra to be established next autumn with Artur Bodanzky as conductor, and comparison of details of the society's budget of more than $400,000 with the figures divulged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the beginning of the current season is of interest. In New York it is expected that the box-office receipts for the season will cover only about 60% of the estimated expenses. While both the expenditures and the receipts of our orchestra are far greater, the deficit is proportionately less than that which the New York organization contemplates. In the season of 1927-28 the operating income of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was $677,960.76, of which $520,286.17 represented the gross income from concerts. The total disbursements were $780,957.46.

SALARIES THE BIG ITEM

Salaries of course are the big item in both cases. The Friends of Music, intending to have about 80 musicians and something over a hundred singers in their professional chorus, plan to pay them in round numbers $250,000, and the fees and salaries of conductor, assistant conductor, chorus master, librarian and other assistants will come to something over $50,000 more, say $300,000 in all. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which numbered last season 112 men, paid out in salaries for conductor and players a total of $420,887.33. (There is no hint in the official figures as to who got the odd 33 cents.)

The Society of the Friends of Music figures the cost of soloists, essential for its projected choral concerts, at $30,000. Under the present dispensation the expense for soloists with the Boston Symphony is not a substantial item. But travelling expenses are. In the statement already quoted the Boston Symphony accounting lumps the items of out-of-town rents, travelling expenses, soloists, etc., at $164,613.39.

These Boston figures are for the season that ended almost a year ago. The estimated deficit of the season now drawing to a close is $135,000. Generous friends and patrons of the orchestra have already subscribed all but some $40,000 of that amount, and there is no question that the rest will be forthcoming.

But is there any way out of this financial woods, any way to avoid the necessity for appeals to generosity and public spirit to pay an orchestra's way? Apparently not. Only a limited portion of the public, even of the supposedly musical public, interested in symphonic concerts. And were they as popular as ball games the situation still would be but little better. Only as large a hall can be used as will permit the orchestra to be heard to advantage. Not always are the 80 or 100 or 112 men playing together or at the top of their powers; often a flute or a violin plays alone, and softly. The ethereal harp harmonics must be heard as well as the thunderous blasts of trumpets and trombones.

Thus the possible attendance at concerts is limited. There is also a limit to the amount which any but the most opulent or the most enthusiastic patron of a symphony concert is willing to pay for his or her seat. Three, four or even five dollars can be asked, but not seven or eight as with opera. And when the time does come, as with rising costs it seems certain to come, when seats for symphony concerts cost $10 each, conductor and players, not to mention the numerous officials and attendants necessary to the running of such an organization, will be getting proportionately that much more for their services.

And there you are.

...zione di Poppea" and "Il Combattimento di Tancredi e Clorinda," and of Handel's "Julius Cæsar" and "Xerxes." His own compositions exhibit the same interest in olden times.

The "Concerto Sacro" was inspired, the composer says, by "the mysterious dark triptych painted for the Isenheim altar at Colmar by Grünewald." There are four sections: "The Annunciation," "The Miracle," "Lament" and "Sepulchre and Transfiguration." The last two were those chosen by Mr. Koussevitzky for the present program. It is possible that they might have made a stronger impression in connection with their companion pieces. As it was, if they did not seem overwhelmingly original, they revealed an eclectic taste involving obligations to both Wagner and Debussy, and a feeling for the atmospheric possibilities inherent in an application of modern dissonances to an archaic style. Mr. Koussevitzky, one felt, strove a little overmuch to give an effective performance.

...concluded the program. The first movement, taken at a breathless pace, was a thing to stir admiration in performance, and the succeeding sections must have delighted those who relish ecclesiastical pomp, and like to listen to a good Rhenish tune, however often repeated. L. A. S.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Pop Concerts Commence Wednesday, May 1

AMER. APR 13

Wednesday, May 1, will be opening night of the Pop Concerts for the 44th season at Symphony Hall. The serious musical season then being over, this auditorium will be made festive with tables covering the floor, at which refreshments are to be served.

Alfredo Casella is now returning from his native Italy to conduct the Pops season. There will be light and varied programs and many nights of special interest.

Music Notes and Comment

GLOBE APR 14

Mr Koussevitzky has chosen as the novelty on this week's Symphony program a "Concerto Sacro" for string orchestra, by Werner Josten, now a member of the faculty at Smith College. He has not carried out the intention he confided to an interviewer at the beginning of the season of playing all of Schumann's symphonies, of which the first, in B flat, has alone figured on the programs. He will, however, play the third this week. The program for the final pair of concerts next week is to be made up of pieces requested by the subscribers, who are limited to numbers already played this season. One is willing to venture the guess that Tchaikovsky's Fifth will be the chosen symphony, though there are others one would rather hear.

Ninth in New York

Prelude APR 15 TRANS.

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY'S interpretation of the Ninth Symphony has long been a critical storm-center in Europe. For some, it is too emotional, suffers from "an attempt at more 'expression' than the music will bear," is over-stressed and over-romanticized. For others, it is a just revaluation of Beethoven—a "genuinely classic" reading, "since it places Beethoven before us in the composer's own image."

The critical air would be cleared if we should candidly admit that this whole question of the interpretation of masterworks is to a surprisingly large extent a matter of personal feeling and preference. . . . There is neither map nor guide, nor any certain path to follow, for the musical interpreter confronting a masterwork. The impressiveness of the account that he gives us will depend, for each of us, upon the extent to which we happen to share his temperamental and imaginative point of view. [Herald Tribune.

Essence

The special virtue of Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of The Ninth was that it gave us a curiously vivid sense of the subliminal quality of the greater portions of the work. Even though the tremendous first movement was somewhat reduced to scale and impact, the mysteriousness and the awe of the music spoke from the orchestra, and these things are of its essence. . . . The Nonth Symphony is full of the sense of that mystical real world, and of the quality of utterance that is proper to its perception. Like Paul, Beethoven uttered words that we had thought unspeakable. We are aware of Beethoven's travail, of his despair over the consciousness that what he perceived was unutterable; yet we, who listen, know that those words did actually pass his lips. Perhaps because he approached these great mysteries and clarities of Beethoven's imaginative world with simplicity of spirit, with honesty of purpose, with affection and with awe, Mr. Koussevitzky was able last night to give us so often a sense of the special quality of The Ninth—its strange blend of fatefulness and transport, wild humor and superterrestrial beauty, mystery and exaltation, its tragical despair and its shouting among the stars. [Herald Tribune

Climax

The slow movement was gloriously sung. Some prefer a broader tempo here, but it would be hard to surpass the warmth and expressiveness of the strings and the radiance of the coloring. The triumph of the performance was certainly the finale. Here the conductor's dramatic temperament, his personal ability to bring response from his interpretators, his instinct for effect, welded all the forces of interpretation into a single unit of will and feeling. Here again, Mr. Koussevitzky has his own ideas of tempo, nuance and the like. He conveyed them with such logic, such conviction, such imperious command of the other interpretors, that the finale had a wonderful sweep and length of line and cumulative power. It was not a series of episodes, an ineffectual warbling of the quartet one moment, then an instrumental interlude, then shouts from the chorus, then a variation for orchestra, and onward. The listeners did not gasp at the simple grandeur of Beethoven's "vor Gott," and marvel the next moment at the thinness of a passage of instrumentation.

Surely and grandly, and with the most dramatic punctuation, this movement gathered to its close. The chorus did not sing what it could sing, but what it had to sing. The quartet was a firmly sustained and adjusted part of a mighty ensemble, and under the circumstances acquitted itself with uncommon credit. Temperament, leadership, a dramatic vision conveyed the finale of the Ninth Symphony, and, assent or dissent of individuals to the contrary, profoundly impressed the audience. [Times

Cohesion

I have never heard a performance of the Ninth more persuasive of its merits than the one Mr. Koussevitzky gave us. The customary interpretation leaves the various movements so disjointed and of uneven development as to confirm the statement, said to have been made by Beethoven, that only his poverty compelled him to write it. Mr. Koussevitzky lent a homogeneity to the third movement which almost made one forget the sharp break in the score which makes that movement a strange marriage of two entirely unrelated themes. His deft embroidery of the three themes of the delightful Scherzo in the "dotted triplet" rhythm was good to hear, and his despotic direction of the vocal chorus seemed to impress unity and cohesion on the entire performance. [The Evening Post

Weary Titans

There is nothing to be said about the Ninth Symphony that has not been said many times. [W. J. Henderson in The Sun

Mr. Toscanini has set a standard for The Ninth which cannot be easily effaced. [Samuel Chotzinoff in The World

TRANS APR 16

Orchestral Plans

Announcement in New York, Also of Passing Interest to Boston

THE New York Times prints this summary of plans for the Boston Symphony Orchestra not all of which has been confided to its public at home:

> The Boston season of the orchestra will end April 27, and Mr. Koussevitzky will return to New York to sail May 1 on the Mauretania for Paris. There he is to direct performances of "Boris Godunov," later in the month at the Opéra. Musorgsky's music-drama will be performed, as hitherto, in the version arranged by Rimsky-Korsakov.
>
> Alfredo Casella, for the third time, is to conduct the Boston Symphony Pop Concerts, which will run from May 1 to July 2. The orchestra's next season will begin in Boston on Oct. 11 and in New York on Nov. 21. A season after that, in the winter of 1930-31, Koussevitzky and his men will celebrate the Boston Symphony's golden jubilee year.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HONORS ITS BAGGAGE-MAN

At the Symphony Orchestra rehearsal in Symphony Hall yesterday morning an unusual honor was bestowed upon Neil J. Patterson, baggage and property man of the orchestra for the last 40 years.

On this, his birthday, he was summoned to the stage by Serge Koussevitzky. He came, expecting to be asked to move the piano, but was surprised by a trumpet salute and a round of applause from the assembled orchestra.

GLOBE APR 17

Full Report of Symphonic Poll

Subscribers Vote a Program, The Ballots, The Count, The Signs

TRANS APR 18

THE subscribers' ballots for a program at the final Symphony Concerts of the year have been cast and counted. The pieces played at twenty-two pairs of concerts, less one or two, like Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, requiring choral assistance, were divided into three categories: Symphonies; Tone-Poems; Pieces in Other Forms. From each category the voting subscriber was to designate one; from the total vote Mr. Koussevitzky would assemble the final program. Here it is:

Prelude to the Opera, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ..... Wagner
Prelude to Mallarmé's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of A Faun" ..... Debussy
Choreographic Poem, "The Waltz" ..... Ravel
Symphony, No. 5, in E minor ..... Chaikovsky

Bedtime stories all, too significant of the familiar fact that many a subscriber would sit contentedly at the Symphony Concerts, if no more than twenty or thirty-odd pieces, all familiar, were heard over and over again. At these final concerts Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony will be played for the fifth and sixth times in this town within two months. Year in and year out "The Waltz" has been persistent repertory piece. Between last January and this present April, Symphony Hall has already reverberated four times to the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." For Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," there is more excuse. For it has not been worn threadbare by repetition and in it abides a rare and undiminished beauty. Yet those other three, while a hundred deserving pieces, ancient, classic, modern and modernist, European or American, await performance for which there is no room in lists already brimful.

On that score a pair of Symphony Concerts is practically wasted, possibly because a too familiar delusion is again infecting Symphony Hall. Once in so often it returns—the notion that the Symphony Orchestra and as many as possible of its works should be popularized. As though such a thing were possible, with symphonic music and symphonic performance what they have been, intrinsically are, and ever shall be. The last attack eventuated in 1918 in a rather silly concert—Henri Rabaud, conductor—of national hymns and other pieces to the greater glory of the recently victorious Allies. Now it returns in a "Request Program," such as the rival Philadelphia Orchestra long since put by as unbecoming its dignity, or in strange yarns about possible concerts in a huge auditorium where even the volume of a brass and wind band dwindles away. No doubt, the powers that be will make a good recovery, but such caprices are not too desirable for an orchestra that only recently topped the summit of regained prestige.

The Full Poll

More encouraging as to the temper of the subscribing public is the full poll as listed hereunder. When seventy-six subscribers wished another hearing of Sibelius's Third Symphony; 157 would have listened cheerfully to his Concerto of Violin; 103 to Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition; eighty-two to Stravinsky's "Apollo;" eighty to a Brandenburg Concerto of Bach; 285 to Strauss's "Zarathustra" which won a place in the final program but could not be fitted into it; 116 to Mr. Carpenter's "Skyscrapers;" when even "Horace Victorieux" and "Háry János" had discoverable votes—then there is reason to take heart of subscribers' grace and press resolutely forward, as Mr. Koussevitzky does, toward programs of the widest possible range. The world do move and the art of music with it. Nor upon that movement has Symphony Hall yet shut its gates; by

TRANS APR 15

Wednesday evening, May 1, in Symphony Hall, first of a new series of Pop Concerts with the long-standing arrangements of tables, sittings and refreshments; freedom to smoke; other "off season" indulgences. Mr. Casella will return as conductor. His band will number eighty men from the Symphony Orchestra. The program:

Wedding March from the Opera, "The Golden Cockerel" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Song without Words ..... Chaikovsky
Valse Triste ..... Sibelius
Overture to the Opera "La Forza del Destino" ..... Verdi
Symphonic Poem, "Les Préludes" ..... Liszt
Pavane pour une Infante défunte ..... Ravel
Rhapsody, "Italia" ..... Casella
Overture to the Opera "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Largo ..... Handel
Ride of the Valkyrs ..... Wagner

you.

TRANS

Incidents and Prospects APR 15

The poll of subscribers for the program of the final pair of Symphony Concerts is already declaring itself. Chaikovsky's Fifth will certainly be the chosen Symphony, with Franck's as a respectable "runner-up." Ravel's "Waltz" is also looming large. The triter the better seems the guiding principle of many voters.

The Radcliffe Musical Club announces its fifth annual concert for next Wednesday evening at 8.15 in Paine Hall at Harvard. Miss Sally Dodge, as guest, and two members of the club will be heard in two movements of a Concerto for two violins and piano; Miss Nancy Loring will sing songs of Schubert and folk-pieces; Miss Dorothea Cheney will play Schumann's "Papillons" and Franck's

WHY THE HIGH COST OF BEST IN MUSIC

Symphony Orchestras Do Not Pay Because of Limit on Attendance at Concerts

Bos. Post APR. 18

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Symphony orchestras do not pay. This sad fact, although it has long been proclaimed at regular intervals by orchestras threatened with disaster, still seems not to be generally realized by the man on the street. Yet even though the charge for tickets is "all the traffic will bear," symphony orchestras, unless they enjoy State or municipal support or have behind them some Maecenas with a long purse, must each and every one appeal once in so often for funds with which to carry on.

In New York the Society of the Friends of Music is now endeavoring to complete the guarantee fund for a new orchestra to be established next autumn with Artur Bodanzky as conductor, and comparison of details of the society's budget of more than $400,000 with the figures divulged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the beginning of the current season is of interest. In New York it is expected that the box-office receipts for the season will cover only about 60% of the estimated expenses. While both the expenditures and the receipts of our orchestra are far greater, the deficit is proportionately less than that which the New York organization contemplates. In the season of 1927-28 the operating income of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was $677,960.76, of which $520,286.17 represented the gross income from concerts. The total disbursements were $780,957.46.

SALARIES THE BIG ITEM

Salaries of course are the big item in both cases. The Friends of Music, intending to have about 80 musicians and something over a hundred singers in their professional chorus plan to pay them in round numbers $250,000, and the fees and salaries of conductor, assistant conductor, chorus master, librarian and other assistants will come to something over $50,000 more, say $300,000 in all. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which numbered last season 112 men, paid out in salaries for conductor and players a total of $420,887.33. (There is no hint in the official figures as to who got the odd 33 cents.)

The Society of the Friends of Music figures the cost of soloists, essential for its projected choral concerts, at $30,000. Under the present dispensation the expense for soloists with the Boston Symphony is not a substantial item. But travelling expenses are. In the statement already quoted the Boston Symphony accounting lumps the items of out-of-town rents, travelling expenses, soloists, etc., at $164,613.39.

These Boston figures are for the season that ended almost a year ago. The estimated deficit of the season now drawing to a close is $135,000. Generous friends and patrons of the orchestra have already subscribed all but some $40,000 of that amount, and there is no question that the rest will be forthcoming.

But is there any way out of this financial woods, any way to avoid the necessity for appeals to generosity and public spirit to pay an orchestra's way? Apparently not. Only a limited portion of the public, even of the supposedly musical public, is interested in symphonic concerts. And were they as popular as ball games the situation still would be but little better. Only as large a hall can be used as will permit the orchestra to be heard to advantage. Not always are the 80 or 100 or 112 men playing together or at the top of their powers; often a flute or a violin plays alone, and softly. The ethereal harp harmonics must be heard as well as the thunderous blasts of trumpets and trombones.

Thus the possible attendance at concerts is limited. There is also a limit to the amount which any but the most opulent or the most enthusiastic patron of a symphony concert is willing to pay for his or her seat. Three, four or even five dollars can be asked, but not seven or eight as with opera. And when the time does come, as with rising costs it seems certain to come, when seats for symphony concerts cost $10 each, conductor and players, not to mention the numerous officials and attendants necessary to the running of such an organization, will be getting proportionately that much more for their services.

And there you are.

---

zione di Poppea" and "Il Combattimento di Tancredi e Clorinda," and of Handel's "Julius Cæsar" and "Xerxes." His own compositions exhibit the same interest in olden times.

The "Concerto Sacro" was inspired, the composer says, by "the mysterious dark triptych painted for the Isenheim altar at Colmar by Grünewald." There are four sections: "The Annunciation," "The Miracle," "Lament" and "Sepulchre and Transfiguration." The last two were those chosen by Mr. Koussevitzky for the present program. It is possible that they might have made a stronger impression in connection with their companion pieces. As it was, if they did not seem overwhelmingly original, they revealed an eclectic taste involving obligations to both Wagner and Debussy, and a feeling for the atmospheric possibilities inherent in an application of modern dissonances to an archaic style. Mr. Koussevitzky, one felt, strove a little overmuch to give an effective performance.

concluded the program. The first movement, taken at a breathless pace, was a thing to stir admiration in performance, and the succeeding sections must have delighted those who relish ecclesiastical pomp, and like to listen to a good Rhenish tune, however often repeated. L. A. S.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

148

Pop Concerts Commence Wednesday, May 1

AMER. APR 13

Wednesday, May 1, will be opening night of the Pop Concerts for the 44th season at Symphony Hall. The serious musical season then being over, this auditorium will be made festive with tables covering the floor, at which refreshments are to be served.

Alfredo Casella is now returning from his native Italy to conduct the Pops season. There will be light and varied programs and many nights of special interest.

Music Notes and Comment

GLOBE APR 11

Mr Koussevitzky has chosen as the novelty on this week's Symphony program a "Concerto Sacro" for string orchestra, by Werner Josten, now a member of the faculty at Smith College. He has not carried out the intention he confided to an interviewer at the beginning of the season of playing all of Schumann's symphonies, of which the first, in B flat, has alone figured on the programs. He will, however, play the third this week. The program for the final pair of concerts next week is to be made up of pieces requested by the subscribers, who are limited to numbers already played this season. One is willing to venture the guess that Tchaikovsky's Fifth will be the chosen symphony, though there are others one would rather hear.

Ninth in New York

Prelude APR 15 TRANS.

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY'S interpretation of the Ninth Symphony has long been a critical storm-center in Europe. For some, it is too emotional, suffers from "an attempt at more 'expression' than the music will bear," is over-stressed and over-romanticized. For others, it is a just revaluation of Beethoven—a "genuinely classic" reading, "since it places Beethoven before us in the composer's own image."

The critical air would be cleared if we should candidly admit that this whole question of the interpretation of masterworks is to a surprisingly large extent a matter of personal feeling and preference. . . . There is neither map nor guide, nor any certain path to follow, for the musical interpreter confronting a masterwork. The impressiveness of the account that he gives us will depend, for each of us, upon the extent to which we happen to share his temperamental and imaginative point of view. [Herald Tribune.

Essence

The special virtue of Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of The Ninth was that it gave us a curiously vivid sense of the subliminal quality of the greater portions of the work. Even though the tremendous first movement was somewhat reduced to scale and impact, the mysteriousness and the awe of the music spoke from the orchestra, and these things are of its essence. . . . The Nonth Symphony is full of the sense of that mystical real world, and of the quality of utterance that is proper to its perception. Like Paul, Beethoven uttered words that we had thought unspeakable. We are aware of Beethoven's travail, of his despair over the consciousness that what he perceived was unutterable; yet we, who listen, know that those words did actually pass his lips. Perhaps because he approached these great mysteries and clarities of Beethoven's imaginative world with simplicity of spirit, with honesty of purpose, with affection and with awe, Mr. Koussevitzky was able last night to give us so often a sense of the special quality of The Ninth—its strange blend of fatefulness and transport, wild humor and superterrestrial beauty, mystery and exaltation, its tragical despair and its shouting among the stars. [Herald Tribune

Climax

The slow movement was gloriously sung. Some prefer a broader tempo here, but it would be hard to surpass the warmth and expressiveness of the strings and the radiance of the coloring. The triumph of the performance was certainly the finale. Here the conductor's dramatic temperament, his personal ability to bring response from his interpretators, his instinct for effect, welded all the forces of interpretation into a single unit of will and feeling. Here again, Mr. Koussevitzky has his own ideas of tempo, nuance and the like. He conveyed them with such logic, such conviction, such imperious command of the other interpretors, that the finale had a wonderful sweep and length of line and cumulative power. It was not a series of episodes, an ineffectual warbling of the quartet one moment, then an instrumental interlude, then shouts from the chorus, then a variation for orchestra, and onward. The listeners did not gasp at the simple grandeur of Beethoven's "vor Gott," and marvel the next moment at the thinness of a passage of instrumentation.

Surely and grandly, and with the most dramatic punctuation, this movement gathered to its close. The chorus did not sing what it could sing, but what it had to sing. The quartet was a firmly sustained and adjusted part of a mighty ensemble, and under the circumstances acquitted itself with uncommon credit. Temperament, leadership, a dramatic vision conveyed the finale of the Ninth Symphony, and, assent or dissent of individuals to the contrary, profoundly impressed the audience. [Times

Cohesion

I have never heard a performance of the Ninth more persuasive of its merits than the one Mr. Koussevitzky gave us. The customary interpretation leaves the various movements so disjointed and of uneven development as to confirm the statement, said to have been made by Beethoven, that only his poverty compelled him to write it. Mr. Koussevitzky lent a homogeneity to the third movement which almost made one forget the sharp break in the score which makes that movement a strange marriage of two entirely unrelated themes. His deft embroidery of the three themes of the delightful Scherzo in the "dotted triplet" rhythm was good to hear, and his despotic direction of the vocal chorus seemed to impress unity and cohesion on the entire performance. [The Evening Post

Weary Titans

There is nothing to be said about the Ninth Symphony that has not been said many times. [W. J. Henderson in The Sun

Mr. Toscanini has set a standard for The Ninth which cannot be easily effaced. [Samuel Chotzinoff in The World

TRANS APR 16

Orchestral Plans

Announcement in New York, Also of Passing Interest to Boston

THE New York Times prints this summary of plans for the Boston Symphony Orchestra not all of which has been confided to its public at home:

> The Boston season of the orchestra will end April 27, and Mr. Koussevitzky will return to New York to sail May 1 on the Mauretania for Paris. There he is to direct performances of "Boris Godunov," later in the month at the Opéra. Musorgsky's music-drama will be performed, as hitherto, in the version arranged by Rimsky-Korsakov.
>
> Alfredo Casella, for the third time, is to conduct the Boston Symphony Pop Concerts, which will run from May 1 to July 2. The orchestra's next season will begin in Boston on Oct. 11 and in New York on Nov. 21. A season after that, in the winter of 1930-31, Koussevitzky and his men will celebrate the Boston Symphony's golden jubilee year.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HONORS ITS BAGGAGE-MAN

At the Symphony Orchestra rehearsal in Symphony Hall yesterday morning an unusual honor was bestowed upon Neil J. Patterson, baggage and property man of the orchestra for the last 40 years.

On this, his birthday, he was summoned to the stage by Serge Koussevitzky. He came, expecting to be asked to move the piano, but was surprised by a trumpet salute and a round of applause from the assembled orchestra.

GLOBE APR 16.

Full Report of Symphonic Poll

Subscribers Vote a Program, The Ballots, The Count, The Signs

TRANS APR 18

THE subscribers' ballots for a program at the final Symphony Concerts of the year have been cast and counted. The pieces played at twenty-two pairs of concerts, less one or two, like Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, requiring choral assistance, were divided into three categories: Symphonies; Tone-Poems; Pieces in Other Forms. From each category the voting subscriber was to designate one; from the total vote Mr. Koussevitzky would assemble the final program. Here it is:

Prelude to the Opera, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ..... Wagner
Prelude to Mallarmé's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of A Faun" ..... Debussy
Choreographic Poem, "The Waltz" ..... Ravel
Symphony, No. 5, in E minor ..... Chaikovsky

Bedtime stories all, too significant of the familiar fact that many a subscriber would sit contentedly at the Symphony Concerts, if no more than twenty or thirty-odd pieces, all familiar, were heard over and over again. At these final concerts Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony will be played for the fifth and sixth times in this town within two months. Year in and year out "The Waltz" has been persistent repertory piece. Between last January and this present April, Symphony Hall has already reverberated four times to the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." For Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," there is more excuse. For it has not been worn threadbare by repetition and in it abides a rare and undiminished beauty. Yet those other three, while a hundred deserving pieces, ancient, classic, modern and modernist, European or American, await performance for which there is no room in lists already brimful.

On that score a pair of Symphony Concerts is practically wasted, possibly because a too familiar delusion is again infecting Symphony Hall. Once in so often it returns—the notion that the Symphony Orchestra and as many as possible of its works should be popularized. As though such a thing were possible, with symphonic music and symphonic performance what they have been, intrinsically are, and ever shall be. The last attack eventuated in 1918 in a rather silly concert—Henri Rabaud, conductor—of national hymns and other pieces to the greater glory of the recently victorious Allies. Now it returns in a "Request Program," such as the rival Philadelphia Orchestra long since put by as unbecoming its dignity, or in strange yarns about possible concerts in a huge auditorium where even the volume of a brass and wind band dwindles away. No doubt, the powers that be will make a good recovery, but such caprices are not too desirable for an orchestra that only recently topped the summit of regained prestige.

The Full Poll

More encouraging as to the temper of the subscribing public is the full poll as listed hereunder. When seventy-six subscribers wished another hearing of Sibelius's Third Symphony; 157 would have listened cheerfully to his Concerto of Violin; 103 to Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition; eighty-two to Stravinsky's "Apollo;" eighty to a Brandenburg Concerto of Bach; 285 to Strauss's "Zarathustra" which won a place in the final program but could not be fitted into it; 116 to Mr. Carpenter's "Skyscrapers;" when even "Horace Victorieux" and "Háry János" had discoverable votes

...Handel
Ride of the Valkyrs ..... Wagner

WHY THE HIGH COST OF BEST IN MUSIC

Symphony Orchestras Do Not Pay Because of Limit on Attendance at Concerts

Bos. Post APR. 18

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Symphony orchestras do not pay. This sad fact, although it has long been proclaimed at regular intervals by orchestras threatened with disaster, still seems not to be generally realized by the man on the street. Yet even though the charge for tickets is "all the traffic will bear," symphony orchestras, unless they enjoy State or municipal support or have behind them some Maecenas with a long purse, must each and every one appeal once in so often for funds with which to carry on.

In New York the Society of the Friends of Music is now endeavoring to complete the guarantee fund for a new orchestra to be established next autumn with Artur Bodanzky as conductor, and comparison of details of the society's budget of more than $400,000 with the figures divulged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the beginning of the current season is of interest. In New York it is expected that the box-office receipts for the season will cover only about 60% of the estimated expenses. While both the expenditures and the receipts of our orchestra are far greater, the deficit is proportionately less than that which the New York organization contemplates. In the season of 1927-28 the operating income of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was $677,960.76, of which $520,286.17 represented the gross income from concerts. The total disbursements were $780,957.46.

SALARIES THE BIG ITEM

Salaries of course are the big item in both cases. The Friends of Music, intending to have about 80 musicians and something over a hundred singers in their professional chorus, plan to pay them in round numbers $250,000, and the fees and salaries of conductor, assistant conductor, chorus master, librarian and other assistants will come to something over $50,000 more, say $300,000 in all. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which numbered last season 112 men, paid out in salaries for conductor and players a total of $420,887.33. (There is no hint in the official figures as to who got the odd 33 cents.)

The Society of the Friends of Music figures the cost of soloists, essential for its projected choral concerts, at $30,000. Under the present dispensation the expense for soloists with the Boston Symphony is not a substantial item. But travelling expenses are. In the statement already quoted the Boston Symphony accounting lumps the items of out-of-town rents, travelling expenses, soloists, etc., at $164,613.39.

These Boston figures are for the season that ended almost a year ago. The estimated deficit of the season now drawing to a close is $135,000. Generous friends and patrons of the orchestra have already subscribed all but some $40,000 of that amount, and there is no question that the rest will be forthcoming.

But is there any way out of this financial woods, any way to avoid the necessity for appeals to generosity and public spirit to pay an orchestra's way? Apparently not. Only a limited

...department of pub... defended the meas... would strengthen t... partment in regul... companies and kee... with the Massachu... lowing a monopoly ... vision.

Sheldon E. Ward... Americans were hon... Massachusetts Elect... ...oussevitzky on his ... ciation, offered the ... in opposition to the ...am of the Boston ... completed presentati... ...ra season—though ... the hearing was ad... day afternoon at about ... is a native. One

During his appe... ...rner Josten, two ... however, Mr. Ward ... whose. "Concerto ... bill as one which ... ...rchestra and piano ... confidence of Mas... in lighting compa... ...formance in Bos... them, he said. an ... large outside-of-t... who is professor of ... concerning the acti... ...gue at Smith Col... department of publi... much concerned for ... Mass., has at... He also pointed out ... by his revival of ... line in the pending ... own. He has given ... State any greater co... ...merican performer business than it ... ...di's "L'Incoronazione di Poppea" and "Il Combattimento di Tancredi e Clorinda," and of Handel's "Julius Cæsar" and "Xerxes." His own compositions exhibit the same interest in olden times.

The "Concerto Sacro" was inspired, the composer says, by "the mysterious dark triptych painted for the Isenheim altar at Colmar by Grünewald." There are four sections: "The Annunciation," "The Miracle," "Lament" and "Sepulchre and Transfiguration." The last two were those chosen by Mr. Koussevitzky for the present program. It is possible that they might have made a stronger impression in connection with their companion pieces. As it was, if they did not seem overwhelmingly original, they revealed an eclectic taste involving obligations to both Wagner and Debussy, and a feeling for the atmospheric possibilities inherent in an application of modern dissonances to an archaic style. Mr. Koussevitzky, one felt, strove a little overmuch to give an effective performance.

...te Program
... Orchestra
APR 20

To follow this fragment with Fauré's Élégie for violoncello and orchestra was not a good stroke of program-making. It is difficult to imagine any better reason for it than that Jean Bedetti, first cellist, is expected to play one solo a season, and this work was the shortest one available. The composition itself has a distinction which was obscured by this juxtaposition. After the gloomy reflections of Mr. Josten we were in no mood to listen to the sorrows of Fauré. Mr. Bedetti, however, gave a performance marked by artistic elegance.

There was more matter in the other American contribution, Charles Martin Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson," after Verlaine. This imaginative, poetic work had a brilliant utterance. If after 25 years it seems somewhat discursive, this is a characteristic that it shares with Schumann's Symphony in E flat, which concluded the program. The first movement, taken at a breathless pace, was a thing to stir admiration in performance, and the succeeding sections must have delighted those who relish ecclesiastical pomp, and like to listen to a good Rhenish tune, however often repeated. L. A. S.

you.

TRANS APR 15

Incidents and Prospects

The poll of subscribers for the program of the final pair of Symphony Concerts is already declaring itself. Chaikovsky's Fifth will certainly be the chosen Symphony, with Franck's as a respectable "runner-up." Ravel's "Waltz" is also looming large. The triter the better seems the guiding principle of many voters.

The Radcliffe Musical Club announces its fifth annual concert for next Wednesday evening at 8.15 in Paine Hall at Har... Miss Sally Dodge, as guest, and ... two in... ...heard in two m... ments of a Concerto ... two violins and piano; Miss Nancy Loring will sing songs of Schubert and folk-pieces; Miss Dorothea Cheney will play Schumann's "Papillons" and Franck's

...the man from the engine which was standing there, who brought me the handbag.

Q—You say the handbag was handed to you. How far was that from a perpendicular drop from the southerly side of Cross street bridge?

A—As I was going up he was coming down, and on the southerly side of the handbag. The bag remained in my possession until I handed it to Dr. Sweet.

Urged Trains Be Inspected

Q—Did you know the name of the man who picked it up?

A—I do not.

Q—You have testified that the girl's hat was picked up against the abutment. To what abutment do you refer?

A—To the wall which holds the westerly bank up.

Q—With reference to the position of the body, where was the hat?

A—Westerly, maybe one foot either way from the side of the body.

Q—Did you have anything to do with causing any trains of the New Haven

Pop Concerts Commence Wednesday, May 1

AMER. APR 8

Wednesday, May 1, will be opening night of the Pop Concerts for the 44th season at Symphony Hall. The serious musical season then being over, this auditorium will be made festive with tables covering the floor, at which refreshments are to be served.

Alfredo Casella is now returning from his native Italy to conduct the Pops season. There will be light and varied programs and many nights of special interest.

Music Notes and Comment

GLOBE APR 11

Mr Koussevitzky has chosen as the novelty on this week's Symphony program a "Concerto Sacro" for string orchestra, by Werner Josten, now a member of the faculty at Smith College. He has not carried out the intention he confided to an interviewer at the beginning of the season of playing all of Schumann's symphonies, of which the first, in B flat, has alone figured on the programs. He will, however, play the third this week. The program for the final pair of concerts next week is to be made up of pieces requested by the subscribers, who are limited to numbers already played this season. One is willing to venture the guess that Tchaikovsky's Fifth will be the chosen symphony, though there are others one would rather hear.

Ninth in New York

Prelude APR 15 TRANS.

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY'S interpretation of the Ninth Symphony has long been a critical storm-center in Europe. For some, it is too emotional, suffers from "an attempt at more 'expression' than the music will bear," is over-stressed and over-romanticized. For others, it is a just revaluation of Beethoven—a "genuinely classic" reading, "since it places Beethoven before us in the composer's own image."

The critical air would be cleared if we should candidly admit that this whole question of the interpretation of masterworks is to a surprisingly large extent a matter of personal feeling and preference. . . . There is neither map nor guide, nor any certain path to follow, for the musical interpreter confronting a masterwork. The impressiveness of the account that he gives us will depend, for each of us, upon the extent to which we happen to share his temperamental and imaginative point of view. [Herald Tribune.

Essence

The special virtue of Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of The Ninth was that it gave us a curiously vivid sense of the subliminal quality of the greater portions of the work. Even though the tremendous first movement was somewhat reduced to scale and impact, the mysteriousness and the awe of the music spoke from the orchestra, and these things are of its essence. . . . The Nonth Symphony is full of the sense of that mystical real world, and of the quality of utterance that is proper to its perception. Like Paul, Beethoven uttered words that we had thought unspeakable. We are aware of Beethoven's travail, of his despair over the consciousness that what he perceived was unutterable; yet we, who listen, know that those words did actually pass his lips. Perhaps because he approached these great mysteries and clarities of Beethoven's imaginative world with simplicity of spirit, with honesty of purpose, with affection and with awe, Mr. Koussevitzky was able last night to give us so often a sense of the special quality of The Ninth—its strange blend of fatefulness and transport, wild humor and superterrestrial beauty, mystery and exaltation, its tragical despair and its shouting among the stars. [Herald Tribune

Climax

The slow movement was gloriously sung. Some prefer a broader tempo here, but it would be hard to surpass the warmth and expressiveness of the strings and the radiance of the coloring. The triumph of the performance was certainly the finale. Here the conductor's dramatic temperament, his personal ability to bring response from his interpretators, his instinct for effect, welded all the forces of interpretation into a single unit of will and feeling. Here again, Mr. Koussevitzky has his own ideas of tempo, nuance and the like. He conveyed them with such logic, such conviction, such imperious command of the other interpretors, that the finale had a wonderful sweep and length of line and cumulative power. It was not a series of episodes, an ineffectual warbling of the quartet one moment, then an instrumental interlude, then shouts from the chorus, then a variation for orchestra, and onward. The listeners did not gasp at the simple grandeur of Beethoven's "vor Gott," and marvel the next moment at the thinness of a passage of instrumentation.

Surely and grandly, and with the most dramatic punctuation, this movement gathered to its close. The chorus did not sing what it could sing, but what it had to sing. The quartet was a firmly sustained and adjusted part of a mighty ensemble, and under the circumstances acquitted itself with uncommon credit. Temperament, leadership, a dramatic vision conveyed the finale of the Ninth Symphony, and, assent or dissent of individuals to the contrary, profoundly impressed the audience. [Times

Cohesion

I have never heard a performance of the Ninth more persuasive of its merits than the one Mr. Koussevitzky gave us. The customary interpretation leaves the various movements so disjointed and of uneven development as to confirm the statement, said to have been made by Beethoven, that only his poverty compelled him to write it. Mr. Koussevitzky lent a homogeneity to the third movement which almost made one forget the sharp break in the score which makes that movement a strange marriage of two entirely unrelated themes. His deft embroidery of the three themes of the delightful Scherzo in the "dotted triplet" rhythm was good to hear, and his despotic direction of the vocal chorus seemed to impress unity and cohesion on the entire performance. [The Evening Post

Weary Titans

There is nothing to be said about the Ninth Symphony that has not been said many times. [W. J. Henderson in The Sun

Mr. Toscanini has set a standard for The Ninth which cannot be easily effaced. [Samuel Chotzinoff in The World

TRANS. APR 16

Orchestral Plans

Announcement in New York, Also of Passing Interest to Boston

THE New York Times prints this summary of plans for the Boston Symphony Orchestra not all of which has been confided to its public at home:

> The Boston season of the orchestra will end April 27, and Mr. Koussevitzky will return to New York to sail May 1 on the Mauretania for Paris. There he is to direct performances of "Boris Godunov," later in the month at the Opéra. Musorgsky's music-drama will be performed, as hitherto, in the version arranged by Rimsky-Korsakov.
>
> Alfredo Casella, for the third time, is to conduct the Boston Symphony Pop Concerts, which will run from May 1 to July 2. The orchestra's next season will begin in Boston on Oct. 11 and in New York on Nov. 21. A season after that, in the winter of 1930-31, Koussevitzky and his men will celebrate the Boston Symphony's golden jubilee year.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HONORS ITS BAGGAGE-MAN

At the Symphony Orchestra rehearsal in Symphony Hall yesterday morning an unusual honor was bestowed upon Neil J. Patterson, baggage and property man of the orchestra for the last 40 years.

On this, his birthday, he was summoned to the stage by Serge Koussevitzky. He came, expecting to be asked to move the piano, but was surprised by a trumpet salute and a round of applause from the assembled orchestra.

GLOBE APR 10

Full Report of Symphonic Poll

Subscribers Vote a Program, The Ballots, The Count, The Signs

TRANS APR 18

THE subscribers' ballots for a program at the final Symphony Concerts of the year have been cast and counted. The pieces played at twenty-two pairs of concerts, less one or two, like Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, requiring choral assistance, were divided into three categories: Symphonies; Tone-Poems; Pieces in Other Forms. From each category the voting subscriber was to designate one; from the total vote Mr. Koussevitzky would assemble the final program. Here it is:

Prelude to the Opera, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ..... Wagner
Prelude to Mallarmé's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of A Faun" ..... Debussy
Choreographic Poem, "The Waltz" ..... Ravel
Symphony, No. 5, in E minor ..... Chaikovsky

Bedtime stories all, too significant of the familiar fact that many a subscriber would sit contentedly at the Symphony Concerts, if no more than twenty or thirty-odd pieces, all familiar, were heard over and over again. At these final concerts Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony will be played for the fifth and sixth times in this town within two months. Year in and year out "The Waltz" has been persistent repertory piece. Between last January and this present April, Symphony Hall has already reverberated four times to the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." For Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," there is more excuse. For it has not been worn threadbare by repetition and in it abides a rare and undiminished beauty. Yet those other three, while a hundred deserving pieces, ancient, classic, modern and modernist, European or American, await performance for which there is no room in lists already brimful.

On that score a pair of Symphony Concerts is practically wasted, possibly because a too familiar delusion is again infecting Symphony Hall. Once in so often it returns—the notion that the Symphony Orchestra and as many as possible of its works should be popularized. As though such a thing were possible, with symphonic music and symphonic performance what they have been, intrinsically are, and ever shall be. The last attack eventuated in 1918 in a rather silly concert—Henri Rabaud, conductor—of national hymns and other pieces to the greater glory of the recently victorious Allies. Now it returns in a "Request Program," such as the rival Philadelphia Orchestra long since put by as unbecoming its dignity, or in strange yarns about possible concerts in a huge auditorium where even the volume of a brass and wind band dwindles away. No doubt, the powers that be will make a good recovery, but such caprices are not too desirable for an orchestra that only recently topped the summit of regained prestige.

The Full Poll

More encouraging as to the temper of the subscribing public is the full poll as listed hereunder. When seventy-six subscribers wished another hearing of Sibelius's Third Symphony; 157 would have listened cheerfully to his Concerto of Violin; 103 to Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition; eighty-two to Stravinsky's "Apollo;" eighty to a Brandenburg Concerto of Bach; 285 to Strauss's "Zarathustra" which won a place in the final program but could not be fitted into it; 116 to Mr. Carpenter's "Skyscrapers;" when even "Horace Victorieux" and "Háry János" had discoverable votes—then there is reason to take heart of subscribers' grace and press resolutely forward, as Mr. Koussevitzky does, toward programs of the widest possible range. The world do move and the art of music with it. Nor upon that movement has Symphony Hall yet shut its gates; by

Wednesday evening, May 1, in Symphony Hall, first of a new series of Pop Concerts with the long-standing arrangements of tables, sittings and refreshments; freedom to smoke; other "off season" indulgences. Mr. Casella will return as conductor. His band will number eighty men from the Symphony Orchestra. The program:

Wedding March from the Opera, "The Golden Cockerel" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Song without Words ..... Chaikovsky
Valse Triste ..... Sibelius
Overture to the Opera "La Forza del Destino" ..... Verdi
Symphonic Poem, "Les Préludes" ..... Liszt
Pavane pour une Infante défunte ..... Ravel
Rhapsody, "Italia" ..... Casella
Overture to the Opera "William Tell" .. Rossini
Largo ..... Handel
Ride of the Valkyrs ..... Wagner

TRANS APR 15

Incidents and Prospects

The poll of subscribers for the program of the final pair of Symphony Concerts is already declaring itself. Chaikovsky's Fifth will certainly be the chosen Symphony, with Franck's as a respectable "runner-up." Ravel's "Waltz" is also looming large. The triter the better seems the guiding principle of many voters.

The Radcliffe Musical Club announces its fifth annual concert for next Wednesday evening at 8.15 in Paine Hall at Harvard. Miss Sally Dodge, as guest, and two members of the club will be heard in two movements of a Concerto of Bach for two violins and piano; Miss Nancy Loring will sing songs of Schubert and folk-pieces; Miss Dorothea Cheney will play Schumann's "Papillons" and Franck's

WHY THE HIGH COST OF BEST IN MUSIC

Symphony Orchestras Do Not Pay Because of Limit on Attendance at Concerts

Bos. Post APR. 18

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Symphony orchestras do not pay. This sad fact, although it has long been proclaimed at regular intervals by orchestras threatened with disaster, still seems not to be generally realized by the man on the street. Yet even though the charge for tickets is "all the traffic will bear," symphony orchestras, unless they enjoy State or municipal support or have behind them some Maecenas with a long purse, must each and every one appeal once in so often for funds with which to carry on.

In New York the Society of the Friends of Music is now endeavoring to complete the guarantee fund for a new orchestra to be established next autumn with Artur Bodanzky as conductor, and comparison of details of the society's budget of more than $400,000 with the figures divulged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the beginning of the current season is of interest. In New York it is expected that the box-office receipts for the season will cover only about 60% of the estimated expenses. While both the expenditures and the receipts of our orchestra are far greater, the deficit is proportionately less than that which the New York organization contemplates. In the season of 1927-28 the operating income of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was $677,960.76, of which $520,286.17 represented the gross income from concerts. The total disbursements were $780,957.46.

SALARIES THE BIG ITEM

Salaries of course are the big item in both cases. The Friends of Music, intending to have about 80 musicians and something over a hundred singers in their professional chorus plan to pay them in round numbers $250,000, and the fees and salaries of conductor, assistant conductor, chorus master, librarian and other assistants will come to something over $50,000 more, say $300,000 in all. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which numbered last season 112 men, paid out in salaries for conductor and players a total of $420,887.33. (There is no hint in the official figures as to who got the odd 33 cents.)

The Society of the Friends of Music figures the cost of soloists, essential for its projected choral concerts, at $30,000. Under the present dispensation the expense for soloists with the Boston Symphony is not a substantial item. But travelling expenses are. In the statement already quoted the Boston Symphony accounting lumps the items of out-of-town rents, travelling expenses, soloists, etc., at $164,613.39.

These Boston figures are for the season that ended almost a year ago. The estimated deficit of the season now drawing to a close is $135,000. Generous friends and patrons of the orchestra have already subscribed all but some $40,000 of that amount, and there is no question that the rest will be forthcoming.

But is there any way out of this financial woods, any way to avoid the necessity for appeals to generosity and public spirit to pay an orchestra's way? Apparently not. Only a limited

Penultimate Program of Boston Orchestra

MON. APR 20

Two more Americans were honored by Serge Koussevitzky on his penultimate program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season—though as it happens neither is a native. One of these was Werner Josten, two movements of whose "Concerto Sacro" for string orchestra and piano received a first performance in Boston. Mr. Josten, who is professor of composition and fugue at Smith College, Northampton, Mass., has attracted attention by his revival of old operas in that town. He has given there the first American performances of Monteverdi's "L'Incoronazione di Poppea" and "Il Combattimento di Tancredi e Clorinda," and of Handel's "Julius Cæsar" and "Xerxes." His own compositions exhibit the same interest in olden times.

The "Concerto Sacro" was inspired, the composer says, by "the mysterious dark triptych painted for the Isenheim altar at Colmar by Grünewald." There are four sections: "The Annunciation," "The Miracle," "Lament" and "Sepulchre and Transfiguration." The last two were those chosen by Mr. Koussevitzky for the present program. It is possible that they might have made a stronger impression in connection with their companion pieces. As it was, if they did not seem overwhelmingly original, they revealed an eclectic taste involving obligations to both Wagner and Debussy, and a feeling for the atmospheric possibilities inherent in an application of modern dissonances to an archaic style. Mr. Koussevitzky, one felt, strove a little overmuch to give an effective performance.

To follow this fragment with Fauré's Élégie for violoncello and orchestra was not a good stroke of program-making. It is difficult to imagine any better reason for it than that Jean Bedetti, first cellist, is expected to play one solo a season, and this work was the shortest one available. The composition itself has a distinction which was obscured by this juxtaposition. After the gloomy reflections of Mr. Josten we were in no mood to listen to the sorrows of Fauré. Mr. Bedetti, however, gave a performance marked by artistic elegance.

There was more matter in the other American contribution, Charles Martin Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson," after Verlaine. This imaginative, poetic work had a brilliant utterance. If after 25 years it seems somewhat discursive, this is a characteristic that it shares with Schumann's Symphony in E flat, which concluded the program. The first movement, taken at a breathless pace, was a thing to stir admiration in performance, and the succeeding sections must have delighted those who relish ecclesiastical pomp, and like to listen to a good Rhenish tune, however often repeated. L. A. S.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

144

BOSTON EVE[illegible] TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, APRIL 20, 1929

Symphony === "Letter"

Fortunate Day For Conductor And Composers

New Concerto Well Received, Mr. Loeffler Full-Voiced, Schumann Sounds

TO most intents and purposes the orchestral year in Boston is ending with the Symphony Concerts of yesterday and today. Next week they will contain only stock-pieces chosen by ballot—a mistaken groping for popularity that is not likely to recur. On Friday—as again this evening—they were worthy of an illustrious orchestra and conductor in high prestige, of the musically intelligent public that hears and maintains them. The program, for example, contained a novel piece, two movements from Mr. Josten's "Concerto Sacro," deserving performance and well received. Fauré's Elegy gave opportunity to the first violoncellist of the orchestra, Mr. Bedetti. "La Bonne Chanson" is not the least of Mr. Loeffler's tone-poems, and his high place among American composers is unchallenged. Finally stood Schumann's "Rhenish Symphony," seldom heard in these days, yet proving one more of Mr. Koussevitzky's fortunate revivals. Mr. Josten answered the conductor's and the audience's call to the stage, and for the first time a Bostonian public looked upon the head of the Department of Music at Smith College and the courageous producer of ancient operas. The more familiar Loeffler also acknowledged from the platform the hearty plaudits his neighbors are wont to bestow on him. Mr. Koussevitzky set to his task with the inexhaustible élan that makes not only each concert, but each piece, a new adventure; while, as usual, his pains matched his zeal. The orchestra was the sensitive and responsive instrument by him schooled and attuned. Though the customary fervors of final concerts—by the calendar—were naturally lacking, the symphonic year ended auspiciously.

Conductors leave too many of Mr. Loeffler's pieces on the shelves. When he hands them a manuscript they are quick to play it and to pass it from hand to hand. When, otherwise, they are Loeffler-minded, the convenient choice is "Pagan Poem." Possibly, "The Death of Tintagiles" and "The Devil's Villanelle" belong to another time in music, since Mr. Loeffler's life has spanned nearly seventy years. Possibly, it is the will of chance that only Boston and New York should have heard his setting of three Irish songs for orchestra and tenor voice; only Philadelphia and New York his resplendent and exalted proclamation, by orchestra and soprano voice, of St. Francis's "Hymn to the Sun." Perhaps there is no appeal from his decision to withhold his Symphony, once heard in Boston, from further public performance.

At least, "La Bonne Chanson" remains; but only Mr. Koussevitzky, as Mr. Monteux before him, seems to be aware of its existence. Yet audiences hear the tone-poem gladly and its place in the sum of Mr. Loeffler's work is unmistakably high. In more than one respect indeed, it is epitome of his abilities and his courses as composer. A poem suggested the piece and poetry has often been his prompting. He read Verlaine's "Avant que tu ne t'en ailles" and forthwith was minded to music. The poem contrasts the images of nature at dawn with the image of the poet's mistress, half-sleeping, half-waking by his side; culminates in the sun-rise. Each stanza is divided between the two sensations; moves toward the climax—"Car voici le soleil d'or"—in suspensive rhythm. Here, for example, are the first two, arresting the casual ear, as they did Mr. Loeffler's pondering them:

Avant que tu ne t'en ailles,
Pâle étoile du matin,
—Mille cailles
Chantent, chantent dans le thym—

Tourne devers le poète,
Dont les yeux sont pleins d'amour,
—L'alouette
Monte au ciel avec le jour—

Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem is self-contained music, yet in close accord with the verbal images he would transcribe into another medium. There is preluding, as in Verlaine's first stanza. A distinct motiv emerges, henceforth to pervade and fertilize the music. It is richly developed; proceeding suspensively, becomes more and more animated; culminates in the rising of the sun. Its progress through the tone-poem, more and more passionate, ever in ampler and more glowing vesture, is the musical expression of Verlaine's longing, mounting apostrophe to his wakening mistress, in the sunrise finally bathed. There are also the poet's images of nature in the dawning. Mr. Loeffler treats them as variants of his principal motiv; like Verlaine, casts them contrastingly in idyllic mood. Here, then, is the composer of music achieving a symphonic structure, with no small skill and resource, that fills the ear and lays hold upon the imagination. Here also is the composer of music who is also poet in tones. For to the tender beauty of his idyllic measures Mr. Loeffler joins the ascending passion of his pages of longing, until both are fused in a tonal spectacle, attaining its own beauty rather than a Straussian grandeur or the mere magniloquence of the opera house. "La Bonne Chanson" is almost perfect example of a a tone-poem both musically and poetically fulfilled. It is also of Mr. Loeffler and no other. With reason conductor, orchestra and audience yesterday answered to it.

Mr. Josten's "Concerto Sacro" proceeds also from external suggestion. He comes out of the Rhineland; has wandered the neighboring Alsace; saw at Colmar, in the Museum, the triptych, a panel of which is here reproduced, as it stood above the votive altar of the Isenheims. Early in the sixteenth century, Matthias Grünewald, the German "primitive," painted it. Mr. Josten, who is in his fortieth year, is true son of his time. Now his bent turns to the ancientries of music more or less modernly renewed; again he would write in the larger speech of these nineteen-twenties, as we may discover from his "Jungle," when Mr. Koussevitzky (as he intends) plays it next season. Grünewald's fresco stirred Mr. Josten to music; he found the form and the manner in the "Sacred Concertos" of the older Italians; wrote for string choir and piano: within the frame would set the beginning and the end of the life of Jesus—the Annunciation to Mary, the Nativity at Bethlehem; her lament by the tomb after the Crucifixion; a final transfiguration. Unfortunately, Mr. Koussevitzky found the whole piece too long for his program and played only the last two divisions. By their quality the first two deserved likewise to be heard, even if the concert had been twenty minutes longer. Besides, it is only fair to a composer, when his work comes to first performance, to play it in the integrity in which he conceived it.

As they stand, these last two movements are timely and persuasive example of ancient form and procedure in modern day refertilized. For string choir, Mr. Josten writes of purpose a music of interwoven strands that part, meet and re-part, move in under-voices and upper-voices, follow this and that device of the ancient polyphonic style. Here and there the tonal progress, the interplay of the instrumental voices, are stiff and angular, as though the composer, in his turn, would also make a primitive fresco. On the other hand, living and working in this stimulating present, Mr. Josten does not forbear, as occasion prompts, either the richness of modern string tone or the modern art of dissonance. Moreover, his addition of a piano as instrument of percussion is distinctly modernist. In the movement of lament he uses it imaginatively and expertly. Its dissonances and timbres, as well as the repeated dissonances among the double-basses, intensify the suggestion of the Divine Tragedy wrought and mourned.

Yet Mr. Josten returns to the ancients and to the old fresco, when he holds both his music of lament and his music of transfiguration in relative repression. He does not make Mary, if it is she that mourns, plangent. The glorification of Jesus does not rend dazzling tonal skies. Rather it is of the Jesus risen who sat at meat, haloed. with the disciples at Emmaus; of the Mary who sorrowed mother-like, in the simplicity of these primitive painters, by cross and sepulchre. As a part of his imaginative and stylistic scheme, Mr. Josten keeps his tonal-palette pale-bright rather than glowing; his string choir measured rather than reverberant. To reproach him with a certain monotony of color and of movement is to deny him his prescriptive right to a design of purpose conceived, to a style—or perhaps a blending of styles—purposefully chosen and followed. Within both he has accomplished a work of individual skill and imagination, born of the ancients, yet in accord with the musical spirit and practice of this, our day. True, his German compatriots, Hindemuth and Toch, may hardly applaud it; but it would please not a little Malipiero and Casella, who cultivate a similar vein Italian-fashion; while in Paris it would have rejoiced the late André Caplet, tonal pietist in his final days.

Between Mr. Josten's Concerto and Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, Mr. Bedetti played the solo-part in Fauré's orchestral version of his Elegy for Violoncello. Seldom can Fauré come to hearing at a Symphony Concert because he left behind few symphonic pieces, self-contained or detachable from his music of the theater. Our violinists, pianists, string quartets, play his chamber-music rarely, because, they say, it is too finely textured, too finely flavored for "the usual audience"; because its characteristic qualities are too intrinsically French to endure exportation to other peoples. Originally the Elegy was a piece of this chamber-music—and what were its essential qualities as Mr. Bedetti and Mr. Koussevitzky disclosed them? A persistent clarity, an unvarying fineness, an instant beauty of line; the symmetry of the whole between solo-instrument and orchestra, the adroit proportioning, the delicate detailing throughout; the chisselled workmanship; the mood sustained, but not exhausted or inflated, of mournful melancholy in a quiet place, out of dear memories, to one's self. Add the tonal beauty with which Mr. Bedetti and Mr. Koussevitzky clothed the Elegy and there is not a reason to doubt that such music of Fauré may be addressed to any cultivated audience; that its traits, if intrinsically French, are also believably universal.

Schumann's Symphony in E-flat of the Rhine fell short of the triumph (as the press-agents name it) that Mr. Koussevitsky has thrice gained for the Symphony in B-flat of the spring, and might readily win also for the conjugal Second Symphony in C major Sufficient reasons leap to the pen. The "Spring Symphony" was work of Schumann's earlier, happier, most fertile years. The "Rhenish Symphony" was made in the later, distressful, Düsseldorfian days when mental insecurity and the consequent musical decay were beginning to creep upon him. In the new environment and contacts of the

Lament

Mary and John Beside the Cross

Fragment of the Isenheim Votive Altar by Matthias Gruenewald, at Colmar in Alsace, Which Prompted Werner Josten to The Composition of His "Concerto Sacro" Played This Week at the Symphony Concerts

(From Hagen's "Matthias Gruenewald," by Courtesy of Robert G. Appel of The Brown Music Room at the Public Library)

OF THE MONTH

Club. Thompson Stone, conductor.

Saturday afternoon and evening, May 11, Ethel Leginska announces two introductory performances of Bizet's "Carmen" (sung in English), at Jordan Hall. This will afford opportunity for Boston singers and players to appear in actual performances. Boston lacks opportunities for the young professional musicians to appear in performing roles. It is for this purpose that Mme. Leginska is fostering this movement, which she hopes to make permanent. The orchestra [illegible] of members of the Boston Women's [illegible] orche[illegible]

POPS PROGRAM

[illegible]pening night at the Pops will take [illegible]ce on Wednesday, May 1. The regu[illegible] concert season having then ended, [illegible]les will displace the rows of seats [illegible]ich cover the floor of Symphony hall. [illegible] orchestra of over 80 Symphony play[illegible]s will be conducted by Alfredo Cas[illegible], the Italian muscian who is cele[illegible]ted as composer and pianist, as well [illegible]conductor. There will be a Pop con[illegible] each night of the week, and on al[illegible]te Sundays, during May and June.

Casella is now on his way from It[illegible] bringing with him some music of [illegible]ecial interest and charm to freshen the [illegible]ops repertory, which will comprise mu[illegible] suitable to a full sized orchestra, of [illegible]ect appeal and variety to please

[illegible]e varied tastes of the Pops publi[illegible]

For the opening night, Casella wired the following program:

Wedding March from "Le Coq D'Or" ..... Rimsky-Kor[illegible]
Song Without Words ..... Tchaik[illegible]
Valse Triste ..... Si[illegible]
Overture to "La Forza del Destino" ..... [illegible]
"Les Preludes," symphonic poem ..... [illegible]
Pavane pour une Infante Defunte" ..... [illegible]
"Italia," rhapsody ..... [illegible]
Overture to "William Tell" ..... [illegible]
Largo ..... [illegible]
Ride of the Valkyries ..... [illegible]

CALENDAR OF THE W[illegible]

Sunday: Symphony Hall, [illegible] and H[illegible] Simmons College, [illegible] Glee Club. Copley Plaza, 3:30 P. M., Mme. Abbott, coloratura soprano; [illegible]mond Eaton, baritone. Boston Public Library, 3:30 P. M., Leonora Sweet[illegible] Society of Bradford Academy, Fr[illegible] Johnson, conductor. 8 P. M., Th[illegible] nini Symphony Ensemble, August[illegible] nini, conductor.

Tuesday: Symphony Hall, 3 P. M., Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor. Last concert of the Tuesday series.

Thursday: Jordan Hall, 8:15 P. M., People's Choral Union, James R. Houghton, conductor.

Friday: Symphony Hall, 2:30 P. M., Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor.

Saturday: Symphony Hall, 8:[illegible] Repetition of Friday's Symph[illegible] concert, the last of the 48th season.

HERALD APR 21

INFORMATION OBSCURED

144

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, APRIL 20, 1929

Symphony === "Letter"

Fortunate Day For Conductor And Composers

New Concerto Well Received, Mr. Loeffler Full-Voiced, Schumann Sounds

TO most intents and purposes the orchestral year in Boston is ending with the Symphony Concerts of yesterday and today. Next week they will contain only stock-pieces chosen by ballot—a mistaken groping for popularity that is not likely to recur. On Friday—as again this evening—they were worthy of an illustrious orchestra and conductor in high prestige, of the musically intelligent public that hears and maintains them. The program, for example, contained a novel piece, two movements from Mr. Josten's "Concerto Sacro," deserving performance and well received. Fauré's Elegy gave opportunity to the first violoncellist of the orchestra, Mr. Bedetti. "La Bonne Chanson" is not the least of Mr. Loeffler's tone-poems, and his high place among American composers is unchallenged. Finally stood Schumann's "Rhenish Symphony," seldom heard in these days, yet proving one more of Mr. Koussevitzky's fortunate revivals. Mr. Josten answered the conductor's and the audience's call to the stage, and for the first time a Bostonian public looked upon the head of the Department of Music at Smith College and the courageous producer of ancient operas. The more familiar Loeffler also acknowledged from the platform the hearty plaudits his neighbors are wont to bestow on him. Mr. Koussevitzky set to his task with the inexhaustible élan that makes not only each concert, but each piece, a new adventure; while, as usual, his pains matched his zeal. The orchestra was the sensitive and responsive instrument by him schooled and attuned. Though the customary fervors of final concerts—by the calendar—were naturally lacking, the symphonic year ended auspiciously.

Conductors leave too many of Mr. Loeffler's pieces on the shelves. When he hands them a manuscript they are quick to play it and to pass it from hand to hand. When, otherwise, they are Loeffler-minded, the convenient choice is "Pagan Poem." Possibly, "The Death of Tintagiles" and "The Devil's Villanelle" belong to another time in music, since Mr. Loeffler's life has spanned nearly seventy years. Possibly, it is the will of chance that only Boston and New York should have heard his setting of three Irish songs for orchestra and tenor voice; only Philadelphia and New York his resplendent and exalted proclamation, by orchestra and soprano voice, of St. Francis's "Hymn to the Sun." Perhaps there is no appeal from his decision to withhold his Symphony, once heard in Boston, from further public performance.

At least, "La Bonne Chanson" remains; but only Mr. Koussevitzky, as Mr. Monteux before him, seems to be aware of its existence. Yet audiences hear the tone-poem gladly and its place in the sum of Mr. Loeffler's work is unmistakably high. In more than one respect indeed, it is epitome of his abilities and his courses as composer. A poem suggested the piece and poetry has often been his prompting. He read Verlaine's "Avant que tu ne t'en ailles" and forthwith was minded to music. The poem contrasts the images of nature at dawn with the image of the poet's mistress, half-sleeping, half-waking by his side; culminates in the sun-rise. Each stanza is divided between the two sensations; moves toward the climax—"Car voici le soleil d'or"—in suspensive rhythm. Here, for example, are the first two, arresting the casual ear, as they did Mr. Loeffler's pondering them:

Avant que tu ne t'en ailles,
Pâle étoile du matin,
—Mille cailles
Chantent, chantent dans le thym—

Tourne devers le poète,
Dont les yeux sont pleins d'amour,
—L'alouette
Monte au ciel avec le jour—

Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem is self-contained music, yet in close accord with the verbal images he would transcribe into another medium. There is preluding, as in Verlaine's first stanza. A distinct motiv emerges, henceforth to pervade and fertilize the music. It is richly developed; proceeding suspensively, becomes more and more animated: culminates in the rising of the sun. Its progress through the tone-poem, more and more passionate, ever in ampler and more glowing vesture, is the musical expression of Verlaine's longing, mounting apostrophe to his wakening mistress, in the sunrise finally bathed. There are also the poet's images of nature in the dawning. Mr. Loeffler treats them as variants of his principal motiv; like Verlaine, casts them contrastingly in idyllic mood. Here, then, is the composer of music achieving a symphonic structure, with no small skill and resource, that fills the ear and lays hold upon the imagination. Here also is the composer of music who is also poet in tones. For to the tender beauty of his idyllic measures Mr. Loeffler joins the ascending passion of his pages of longing, until both are fused in a tonal spectacle, attaining its own beauty rather than a Straussian grandeur or the mere magniloquence of the opera house. "La Bonne Chanson" is almost perfect example of a a tone-poem both musically and poetically fulfilled. It is also of Mr. Loeffler and no other. With reason conductor, orchestra and audience yesterday answered to it.

Mr. Josten's "Concerto Sacro" proceeds also from external suggestion. He comes out of the Rhineland; has wandered the neighboring Alsace; saw at Colmar, in the Museum, the triptych, a panel of which is here reproduced, as it stood above the votive altar of the Isenheims. Early in the sixteenth century, Matthias Grünewald, the German "primitive," painted it. Mr. Josten, who is in his fortieth year, is true son of his time. Now his bent turns to the ancientries of music more or less modernly renewed; again he would write in the larger speech of these nineteen-twenties, as we may discover from his "Jungle," when Mr. Koussevitzky (as he intends) plays it next season. Grünewald's fresco stirred Mr. Josten to music: he found the form and the manner in the "Sacred Concertos" of the older Italians; wrote for string choir and piano: within the frame would set the beginning and the end of the life of Jesus—the Annunciation to Mary, the Nativity at Bethlehem; her lament by the tomb after the Crucifixion; a final transfiguration. Unfortunately, Mr. Koussevitzky found the whole piece too long for his program and played only the last two divisions. By their quality the first two deserved likewise to be heard, even if the concert had been twenty minutes longer. Besides, it is only fair to a composer, when his work comes to first performance, to play it in the integrity in which he conceived it.

As they stand, these last two movements are timely and persuasive example of ancient form and procedure in modern day refertilized. For string choir, Mr. Josten writes of purpose a music of interwoven strands that part, meet and re-part, move in under-voices and upper-voices, follow this and that device of the ancient polyphonic style. Here and there the tonal progress, the interplay of the instrumental voices, are stiff and angular, as though the composer, in his turn, would also make a primitive fresco. On the other hand, living and working in this stimulating present, Mr. Josten does not forbear, as occasion prompts, either the richness of modern string tone or the modern art of dissonance. Moreover, his addition of a piano as instrument of percussion is distinctly modernist. In the movement of lament he uses it imaginatively and expertly. Its dissonances and timbres, as well as the repeated dissonances among the double-basses, intensify the suggestion of the Divine Tragedy wrought and mourned.

Yet Mr. Josten returns to the ancients and to the old fresco, when he holds both his music of lament and his music of transfiguration in relative repression. He does not make Mary, if it is she that mourns, plangent. The glorification of Jesus does not rend dazzling tonal skies. Rather it is of the Jesus risen who sat at meat, haloed, with the disciples at Emmaus; of the Mary who sorrowed mother-like, in the simplicity of these primitive painters, by cross and sepulchre. As a part of his imaginative and stylistic scheme, Mr. Josten keeps his tonal-palette pale-bright rather than glowing; his string choir measured rather than reverberant. To reproach him with a certain monotony of color and of movement is to deny him his prescriptive right to a design of purpose conceived, to a style—or perhaps a blending of styles—purposefully chosen and followed. Within both he has accomplished a work of individual skill and imagination, born of the ancients, yet in accord with the musical spirit and practice of this, our day. True, his German compatriots, Hindemuth and Toch, may hardly applaud it; but it would please not a little Malipiero and Casella, who cultivate a similar vein Italian-fashion; while in Paris it would have rejoiced the late André Caplet, tonal pietist in his final days.

Between Mr. Josten's Concerto and Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, Mr. Bedetti played the solo-part in Fauré's orchestral version of his Elegy for Violoncello. Seldom can Fauré come to hearing at a Symphony Concert because he left behind few symphonic pieces, self-contained or detachable from his music of the theater. Our violinists, pianists, string quartets, play his chamber-music rarely, because, they say, it is too finely textured, too finely flavored for "the usual audience"; because its characteristic qualities are too intrinsically French to endure exportation to other peoples. Originally the Elegy was a piece of this chamber-music—and what were its essential qualities as Mr. Bedetti and Mr. Koussevitzky disclosed them? A persistent clarity, an unvarying fineness, an instant beauty of line; the symmetry of the whole between solo-instrument and orchestra, the adroit proportioning, the delicate detailing throughout; the chisselled workmanship; the mood sustained, but not exhausted or inflated, of mournful melancholy in a quiet place, out of dear memories, to one's self. Add the tonal beauty with which Mr. Bedetti and Mr. Koussevitzky clothed the Elegy and there is not a reason to doubt that such music of Fauré may be addressed to any cultivated audience; that its traits, if intrinsically French, are also believably universal.

Schumann's Symphony in E-flat of the Rhine fell short of the triumph (as the press-agents name it) that Mr. Koussevitsky has thrice gained for the Symphony in B-flat of the spring, and might readily win also for the conjugal Second Symphony in C major Sufficient reasons leap to the pen. The "Spring Symphony" was work of Schumann's earlier, happier, most fertile years. The "Rhenish Symphony" was made in the later, distressful, Düsseldorfian days when mental insecurity and the consequent musical decay were beginning to creep upon him. In the new environment and contacts of the

Lament

Mary and John Beside the Cross

Fragment of the Isenheim Votive Altar by Matthias Gruenewald, at Colmar in Alsace, Which Prompted Werner Josten to The Composition of His "Concerto Sacro" Played This Week at the Symphony Concerts

(From Hagen's "Matthias Gruenewald," by Courtesy of Robert G. Appel of The Brown Music Room at the Public Library)

OF THE MONTH

Club. Thompson Stone, conductor.

Saturday afternoon and evening, May 11, Ethel Leginska announces two introductory performances of Bizet's "Carmen" (sung in English), at Jordan Hall. This will afford opportunity for Boston singers and players to appear in actual performances. Boston lacks opportunities for the young professional musicians to appear in performing roles. It is for this purpose that Mme. Leginska is fostering this movement, which she hopes to make permanent. The orchestra [illegible] of members of the Boston Women's Symphony orch[illegible]

POPS PROGRAM

[illegible]pening night at the Pops will take [illegible]ce on Wednesday, May 1. The regu[illegible] concert season having then ended, [illegible]ples will displace the rows of seats [illegible]ich cover the floor of Symphony hall. [illegible] orchestra of over 80 Symphony play[illegible]s will be conducted by Alfredo Cas[illegible]a, the Italian muscian who is cele[illegible]ted as composer and pianist, as well a[illegible] conductor. There will be a Pop con[illegible]c[illegible] each night of the week, and on al[illegible]te Sundays, during May and June. [illegible] Casella is now on his way from It[illegible] bringing with him some music of [illegible]cial interest and charm to freshen the [illegible]ops repertory, which will comprise mu[illegible] suitable to a full sized orchestra, of [illegible]ect appeal and variety to please the varied tastes of the Pops public. For the opening night, Casella wired the following program:

Wedding March from "Le Coq D'Or" ..... Rimsky-Korsakow
Song Without Words ..... Tchaikowsky
Valse Triste ..... Sibelius
Overture to "La Forza del Destino" ..... Verdi
"Les Preludes," symphonic poem ..... Liszt
"Pavane pour une Infante Defunte" ..... Ravel
"Italia," rhapsody ..... Casella
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Largo ..... Handel
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner

CALENDAR OF THE W[illegible]

Sunday: Symphony Hall, [illegible] and H[illegible] Simmons College Glee Club. Copley Plaza, 3:30 [illegible] Melba Abbott, coloratura soprano; [illegible]mond Eaton, baritone. Boston [illegible] Library, 3:30 P. M., Leonora [illegible] Society of Bradford Academy, Fre[illegible] John[illegible]on, conductor. 8 P. M., Th[illegible] nini Symphony Ensemble. August[illegible] nini, conductor.

Tuesday: Symphony Hall, 3 [illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. [illegible] sevitzky, conductor. Last conc[illegible] the Tuesday series.

Thursday: Jordan Hall, 8:15 [illegible] People's Choral Union, James R. [illegible] ton, conductor.

Friday: Symphony Hall, 2:30 [illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. [illegible] sevitzky, conductor.

Saturday: Symphony Hall, 8: [illegible] Repetition of Friday's Symph[illegible] cert, the last of the 48th season.

HERALD APR 21

INFORMATION OBSCURED

GLOBE APR 21

Music Notes and Comment

Symphony "Request Program"

Mr Koussevitzky has given the subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts in the regular Friday and Saturday series something to talk about by his latest innovation, the "request program," which will be played at the final pair of concerts this week. The Pops audiences have for many years chosen a request program by ballot near the end of the season. These request programs have proved so popular that it has become an invariable custom with the conductors to play them twice. But never before have the subscribers to the regular series of Symphony concerts been offered an opportunity to select a program for a pair of concerts.

The programs of the concerts of April 5 and 6 contained a ballot on which the subscribers were asked to register their choice from the pieces played during the season, excluding those which would require chorus or unavailable soloists. A symphony, a tone poem, and a work in some other form could each be voted for.

The result, announced last week, was that Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony was chosen by a large margin; Ravel's "La Valse" led among the tone poems, with Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra" second; and in the miscellaneous group, Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude was chosen, with Sibelius' violin concerto (in which Mr Burgin played the solo part) second. Mr Koussevitsky has chosen the three pieces winning the most votes. He has added to them Debussy's "Faun," which received many votes among the tone poems; passing over Strauss' "Zarathustra" because it is too long, though it got more votes than Debussy's familiar and popular piece.

Further Details

Further details of the results follow. The other symphonies preferred by subscribers were in this order: Cesar Franck; Brahms' Second; Schubert's "Unfinished"; Sibelius' Third; Beethoven's "Pastoral" and "Enroica"; Prokofieff "Classical"; Bloch's "America"; and Bruckner's Eighth. It is curious that some of these should have been preferred to Mozart's "Jupiter," two of Schumann, Haydn's "Surprise," Schubert's C major, and Mahler's "Lied von der Erde." Mr Koussevitzky does not excel in Mozart and Schubert, but his Haydn and Schumann are good. The choice of Tchaikovsky's Fifth was no doubt partly owing to the fact that Mr Koussevitzky's performance of it is the best ever given in Boston.

The "Meistersinger" prelude has so long been one of the two or three most popular and most played pieces at the Symphony concerts that nobody will wonder it was chosen. The previous performance this season, an unusually fine one, was conducted not by Mr Koussevitzky, but by Mr Arbos as guest conductor. Perhaps some people wanted to know whether Koussevitzky could do it as well.

The miscellaneous pieces were in order of preference after the Wagner prelude and Sibelius concerto, Beethoven's "Leonore No. 3"; Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet"; Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition"; Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagate" (the only work of his on the ballot), and Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto. Here one wonders at the relative standing of Honegger's "Pacific 213"; Berlioz' "Roman Carnival"; Kodaly's "Hary Janos" and Handels Concerto Grosso in B minor.

Surprises

It is a great surprise to find Strauss' lengthy and seldom played "Zarathustra" second among the tone poems, and an even greater surprise to find Ravel's "La Valse" first of all. Nobody had supposed it so popular with the audiences. It is one of Koussevitzky's show pieces, which probably explains why it was chosen. But one would have guessed that Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes" would have ranked it, they also being Koussevitzkian war horses.

Some general notion of the preferences of this supposedly conservative and classically minded audience may be gained from these votes. In the first place what it wants is not the classics of the 18th century or the first half of the 19th, none of which were chosen, but music of the period from 1850 to 1900.

It has much less objection to novelties than one supposed, witness the votes for the unfamiliar Sibelius symphony and concerto, for Strauss' "Zarathustra," for Prokofieff, Bloch, and Bruckner.

And, finally, what it wants to hear is pieces Koussevitzky is likely to do well. Very many of the subscribers undoubtedly come chiefly to hear and to watch his conducting. The great increase in the box office sale of seats after his first season here would prove this point.

It is particularly heartening to notice that some 20th century and modernist pieces received large votes, proving that Koussevitzky's wise policy of playing a modern piece at each concert for most of the past five seasons has begun to bear fruit. He ought therefore to take heart of grace and give us modern novelties more stimulating and more provocative than some of the tepid novelties he has lately chosen.

Mr Koussevitzky is sailing for Europe May 1. He is to conduct performances of Musorgsky's "Boris" at the Paris Opera in May, at which the usual version edited by Rimsky Korsakoff will be used, and not the newly published original score. The 49th season of Boston Symphony concerts, with Mr Koussevitzky as conductor, will begin Oct 11. Plans for celebrating the 50th anniversary of the orchestra in 1930 are already being considered. It will perhaps be possible for the orchestra's first conductor, Sir George Henschel, still active in London as teacher of singing, to lead one of the pieces from the first program the orchestra ever gave at the 50th anniversary. It is not, unfortunately, likely that all of the other surviving conductors will appear. Nikisch and Gericke are dead. Fiedler, Muck, Rabaud, and Monteux survive. Paur's whereabouts is unknown to the writer of these remarks. No announcement of his death has reached Boston.

Mr Monteux is conducting at present a portion of the new series of orchestral concerts in Paris, given by the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris, founded last year to offer Paris first rate symphony concerts open to a wider public than that of the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire.

Complete Results

The complete list of pieces receiving more than 10 votes is as follows:

SYMPHONIES—Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 5 in E minor (440); Franck, Symphony in D minor (302); Brahms, Symphony No. 2 in D major (116); Schubert, Symphony in B minor ("Unfinished") (91); Sibelius, Symphony No. 3 (76); Beethoven, Symphony No. 6 ("Pastorale") (75); Beethoven, Symphony No. 3 ("Eroica") (66); Prokofieff, "Classical Symphony" (52); Bloch, "America," An Epic Rhapsody (51); Bruckner, Symphony No. 8 in C minor (45); Mozart, Symphony in C major, "Jupiter" (39); Schumann, Symphony No. 1 in B flat (39); Schubert, Symphony No. 7 in C major (37); Mahler, Symphony, "Das Lied von der Eree" (29); Beethoven, Symphony No. 1 in C major (28); Haydn, Symphony in G major, "Surprise" (20); Hanson, Nordic Symphony (10).

TONE POEMS—Ravel, "La Valse," Choregraphic Poem (349); Strauss, "Also Sprach Zarathustra" (285); Debussy, Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" (210); Scriabin, "Poem of Ecstasy" (161); Carpenter, "Skyscrapers" (116); Strauss, "Tod und Verklarung" (82); Debussy, "Iberia" (60); Goldmark, "A Negro Rhapsody" (51); Debussy, "Nocturnes" (49); Loeffler, "La Bonne Chanson" (25); Schelling, "Morocco" (20); Honegger, "Horace Victorieux" (14).

MUSIC IN OTHER FORMS—Wagner, prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg" (312); Sibelius, concerto for violin and orchestra (157); Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 3 (129); Tchaikovsky, overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" (129); Moussorgsky-Ravel, pictures at an exhibition (103); Stravinsky, "Apollon Musagete" (82); Bach, Brandenburg Concerto, No. (80); Strauss, Salome's Dance from "Salome" (65); Handel, Concerto Grosso, No. 12 (53); Foote, suite in E minor for string orchestra (50); Bach, C. P. E., concerto for orchestra (48).

Program for Pops Opening

Opening night at the Pops will take place on Wednesday, May 1. The regular concert season having then ended tables will displace the rows of seats which cover the floor of Symphony Hall. An orchestra of over Symphony players will be conducted by Alfredo Casella, the Italian musician who is celebrated as composer pianist, as well as conductor.

There will be a Pop concert each night of the week and on alternate Sundays during May and June.

Alfredo Casella is now on his way from Italy, bringing with him some music of special interest and charm to freshen the Pops' repertory, which will comprise music suitable to a full-sized orchestra, of direct appeal and variety to please the varied tastes of the Pops public.

For the opening night Casella has wired the following program: Wedding march from "LeCoq d'Or," Rimsky-Korsakov; "Song Without Words," Tchaikovsky; "Valse Triste," Sibelius; overture to "La Forza del Destino," Verdi; "Les Preludes," Symphonic poem, Liszt; "Pavane pour une Infante defunte," Ravel; "Italian," rhapsody, Casella; overture to "William Tell," Rossini; "Largo," Handel; "Ride of the Valkyries,' Wagner.

MUSIC OF MODERNS PREFERRED

Symphony Patrons' Ballots Indicate Trend

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Modern music, if it is not too modern, is preferred to the classics by the majority of the patrons of the Symphony concerts. At least that is the clear indication of the balloting for the request programme to be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at the final concerts of the season. Quite definitely they prefer the comparatively new to the comparatively or the very old, and the newest they seem to like the least of all.

1550 MAKE CHOICE

To be sure this balloting does not represent the opinions of even a majority of the concert-goers, since of the 5000-odd persons who received the ballots enclosed in the programme-books of the season's 22d pair of concerts, but 1550 expressed their preference in the matter of a symphony. And in the other two classifications to be voted on, tone-poems and "music in other forms," but 1415 and 1395 votes, respectively, were registered. Furthermore for obvious reasons the voting was restricted to the pieces played during the current season and from even that list were omitted those pieces requiring a chorus or soloists no longer available.

Tchaikovsky Leads All

The programme assembled as a result of the voting has already been extensively announced: Wagner's Prelude to "The Meistersingers," Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," Ravel's choreographic poem, "The tion, save only the Symphony of Tchaikovsky. It is not quite an accurate registering of expressed preferences, however, inasmuch as Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra" topped the tone-poem of Debussy by a matter of 75 votes, but was too long to fit into a practicable programme. And Franck's Symphony, although it ran second in its own class, actually received more sition, save only the symphony of votes than any other single composi- Tchaikovsky and the waltz of Ravel.

To come then to deductions concerning this hypothetical average concert-goer. He prefers music written during the last half-century, since most of the 13 pieces receiving more than 100 votes apiece belong to that epoch and he turns a cold shoulder to pieces played here for the first time. One exception to this latter generalization seem to point to a third: he likes soloists. For Ernest Toch's Piano Concerto—and Toch is a modern of the moderns—had 37 supporters. One will, of course, never know how many of those votes were cast for Toch and how many for Mr. Sanroma, the pianist. But the fact that the only other piece calling for a soloist which was among the balloting possibilities, Sibelius' Violin Concerto, a piece until this year unheard here for two decades and hardly one of the Finn's outstanding compositions, received no less than 157 votes would seem to suggest the appeal of the solo performer.

116 for "Skyscrapers"

There were three pieces besides Toch's Concerto which, having been heard for the first time this season, make an appreciable showing in the voting tabulations: the Third Symphony of Sibelius, already 20 years old, which received 76 votes, and Goldmark's Negro Rhapsody and Bloch's "America," which drew 51 votes apiece. Neither of the latter is modernist music. But Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," with its bit of jazz and its vivid depicting of the American spirit, made known in an earlier season, was chosen by 116 voters. It is good, incidentally, to find a native composition among the top 13 of the 64 pieces voted upon. The other American composers fared not nearly so well.

It is, of course, a truism that concert-goers like to hear what they already know. Yet familiarity alone does not, by this balloting test, insure popularity. The more than familiar "Surprise" Symphony of Haydn and the "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart had but 20 and 39 adherents respectively, the great C major Symphony of Schubert but 37.

Few Votes for Beethoven

As for Beethoven, whose name is emblazoned over the proscenium arch of Symphony Hall, his "Pastoral" Symphony received 75 votes, his "Eroica" 66, to the 440 accorded Tchaikovsky's Fifth and the 302 that went to the Symphony of Franck, and Schubert's "Unfinished" trailed with 91. No doubt the Fifth or the Seventh of Beethoven, not on this season's list, would have fared much better, as for that matter would the Ninth, excluded from the balloting by the requirements of its choral Finale.

In one respect these voters showed sound musical judgment. Janin's "Symphonie Spirituelle" which received but two votes, and Miaskovsky's Eighth Symphony, Ibert's "Feeriques" and Honegger's "Chant de Nigamon," which received but one vote apiece, novelties all, deserved no more.

The preferences stated above would not, in most cases, be those of the connoisseur, the tonal epicure, the musically curious. And it is safe to say that no one of the winning pieces would have won or been even a runner-up when it was brand new. These request programmes are, after all, an index of musical vitality. "The individual," said Weber, "is an ass, but the voice of the people is the voice of God."

Page Nine

TRANS APR 22

New Prices for the Symphony Concerts

General Rise for Both Series, With Floor and Balconies Minutely Divided

WITH the current renewal of subscriptions for the Symphony Concerts, subscribers are discovering an increase in the price of seats for next season, throughout the house and for both the Friday and the Saturday series. For the matinées on Fridays, prices on the floor descend from $100, through $70, $60 and $50, to $35; in the first balcony from $90, through $70, $60, $50, to $35; in the second, for the first row, they are $45. For the present, the other rows remain "rush-seats" to be sold for each concert; but it is within possibility that a considerable number may be offered to subscribers at $35.

For the evening concerts on Saturdays, frequented by a less opulent and more musical public, prices on the floor descend from $70, through $60, $55, $45, $40, $35, to $25; in the first balcony from $60, through $50, $45, $40, $35, to $25; in the second there are two prices, $35 and $25. A glance at the diagrams shows that Symphony Hall has been more minutely subdivided for price-making than ever before. End-seats, for example, in the more desirable portions of the floor have been marked up for both series; while those beyond in the same row may be sold for less. Even the theaters, where end-seats are equally prized, have not ventured that.

Viewed without irritation, the increase seems warranted. The outgo of the orchestra has risen and tends to rise. It can give no more concerts in a season—and keep its standards—than it now undertakes. It can play to no larger audiences, since everywhere they now fill the halls. A larger income is necessary; only in higher prices for seats can it be gained. That increase has been distributed as justly as ingenuity could accomplish it. The relative ability to pay between the publics of Friday and Saturday was thoroughly considered. For either series there is a considerable residue of low-priced seats—$35 and $25; for the evening series, indeed, they are numerous. Furthermore: both weekly audiences now listen to an orchestra restored to the first rank; to a truly illustrious conductor; to the most widely ranging and generally interesting programs now proffered at any symphony concerts the world over. For what one would have and enjoy, keep as a standard at home and as a boast abroad, one must also pay. The Symphony Orchestra can be neither a philanthropic nor a popular institution—and survive.

H. T. P.

Concert-Chronic

TRANS APR 22

The Vote and The Victory

BETWEEN numbers and throu intermission at the Symphon cert on Saturday, talk played fully over the vote for the final "re program." Said the wise in such th "These Paradestücke (parade-pie were sure to be chose on a ball Average listeners like direct melodie direct sensations, direct emotions, an remember them. They get them i Chaikovsky's Fifth or Ravel's 'Waltz and want them over and over again They like sonorities as much and the 'Meistersinger' Prelude is a whole procession of them. What did you expect?" Said another: "People like things that are a sort of tonal narrative where they can follow an easy idea as well as the music. There it is in the waltz that comes to life and dies in Ravel's piece, in Debussy's faun with a flute, in Chaikovsky's successive emotions. Or take 'Zarathustra.' There is the idea and there the sonorities. And it had 285 votes—fifth highest on the whole list. Strauss is no 'old hat.' Mr. and Mrs. Average have learned to like him."

"Strauss is all very well," cut in Madame, "but what is there to say to only sixty-six votes for 'The Eroica' and seventy-five for 'The Pastoral.' Where's your Beethoven now?" The man of wisdom took the cue: "Out of favor with the younger and early middle generations. They know what they like. They don't find it in the ancients—look at thirty-nine for Mozart's 'Jupiter' and only twenty for Haydn's 'Surprise.' They don't find it in Beethoven, unless he is all dressed up as he is in the Ninth, or in the whole classic line through Schubert and Schumann. The stuff they want is the romantic stuff of the eighties and the nineties—Chaikovsky and Wagner—and the picture-stuff that followed on—Debussy and Ravel. Out of that same liking Bruckner got fifty-two votes for the Scherzo and the Adagio in his Eighth; while Skriabin walked away with 161 for the 'Poem of Ecstasy.'"

"You are making the wrong comparisons," countered the young gentleman from Professor Hill's courses in Cambridge. "Beethoven, seventy-five and sixty-six for two Symphonies, or at most 129 for the big 'Leonore' Overture. Then what do you say to 116 for Carpenter's 'Skyscrapers'; eighty-two for Stravinsky's 'Apollo'; seventy-six for Sibelius's Third, even fourteen for 'Horace Victorieux? I doubted after the cries of grief, pain and anger last January, whether it would have even one. That's what signifies. Give them their Paradestücke, as you call them, for an occasion, but there's a sound and solid part of this public that as a steady diet wants novel pieces and modern pieces, and bold pieces written the day before yesterday, along with the classics and the ancients, who for that matter are as new as Bach or Handel. What this vote means is a plain signal to Koussevitzky to keep straight on and to keep going strong. He's on the right road and he has no end of courage. It's his victory—and rather complete. Just watch the future." . . . "The ayes have it," said the three or four gathered together, as the gong rang.

As All Might Hear

More than one of these sayings stood confirmed by Saturday's concert. The two movements of Mr. Josten's "Concerto Sacro" were again the novel number. In it, boldly and modernly, he uses the piano for iteration, for rhythm, for color, against the pervading string-tone. In measure after measure of the "Lament," Mr. Zighera, who played this piano-part in masterly fashion, was tearing off dissonances. Yet long and loud were Concerto and composer applauded.

Fauré's Elegy for Violoncello is not the ordinary stuff of solo-pieces. Recall, for example, the delicate tracery of the woodwinds over the sighing strings. Yet the listening was rapt, the applause hearty, even though to Mr. Bedetti fell the lion's share. He was at his finest mettle and Mr. Koussevitzky with him; while the evening audience is quick to discern and answer superlative performance.

Mr. Loeffler, indeed, was insisting too modestly that it was the playing, rather than ripened appreciation of his "Bonne Chanson," that made the tone-poem prevail as never before. To the full Mr. Koussevitzky set forth the passionate suspense and songfulness, the fragrance of the idyllic episodes, the beauty that suffuses the end. More in the vein, too, than on Friday were conductor and orchestra with Schumann's Rhenish Symphony. When his invention halted, they carried him forward; when he blurred, they pierced through. The poetry, the music in him, sang out; while none who listened might deny the mystical and sonorous majesty of the "Cathedral Scene." If the Bostonian brass can pierce for Stravinsky or for Hindemith, it can also upswell and ennoble Schumann.

H. T. P.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

GLOBE APR 21

Music Notes and Comment

Symphony "Request Program"

Mr Koussevitzky has given the subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts in the regular Friday and Saturday series something to talk about by his latest innovation, the "request program," which will be played at the final pair of concerts this week. The Pops audiences have for many years chosen a request program by ballot near the end of the season. These request programs have proved so popular that it has become an invariable custom with the conductors to play them twice. But never before have the subscribers to the regular series of Symphony concerts been offered an opportunity to select a program for a pair of concerts.

The programs of the concerts of April 5 and 6 contained a ballot on which the subscribers were asked to register their choice from the pieces played during the season, excluding those which would require chorus or unavailable soloists. A symphony, a tone poem, and a work in some other form could each be voted for.

The result, announced last week, was that Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony was chosen by a large margin; Ravel's "La Valse" led among the tone poems, with Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra" second; and in the miscellaneous group, Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude was chosen, with Sibelius' violin concerto (in which Mr Burgin played the solo part) second. Mr Koussevitzky has chosen the three pieces winning the most votes. He has added to them Debussy's "Faun," which received many votes among the tone poems; passing over Strauss' "Zarathustra" because it is too long, though it got more votes than Debussy's familiar and popular piece.

Further Details

Further details of the results follow. The other symphonies preferred by subscribers were in this order: Cesar Franck; Brahms' Second; Schubert's "Unfinished"; Sibelius' Third; Beethoven's "Pastoral" and "Enroica"; Prokofieff "Classical"; Bloch's "America"; and Bruckner's Eighth. It is curious that some of these should have been preferred to Mozart's "Jupiter," two of Schumann, Haydn's "Surprise," Schubert's C major, and Mahler's "Lied von der Erde." Mr Koussevitzky does not excel in Mozart and Schubert, but his Haydn and Schumann are good. The choice of Tchaikovsky's Fifth was no doubt partly owing to the fact that Mr Koussevitzky's performance of it is the best ever given in Boston.

The "Meistersinger" prelude has so long been one of the two or three most popular and most played pieces at the Symphony concerts that nobody will wonder it was chosen. The previous performance this season, an unusually fine one, was conducted not by Mr Koussevitzky, but by Mr Arbos as guest conductor. Perhaps some people wanted to know whether Koussevitzky could do it as well.

The miscellaneous pieces were in order of preference after the Wagner prelude and Sibelius concerto, Beethoven's "Leonore No. 3"; Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet"; Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition"; Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagate" (the only work of his on the ballot), and Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto. Here one wonders at the relative standing of Honegger's "Pacific 213"; Berlioz' "Roman Carnival"; Kodaly's "Hary Janos" and Handels Concerto Grosso in B minor.

Surprises

It is a great surprise to find Strauss' lengthy and seldom played "Zarathustra" second among the tone poems, and an even greater surprise to find Ravel's "La Valse" first of all. Nobody had supposed it so popular with the audiences. It is one of Koussevitzky's show pieces, which probably explains why it was chosen. But one would have guessed that Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes" would have ranked it, they also being Koussevitzkian war horses.

Some general notion of the preferences of this supposedly conservative and classically minded audience may be gained from these votes. In the first place what it wants is not the classics of the 18th century or the first half of the 19th, none of which were chosen, but music of the period from 1850 to 1900.

It has much less objection to novelties than one supposed, witness the votes for the unfamiliar Sibelius symphony and concerto, for Strauss' "Zarathustra," for Prokofieff, Bloch, and Bruckner.

And, finally, what it wants to hear is pieces Koussevitzky is likely to do well. Very many of the subscribers undoubtedly come chiefly to hear and to watch his conducting. The great increase in the box office sale of seats after his first season here would prove this point.

It is particularly heartening to notice that some 20th century and modernist pieces received large votes, proving that Koussevitzky's wise policy of playing a modern piece at each concert for most of the past five seasons has begun to bear fruit. He ought therefore to take heart of grace and give us modern novelties more stimulating and more provocative than some of the tepid novelties he has lately chosen.

Mr Koussevitzky is sailing for Europe May 1. He is to conduct performances of Musorgsky's "Boris" at the Paris Opera in May, at which the usual version edited by Rimsky Korsakoff will be used, and not the newly published original score. The 49th season of Boston Symphony concerts, with Mr Koussevitzky as conductor, will begin Oct 11. Plans for celebrating the 50th anniversary of the orchestra in 1930 are already being considered. It will perhaps be possible for the orchestra's first conductor, Sir George Henschel, still active in London as teacher of singing, to lead one of the pieces from the first program the orchestra ever gave at the 50th anniversary. It is not, unfortunately, likely that all of the other surviving conductors will appear. Nikisch and Gericke are dead. Fiedler, Muck, Rabaud, and Monteux survive. Paur's whereabouts is unknown to the writer of these remarks. No announcement of his death has reached Boston.

Mr Monteux is conducting at present a portion of the new series of orchestral concerts in Paris, given by the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris, founded last year to offer Paris first rate symphony concerts open to a wider public than that of the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire.

Complete Results

The complete list of pieces receiving more than 10 votes is as follows:

SYMPHONIES—Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 5 in E minor (440); Franck, Symphony in D minor (302); Brahms, Symphony No. 2 in D major (116); Schubert, Symphony in B minor ("Unfinished") (91); Sibelius, Symphony No. 3 (76); Beethoven, Symphony No. 6 ("Pastorale") (75); Beethoven, Symphony No. 3 ("Eroica") (66); Prokofieff, "Classical Symphony" (52); Bloch, "America," An Epic Rhapsody (51); Bruckner, Symphony No. 8 in C minor (45); Mozart, Symphony in C major, "Jupiter" (39); Schumann, Symphony No. 1 in B flat (39); Schubert, Symphony No. 7 in C major (37); Mahler, Symphony, "Das Lied von der Eree" (29); Beethoven, Symphony No. 1 in C major (28); Haydn, Symphony in G major, "Surprise" (20); Hanson, Nordic Symphony (10).

TONE POEMS—Ravel, "La Valse," Choregraphic Poem (349); Strauss, "Also Sprach Zarathustra" (285); Debussy, Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" (210); Scriabin, "Poem of Ecstasy" (161); Carpenter, "Skyscrapers" (116); Strauss, "Tod und Verklarung" (82); Debussy, "Iberia" (60); Goldmark, "A Negro Rhapsody" (51); Debussy, "Nocturnes" (49); Loeffler, "La Bonne Chanson" (25); Schelling, "Morocco" (20); Honegger, "Horace Victorieux" (14).

MUSIC IN OTHER FORMS—Wagner, prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg" (312); Sibelius, concerto for violin and orchestra (157); Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 3 (129); Tchaikovsky, overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" (129); Moussorgsky-Ravel, pictures at an exhibition (103); Stravinsky, "Apollon Musagete" (82); Bach, Brandenburg Concerto, No. 4 (80); Strauss, Salome's Dance from "Salome" (65); Handel, Concerto Grosso. No. 12 (53); Foote, suite in E minor for string orchestra (50); Bach, C. P. E., concerto for orchestra (48).

Program for Pops Opening

Opening night at the Pops will take place on Wednesday, May 1. The regular concert season having then ended tables will displace the rows of seats which cover the floor of Symphony Hall. An orchestra of over Symphony players will be conducted by Alfredo Casella, the Italian musician who is celebrated as composer pianist, as well as conductor.

There will be a Pop concert each night of the week and on alternate Sundays during May and June.

Alfredo Casella is now on his way from Italy, bringing with him some music of special interest and charm to freshen the Pops' repertory, which must comprise music suitable to a full-sized orchestra, of direct appeal and variety to please the varied tastes of the Pops public.

For the opening night Casella has wired the following program: Wedding march from "LeCoq d'Or," Rimsky Korsakov; "Song Without Words," Tchaikovsky; "Valse Triste," Sibelius; overture to "La Forza del Destino," Verdi; "Les Preludes," symphonic poem, Liszt; "Pavane pour une Infante defunte," Ravel; "Italy," rhapsody, Casella; overture to "William Tell," Rossini; "Largo," Handel; "Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner.

Boston Transcript Apr 22

MUSIC OF MODERNS PREFERRED

Symphony Patrons' Ballots Indicate Trend

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Modern music, if it is not too modern, is preferred to the classics by the majority of the patrons of the Symphony concerts. At least that is the clear indication of the balloting for the request programme to be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at the final concerts of the season. Quite definitely they prefer the comparatively new to the comparatively or the very old, and the newest they seem to like the least of all.

1550 MAKE CHOICE

To be sure this balloting does not represent the opinions of even a majority of the concert-goers, since of the 5000-odd persons who received the ballots enclosed in the programme-books of the season's 22d pair of concerts, but 1550 expressed their preference in the matter of a symphony. And in the other two classifications to be voted on, tone-poems and "music in other forms," but 1415 and 1395 votes, respectively, were registered. Furthermore for obvious reasons the voting was restricted to the pieces played during the current season and from even that list were omitted those pieces requiring a chorus or soloists no longer available.

Tchaikovsky Leads All

The programme assembled as a result of the voting has already been extensively announced: Wagner's Prelude to "The Meistersingers," Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," Ravel's choreographic poem, "The Tchaikovsky. It is not quite an accurate registering of expressed preferences, however, inasmuch as Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra" topped the tone-poem of Debussy by a matter of 75 votes, but was too long to fit into a practicable programme. And Franck's Symphony, although it ran second in its own class, actually received more votes than any other single composition, save only the symphony of Tchaikovsky and the waltz of Ravel.

To come then to deductions concerning this hypothetical average concert-goer. He prefers music written during the last half-century, since most of the 13 pieces receiving more than 100 votes apiece belong to that epoch and he turns a cold shoulder to pieces played here for the first time. One exception to this latter generalization seem to point to a third: he likes soloists. For Ernest Toch's Piano Concerto—and Toch is a modern of the moderns—had 37 supporters. One will, of course, never know how many of those votes were cast for Toch and how many for Mr. Sanroma, the pianist. But the fact that the only other piece calling for a soloist which was among the balloting possibilities, Sibelius' Violin Concerto, a piece until this year unheard here for two decades and hardly one of the Finn's outstanding compositions, received no less than 157 votes would seem to suggest the appeal of the solo performer.

116 for "Skyscrapers"

There were three pieces besides Toch's Concerto which, having been heard for the first time this season, make an appreciable showing in the voting tabulations: the Third Symphony of Sibelius, already 20 years old, which received 76 votes, and Goldmark's Negro Rhapsody and Bloch's "America," which drew 51 votes apiece. Neither of the latter is modernist music. But Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," with its bit of jazz and its vivid depicting of the American spirit, made known in an earlier season, was chosen by 116 voters. It is good, incidentally, to find a native composition among the top 13 of the 64 pieces voted upon. The other American composers fared not nearly so well.

It is, of course, a truism that concert-goers like to hear what they already know. Yet familiarity alone does not, by this balloting test, insure popularity. The more than familiar "Surprise" Symphony of Haydn and the "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart had but 20 and 39 adherents respectively, the great C major Symphony of Schubert but 37.

Few Votes for Beethoven

As for Beethoven, whose name is emblazoned over the proscenium arch of Symphony Hall, his "Pastoral" Symphony received 75 votes, his "Eroica" 66, to the 440 accorded Tchaikovsky's Fifth and the 302 that went to the Symphony of Franck, and Schubert's "Unfinished" trailed with 91. No doubt the Fifth or the Seventh of Beethoven, not on this season's list, would have fared much better, as for that matter would the Ninth, excluded from the balloting by the requirements of its choral Finale.

In one respect these voters showed sound musical judgment. Janin's "Symphonie Spirituelle" which received but two votes, and Miaskovsky's Eighth Symphony, Ibert's "Feeriques" and Honegger's "Chant de Nigamon," which received but one vote apiece, novelties all, deserved no more.

The preferences stated above would not, in most cases, be those of the connoisseur, the tonal epicure, the musically curious. And it is safe to say that no one of the winning pieces would have won or been even a runner-up when it was brand new. These request programmes are, after all, an index of musical vitality. "The individual," said Weber, "is an ass, but the voice of the people is the voice of God."

Page Nine

TRANS Apr 22

New Prices for the Symphony Concerts

General Rise for Both Series, With Floor and Balconies Minutely Divided

WITH the current renewal of subscriptions for the Symphony Concerts, subscribers are discovering an increase in the price of seats for next season, throughout the house and for both the Friday and the Saturday series. For the matinées on Fridays, prices on the floor descend from $100, through $70, $60 and $50, to $35; in the first balcony from $90, through $70, $60, $50, to $35; in the second, for the first row, they are $45. For the present, the other rows remain "rush-seats" to be sold for each concert; but it is within possibility that a considerable number may be offered to subscribers at $35.

For the evening concerts on Saturdays, frequented by a less opulent and more musical public, prices on the floor descend from $70, through $60, $55, $45, $40, $35, to $25; in the first balcony from $60 through $50, $45, $40, $35, to $25; in the second there are two prices, $35 and $25. A glance at the diagrams shows that Symphony Hall has been more minutely subdivided for price-making than ever before. End-seats, for example, in the more desirable portions of the floor have been marked up for both series; while those beyond in the same row may be sold for less. Even the theaters, where end-seats are equally prized, have not ventured that.

Viewed without irritation, the increase seems warranted. The outgo of the orchestra has risen and tends to rise. It can give no more concerts in a season—and keep its standards—than it now undertakes. It can play to no larger audiences, since everywhere they now fill the halls. A larger income is necessary; only in higher prices for seats can it be gained. That increase has been distributed as justly as ingenuity could accomplish it. The relative ability to pay between the publics of Friday and Saturday was thoroughly considered. For either series there is a considerable residue of low-priced seats—$35 and $25; for the evening series, indeed, they are numerous. Furthermore: both weekly audiences now listen to an orchestra restored to the first rank; to a truly illustrious conductor; to the most widely ranging and generally interesting programs now proffered at any symphony concerts the world over. For what one would have and enjoy, keep as a standard at home and as a boast abroad, one must also pay. The Symphony Orchestra can be neither a philanthropic nor a popular institution—and survive.

H. T. P.

145

Concert-Chronic

TRANS Apr 22

The Vote and The Victory

BETWEEN numbers and throu intermission at the Symphon cert on Saturday, talk played fully over the vote for the final "re program." Said the wise in such th "These Paradestücke (parade-pie were sure to be chosen on a ball Average listeners like direct melodie direct sensations, direct emotions, an remember them. They get them i Chaikovsky's Fifth or Ravel's 'Waltz and want them over and over again They like sonorities as much and the 'Meistersinger' Prelude is a whole procession of them. What did you expect?" Said another: "People like things that are a sort of tonal narrative where they can follow an easy idea as well as the music. There it is in the waltz that comes to life and dies in Ravel's piece, in Debussy's faun with a flute, in Chaikovsky's successive emotions. Or take 'Zarathustra.' There is the idea and there the sonorities. And it had 285 votes—fifth highest on the whole list. Strauss is no 'old hat.' Mr. and Mrs. Average have learned to like him."

"Strauss is all very well," cut in Madame, "but what is there to say to only sixty-six votes for 'The Eroica' and seventy-five for 'The Pastoral.' Where's your Beethoven now?" The man of wisdom took the cue: "Out of favor with the younger and early middle generations. They know what they like. They don't find it in the ancients—look at thirty-nine for Mozart's 'Jupiter' and only twenty for Haydn's 'Surprise.' They don't find it in Beethoven, unless he is all dressed up as he is in the Ninth, or in the whole classic line through Schubert and Schumann. The stuff they want is the romantic stuff of the eighties and the nineties—Chaikovsky and Wagner—and the picture-stuff that followed on—Debussy and Ravel. Out of that same liking Bruckner got fifty-two votes for the Scherzo and the Adagio in his Eighth; while Skriabin walked away with 161 for the 'Poem of Ecstasy.'"

"You are making the wrong comparisons," countered the young gentleman from Professor Hill's courses in Cambridge. "Beethoven, seventy-five and sixty-six for two Symphonies, or at most 129 for the big 'Leonore' Overture. Then what do you say to 116 for Carpenter's 'Skyscrapers'; eighty-two for Stravinsky's 'Apollo'; seventy-six for Sibelius's Third, even fourteen for 'Horace Victorieux? I doubted after the cries of grief, pain and anger last January, whether it would have even one. That's what signifies. Give them their Paradestücke, as you call them, for an occasion, but there's a sound and solid part of this public that as a steady diet wants novel pieces and modern pieces, and bold pieces written the day before yesterday, along with the classics and the ancients, who for that matter are as new as Bach or Handel. What this vote means is a plain signal to Koussevitzky to keep straight on and to keep going strong. He's on the right road and he has no end of courage. It's his victory—and rather complete. Just watch the future." . . . "The ayes have it," said the three or four gathered together, as the gong rang.

As All Might Hear

More than one of these sayings stood confirmed by Saturday's concert. The two movements of Mr. Josten's "Concerto Sacro" were again the novel number. In it, boldly and modernly, he uses the piano for iteration, for rhythm, for color, against the pervading string-tone. In measure after measure of the "Lament," Mr. Zighera, who played this piano-part in masterly fashion, was tearing off dissonances. Yet long and loud were Concerto and composer applauded. . . . Fauré's Elegy for Violoncello is not the ordinary stuff of solo-pieces. Recall, for example, the delicate tracery of the woodwinds over the sighing strings. Yet the listening was rapt, the applause hearty, even though to Mr. Bedetti fell the lion's share. He was at his finest mettle and Mr. Koussevitzky with him; while the evening audience is quick to discern and answer superlative performance.

Mr. Loeffler, indeed, was insisting too modestly that it was the playing, rather than ripened appreciation of his "Bonne Chanson," that made the tone-poem prevail as never before. To the full Mr. Koussevitzky set forth the passionate suspense and songfulness, the fragrance of the idyllic episodes, the beauty that suffuses the end. More in the vein, too, than on Friday were conductor and orchestra with Schumann's Rhenish Symphony. When his invention halted, they carried him forward; when he blurred, they pierced through. The poetry, the music in him, sang out; while none who listened might deny the mystical and sonorous majesty of the "Cathedral Scene." If the Bostonian brass can pierce for Stravinsky or for Hindemith, it can also upswell and ennoble Schumann.

H. T. P.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

GLOBE APR 21

145

Symphony "Request Program"

Mr Koussevitzky has given the subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts in the regular Friday and Saturday series something to talk about by his latest innovation, the "request program," which will be played at the final pair of concerts this week. The Pops audiences have for many years chosen a request program by ballot near the end of the season. These request programs have proved so popular that it has become an invariable custom with the conductors to play them twice. But never before have the subscribers to the regular series of Symphony concerts been offered an opportunity to select a program for a pair of concerts.

The programs of the concerts of April 5 and 6 contained a ballot on which the subscribers were asked to register their choice from the pieces played during the season, excluding those which would require chorus or unavailable soloists. A symphony, a tone poem, and a work in some other form could each be voted for.

The result, announced last week, was that Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony was chosen by a large margin; Ravel's "La Valse" led among the tone poems, with Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra" second; and in the miscellaneous group, Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude was chosen, with Sibelius' violin concerto (in which Mr Burgin played the solo part) second. Mr Koussevitzky has chosen the three pieces winning the most votes. He has added to them Debussy's "Faun," which received many votes among the tone poems; passing over Strauss' "Zarathustra" because it is too long, though it got more votes than Debussy's familiar and popular piece.

Further Details

Further details of the results follow. The other symphonies preferred by subscribers were in this order: Cesar Franck; Brahms' Second; Schubert's "Unfinished"; Sibelius' Third; Beethoven's "Pastoral" and "Enroica"; Prokofieff "Classical"; Bloch's "America"; and Bruckner's Eighth. It is curious that some of these should have been preferred to Mozart's "Jupiter," two of Schumann, Haydn's "Surprise," Schubert's C major, and Mahler's "Lied von der Erde." Mr Koussevitzky does not excel in Mozart and Schubert, but his Haydn and Schumann are good. The choice of Tchaikovsky's Fifth was no doubt partly owing to the fact that Mr Koussevitzky's performance of it is the best ever given in Boston.

The "Meistersinger" prelude has so long been one of the two or three most popular and most played pieces at the Symphony concerts that nobody will wonder it was chosen. The previous performance this season, an unusually fine one, was conducted not by Mr Koussevitzky, but by Mr Arbos as guest conductor. Perhaps some people wanted to know whether Koussevitzky could do it as well.

The miscellaneous pieces were in order of preference after the Wagner prelude and Sibelius concerto, Beethoven's "Leonore No. 3"; Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet"; Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition"; Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagate" (the only work of his on the ballot), and Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto. Here one wonders at the relative standing of Honegger's "Pacific 213"; Berlioz' "Roman Carnival"; Kodaly's "Hary Janos" and Handels Concerto Grosso in B minor.

Surprises

It is a great surprise to find Strauss' lengthy and seldom played "Zarathustra" second among the tone poems, and an even greater surprise to find Ravel's "La Valse" first of all. Nobody had supposed it so popular with the audiences. It is one of Koussevitzky's show pieces, which probably explains why it was chosen. But one would have guessed that Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes" would have ranked it, they also being Koussevitzkian war horses.

Some general notion of the preferences of this supposedly conservative and classically minded audience may be gained from these votes. In the first place what it wants is not the classics of the 18th century or the first half of the 19th, none of which were chosen, but music of the period from 1850 to 1900.

It has much less objection to novelties than one supposed, witness the votes for the unfamiliar Sibelius symphony and concerto, for Strauss' "Zarathustra," for Prokofieff, Bloch, and Bruckner.

And, finally, what it wants to hear is pieces Koussevitzky is likely to do well. Very many of the subscribers undoubtedly come chiefly to hear and to watch his conducting. The great increase in the box office sale of seats after his first season here would prove this point.

It is particularly heartening to notice that some 20th century and modernist pieces received large votes, proving that Koussevitzky's wise policy of playing a modern piece at each concert for most of the past five seasons has begun to bear fruit. He ought therefore to take heart of grace and give us modern novelties more stimulating and more provocative than some of the tepid novelties he has lately chosen.

Music Notes and Comment

Mr Koussevitzky is sailing for Europe May 1. He is to conduct performances of Musorgsky's "Boris" at the Paris Opera in May, at which the usual version edited by Rimsky Korsakoff will be used, and not the newly published original score. The 49th season of Boston Symphony concerts, with Mr Koussevitzky as conductor, will begin Oct 11. Plans for celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of the orchestra in 1930 are already being considered. It will perhaps be possible for the orchestra's first conductor, Sir George Henschel, still active in London as teacher of singing, to lead one of the pieces from the first program the orchestra ever gave at the 50th anniversary. It is not, unfortunately, likely that all of the other surviving conductors will appear. Nikisch and Gericke are dead. Fiedler, Muck, Rabaud, and Monteux survive. Paur's whereabouts is unknown to the writer of these remarks. No announcement of his death has reached Boston.

Mr Monteux is conducting at present a portion of the new series of orchestral concerts in Paris, given by the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris, founded last year to offer Paris first rate symphony concerts open to a wider public than that of the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire.

Complete Results

The complete list of pieces receiving more than 10 votes is as follows:

SYMPHONIES—Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 5 in E minor (440); Franck, Symphony in D minor (302); Brahms, Symphony No. 2 in D major (116); Schubert, Symphony in B minor ("Unfinished") (91); Sibelius, Symphony No. 3 (76); Beethoven, Symphony No. 6 ("Pastorale") (75); Beethoven, Symphony No. 3 ("Eroica") (66); Prokofieff, "Classical Symphony" (52); Bloch, "America," An Epic Rhapsody (51); Bruckner, Symphony No. 8 in C minor (45); Mozart, Symphony in C major, "Jupiter" (39); Schumann, Symphony No. 1 in B flat (39); Schubert, Symphony No. 7 in C major (37); Mahler, Symphony, "Das Lied von der Eree" (29); Beethoven, Symphony No. 1 in C major (28); Haydn, Symphony in G major, "Surprise" (20); Hanson, Nordic Symphony (10).

TONE POEMS—Ravel, "La Valse," Choregraphic Poem (349); Strauss, "Also Sprach Zarathustra" (285); Debussy, Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" (210); Scriabin, "Poem of Ecstasy" (161); Carpenter, "Skyscrapers" (116); Strauss, "Tod und Verklarung" (82); Debussy, "Iberia" (60); Goldmark, "A Negro Rhapsody" (51); Debussy, "Nocturnes" (49); Loeffler, "La Bonne Chanson" (25); Schelling, "Morocco" (20); Honegger, "Horace Victorieux" (14).

MUSIC IN OTHER FORMS—Wagner, prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg" (312); Sibelius, concerto for violin and orchestra (157); Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 3 (129); Tchaikovsky, overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" (129); Moussorgsky-Ravel, pictures at an exhibition (103); Stravinsky, "Apollon Musagete" (82); Bach, Brandenburg Concerto, No. 4 (80); Strauss, Salome's Dance from "Salome" (65); Handel, Concerto Grosso, No. 12 (53); Foote, suite in E minor for string orchestra (50); Bach, C. P. E., concerto for orchestra (48).

Program for Pops Opening

Opening night at the Pops will take place on Wednesday, May 1. The regular concert season having then ended tables will displace the rows of seats which cover the floor of Symphony Hall. An orchestra of over Symphony players will be conducted by Alfredo Casella, the Italian musician who is celebrated as composer pianist, as well as conductor.

There will be a Pop concert each night of the week and on alternate Sundays during May and June.

Alfredo Casella is now on his way from Italy, bringing with him some music of special interest and charm to freshen the Pops' repertory, which will comprise music suitable to a full-size orchestra, of direct appeal and variety to please the varied tastes of the Pops public.

For the opening night Casella has arranged the following program: Wedding march from "LeCoq d'Or," Rimsky-Korsakov; "Song Without Words," Tchaikovsky; "Valse Triste," Sibelius; overture to "La Forza del Destino," Verdi; "Les Preludes," symphonic poem, Liszt; "Pavane pour une Infante defunte," Ravel; "Italy," rhapsody, Casella; overture to "William Tell," Rossini; "Largo," Handel; "Ride of the Valkyries,' Wagner.

MUSIC OF MODERNS PREFERRED

Symphony Patrons' Ballots Indicate Trend

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Modern music, if it is not too modern, is preferred to the classics by the majority of the patrons of the Symphony concerts. At least that is the clear indication of the balloting for the request programme to be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at the final concerts of the season. Quite definitely they prefer the comparatively new to the comparatively or the very old, and the newest they seem to like the least of all.

1550 MAKE CHOICE

To be sure this balloting does not represent the opinions of even a majority of the concert-goers, since of the 5000-odd persons who received the ballots enclosed in the programme-books of the season's 22d pair of concerts, but 1550 expressed their preference in the matter of a symphony. And in the other two classifications to be voted on, tone-poems and "music in other forms," but 1415 and 1395 votes, respectively, were registered. Furthermore for obvious reasons the voting was restricted to the pieces played during the current season and from even that list were omitted those pieces requiring a chorus or soloists no longer available.

Tchaikovsky Leads All

The programme assembled as a result of the voting has already been extensively announced: Wagner's Prelude to "The Meistersingers," Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," Ravel's choreographic poem, "The tion, save only the Symphony of Tchaikovsky. It is not quite an accurate registering of expressed preferences, however, inasmuch as Strauss "Thus Spake Zarathustra" topped the tone-poem of Debussy by a matter of 75 votes, but was too long to fit into a practicable programme. And Franck's Symphony, although it ran second in its own class, actually received more sition, save only the symphony of votes than any other single composi- Tchaikovsky and the waltz of Ravel.

To come then to deductions concerning this hypothetical average concert-goer. He prefers music written during the last half-century, since most of the 13 pieces receiving more than 100 votes apiece belong to that epoch and he turns a cold shoulder to pieces played here for the first time. One exception to this latter generalization seem to point to a third: he likes soloists. For Ernest Toch's Piano Concerto—and Toch is a modern of the moderns—had 37 supporters. One will, of course, never know how many of those votes were cast for Toch and how many for Mr. Sanroma, the pianist. But the fact that the only other piece calling for a soloist which was among the balloting possibilities, Sibelius' Violin Concerto, a piece until this year unheard here for two decades and hardly one of the Finn's outstanding compositions, received no less than 157 votes would seem to suggest the appeal of the solo performer.

116 for "Skyscrapers"

There were three pieces besides Toch's certo which, having been heard for the first time this season, make an appreciable showing in the voting tabulations: the Third Symphony of Sibelius, already 20 years old, which received 76 votes, and Goldmark's Negro Rhapsody and Bloch's "America," which drew 51 votes apiece. Neither of the latter is modernist music. But Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," with its bit of jazz and its vivid depicting of the American spirit, made known in an earlier season, was chosen by 116 voters. It is good, incidentally, to find a native composition among the top 13 of the 64 pieces voted upon. The other American composers fared not nearly so well.

It is, of course, a truism that concert-goers like to hear what they already know. Yet familiarity alone does not, by this balloting test, insure popularity. The more than familiar "Surprise" Symphony of Haydn and the "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart had but 20 and 39 adherents respectively, the great C major Symphony of Schubert but 27.

Few Votes for Beethoven

As for Beethoven, whose name is emblazoned over the proscenium arch of Symphony Hall, his "Pastoral" Symphony received 75 votes, his "Eroica" 66, to the 440 accorded Tchaikovsky's Fifth and the 302 that went to the Symphony of Franck, and Schubert's "Unfinished" trailed with 91. No doubt the Fifth or the Seventh of Beethoven, not on this season's list, would have fared much better, as for that matter would the Ninth, excluded from the balloting by the requirements of its choral Finale.

In one respect these voters showed sound musical judgment. Janin's "Symphonie Spirituelle" which received but two votes, and Miaskovsky's Eighth Symphony, Ibert's "Feeriques" and Honegger's "Chant de Nigamon," which received but one vote apiece, novelties all, deserved no more.

The preferences stated above would not, in most cases, be those of the connoisseur, the tonal epicure, the musically curious. And it is safe to say that no one of the winning pieces would have won or been even a runner-up when it was brand new. These request programmes are, after all, an index of musical vitality. "The individual," said Weber, "is an ass, but the voice of the people is the voice of God."

Page Nine

TRANS APR 22

New Prices for the Symphony Concerts

General Rise for Both Series, With Floor and Balconies Minutely Divided

WITH the current renewal of subscriptions for the Symphony Concerts, subscribers are discovering an increase in the price of seats for next season, throughout the house and for both the Friday and the Saturday series. For the matinées on Fridays, prices on the floor descend from $100, through $70, $60 and $50, to $35; in the first balcony from $90, through $70, $60, $50, to $35; in the second, for the first row, they are $45. For the present, the other rows remain "rush-seats" to be sold for each concert; but it is within possibility that a considerable number may be offered to subscribers at $35.

For the evening concerts on Saturdays, frequented by a less opulent and more musical public, prices on the floor descend from $70, through $60, $55, $45, $40, $35, to $25; in the first balcony from $60, through $50, $45, $40, $35, to $25; in the second there are two prices, $35 and $25. A glance at the diagrams shows that Symphony Hall has been more minutely subdivided for price-making than ever before. End-seats, for example, in the more desirable portions of the floor have been marked up for both series; while those beyond in the same row may be sold for less. Even the theaters, where end-seats are equally prized, have not ventured that.

Viewed without irritation, the increase seems warranted. The outgo of the orchestra has risen and tends to rise. It can give no more concerts in a season—and keep its standards—than it now undertakes. It can play to no larger audiences, since everywhere they now fill the halls. A larger income is necessary; only in higher prices for seats can it be gained. That increase has been distributed as justly as ingenuity could accomplish it. The relative ability to pay between the publics of Friday and Saturday was thoroughly considered. For either series there is a considerable residue of low-priced seats—$35 and $25; for the evening series, indeed, they are numerous. Furthermore: both weekly audiences now listen to an orchestra restored to the first rank; to a truly illustrious conductor; to the most widely ranging and generally interesting programs now proffered at any symphony concerts the world over. For what one would have and enjoy, keep as a standard at home and as a boast abroad, one must also pay. The Symphony Orchestra can be neither a philanthropic nor a popular institution—and survive.

H. T. P.

Concert-Chronic

TRANS APR 22

The Vote and The Victory

BETWEEN numbers and throu intermission at the Symphon cert on Saturday, talk played fully over the vote for the final "re program." Said the wise in such th "These Paradestücke (parade-pie were sure to be chosen on a ba Average listeners like direct melodie direct sensations, direct emotions, an remember them. They get them i Chaikovsky's Fifth or Ravel's 'Waltz and want them over and over again They like sonorities as much and the 'Meistersinger' Prelude is a whole procession of them. What did you expect?" Said another: "People like things that are a sort of tonal narrative where they can follow an easy idea as well as the music. There it is in the waltz that comes to life and dies in Ravel's piece, in Debussy's faun with a flute, in Chaikovsky's successive emotions. Or take 'Zarathustra.' There is the idea and there the sonorities. And it had 285 votes—fifth highest on the whole list. Strauss is no 'old hat.' Mr. and Mrs. Average have learned to like him."

"Strauss is all very well," cut in Madame, "but what is there to say to only sixty-six votes for 'The Eroica' and seventy-five for 'The Pastoral.' Where's your Beethoven now?" The man of wisdom took the cue: "Out of favor with the younger and early middle generations. They know what they like. They don't find it in the ancients—look at thirty-nine for Mozart's 'Jupiter' and only twenty for Haydn's 'Surprise.' They don't find it in Beethoven, unless he is all dressed up as he is in the Ninth, or in the whole classic line through Schubert and Schumann. The stuff they want is the romantic stuff of the eighties and the nineties—Chaikovsky and Wagner and the picture-stuff that followed on—Debussy and Ravel. Out of that same liking Bruckner got fifty-two votes for the Scherzo and the Adagio in his Eighth; while Skriabin walked away with 161 for the 'Poem of Ecstasy.'"

"You are making the wrong comparisons," countered the young gentleman from Professor Hill's courses in Cambridge. "Beethoven, seventy-five and sixty-six for two Symphonies, or at most 129 for the big 'Leonore' Overture. Then what do you say to 116 for Carpenter's 'Skyscrapers'; eighty-two for Stravinsky's 'Apollo'; seventy-six for Sibelius's Third, even fourteen for 'Horace Victorieux? I doubted after the cries of grief, pain and anger last January, whether it would have even one. That's what signifies. Give them their Paradestücke, as you call them, for an occasion, but there's a sound and solid part of this public that as a steady diet wants novel pieces and modern pieces, and bold pieces written the day before yesterday, along with the classics and the ancients, who for that matter are as new as Bach or Handel. What this vote means is a plain signal to Koussevitzky to keep straight on and to keep going strong. He's on the right road and he has no end of courage. It's his victory—and rather complete. Just watch the future." . . . "The ayes have it," said the three or four gathered together, as the gong rang.

As All Might Hear

More than one of these sayings stood confirmed by Saturday's concert. The two movements of Mr. Josten's "Concerto Sacro" were again the novel number. In it, boldly and modernly, he uses the piano for iteration, for rhythm, for color, against the pervading string-tone. In measure after measure of the "Lament," Mr. Zighera, who played this piano-part in masterly fashion, was tearing off dissonances. Yet long and loud were Concerto and composer applauded. . . . Fauré's Elegy for Violoncello is not the ordinary stuff of solo-pieces. Recall, for example, the delicate tracery of the woodwinds over the sighing strings. Yet the listening was rapt, the applause hearty, even though to Mr. Bedetti fell the lion's share. He was at his finest mettle and Mr. Koussevitzky with him; while the evening audience is quick to discern and answer superlative performance.

Mr. Loeffler, indeed, was insisting too modestly that it was the playing, rather than ripened appreciation of his "Bonne Chanson," that made the tone-poem prevail as never before. To the full Mr. Koussevitzky set forth the passionate suspense and songfulness, the fragrance of the idyllic episodes, the beauty that suffuses the end. More in the vein, too, than on Friday were conductor and orchestra with Schumann's Rhenish Symphony. When his invention halted, they carried him forward; when he blurred, they pierced through. The poetry, the music in him, sang out; while none who listened might deny the mystical and sonorous majesty of the "Cathedral Scene." If the Bostonian brass can pierce for Stravinsky or for Hindemith, it can also upswell and ennoble Schumann.

H. T. P.

146

TRANS. APR 23

Restored Orchestra

Laurels from New York for Mr. Koussevitzky and His Work

WITH this brilliant finale [the performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony] the visitors from Boston ended one of their most interesting seasons in New York. Among the works presented, and for which we should be especially grateful, were Arthur Foote's Suite for Strings, Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," Toch's Piano-Concerto and Ravel's "The Waltz"—the latter because of superlative performance. Among those for which we find ourselves unable to give fervent thanks were Bloch's "America" and Honegger's "Rugby." The symphony in D of Frederick the Great increased our respect for that monarch and the performance of Schumann's Symphony in B-flat our admiration for Mr. Koussevitzky.

To the conductor a rendering of praise is certainly due at the end of the season. He has restored to the Boston Symphony Orchestra the fullness of its prestige. He has brought back the luminosity of its tone, the vitality of its style, the finish of its technic. In his selections and his interpretations he has shown himself to be a progressive who preserves his sanity and a respecter of the past, whose treasures he treats not merely as a historical heritage, but as a living power to be felt by the living. He will return to us next winter at the head of a truly great orchestra which has signally added to its influence under his guidance. [W. J. Henderson in The Sun

Concert-Chronicle

Error Corrected TRANS APR 23.

THE SUNDAY newspapers of Philadelphia, yesterday come to hand, and sundry letters from readers in that city, correct an inadvertent error of this department. With the return of Mr. Stokowski to the conductorship of the Philadelphia Orchestra at the beginning and the end of the musical year, it has revived the custom of a final "request program," to be played at the concerts of next Friday and Saturday. The management of the orchestra has civilly sent forward a ballot. It begins with this proviso: "The last program of the current season will be made up of numbers chosen by the audience. The choice of works to be performed need not be limited to those which the orchestra has played this season, but may be selected from any works in the orchestral repertory, and a second and third choice may be indicated, if desired." Then follow three categories: Symphony, Overture, Miscellaneous Numbers—that is, tone-poems, suites and the like—within each of which one, two or three pieces may be designated.

The chosen pieces were the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," as in Boston: Franck's Symphony, which stood second on the Bostonian lists; Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" unplayed in Boston during the current season. Reasonably, the Bostonian equivalent in the final choice is Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. As it happened, Franck's Symphony was played in Philadelphia last Friday and Saturday. Mr. Stokowski declined to replay it at the succeeding pair of concerts, substituting for it the second choice in the balloting—Beethoven's Fifth. Other pieces to receive an appreciable number of votes were Brahms's First Symphony; Chaikovsky's Fifth; Dvorák's Symphony, "From the New World"; Beethoven's third "Leonore" Overture; the Prelude to "Lohengrin," the Prelude and Finale from "Tristan and Isolde"; the Overtures to "Tannhäuser" and "Rienzi"; Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration"; Chaikovsky's fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet"; even his Overture, "1812." With that piece, which by common consent Boston has long relegated to The Pops, it is time to pause.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the closing concert of the Tuesday afternoon series in Symphony Hall on Tuesday, April 23, at 3.

Serge Koussevitzky will then present the following program: Arthur Foote's suite for string orchestra in E major; Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"; Dukas' scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"; Tchaikovsky's symphony No. 5 in E minor.

Globe Apr 20 T

BEDETTI SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Orchestra Member Wins Cordial Applause

New "Concerto Sacro," by Prof Josten of Smith College, Performed

Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1919, was heard as soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert. His playing in Faure's "Elegie" won cordial applause. The novelty of the afternoon was two movements from a "Concerto Sacro" by Prof Werner Josten of Smith College.

Charles Martin Loeffler, a composer whom Boston can claim as her own, though he was born in Alsace and now lives at Medfield, Mass, was present to acknowledge the cordial reception of his "La Bonne Chanson," first heard at these concerts in 1902 and since become part of the repertory. Prof Josten also bowed his acknowledgment from the stage for the applause which greeted his work. The only other number was Schumann's "Rhenish Symphony."

Mr Bedetti's popularity with the audience was shown by the warmth of the applause that greeted him as he took his place to play the solo in Faure's "Elegie." He has been soloist a number of times, besides numerous appearances here in recital and at chamber concerts. Faure's "Elegie," with its suavely flowing melody, restrained sentiment and subdued elegance of style, suits Mr Bedetti's talent admirably.

16th Century Character

Prof Josten, an enthusiast for ancient music, has apparently sought to give his Concerto Sacro something of the character of 16th century church music. The score contains an elaborate set of programmatic headings, particularly for the first two movements, "The Annunciation," and "The Miracle," omitted yesterday. The two latter movements, which were played, are entitled "Lament"; and "Sepulchre and Transfiguration (Instrumental Motet)." He has scored his music for string orchestra and piano. The piano, however, was made to sound yesterday like one of its ancestors, with all its hard-won sonority muffled and dulled.

Mr Josten says that he got the idea for this piece from an altar painting at Colmar by Gruenwald, who flourished about the year 1500. He has written it with self-conscious archaism of style, modal harmonies, contrapuntal part writing, a deliberate avoidance of modernity. The "Lament," a long flowing adagio, lacks melodic originality. The finale does not quite rise to the sublimity of its title.

But has there been in the whole history of music a really successful attempt to write in the style and mood of a long-vanished age? This concert, despite some appealing qualities, seemed mere antiquarianism, not devoid of kinship with the attitude that has caused so many "Ye Arte Shoppes" to flourish of late years on American main streets, to the annoyance of serious souls like Mr Sinclair Lewis.

A Dramatic Interpretation

Mr Loeffler's tone poem, suggested by Verlaine's well known verses beginning "Avant que tu ne t'en ailles," from "La Bonne Chanson," gained in impressiveness yesterday from Mr Koussevitzky's dramatic and intense interpretation. Loeffler's music, like that of Debussey and Ravel, with which it has close imaginative affinities, has too often been performed in a manner so refined and subdued as to deprive it of forcefulness.

This score has substance, vigor, emphasis, as well as color and atmosphere. It has stood the test of more than a quarter-century well, and begins to sound like a genuine, if minor, masterpiece. If only Mr Loeffler lived at Moscow or on Montmartre, there are some who would be more likely to render him due honor as a composer. But, after all, it is possible for a genius to live in a New England village, as the case of Concord in the mid-19th century proves.

Mr Koussevitzky gave an individual and not very clean-cut reading of Schumann's Third Symphony, which he had not previously conducted here. He failed to save the slow movement from banality, a feat of skill and taste of which few musicians would perhaps be capable, but made the rest of it interesting and appealing. No doubt after he has had more opportunity to familiarize himself with the score he will succeed, as he has with Schumann's First Symphony, in working out an interpretation of remarkable imaginative power. The orchestra yesterday played sloppily and carelessly at times, as it too often does. There seems no necessity of inaccurate attacks and other errors of detail at these concerts, yet they not seldom occur.

The "request program," chosen by ballot of the audience, will be played at the final pair of concerts next week. The chosen numbers are Wagner's "Meistersinger," prelude; Debussey's "Faun," Ravel's "La Valse," and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony. Extended comment on the results of the ballot will be printed in the music and musicians department of the Sunday Globe tomorrow.

Herald Apr 20

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The 23d concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Werner Josten, two movements from the Concerto Sacro for strings and piano, "Lament" and "Sepulchre and Transfiguration" (first time in Boston). G. Faure, Elegy for violoncello and orchestra (Mr. Bedetti, violoncellist). Loeffler, "La Bonne Chanson" (after Verlaine). Schumann, symphony, E flat major, No. 3, "Rhenish."

Mr. Josten, born at Elberfeld in 1888, has been the teacher of fugue and composition at Smith College, Northampton, since 1923. A pupil of Rudolf Siegel, who was in turn a pupil of Thiel, Thuille and Humperdinck, he was assistant conductor at the Munich Opera House before he came to the United States. The list of his compositions includes choral works, music for tenor and orchestra, stage music and an orchestral piece of large proportions, "Jungle." He has within the last three years given performances of operas by Monteverdi and Handel, revivals which have excited wide attention.

His Concerto Sacro was inspired, he writes us, by "the mysterious dark triptych painted for the Isenheim altar by Gruenewald." This Matthias Gruenewald was the chief Rhenish painter at the beginning of the 16th century. The Concerto is in four movements. "The Annunciation" and "The Miracle" were not played yesterday. The first performance of the Concerto was at New York on March 27, 1929.

This music might be said to be a translation of the triptych into tones; music for religious art of early German painters. The religious expression in "The Lament" and the final section is far from a blend of mysticism and sensuousness; there is no dramatic, much less theatrical appeal to the hearer. The flame of pious devotion is pure; it burns brighter and brighter. The sorrowing is neither lacrymose nor austere. There is impressive dignity; a reticence in grief at first that finally gives way to a more intense outpouring of emotion.

"The Sepulchre and Transfiguration" is on a little lower plane; necessarily so, when one considers the subject than must find portrayal in tones. At the beginning of the "Transfiguration" section, the first few measures suggest those which Strauss found for the opening of his "Transfiguration." This is not surprising, for an ascending passage would occur to any composer choosing this mighty theme for musical illustration. The swelling of the voices to the final glorification—Mr. Josten calls this movement an "Instrumental Motet"—is skilfully managed, but the effect is soon diminished by undue repetition of the ground figure on which the choral masses are based. These repetitions bring monotony. For the first time in the performance a hearer was tempted to cry out to Mr. Josten, who was in the audience, "Hold, enough! You have said that and said it well. Don't spoil it now."

The Concerto met with genuine favor. It is said that Mr. Josten's "Jungle" may be performed here next season. Whether this jungle is Kipling's or Tomlinson's, or another's is immaterial as long as it is definitely Mr. Josten's.

The other pieces on the program, the Elegy with the charming accompaniment for the solo instrument which was of course, finely played by Mr. Bedetti; the beautiful tone-poem of Loeffler's and the sturdy symphony of Schumann's with the pontifical Cologne Cathedral movement gave great pleasure to the audience. Mr. Loeffler's music lends additional beauty to the exquisite charm of Verlaine's poem. It was never so well performed here as it was yesterday—never with the like richness of coloring and poetic expression. The interpretation of the symphony made one forget all that has been said in disparagement of Schumann's technical ability both in form and in orchestration.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week was thus originally arranged in answer to requests: Wagner, prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; Ravel "La Valse"; Tchaikovsky, symphony, E minor, number 5. Since the first announcement Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" has been added though, in the voting for the poems. Ravel led with 349 ballots; Strauss came next with "Thus Spoke Zarathustra" 285 votes; then came Debussy's prelude, with 210 votes. Strauss's tone poem would have made the concert too long.

It may interest some to ponder, the voting for a symphony: Tchaikovsky, 440, Franck 302, Brahms 116, Schubert 91, Beethoven (Pastorale) 75, Beethoven (Eroca) 66, Mozart Jupiter) 39, Schuman No. 1 39, Haydn 20.

On the other hand Sibelius received 76, Prokofieff 52, Bruckner 45.

Those who were dismayed by Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" may not like to hear that it received 116 votes and was fifth out of 15 tone poems named.

What is amazing, what is unaccountable is that Ravel's "La Valse" headed the list, receiving 64 more votes than Strauss's "Zarathustra", 139 more votes than Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun."

NEW AND OLD PIECES BY SYMPHONY

Jean Bedetti, Cellist Soloist—Loeffler's Music

Post Apr 20

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The last new programme of the current Symphony season, since next week's requested list offers only repetitions, that of yesterday afternoon and this evening embraces part of a Concerto Sacro for strings and a piano by Werner Josten, Faure's Elegy with Jean Bedetti as solo 'cellist, Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson" and Schumann's Third or Rhenish Symphony.

JOSTEN'S CONCERTO

Mr. Josten, who has conducted notable revivals of ancient operas, Monteverde's and Handel's, at Northampton where as instructor in composition he now resides, is plainly of the contemporary musicians who incline to live spiritually in the remoter past. His Concerto of yesterday, for example, was inspired by a 16th century altar-piece by Matthias Gruenewald, and the music has a markedly medieval flavor. The four movements are entitled respectively: The Annunciation; The Miracle; Lament; Sepulchre and Transfiguration. Only the third and fourth were played yesterday.

In each Mr. Josten established immediately and convincingly a mood, but fails somehow to sustain and develop it, lapsing rather into mere repetitiousness and reiteration. It is unfortunate, too, that the Transfiguration section should suggest so pointedly Debussy's piano-piece "La Cathedrale Engloutie." Mr. Josten, who was present in the audience, was called and recalled to the stage.

Loeffler's Music

Likewise in Symphony Hall yesterday was Mr. Loeffler to hear a glowing and much applauded performance of a 28-year-old work which, if not his most significant composition, at least bears eloquent witness to his great skill, his warm imagination, his true distinction as a maker of music. Self-effacingly these many years Mr. Loeffler has lived and worked in nearby Medfield. Had he instead made Paris his home, one feels sure that his name and fame would have been more loudly trumpeted.

Compared to "La Bonne Chanson," which followed it yesterday Faure's Elegy seems no more than an inflated bit of salon-music, linked sweetness happily not too long drawn out. Mr. Bedetti played his part in this amiable work with his wonted finish of style and beauty of tone.

Schumann's Third

In the knowledge of the miracle of rejuvenation that Mr. Koussevitzky wrought not so long ago with Schumann's First Symphony, much was to be expected yesterday of his version of the Third, and such expectation was amply fulfilled, although the earlier piece by reason of its greater freshness offers more promising material. Of each of the five movements of the Rhenish Symphony Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra made much.

The first movement had due exuberance, its elate chief theme was superbly proclaimed; the homely humor of the second, the tender sentiment of the third, the solemnity of the so-called Cathedral Scene, the buoyancy of the Finale, did not escape them. And as with the First Symphony Mr. Koussevitzky made the listener feel that Schumann's much-maligned orchestration needs only a sympathetic handling to make it a suitable, even the ideal investment of his musical thought.

It should be added that the three trombonists met bravely and successfully the difficult test offered them by the fourth movement.

146

TRANS. APR 23

Restored Orchestra

Laurels from New York for Mr. Koussevitzky and His Work

WITH this brilliant finale [the performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony] the visitors from Boston ended one of their most interesting seasons in New York. Among the works presented, and for which we should be especially grateful, were Arthur Foote's Suite for Strings, Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," Toch's Piano-Concerto and Ravel's "The Waltz"—the latter because of superlative performance. Among those for which we find ourselves unable to give fervent thanks were Bloch's "America" and Honegger's "Rugby." The symphony in D of Frederick the Great increased our respect for that monarch and the performance of Schumann's Symphony in B-flat our admiration for Mr. Koussevitzky.

To the conductor a rendering of praise is certainly due at the end of the season. He has restored to the Boston Symphony Orchestra the fullness of its prestige. He has brought back the luminosity of its tone, the vitality of its style, the finish of its technic. In his selections and his interpretations he has shown himself to be a progressive who preserves his sanity and a respecter of the past, whose treasures he treats not merely as a historical heritage, but as a living power to be felt by the living. He will return to us next winter at the head of a truly great orchestra which has signally added to its influence under his guidance. [W. J. Henderson in The Sun

Concert-Chronicle

Error Corrected TRANS APR 23,

THE SUNDAY newspapers of Philadelphia, yesterday come to hand, and sundry letters from readers in that city, correct an inadvertent error of this department. With the return of Mr. Stokowski to the conductorship of the Philadelphia Orchestra at the beginning and the end of the musical year, it has revived the custom of a final "request program," to be played at the concerts of next Friday and Saturday. The management of the orchestra has civilly sent forward a ballot. It begins with this proviso: "The last program of the current season will be made up of numbers chosen by the audience. The choice of works to be performed need not be limited to those which the orchestra has played this season, but may be selected from any works in the orchestral repertory, and a second and third choice may be indicated, if desired." Then follow three categories: Symphony, Overture, Miscellaneous Numbers—that is, tone-poems, suites and the like—within each of which one, two or three pieces may be designated.

The chosen pieces were the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," as in Boston: Franck's Symphony, which stood second on the Bostonian lists; Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" unplayed in Boston during the current season. Reasonably, the Bostonian equivalent in the final choice is Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. As it happened, Franck's Symphony was played in Philadelphia last Friday and Saturday. Mr. Stokowski declined to replay it at the succeeding pair of concerts, substituting for it the second choice in the balloting—Beethoven's Fifth. Other pieces to receive an appreciable number of votes were Brahms's First Symphony; Chaikovsky's Fifth; Dvorák's Symphony, "From the New World"; Beethoven's third "Leonore" Overture; the Prelude to "Lohengrin," the Prelude and Finale from "Tristan and Isolde"; the Overtures to "Tannhäuser" and "Rienzi"; Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration"; Chaikovsky's fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet"; even his Overture, "1812." With that piece, which by common consent Boston has long relegated to The Pops, it is time to pause.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the closing concert of the Tuesday afternoon series in Symphony Hall on Tuesday, April 23, at 3.

Serge Koussevitzky will then present the following program: Arthur Foote's suite for string orchestra in E major; Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"; Dukas' scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"; Tchaikovsky's symphony No. 5 in E minor.

Globe Apr 20 T

BEDETTI SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Orchestra Member Wins Cordial Applause

New "Concerto Sacro," by Prof Josten of Smith College, Performed

Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1919, was heard as soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert. His playing in Faure's "Elegie" won cordial applause. The novelty of the afternoon was two movements from a "Concerto Sacro" by Prof Werner Josten of Smith College.

Charles Martin Loeffler, a composer whom Boston can claim as her own, though he was born in Alsace and now lives at Medfield, Mass, was present to acknowledge the cordial reception of his "La Bonne Chanson," first heard at these concerts in 1902 and since become part of the repertory. Prof Josten also bowed his acknowledgment from the stage for the applause which greeted his work. The only other number was Schumann's "Rhenish Symphony."

Mr Bedetti's popularity with the audience was shown by the warmth of the applause that greeted him as he took his place to play the solo in Faure's "Elegie." He has been soloist a number of times, besides numerous appearances here in recital and at chamber concerts. Faure's "Elegie," with its suavely flowing melody, restrained sentiment and subdued elegance of style, suits Mr Bedetti's talent admirably.

16th Century Character

Prof Josten, an enthusiast for ancient music, has apparently sought to give his Concerto Sacro something of the character of 16th century church music. The score contains an elaborate set of programmatic headings, particularly for the first two movements, "The Annunciation," and "The Miracle," omitted yesterday. The two latter movements, which were played, are entitled "Lament"; and "Sepulchre and Transfiguration (Instrumental Motet)." He has scored his music for string orchestra and piano. The piano, however, was made to sound yesterday like one of its ancestors, with all its hard-won sonority muffled and dulled.

Mr Josten says that he got the idea for this piece from an altar painting at Colmar by Gruenwald, who flourished about the year 1500. He has written it with self-conscious archaism of style, modal harmonies, contrapuntal part writing, a deliberate avoidance of modernity. The "Lament," a long flowing adagio, lacks melodic originality. The finale does not quite rise to the sublimity of its title.

But has there been in the whole history of music a really successful attempt to write in the style and mood of a long-vanished age? This concert, despite some appealing qualities, seemed mere antiquarianism, not devoid of kinship with the attitude that has caused so many "Ye Arte Shoppes" to flourish of late years on American main streets, to the annoyance of serious souls like Mr Sinclair Lewis.

A Dramatic Interpretation

Mr Loeffler's tone poem, suggested by Verlaine's well known verses beginning "Avant que tu ne t'en ailles," from "La Bonne Chanson," gained in impressiveness yesterday from Mr Koussevitzky's dramatic and intense interpretation. Loeffler's music, like that of Debussey and Ravel, with which it has close imaginative affinities, has too often been performed in a manner so refined and subdued as to deprive it of forcefulness.

This score has substance, vigor, emphasis, as well as color and atmosphere. It has stood the test of more than a quarter-century well, and begins to sound like a genuine, if minor, masterpiece. If only Mr Loeffler lived at Moscow or on Montmartre, there are some who would be more likely to render him due honor as a composer. But, after all, it is possible for a genius to live in a New England village, as the case of Concord in the mid-19th century proves.

Mr Koussevitzky gave an individual and not very clean-cut reading of Schumann's Third Symphony, which he had not previously conducted here. He failed to save the slow movement from banality, a feat of skill and taste of which few musicians would perhaps be capable, but made the rest of it interesting and appealing. No doubt after he has had more opportunity to familiarize himself with the score he will succeed, as he has with Schumann's First Symphony, in working out an interpretation of remarkable imaginative power. The orchestra yesterday played sloppily and carelessly at times, as it too often does. There seems no necessity of inaccurate attacks and other errors of detail at these concerts, yet they not seldom occur.

The "request program," chosen by ballot of the audience, will be played at the final pair of concerts next week. The chosen numbers are Wagner's "Meistersinger," prelude; Debussey's "Faun," Ravel's "La Valse," and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony. Extended comment on the results of the ballot will be printed in the music and musicians department of the Sunday Globe tomorrow.

Herald Apr 20

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The 23d concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Werner Josten, two movements from the Concerto Sacro for strings and piano, "Lament" and "Sepulchre and Transfiguration" (first time in Boston). G. Faure, Elegy for violoncello and orchestra (Mr. Bedetti, violoncellist). Loeffler, "La Bonne Chanson" (after Verlaine). Schumann, symphony, E flat major, No. 3, "Rhenish."

Mr. Josten, born at Elberfeld in 1888, has been the teacher of fugue and composition at Smith College, Northampton, since 1923. A pupil of Rudolf Siegel, who was in turn a pupil of Thiel, Thuilte and Humperdinck, he was assistant conductor at the Munich Opera House before he came to the United States. The list of his compositions includes choral works, music for tenor and orchestra, stage music and an orchestral piece of large proportions, "Jungle." He has within the last three years given performances of operas by Monteverdi and Handel, revivals which have excited wide attention.

His Concerto Sacro was inspired, he writes us, by "the mysterious dark triptych painted for the Isenheim altar by Gruenewald." This Matthias Gruenewald was the chief Rhenish painter at the beginning of the 16th century. The Concerto is in four movements. "The Annunciation" and "The Miracle" were not played yesterday. The first performance of the Concerto was at New York on March 27, 1929.

This music might be said to be a translation of the triptych into tones; music for religious art of early German painters. The religious expression in "The Lament" and the final section is far from a blend of mysticism and sensuousness; there is no dramatic, much less theatrical appeal to the hearer. The flame of pious devotion is pure; it burns brighter and brighter. The sorrowing is neither lacrymose nor austere. There is impressive dignity; a reticence in grief at first that finally gives way to a more intense outpouring of emotion.

"The Sepulchre and Transfiguration" is on a little lower plane; necessarily so, when one considers the subject than must find portrayal in tones. At the beginning of the "Transfiguration" section, the first few measures suggest those which Strauss found for the opening of his "Transfiguration." This is not surprising, for an ascending passage would occur to any composer choosing this mighty theme for musical illustration. The swelling of the voices to the final glorification—Mr. Josten calls this movement an "Instrumental Motet"—is skilfully managed, but the effect is soon diminished by undue repetition of the ground figure on which the choral masses are based. These repetitions bring monotony. For the first time in the performance a hearer was tempted to cry out to Mr. Josten, who was in the audience, "Hold, enough! You have said that and said it well. Don't spoil it now."

The Concerto met with genuine favor. It is said that Mr. Josten's "Jungle" may be performed here next season. Whether this jungle is Kipling's or Tomlinson's, or another's is immaterial as long as it is definitely Mr. Josten's.

The other pieces on the program, the Elegy with the charming accompaniment for the solo instrument which was of course, finely played by Mr. Bedetti; the beautiful tone-poem of Loeffler's and the sturdy symphony of Schumann's, with the pontifical Cologne Cathedral movement gave great pleasure to the audience. Mr. Loeffler's music lends additional beauty to the exquisite charm of Verlaine's poem. It was never so well performed here as it was yesterday—never with the like richness of coloring and poetic expression. The interpretation of the symphony made one forget all that has been said in disparagement of Schumann's technical ability both in form and in orchestration.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week was thus originally arranged in answer to requests: Wagner, prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; Ravel "La Valse"; Tchaikovsky, symphony, E minor, number 5. Since the first announcement Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" has been added though, in the voting for the poems. Ravel led with 349 ballots; Strauss came next with "Thus Spoke Zarathustra" 285 votes; then came Debussy's prelude, with 210 votes. Strauss's tone poem would have made the concert too long.

It may interest some to ponder, the voting for a symphony: Tchaikovsky, 440, Franck 302, Brahms 116, Schubert 91, Beethoven (Pastorale) 75, Beethoven (Eroca) 66, Mozart Jupiter) 39, Schuman No. 1 39, Haydn 20.

On the other hand Sibelius received 76, Prokofieff 52, Bruckner 45.

Those who were dismayed by Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" may not like to hear that it received 116 votes and was fifth out of 15 tone poems named.

What is amazing, what is unaccountable is that Ravel's "La Valse" headed the list, receiving 64 more votes than Strauss's "Zarathustra"; 139 more votes than Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun."

NEW AND OLD PIECES BY SYMPHONY

Jean Bedetti, Cellist Soloist—Loeffler's Music

Post Apr 20

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The last new programme of the current Symphony season, since next week's requested list offers only repetitions, that of yesterday afternoon and this evening embraces part of a Concerto Sacro for strings and a piano by Werner Josten, Faure's Elegy with Jean Bedetti as solo 'cellist, Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson" and Schumann's Third or Rhenish Symphony.

JOSTEN'S CONCERTO

Mr. Josten, who has conducted notable revivals of ancient operas, Monteverde's and Handel's, at Northampton where as instructor in composition he now resides, is plainly of the contemporary musicians who incline to live spiritually in the remoter past. His Concerto of yesterday, for example, was inspired by a 16th century altar-piece by Matthias Gruenewald, and the music has a markedly medieval flavor. The four movements are entitled respectively: The Annunciation; The Miracle; Lament; Sepulchre and Transfiguration. Only the third and fourth were played yesterday.

In each Mr. Josten established immediately and convincingly a mood, but fails somehow to sustain and develop it, lapsing rather into mere repetitiousness and reiteration. It is unfortunate, too, that the Transfiguration section should suggest so pointedly Debussy's piano-piece "La Cathedrale Engloutie." Mr. Josten, who was present in the audience, was called and recalled to the stage.

Loeffler's Music

Likewise in Symphony Hall yesterday was Mr. Loeffler to hear a glowing and much applauded performance of a 28-year-old work which, if not his most significant composition, at least bears eloquent witness to his great skill, his warm imagination, his true distinction as a maker of music. Self-effacingly these many years Mr. Loeffler has lived and worked in nearby Medfield. Had he instead made Paris his home, one feels sure that his name and fame would have been more loudly trumpeted.

Compared to "La Bonne Chanson," which followed it yesterday Faure's Elegy seems no more than an inflated bit of salon-music, linked sweetness happily not too long drawn out. Mr. Bedetti played his part in this amiable work with his wonted finish of style and beauty of tone.

Schumann's Third

In the knowledge of the miracle of rejuvenation that Mr. Koussevitzky wrought not so long ago with Schumann's First Symphony, much was to be expected yesterday of his version of the Third, and such expectation was amply fulfilled, although the earlier piece by reason of its greater freshness offers more promising material. Of each of the five movements of the Rhenish Symphony Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra made much.

The first movement had due exuberance, its elate chief theme was superbly proclaimed; the homely humor of the second, the tender sentiment of the third, the solemnity of the so-called Cathedral Scene, the buoyancy of the Finale, did not escape them. And as with the First Symphony Mr. Koussevitzky made the listener feel that Schumann's much-maligned orchestration needs only a sympathetic handling to make it a suitable, even the ideal investment of his musical thought.

It should be added that the three trombonists met bravely and successfully the difficult test offered them by the fourth movement.

Hearing Hearers, Keen Listening, Happy Outcome

TRANS APR 24

Final Tuesday Matinee At Symphony Hall With Many A Moral

THE TUESDAY matinées have proved a fortunate invention at Symphony Hall. At first they were devised as additional opportunity for the increasing public that Mr. Koussevitzky was winning to the Symphony Orchestra. It had overflowed the subscription concerts and the "Monday Series." It might be sufficient for five more afternoons. For awhile it was not—in the sense of a concert-room filled to the last seat; but the audiences were numerous enough to justify continuance. At first, also, Mr. Koussevitzky was obviously experimenting toward the sort of program best adapted to this new public. Then came the turn that to management and conductor showed the way. As the matinée audiences increased, they were more and more youthful. As the programs tended toward established pieces, ancient, classic or modern, the better they pleased.

Yesterday, at the final matinée for the current season, the outcome of these works of wisdom stood clear. The hall was filled by a young audience—rare and fortunate experience at a Bostonian concert. Not, of course, the audience of children and youngsters in the earlier teens that Mr. Schelling or the Symphony Orchestra assembles on specialized occasions. From the late teens and the early twenties came this new public for symphonic music—intelligent, alert, well-mannered, plainly receptive, plainly enjoying itself. Though the superior sex abounded, young men were not lacking—at an hour when not too many such are at leisure for pleasure-seeking. The elders, moreover, were not too elderly in comparison with the middle-aged audiences of Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings. Nor had they declined into merely passive listening. They also contributed to the responsive atmosphere that kept the concert, on stage and in auditorium, steadily alight.

The deduction was obvious. These Tuesday matinées are nursery and training ground for sustaining audiences at at Symphony Hall. Here they learn their symphonic way about; here they discover new pleasures. Thereafter the progress is easy and the appetite lasting. Not in gibble-gabble about popularizing the orchestra, but in the fostering of these matinées, lies future assurance for the Symphony Concerts. With reason, there are to be six next year instead of the present five. Once and for all, moreover, how absurd is the notion that the rising generation cares not at all, or only exceptionally, for the pleasures of symphonic music! As much of it as of any other—probably more—has its curiosities and takes its satisfactions. It is current middle age, not current youth, that is narrowed, materialized and atrophied.

The concert began with Mr. Foote's Suite for Strings, re-established deservingly by Mr. Koussevitzky as repertory piece, but by no means played as such. The first division flowed rich-voiced, in flawless euphony within the choir. Its touch was superlatively light, clean, rhythmic, through the succeeding Pizzicato. The little Adagietto was as transparent, and moved as gracefully, as the composer designed it. The final Fugue went with the keen accents, the alert motion, that are life to such play of scholarship. Nor is the Suite a music to be heard for a third or a fourth time without new impressions. To some of us, touched, perhaps, by the spring day, a simple poetry sang warm and lyrical, honest and brief, out of the Adagietto as out of Emily Dickinson's New-England-like verse. How unartificial Mr. Foote made the artifice of his Pizzicato—as so much musical high spirits! It is said that in his seventy-sixth year he wishes to rescore the Fugue, for more apt strokes, plasticity, animation. Yet as it is, they abound. . . . To this young audience Arthur Foote must have been only a name. His music captured it. Not until it had twice called him from his seat would it have done.

Next "The Afternoon of a Faun" in Mr. Koussevitzky's singularly fortunate version of Debussy's Prelude. It is fortunate not only in the clear musical outline that the conductor preserves throughout; the melting of phrase into phrase; the distribution of foreground and background, as when the horns call and the flute sings; the fine resonance of the chords; the sensitive play of harmonic and instrumental color until the whole tone-poem seems bathed in its own iridescence. It is fortunate also, and more rarely, in another respect. Debussy wrote intensely sensuous measures. By a slowing of the pace, by a weighting of the accents, they may easily sound over-luxuriant, over-languorous, smothered as it were in the coils of their own beauty. Too often German conductors take "The Faun" in this fashion, while audiences listen drugged. Mr. Koussevitzky keeps every sensuous warmth, every sensuous melancholy, yet clouds not a whit an intrinsically limpid music, stays not a jot a music that is all plastic motion. The "musicien Français" that Debussy liked to call himself wrote the Prelude; but a French musician touched for the moment by the Grecian background imagined. Therefore this clarity, plasticity and golden measure. Debussy owed something to Satie and Satie in this and that piece, say the "Gymnopédies," by Debussy himself scored for orchestra, could wear this Grecian air. And for the young ears that listened yesterday what an introduction is this Prelude to the sensuous beauty and suggestion of musical sound!

In the give-and-take of program-making, Mr. Koussevitzky has not bestowed "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" upon the [illegible] subscription audiences, though years and more Dukas's Scherzo rested deservedly upon the library-shelves. Dr. Muck, who both fancied it and used it as a stop-gap, wore it threadbare. Mr. Monteux failed to refurbish it with new lustres. Now Mr. Koussevitzky, sometimes not too happy with music of fantastic, quasi-humorous intent, recalls it to life and pleasure. The Scherzo is expert music-making. It unfolds the motivs, and no one with half an ear can mistake or miss them. The musical progress is swift; yet few lose the way. And there clearly enough—after a glance at the program-book—is Goethe's ballad-fable: the atmosphere of sorcery; the charm wound up; the busy broom; the flooding waters; the lad's alarm; the master's sonorous and saving intervention; the "fade-away" (as the movies have it) into the mists of fable. Dukas's skill and readiness and verve are inexhaustible; music-maker and narrator go hand in hand smilingly. Doubtless, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" is only a tonal anecdote, but an anecdote capitally invented and told, inviting conductor and orchestra to sharp-cut rhythms and dexterous play with instrumental color. They missed nothing yesterday. They made of the whole a jeu d'esprit . . . So onward to Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony; but twice more within a single week it loomed before the reviewer. Into the spring he fled. What more, after all, could he add to Peter Iljitsch and Serge Alexandrovitch?

HERALD APR 24

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the last of its Tuesday afternoon series yesterday in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Foote, suite in E major for strings; Debussy, prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"; Dukas, scherzo, "The Corcerer's Apprentice"; Tchaikovsky, symphony, E minor, No. 5.

As these compositions, with the exception of the scherzo, have been on the programs of the Friday and Saturday concerts this season, and as the scherzo by Dukas is familiar, there is no need of comment; only praise for the excellent performance by the superb orchestra under its accomplished and magnetic leader. It is to be noted that Debussy's prelude and Tchaikovsky's symphony are on the "request" program of the concerts this week, which will end the brilliant season.

It is Mr. Koussevitzky's purpose in arranging programs for the Tuesday series to perform leading symphonic works of successive periods, but not in a strictly chronological order, which might prove uninteresting to all save students of symphonic development. "Educational" concerts outside of a conservatory are boresome affairs as far as the general public is concerned.

In the first program Bach began; he was not at once coupled with Handel; that great composer was reserved for the second concert. Bach was followed not by Haydn, but by Mozart of the "Jupiter" and the Beethoven of the "Eroica"; Handel by Haydn; then there was a leap to the second symphony of Brahms, the gentler and more lyrical Brahms as revealed in this symphony.

At the third the so-called romanticists, Berlioz, Schubert and Schumann were introduced. As there were brave men before Agamemnon, so there were "romanticists" before these three. Bach could be romantic; the same can be said of Handel and Beethoven. When the fourth concert came Franck and Wagner were side by side, pleasantly associated, although for a time the French opposed the naturalized Frenchman to Wagner, fearing the influence of the latter would work harm to the individuality of the younger French composers. They as well as the Germans writing in post-Wagnerian manner, showed only vain endeavor and distressing impotence. Debussy came and he, too, found his imitators.

Yesterday there was nothing more modern than the music of Debussy and Dukas. Not that Mr. Koussevitzky believes in the futility of works by the ultra-moderns. His programs for the other series is proof to the contrary. It was a pleasure to find American composers recognized yesterday by the admission of Mr. Foote with his delightful suite.

In arranging this series for the next season might it not be advantageous to the general scheme of the programs, if at an early concert a suite of pieces in dance form from the operas of Rameau or Gretry were to represent the French of the 18th century?

Yesterday, as at the previous concerts, the hall was filled with an enthusiastic audience that, regretting the end of the series, showed in no uncertain manner their appreciation of the conductor and the orchestra.

SYMPHONY CONCERT CONCLUDES SERIES

Tuesday Subscribers Applaud Koussevitzky

GLOBE APR 24

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fifth and concluding concert of its Tuesday afternoon series yesterday. Mr Koussevitzky and the orchestra were heartily applauded by the subscribers for their performance of a program that included Arthur Foote's Suite for Strings, Debussy's "Faun," Dukas' "Sorceror's Apprentice," and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

The programs contained an announcement that there will be six, instead of five, Tuesday concerts next season, at slightly higher prices for season tickets. This year's subscribers have until June 1 to reengage their seats. Others desirous of subscribing would do well to put their names on the waiting list as soon as convenient. Payment need not be made until Nov 1.

Two of the pieces on yesterday's program, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and Tchaikovsky's E minor Symphony, are included on the "request program" which will conclude the regular series Friday and Saturday, so that comment on them is reserved for the review of the Friday concert. No doubt the Tuesday audience was grateful for the chance to hear these numbers.

Mr Foote's suite was again cordially applauded. The composer rose in his place near the front of the floor and bowed repeatedly when Mr Koussevitzky pointed him out to the audience. This suite is an unpretentious but sound piece of musical craftsmanship, ingratiating in character. The pizzicato movement particularly pleased, so that there was a little handclapping despite the now well-known rule against applause between the movements of works played at these concerts.

Dukas' familiar orchestral scherzo, suggested by Goethe's poem "Der Zauberlehrling," has not been played this season in the regular series here, by exception to Mr Koussevitzy's custom of choosing his pieces for the supplementary series from those of the 24 Fridays and Saturdays. It was announced on a regular program and then withdrawn to avoid making an excessively long concert.

Audiences have long given every evidence of enjoying Dukas' scherzo. It invariably wins loud and prolonged applause. Conductors have kept it, alone of the composer's many works, in the active repertory. The catchy rhythm of the theme given to bassoons, which represents the broom fetching water in Goethe's ballad, has probably not a little to do with the popularity of the piece. Yet one listener must confess himself thoroughly weary of Dukas' masterpiece, even when it is brilliantly played, as it was yesterday. It might well be relegated to the Pops repertory.

P. R.

SYMPHONY IS BRILLIANT IN ITS FINALS

AMS APR 27

By MOSES SMITH

The current pair of Boston Symphony Concerts brings to a close the long subscription series; at the same time, the musical season may be said to be at an end, though there will be odds and ends occasionally, for the most part of a semi-professional nature.

The program was chosen by vote of the subscribers, an idea employed elsewhere but never before in Boston. This list, consisting of Wagner's "Meistersinger" Prelude, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Ravel's "La Valse" and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, has been widely criticised; more still, the project of a request program has been under fire.

It seems to me, however, that the listeners may with propriety dictate at least once a season the music to which they are to listen. If they choose a program of "favorites," devoid of novel or unusual numbers, the curiosity-seekers should be willing to subside gracefully for a single concert. Viewed over the course of a season, the novel music has not been of such uniformly great merit that concert-goers can't live without it.

Moreover, the present program is an excellent one on its merits, a tribute to the taste of Boston concert-goers. At least three of the choices are masterpieces in their respective forms; and Ravel's brilliantly ironic — and almost obscene—tone-poem remains a great score after repeated performance, though some may question its right to the title of masterpiece. Furthermore—what would you?—it is still less than a decade old.

Since all of these pieces have already been played here several times this season, it is needless to comment further on the music, and too add that the performance was extraordinarily brilliant.

It is a fitting climax to a season that has witnessed the arrival of our orchestra at the top of the orchestral heap. The ovations tendered by the audiences to Mr. Koussevitzky and his men are richly deserved.

Herald Apr 27

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The audiences of the Boston Symphony orchestra chose by ballot the following compositions for the last concerts of the 48th season, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, the concerts of yesterday afternoon and tonight in Symphony hall: Wagner, prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Debussy, prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun." Ravel, "La Valse." Tchaikovsky, Symphony, E minor, No. 5.

The hall, naturally, was completely filled on floor and in galleries. Seldom, if ever, has an audience at these concerts showed the like enthusiasm, the like appreciation of conductor and players. The audience stood when Mr. Koussevitzky entered; it applauded vigorously and for a long time. The two Preludes and Ravel's recollection of a waltz theme by Johann Strauss to whom Ravel did not bother himself to give due credit—he was so busy with his own inventions and perversions—aroused the enthusiasm of an audience prepared to be enthusiastic. After the symphony Mr. Koussevitzky was recalled again and again. The people were loath to say "Good-bye." In this tribute, in which the orchestra joined, and not perfunctorily, there was more than admiration of his genius as a conductor; there was warm affection for the man himself.

In the balloting for the program Tchaikovsky's Symphony received 440 votes; Franck's, 302; Brahms's No. 2, 116. It is interesting to note that Schubert's "Unfinished" received only 91 votes; Beethoven's "Pastoral," 75 and the "Eroica" 66; Mozart's "Jupiter," 39; Schumann's No. 1 only 39. Among the tone poems, Ravel's "La Valse" led with 349 votes. Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra" came next with 285 votes, but as the performance would have made the concert too long, Debussy's Prelude, the third in order (210 votes), was put on the program. Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers" received 312 votes. Sibelius with his violin concerto (157 votes) came next. Beethoven's overture, "Leonore" No. 3 and Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" received 129 votes each.

It is a pleasure to note that Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete" received 82 votes; Sibelius's Symphony No. 3, 76 votes; Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, 52; Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," 116. The ultra-conservatives and the ultra-modernists may draw their own conclusions. It may be allowed one who believes in treating Trojans and Tyrians impartially, to express wonder at the great vote given in favor of Ravel's "La Valse," which is by no means a composition of commanding rank.

Those who are forever complaining that foreign conductors ignore the music of Americans, complaining even when their compositions are of little worth, should recognize the fact that Mr. Koussevitzky this season made room for Messrs. Block, Carpenter, Copland, Foote, Hanson, Hill, Josten, Loeffler, Schelling.

Pieces by Copland, Janin, Martinu were performed for the first time anywhere. Twenty-seven compositions (including songs by Honegger), were heard for the first time in Boston. The list of soloists included Mmes. Cahier, Lassanska, Luboshutz; Messrs. Bedetti, Burgin, Ganz, Heifetz, Maeder, Orloff, Sanroma.

The following composers were represented for the first at these concerts: Frederick the Great, Helffter, Hanson, Jacobi, Janin, Josten, Kodaly, Miaskovsky, Toch.

The guest conductors were Mr. Arbos and Mr. Honegger. The latter led only his own works which as a whole did not make up an engrossing program; furthermore, he was handicapped by a pitiably inefficient soprano, as he was aided greatly by Mme. Honegger, a charming pianist who played her husband's interesting concerto. Mr. Arbos, warmly welcomed, gave exciting interpretations of music by Spanish composers.

Mr. Burgin conducted a pair of concerts in the absence of Mr. Koussevitzky; Messrs. Hanson and Schelling each conducted, the former his "Nordic" symphony; the latter his "Morocco."

It was a brilliant season, noteworthy for remarkably eloquent performances of works that were familiar, of some works that were hitherto unknown. Nor is it to be regretted that a few of the unfamiliar compositions met with little or no favor. Complacent acceptance of everything that is new and strange, interesting or dull and abhorrent, is as much to be deplored as the attitude of the poker-backed and rebellious who resent the production of anything in our idiom foreign to them. They have the anatomical organs known as ears, but they do not, they will not, hear.

Among the unfamiliar works that called for special attention by reason of their contents and the performance were Frederick the Great's delightful little symphony, Halffter's Sinfonietta, Kodaly's "Hazy Janos" suite, the beautiful and impressive symphony by Sibelius, Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete" and Foch's piano concerto.

Performances of certain familiar works now stand out in bold relief; the music of the two Bachs and the symphonies of Beethoven, "The Roman Carnival" overture, the superb rendering of Brahms's violin concerto by Mr. Heifetz with the equally superb accompaniment led by Mr. Koussevitzky; Debussy's Predude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," Schumann's symphonies Nos. 1 and 3, Schubert's C major symphony, Mr. Burgin's playing of Sibelius's violin concerto, Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" and 5th symphony; Mr. Orloff's exquisite performance of Mozart's concerto. But it is not now necessary again to review the 24 concerts.

The 49th season (1929-1930), Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, will begin with the concerts of Oct. 11-12.

Moses Williams, Mrs Ralph B. Williams.

Globe Apr 27

BOSTON SYMPHONY REQUEST PROGRAM

Tchaikovsky Symphony Is Brilliantly Performed

Koussevitzky and Orchestra Win Hearty Applause

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first "request program" at the final concert of the Friday subscription series yesterday afternoon. Mr Koussevitzky and the orchestra were applauded with unusual warmth at the opening and close of the concert. The performance of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony was again remarkably brilliant. The other numbers chosen by ballot of the subscribers were Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude; Ravel's "La Valse"; and Debussy's "Faun."

Mr Koussevitzky has made a practice of repeating at the final pair of concerts numbers heard earlier in the season. Some have objected in former seasons to his choice of pieces to play twice. So, following Mr Stokowski's custom in Philadelphia, Mr Koussevitzky this year allowed the subscribers to vote for their favorite tone poem, symphony, and piece of "music in other forms" among those played this season.

This innovation caused much discussion, and unquestionably interested the audience. It can, however, be argued that there is no reason why any piece except a novelty of overwhelming interest should be repeated during the season, except to save rehearsal time. Nor does a "request program" seem wholly suited to the dignity and seriousness of the Symphony concerts. That sort of thing savors of the Pops.

To these objections, the most effective retort is doubtless the comment that yesterday the audience was more enthusiastic than usual, and plainly delighted, for the most part, with program, performance, orchestra and conductor. So far as one could gather from comment heard or overheard, the only grievance most of yesterday's audience had on their minds was the increase in the prices of season tickets, which will next season range from $100 down.

More Than $40,000 Lacking

But there is still more than $40,000 to be raised toward the deficit on the season now ending, and the demand for tickets is so great that the waiting list, especially for Fridays, seems certain to absorb any and all places released. The management has set the Friday prices higher than those for Saturdays, following the economist's rule about supply and demand. The present subscribers have only until May 1 to reengage their tickets.

Mr Koussevitzky's way with the "Meistersinger" Prelude is too familiar to require much comment. He interprets it, not as an overture to a comedy, which is what Wagner plainly intended, but as a sonorous, broadly swelling, slow moving triumphal march. Mr Arbos' interpretation when the piece was played here last January seemed finer, truer and more spirited to at least one listener.

TRAV APR 27

Pop Concerts to Open May Day

May day (next Wednesday) will bring the opening night of the Pop concerts at Symphony hall—always one of the principal occasions of Boston's spring season. This will be the 44th year of the Pops which, indeed, are almost as old as the Boston Symphony orchestra itself, from which they spring. The custom of serving refreshments at the tables which cover the floor of Symphony hall, and in the foyer, will be continued.

Alfredo Casella, one of the foremost of living Italian musicians, has come from Italy to take over the destiny of the Pops for the third time. Casella will command an orchestra of more than 80 symphony players.

His program for the opening night follows:

Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Song Without Words ..... Tchaikovsky
Valse Triste ..... Sibelius
Overture to "La Forza del Destino," ..... Verdi
"Les Preludes," symphonic poem ..... Liszt
"Pavane pour une Infante Defunte" ..... Ravel
"Italia," rhapsody ..... Casella
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Largo ..... Handel
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner

CONTINUED ON NEXT PAGE—

Young Hearers, Keen Listening, Happy Outcome

TRANS APR 24

Final Tuesday Matinee At Symphony Hall With Many A Moral

THE TUESDAY matinées have proved a fortunate invention at Symphony Hall. At first they were devised as additional opportunity for the increasing public that Mr. Koussevitzky was winning to the Symphony Orchestra. It had overflowed the subscription concerts and the "Monday Series." It might be sufficient for five more afternoons. For awhile it was not —in the sense of a concert-room filled to the last seat; but the audiences were numerous enough to justify continuance. At first, also, Mr. Koussevitzky was obviously experimenting toward the sort of program best adapted to this new public. Then came the turn that to management and conductor showed the way. As the matinée audiences increased, they were more and more youthful. As the programs tended toward established pieces, ancient, classic or modern, the better they pleased.

Yesterday, at the final matinée for the current season, the outcome of these works of wisdom stood clear. The hall was filled by a young audience—rare and fortunate experience at a Bostonian concert. Not, of course, the audience of children and youngsters in the earlier teens that Mr. Schelling or the Symphony Orchestra assembles on specialized occasions. From the late teens and the early twenties came this new public for symphonic music—intelligent, alert, well-mannered, plainly receptive, plainly enjoying itself. Though the superior sex abounded, young men were not lacking—at an hour when not too many such are at leisure for pleasure-seeking. The elders, moreover, were not too elderly in comparison with the middle-aged audiences of Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings. Nor had they declined into merely passive listening. They also contributed to the responsive atmosphere that kept the concert, on stage and in auditorium, steadily alight.

The deduction was obvious. These Tuesday matinées are nursery and training ground for sustaining audiences at at Symphony Hall. Here they learn their symphonic way about; here they discover new pleasures. Thereafter the progress is easy and the appetite lasting. Not in gibble-gabble about popularizing the orchestra, but in the fostering of these matinées, lies future assurance for the Symphony Concerts. With reason, there are to be six next year instead of the present five. Once and for all, moreover, how absurd is the notion that the rising generation cares not at all, or only exceptionally, for the pleasures of symphonic music! As much of it as of any other—probably more—has its curiosities and takes its satisfactions. It is current middle age, not current youth, that is narrowed, materialized and atrophied.

The concert began with Mr. Foote's Suite for Strings, re-established deservingly by Mr. Koussevitzky as repertory piece, but by no means played as such. The first division flowed rich-voiced, in flawless euphony within the choir. Its touch was superlatively light, clean, rhythmic, through the succeeding Pizzicato. The little Adagietto was as transparent, and moved as gracefully, as the composer designed it. The final Fugue went with the keen accents, the alert motion, that are life to such play of scholarship. Nor is the Suite a music to be heard for a third or a fourth time without new impressions. To some of us, touched, perhaps, by the spring day, a simple poetry sang warm and lyrical, honest and brief, out of the Adagietto as out of Emily Dickinson's New-England-like verse. How unartificial Mr. Foote made the artifice of his Pizzicato—as so much musical high spirits! It is said that in his seventy-sixth year he wishes to rescore the Fugue, for more apt strokes, plasticity, animation. Yet as it is, they abound. . . . To this young audience Arthur Foote must have been only a name. His music captured it. Not until it had twice called him from his seat would it have done.

Next "The Afternoon of a Faun" in Mr. Koussevitzky's singularly fortunate version of Debussy's Prelude. It is fortunate not only in the clear musical outline that the conductor preserves throughout; the melting of phrase into phrase; the distribution of foreground and background, as when the horns call and the flute sings; the fine resonance of the chords; the sensitive play of harmonic and instrumental color until the whole tone-poem seems bathed in its own iridescence. It is fortunate also, and more rarely, in another respect. Debussy wrote intensely sensuous measures. By a slowing of the pace, by a weighting of the accents, they may easily sound over-luxuriant, over-languorous, smothered as it were in the coils of their own beauty. Too often German conductors take "The Faun" in this fashion, while audiences listen drugged. Mr. Koussevitzky keeps every sensuous warmth, every sensuous melancholy, yet clouds not a whit an intrinsically limpid music, stays not a jot a music that is all plastic motion. The "musicien Français" that Debussy liked to call himself wrote the Prelude; but a French musician touched for the moment by the Grecian background imagined. Therefore this clarity, plasticity and golden measure. Debussy owed something to Satie and Satie in this and that piece, say the "Gymnopédies," by Debussy himself scored for orchestra, could wear this Grecian air. And for the young ears that listened yesterday what an introduction is this Prelude to the sensuous beauty and suggestion of musical sound!

In the give-and-take of program-making, Mr. Koussevitzky has not bestowed "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" upon the august subscription audiences, though years and more Dukas's Scherzo rested deservedly upon the library-shelves. Dr. Muck, who both fancied it and used it as a stop-gap, wore it threadbare. Mr. Monteux failed to refurbish it with new lustres. Now Mr. Koussevitzky, sometimes not too happy with music of fantastic, quasi-humorous intent, recalls it to life and pleasure. The Scherzo is expert music-making. It unfolds the motivs, and no one with half an ear can mistake or miss them. The musical progress is swift; yet few lose the way. And there clearly enough—after a glance at the program-book—is Goethe's ballad-fable: the atmosphere of sorcery; the charm wound up; the busy broom; the flooding waters; the lad's alarm; the master's sonorous and saving intervention; the "fade-away" (as the movies have it) into the mists of fable. Dukas's skill and readiness and verve are inexhaustible; music-maker and narrator go hand in hand smilingly. Doubtless, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" is only a tonal anecdote, but an anecdote capitally invented and told, inviting conductor and orchestra to sharp-cut rhythms and dexterous play with instrumental color. They missed nothing yesterday. They made of the whole a jeu d'esprit . . . So onward to Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony; but twice more within a single week it loomed before the reviewer. Into the spring he fled. What more, after all, could he add to Peter Iljitsch and Serge Alexandrovitch?

HERALD APR 24 T

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the last of its Tuesday afternoon series yesterday in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Foote, suite in E major for strings; Debussy, prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"; Dukas, scherzo, "The Corcerer's Apprentice"; Tchaikovsky, symphony, E minor, No. 5.

As these compositions, with the exception of the scherzo, have been on the programs of the Friday and Saturday concerts this season, and as the scherzo by Dukas is familiar, there is no need of comment; only praise for the excellent performance by the superb orchestra under its accomplished and magnetic leader. It is to be noted that Debussy's prelude and Tchaikovsky's symphony are on the "request" program of the concerts this week, which will end the brilliant season.

It is Mr. Koussevitzky's purpose in arranging programs for the Tuesday series to perform leading symphonic works of successive periods, but not in a strictly chronological order, which might prove uninteresting to all save students of symphonic development. "Educational" concerts outside of a conservatory are boresome affairs as far as the general public is concerned.

In the first program Bach began; he was not at once coupled with Handel; that great composer was reserved for the second concert. Bach was followed not by Haydn, but by Mozart of the "Jupiter" and the Beethoven of the "Eroica"; Handel by Haydn; then there was a leap to the second symphony of Brahms, the gentler and more lyrical Brahms as revealed in this symphony.

At the third the so-called romanticists, Berlioz, Schubert and Schumann were introduced. As there were brave men before Agamemnon, so there were "romanticists" before these three. Bach could be romantic; the same can be said of Handel and Beethoven. When the fourth concert came Franck and Wagner were side by side, pleasantly associated, although for a time the French opposed the naturalized Frenchman to Wagner, fearing the influence of the latter would work harm to the individuality of the younger French composers. They as well as the Germans writing in post-Wagnerian manner, showed only vain endeavor and distressing impotence. Debussy came and he, too, found his imitators.

Yesterday there was nothing more modern than the music of Debussy and Dukas. Not that Mr. Koussevitzky believes in the futility of works by the ultra-moderns. His programs for the other series is proof to the contrary. It was a pleasure to find American composers recognized yesterday by the admission of Mr. Foote with his delightful suite.

In arranging this series for the next season might it not be advantageous to the general scheme of the programs, if at an early concert a suite of pieces in dance form from the operas of Rameau or Gretry were to represent the French of the 18th century?

Yesterday, as at the previous concerts, the hall was filled with an enthusiastic audience that, regretting the end of the series, showed in no uncertain manner their appreciation of the conductor and the orchestra.

SYMPHONY CONCERT CONCLUDES SERIES

Tuesday Subscribers Applaud Koussevitzky

GLOBE APR 24

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fifth and concluding concert of its Tuesday afternoon series yesterday. Mr Koussevitzky and the orchestra were heartily applauded by the subscribers for their performance of a program that included Arthur Foote's Suite for Strings, Debussy's "Faun," Dukas' "Sorceror's Apprentice," and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

The programs contained an announcement that there will be six, instead of five, Tuesday concerts next season, at slightly higher prices for season tickets. This year's subscribers have until June 1 to reengage their seats. Others desirous of subscribing would do well to put their names on the waiting list as soon as convenient. Payment need not be made until Nov 1.

Two of the pieces on yesterday's program, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and Tchaikovsky's E minor Symphony, are included on the "request program" which will conclude the regular series Friday and Saturday, so that comment on them is reserved for the review of the Friday concert. No doubt the Tuesday audience was grateful for the chance to hear these numbers.

Mr Foote's suite was again cordially applauded. The composer rose in his place near the front of the floor and bowed repeatedly when Mr Koussevitzky pointed him out to the audience. This suite is an unpretentious but sound piece of musical craftsmanship, ingratiating in character. The pizzicato movement particularly pleased, so that there was a little handclapping despite the now well-known rule against applause between the movements of works played at these concerts.

Dukas' familiar orchestral scherzo, suggested by Goethe's poem "Der Zauberlehrling," has not been played this season in the regular series here, by exception to Mr Koussevitzy's custom of choosing his pieces for the supplementary series from those of the 24 Fridays and Saturdays. It was announced on a regular program and then withdrawn to avoid making an excessively long concert.

Audiences have long given every evidence of enjoying Dukas' scherzo. It invariably wins loud and prolonged applause. Conductors have kept it, alone of the composer's many works, in the active repertory. The catchy rhythm of the theme given to bassoons, which represents the broom fetching water in Goethe's ballad, has probably not a little to do with the popularity of the piece. Yet one listener must confess himself thoroughly weary of Dukas' masterpiece, even when it is brilliantly played, as it was yesterday. It might well be relegated to the Pops repertory.

P. R.

SYMPHONY IS BRILLIANT IN ITS FINALS

HERALD APR 27

By MOSES SMITH

The current pair of Boston Symphony Concerts brings to a close the long subscription series; at the same time, the musical season may be said to be at an end, though there will be odds and ends occasionally, for the most part of a semi-professional nature.

The program was chosen by vote of the subscribers, an idea employed elsewhere but never before in Boston. This list, consisting of Wagner's "Meistersinger" Prelude, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Ravel's "La Valse" and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, has been widely criticised; more still, the project of a request program has been under fire.

It seems to me, however, that the listeners may with propriety dictate at least once a season the music to which they are to listen. If they choose a program of "favorites," devoid of novel or unusual numbers, the curiosity-seekers should be willing to subside gracefully for a single concert. Viewed over the course of a season, the novel music has not been of such uniformly great merit that concert-goers can't live without it.

Moreover, the present program is an excellent one on its merits, a tribute to the taste of Boston concert-goers. At least three of the choices are masterpieces in their respective forms; and Ravel's brilliantly ironic — and almost obscene—tone-poem remains a great score after repeated performance, though some may question its right to the title of masterpiece. Furthermore—what would you?—it is still less than a decade old.

Since all of these pieces have already been played here several times this season, it is needless to comment further on the music, and too add that the performance was extraordinarily brilliant.

It is a fitting climax to a season that has witnessed the arrival of our orchestra at the top of the orchestral heap. The ovations tendered by the audiences to Mr. Koussevitzky and his men are richly deserved.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The audiences of the Boston Symphony orchestra chose by ballot the following compositions for the last concerts of the 48th season, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, the concerts of yesterday afternoon and tonight in Symphony hall: Wagner, prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Debussy, prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun." Ravel, "La Valse." Tchaikovsky, Symphony, E minor, No. 5.

The hall, naturally, was completely filled on floor and in galleries. Seldom, if ever, has an audience at these concerts showed the like enthusiasm, the like appreciation of conductor and players. The audience stood when Mr. Koussevitzky entered; it applauded vigorously and for a long time. The two Preludes and Ravel's recollection of a waltz theme by Johann Strauss to whom Ravel did not bother himself to give due credit—he was so busy with his own inventions and perversions—aroused the enthusiasm of an audience prepared to be enthusiastic. After the symphony Mr. Koussevitzky was recalled again and again. The people were loath to say "Good-bye." In this tribute, in which the orchestra joined, and not perfunctorily, there was more than admiration of his genius as a conductor; there was warm affection for the man himself.

In the balloting for the program Tchaikovsky's Symphony received 440 votes; Franck's, 302; Brahms's No. 2, 116. It is interesting to note that Schubert's "Unfinished" received only 91 votes; Beethoven's "Pastoral," 75 and the "Eroica" 66; Mozart's "Jupiter," 39; Schumann's No. 1 only 39. Among the tone poems, Ravel's "La Valse" led with 349 votes. Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra" came next with 285 votes, but as the performance would have made the concert too long, Debussy's Prelude, the third in order (210 votes), was put on the program. Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers" received 312 votes. Sibelius with his violin concerto (157 votes) came next. Beethoven's overture, "Leonore" No. 3 and Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" received 129 votes each.

It is a pleasure to note that Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete" received 82 votes; Sibelius's Symphony No. 3, 76 votes; Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, 52; Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," 116. The ultra-conservatives and the ultra-modernists may draw their own conclusions. It may be allowed one who believes in treating Trojans and Tyrians impartially, to express wonder at the great vote given in favor of Ravel's "La Valse," which is by no means a composition of commanding rank.

Those who are forever complaining that foreign conductors ignore the music of Americans, complaining even when their compositions are of little worth, should recognize the fact that Mr. Koussevitzky this season made room for Messrs. Block, Carpenter, Copland, Foote, Hanson, Hill, Josten, Loeffler, Schelling.

Pieces by Copland, Janin, Martinu were performed for the first time anywhere. Twenty-seven compositions (including songs by Honegger), were heard for the first time in Boston. The list of soloists included Mmes. Cahier, Lassanska, Luboshutz; Messrs. Bedetti, Burgin, Ganz, Heifetz, Maeder, Orloff, Sanroma.

The following composers were represented for the first at these concerts: Frederick the Great, Helffter, Hanson, Jacobi, Janin, Josten, Kodaly, Miaskovsky, Toch.

The guest conductors were Mr. Arbos and Mr. Honegger. The latter led only his own works which as a whole did not make up an engrossing program; furthermore, he was handicapped by a pitiably inefficient soprano, as he was aided greatly by Mme. Honegger, a charming pianist who played her husband's interesting concerto. Mr. Arbos, warmly welcomed, gave exciting interpretations of music by Spanish composers.

Mr. Burgin conducted a pair of concerts in the absence of Mr. Koussevitzky; Messrs. Hanson and Schelling each conducted, the former his "Nordic" symphony; the latter his "Morocco."

It was a brilliant season, noteworthy for remarkably eloquent performances of works that were familiar, of some works that were hitherto unknown. Nor is it to be regretted that a few of the unfamiliar compositions met with little or no favor. Complacent acceptance of everything that is new and strange, interesting or dull and abhorrent, is as much to be deplored as the attitude of the poker-backed and rebellious who resent the production of anything in our idiom foreign to them. They have the anatomical organs known as ears, but they do not, they will not, hear.

Among the unfamiliar works that called for special attention by reason of their contents and the performance were Frederick the Great's delightful little symphony, Halffter's Sinfonietta, Kodaly's "Hazy Janos" suite, the beautiful and impressive symphony by Sibelius, Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete" and Foch's piano concerto.

Performances of certain familiar works now stand out in bold relief; the music of the two Bachs and the symphonies of Beethoven, "The Roman Carnival" overture, the superb rendering of Brahms's violin concerto by Mr. Heifetz with the equally superb accompaniment led by Mr. Koussevitzky; Debussy's Predude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," Schumann's symphonies Nos. 1 and 3, Schubert's C major symphony, Mr. Burgin's playing of Sibelius's violin concerto, Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" and 5th symphony; Mr. Orloff's exquisite performance of Mozart's concerto. But it is not now necessary again to review the 24 concerts.

The 49th season (1929-1930), Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, will begin with the concerts of Oct. 11-12.

Moses Williams, Mrs Ralph B. Williams.

Globe Apr 27

BOSTON SYMPHONY REQUEST PROGRAM

Tchaikovsky Symphony Is Brilliantly Performed

Koussevitzky and Orchestra Win Hearty Applause

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first "request program" at the final concert of the Friday subscription series yesterday afternoon. Mr Koussevitzky and the orchestra were applauded with unusual warmth at the opening and close of the concert. The performance of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony was again remarkably brilliant. The other numbers chosen by ballot of the subscribers were Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude; Ravel's "La Valse"; and Debussy's "Faun."

Mr Koussevitzky has made a practice of repeating at the final pair of concerts numbers heard earlier in the season. Some have objected in former seasons to his choice of pieces to play twice. So, following Mr Stokowski's custom in Philadelphia, Mr Koussevitzky this year allowed the subscribers to vote for their favorite tone poem, symphony, and piece of "music in other forms" among those played this season.

This innovation caused much discussion, and unquestionably interested the audience. It can, however, be argued that there is no reason why any piece except a novelty of overwhelming interest should be repeated during the season, except to save rehearsal time. Nor does a "request program" seem wholly suited to the dignity and seriousness of the Symphony concerts. That sort of thing savors of the Pops.

To these objections, the most effective retort is doubtless the comment that yesterday the audience was more enthusiastic than usual, and plainly delighted, for the most part, with program, performance, orchestra and conductor. So far as one could gather from comment heard or overheard, the only grievance most of yesterday's audience had on their minds was the increase in the prices of season tickets, which will next season range from $100 down.

More Than $40,000 Lacking

But there is still more than $40,000 to be raised toward the deficit on the season now ending, and the demand for tickets is so great that the waiting list, especially for Fridays, seems certain to absorb any and all places released. The management has set the Friday prices higher than those for Saturdays, following the economist's rule about supply and demand. The present subscribers have only until May 1 to reengage their tickets.

Mr Koussevitzky's way with the "Meistersinger" Prelude is too familiar to require much comment. He interprets it, not as an overture to a comedy, which is what Wagner plainly intended, but as a sonorous, broadly swelling, slow moving triumphal march. Mr Arbos' interpretation when the piece was played here last January seemed finer, truer and more spirited to at least one listener.

TRAV APR 27

Pop Concerts to Open May Day

May day (next Wednesday) will bring the opening night of the Pop concerts at Symphony hall—always one of the principal occasions of Boston's spring season. This will be the 44th year of the Pops which, indeed, are almost as old as the Boston Symphony orchestra itself, from which they spring. The custom of serving refreshments at the tables which cover the floor of Symphony hall, and in the foyer, will be continued.

Alfredo Casella, one of the foremost of living Italian musicians, has come from Italy to take over the destiny of the Pops for the third time. Casella will command an orchestra of more than 80 symphony players.

His program for the opening night follows:

Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Song Without Words	Tchaikovsky
Valse Triste	Sibelius
Overture to "La Forza del Destino"	Verdi
"Les Preludes," symphonic poem	Liszt
"Pavane pour une Infante Defunte"	Ravel
"Italia," rhapsody	Casella
Overture to "William Tell"	Rossini
Largo	Handel
Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner

CONTINUED ON NEXT PAGE—

Ravel's "La Valse" is a favorite show piece with Koussevitzky. Here he succeeds better than in the Wagner in getting the players to carry out exactly his personal notion of the music. Those who remember the composer's interpretation when he was here last season as guest conductor will note that, although Ravel takes the piece throughout "in the movement of a Viennese Waltz." Koussevitzky does not establish and maintain that familiar rhythm but breaks it at times for the sake of making striking effects.

Mr. Laurent was again singled out for a share in the applause after Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," a tribute his beautiful playing of the prominent part for solo flute richly deserved. This tone poem, now one of the most popular of modern classics, was vividly, perhaps too vividly, played.

Excellent Performance

Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, his finest work for orchestra, is music which is perfectly fitted to Mr Koussevitzky's genius as conductor. It is hard to imagine a finer performance of it than yesterday's. About the musical value of this work, there have been from the first two sharply divergent opinions. One of them, that of the majority of concert goers over 40, and of many who are younger, is that this symphony has compelling beauty and emotional power.

The other view, in which the present writer concurs with a number of musicians, is that Tchaikovsky's music lacks distinction of melodic style, elaboration of structure, variety of rhythmic effects, subtlety of harmony. The constant repetition of themes and passages grows monotonous. The symphony, in form nearer to a suite than a symphony of Brahms, Beethoven, or Mozart; seems crude and vulgar. From it one cannot derive imaginative stimulus. It is a penance rather than a pleasure to listen to Tchaikovsky's serious music.

There is no way of settling the question of the aesthetic value of Tchaikovsky's or of any composer's music. The reviewer's only duty in the matter is to express as honestly and clearly as possible his opinion.

Tonight's repetition of this "request program" will end a season which has marked the full, and it is to be hoped, the final restoration of the prestige of the Boston Symphony as an orchestra unsurpassed anywhere in the world. For this, credit must go both to Mr Monteux and to Mr Koussevitzky. Extended comment on the season will be made in the Sunday Globe Music and Musicians column tomorrow. P. R.

Pop Nights Planned by Many School Groups

May Day will bring the opening night of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, always one of the events of Boston's spring season. This will be the 44th year of the Pops.

Numerous schools and colleges have made it a custom to take a night at the Pops in their graduation week. These are to include this year Harvard, Simmons, Tufts, Technology, Boston University, Radcliffe, Roxbury Latin and others. Smaller groups, likewise, gather at groups of tables to take advantage of the particular kind of sociability which the Pops afford. These will include Portia Law School, Eliot Circle, Camp Fire Girls, Bryant & Stratton, Jewish Women's College, Boston Life Underwriters, Y. W. C. A., Daughters of Zion and numerous others.

Alfredo Casella, one of the foremost of living Italian musicians, has come from Italy to take over the destiny of the Pops for the third time. Casella will command an orchestra of more than 80 Symphony players.

Boston Symphony Concludes Season

THE forty-eighth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the fifth under the dictatorship of Serge Koussevitzky, comes to a conclusion with the concerts of this week, April 26 and 27. By way of innovation, the conductor permitted the audiences to arrange the final program, by balloting for favorites in three groups of works played during the season: symphonies, tone poems and music in other forms. This radical move, though it has been tried elsewhere, notably in Philadelphia and Cincinnati, was viewed by some with alarm. Yet the result of the experiment does not seem to threaten the foundations of the orchestra. The public's choice, though conservative, was by no means unintelligent. The compositions which received the largest number of votes were the Prelude to "Meistersinger," Ravel's "La Valse," Strauss's "Zarathustra" and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, in E minor. Since "Zarathustra" was too considerable a work to find place with the other items in a program that must be kept within time limits acceptable to an American audience, Mr. Koussevitzky substituted for it the third choice in the tone poem group, Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun."

A Glorious Climax

The performance of these works, all of which have been heard and commented on in recent months, was glorious climax to a brilliant season. The symphony had been played in every series of concerts given by the orchestra this year, but there is no let-down while Koussevitzky holds the stick. This symphony is singularly congenial to him, and his interpretation of it is one of his supreme accomplishments. Yet his genius adapts itself likewise to the exuberance of the "Meistersinger" Prelude and to the fantasy of the "The Afternoon of a Faun." His reading of "La Valse" excites admiration, though under his baton the work lacks the primitivism which the composer himself imparts to it. There were the usual warm leave-takings.

Thus is concluded one of the most brilliant seasons in the history of the orchestra; probably the most brilliant, but as the present commentator has not heard all 48 of them, he will not venture to say so. As usual, Mr. Koussevitzky bestowed novel pieces with a lavish hand; if they do not all promise to become permanent accessions to the repertory, the conductor cannot be blamed for that. Probably there will be no widespread demand for further hearing of any of the three works performed for the first time anywhere: Copland's Two Pieces for String Orchestra, Janin's Symphonie Spirituelle, "Alleluia," and Martinu's "La Symphonie."

But there were several items of deeper interest among the 27 compositions heard for the first time in Boston. Ernest Bloch's prize piece "America," attracted most public interest. As it was avowedly not written for "highbrows," it is perhaps not surprising that many of the learned were moved to condemn it. Within a week it had become a bromidium to call the final chorus "banal." But when the tumult has quieted down, it probably will be realized that Bloch accomplished with admirable artistry what he set out to do, and that even his anthem is no more banal musically than the two that were already competing for the national title; the only difficulty is, it is no better.

Halffter's Sinfonietta

An excellent impression was left by the Sinfonietta in D major of Halffter, who, although young, is able to set down his musical thoughts simply and directly, without proclaiming either new æsthetic theories or a "return" to the ancient masters. This was introduced by Mr. Arbós as guest conductor. The three most considerable of the remaining novelties were Mahler's "Song of the Earth," Miaskovsky's Eighth Symphony and Sibelius's Third; for acquaintance with which musical Boston should render thanks to Mr. Koussevitzky. "Apollon Musagète" indicated that the art of Stravinsky is still stationary. Toch's Piano Concerto, upon which a great deal of laudation has been lavished, seemed to the present observer merely meretricious. Nor were we amused by Dukelsky's Symphony in F major. The suite from Kodály's "Háry János," on the other hand, was a delightful addition to the repertory.

Alfredo Casella resumes on May 1 the direction of the Pop concerts, which he has brought to a new level of musical distinction.

Mr. Koussevitzky is returning next year. The length of his engagement is not announced, but it looks as if his stay might be indefinite. It is only necessary to hear other orchestras of the first rank which have been left for prolonged periods to the ministrations of guest conductors, to realize how important it is that one man should be on the dais permanently. If that man happens to be Koussevitzky, why then—so much the better for Boston. It used to be the fashion to praise the Boston orchestra by saying that it was at its best "since Muck's day." The Muck reservation may now safely be omitted. L. A. S.

Symphony

Close But Not Crown To Season

'Request' Symphony Concert, With Sundry Reflections On the Ending Year

FOR the reviewer, and possibly for sundry others, both on the stage and in the auditorium, it was holiday at the final matinée, for the season, of the Symphony Orchestra. For the fifth time within three months, conductor and orchestra played in Symphony Hall the Prelude to Wagner's operatic comedy, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." For the fifth time within six months in the same concert-room, they also played Debussy's Prelude to Mallarmé's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun." For the fifth time within two months and a half, Chaikovsky's Symphony in E minor rounded out a Symphony Concert. For the fourth time in the course of the season there was room for that persistent repertory piece, Ravel's tone-poem, "The Waltz."

The reviewer, trained to respect his readers and his calling and to prefer fresh matter to "old stuff," declines reasonably to re-traverse pieces so recently examined in these columns. He sets before him, as light and leading, the example of the eminent editor of the program-book. Through forty-eight seasons the Symphony Concerts have continued. Yesterday, for the first time in that long course, there were no program-notes. The erudite compiler is warm and frequent admirer of Artemus Ward. Perhaps, as he scanned this "request program," he recalled a favorite phrase of that humorist—"This is 2 mutch"—and forthwith shut his files. As it was, only the annual records, tables and indexes, with the familiar list of subscribers to current expenses, filled the weekly pamphlet. Vainly the desultory minded sought the usual pages of entertaining miscellany. There was none. With the advertisements they made shift. One, deliciously, announced the program "as a musical triumph in Boston history."

Perhaps it was, though some might have chosen the adjective differently. Certainly many good people believed they had beaten down the Satan of Mr. Koussevitzky's usual programs under their feet, not once, but for good and all. Not an unfamiliar piece disfigured the list. The newest, "The Waltz," had been played almost annually through eight seasons; the next in chronological order dated from 1902; the third from 1892; the fourth from the first year of the orchestra. A good riddance to such bad rubbish as young men who live and work in this our time, absorb its spirit and would infuse it into their music. If a composer must be "still living," at least let him be in Monsieur Ravel's becoming fifties. If we others are to believe a distinguished and resident observer, youth went out of the fashion in New England about 1830, and through a century, less one year, has known no restoration.

Besides, what is the purpose of the Symphony Concerts, their reason for being? Long since, an eminent citizen, as spokesman for the public when Mr. Gericke took final leave, defined both. Two audiences, he said in substance, sought them. They were weary with the domestic cares, the social pleasures, the professional or the business labors of the week. Upon a Friday and a Saturday conductor and orchestra soothed and refreshed them with the music of the masters, and the great mission of both was fulfilled. Of course, conductors and a few other restless and ambitious spirits have not quite agreed to these concepts. They have even cherished and practised a notion that "the great mission" of the concerts was two-fold: to keep alive and aglow in freshening and stimulating performance the heritage of music to these days descended; to publish also, with equal ardor, the music written out of our own life for our own time. Delusions and snares both—departure from "the tradition" that masterpieces might regain living voice and image; encouragement of youth and innovation, notorious disturbers of the peace.

The artistic temperament, however, will have its vagaries; in fact under Dr. Muck and Mr. Monteux rather managed to get its way with them and prepare the ground for the more courageous and insistent Mr. Koussevitzky. Dr. Muck and Mr. Monteux are memories of the past; while now a ballot in which 5200 subscribers might have voted and no piece mustered as many as 500 votes—or one-tenth—has shown Mr. Koussevitzky his true course. Possibly and possibly not. It is within belief, fortified by sound reason, that his programs next season, in cultivation of modernists, in revivals of overlooked and deserving pieces, in catholicity from the oldest ancient to the youngest innovator, in just regard for all these essentials to the prestige of an orchestra by him restored, will much resemble those of the five years now ending. It is also within as reasonable belief that the first and only venture of the Boston Symphony Orchestra into a "request program" will not for a long present be renewed.

Meanwhile it is reportorial duty to record the signs and wonders of what may prove a unique occasion in the orchestral annals: the rapt, yet easy, listening, the tumultuous applause; the audible passing of the word that everything was "tuneful" as they say of the musical plays; the happy content in the thrice-familiar; the all-pervading sense of an entertaining afternoon. There was Chaikovsky racking and baring his spirit that a less neurotic race might hear, stir and clap its hands. There was Ravel (as he told the Viennese when he handed them "The Waltz") foretelling in his final measures the end of this present pretty world, yet by a thousand elect ladies applauded. There, again, was Debussy of "The Faun," as hateful no more than twenty years ago to this same matinée public as is now, say, Dukelsky, dispensing "a message of beauty." So it went; while the casual observers on the outskirts watched amusedly, gave thanks for diversion and stored up useful reflections upon the cultural value of the art of music, symphonically embodied.

Yet chance, the ironist, would get its way. The Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" is not among Mr. Koussevitzky's most fortunate pieces; but he and the orchestra played it with finer-textured tone, less blurring pace, more songful beauty—"beauty" was the catchword of the afternoon—no farther away than the concert for the Pension Fund. Nor had "The Afternoon of A Faun" the flawless felicity of tone, the full glamour of sensuous imagery and motion that conductor and orchestra can bestow upon it. A little slower was the pace than on Tuesday last and the consequences were considerable. Not until they reached "The Waltz" and Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony were Mr. Koussevitzky and his forces quite their puissant and magnificent selves. Yet what did it matter? The applause heaped upon both—at the coming of the conductor to a standing orchestra and a semi-standing audience, at the intermission, at the close of the concert—might well be tribute, outside a few over-wrought spirits, less to a dubious occasion than to a season ended and crowned.

Perhaps it is truest to call it the season of an orchestra restored. Since the heyday of Dr. Muck, before the shadow of the German War over-clouded him, general and particular performance has not risen so high; been so steadily sustained; borne so clearly an individual stamp. Mr. Koussevitzky and the hundred men who now work with him rather than under him, have conquered not only the last doubters within their own city, but the larger and, possibly, the less partisan world beyond. Wherever there are individual judgments to be respected or attending publics to be regarded, the Boston Orchestra has regained its old-time prestige; translated it into the terms of a new musical day; re-asserted on many a score an ancient and honorable primacy. When the occasion is ripe and the means at hand, it may well persuade European capitals of music that prideful report does not exaggerate the high quality of orchestral performance in America; while the range and variety of such performance—program for program—puts the best European orchestras to shame.

Here in Boston, two, and sometimes three audiences weekly feed fat their pleasure in the orchestra as such an instrument. It were a twenty-four times told tale to dwell anew upon the splendor and the finesse, the sensibility and plasticity, the unity en masse, the charactered voice, division by division, of the string choir. As is Mr. Burgin who leads it, so in zest for their task are those who play beside him, down to the last of sixty-odd hands. Not every one of the wood-winds may be the ideal virtuoso for his chair, but enough sit in weekly duty to keep the choir at a clarity, euphony, vividness of tone that make it peer and complement to the strings. The octet of horns has felt the example of Mr. Boettcher, within his field virtuoso and musician of the first rank. In equal measure the brass can be sonorous or mellow with the classic composers, piercing or flaming with the modernists. The players upon the percussion instruments shade and rhythm and characte however exacting the task. Above a the orchestra has attained to unity variety. Plying the merits of each cho it plays as a co-ordinated, reciprocatin stylized whole. Wide indeed is the rang because its musical susceptibility is u failing. It is as true-voiced and graph with the ancients as with the moderns. From it, each individualized in tone and accent, sound Strauss and Schumann, Schubert and Stravinsky. It speaks for Becthoven and Debussy, for Mozart and Bloch. Its scope is the scope of music, opened upon all hearers' ears.

"There are no orchestras," said Strauss once upon a time, "there are only conductors" and, in a sense, weekly at Symphony Hall, his saying is fulfilled. It is an old story that after five years, Mr. Koussevitzky has re-constituted and re-made the Boston Orchestra in his own image; tuned it to be his susceptible and resilient instrument. True enough; but quite as much he has brought it to present pitch by the infusion of his rarest and most salient qualities. As long as listeners have ears to hear, minds to work, imaginations to feel, they will agree and disagree to Mr. Koussevitzky's versions of the pieces that he plays. They will go full course, half-course with him, or halt midway to argue it out as between friends of music. Yet there are two qualities within him from which there can be no dissent, by which he plainest shines.

No conductor ranges more widely, yet to every composer and to each piece he brings a signal openess of mind. He sees the man and the music clearly and sympathetically—the intent, the design, the substance, the manner. He would understand, and, having understood, imagine and project, all three with singular simplicity and directness. Then to the accomplishment with an energy as inexhaustible as it is devoted. Through five seasons in Boston he has come to every piece as though for the while it was to him the most engrossing, important and stimulating thing in the world. He has no traffic with routine. He is stranger to inertia. He lets no piece go by default. He "chances" no performance. To composer and music, to orchestra and audience, he passes white-hot. No wonder his concerts—and the season through—glow with an incandescence that Symphony Hall before him had never known. For him the playing of music is the will, the deed; the living of life itself. As the untranslatable French word has it, to whatever he touches he is animateur. There is no rarer, more signal, more conquering attribute in the whole art of conducting.

Choosing his programs, Mr. Koussevitzky would rightly foster the composers of this our living and fruitful day. Yet not always, as in this very year, have they served him too well. Only in Bloch's "America" and Toch's Piano-Concerto did they give him notable pieces. Only in Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" Hindemith's Concerto, Hill's Symphony, Loeffler's "Bonne Chanson" did repetition confirm them. Martinu and Dukelsky did no more than disclose again their waxing talents; the Stravinsky of "Apollo" worked in a narrow field; "Háry János," graphic, fantastic, flavorsome as Kodály was, remains light-waisted stuff. As the chance of guest-conducting would have it, Honegger, and not Mr. Koussevitzky, achieved so remarkable a modernist piece as "Horace Victorieux." The retort courteous was the conductor's performance of the composer's "Rugby" in far more vivid fashion than Honegger himself could compass. For other cities, Mr. Koussevitzky reserved it, again courteously. Next season it should be Boston's lot.

The obvious resource was overlooked. Composers re-animated classics, neglected pieces from eminent hands. For the first time since Dr. Muck's day, Bruckner and Mahler, to general applause, resumed just place in the repertoire of the Boston Orchestra. At the conductor's hands Sibelius's Third Symphony was recalled not only to hearing but to life. Through him twice over Schumann sounded—memorably, no less, though the composers are poles apart, Strauss's "Zarathustra." Even Frederick the Great, King of Prussia and dilettante in the arts, emerged as agreeable composer. As animateur, Mr. Koussevitzky renewed the Choral Symphony of Beethoven, the Jupiter Symphony of Mozart as, peradventure, they fell first, and with what imagined thrills, upon the Vienna in which the composers lived and wrought. Joining voice with Mr. Heifetz, he saved Brahms's Violin-Concerto from itself. . . . The record in sketchiest outline; but search the program-sheets of European or American orchestras for a comparable range, diversity and catholicity. Search—and find not.

H. T. P.

Ravel's "La Valse" is a favorite show piece with Koussevitzky. Here he succeeds better than in the Wagner in getting the players to carry out exactly his personal notion of the music. Those who remember the composer's interpretation when he was here last season as guest conductor will note that, although Ravel takes the piece throughout "in the movement of a Viennese Waltz." Koussevitzky does not establish and maintain that familiar rhythm but breaks it at times for the sake of making striking effects.

Mr Laurent was again singled out for a share in the applause after Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," a tribute his beautiful playing of the prominent part for solo flute richly deserved. This tone poem, now one of the most popular of modern classics, was vividly, perhaps too vividly, played.

Excellent Performance

Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, his finest work for orchestra, is music which is perfectly fitted to Mr Koussevitzky's genius as conductor. It is hard to imagine a finer performance of it than yesterday's. About the musical value of this work, there have been from the first two sharply divergent opinions. One of them, that of the majority of concert goers over 40, and of many who are younger, is that this symphony has compelling beauty and emotional power.

The other view, in which the present writer concurs with a number of musicians, is that Tchaikovsky's music lacks distinction of melodic style, elaboration of structure, variety of rhythmic effects, subtlety of harmony. The constant repetition of themes and passages grows monotonous. The symphony, in form nearer to a suite than a symphony of Brahms, Beethoven, or Mozart; seems crude and vulgar. From it one cannot derive imaginative stimulus. It is a penance rather than a pleasure to listen to Tchaikovsky's serious music.

There is no way of settling the question of the aesthetic value of Tchaikovsky's or of any composer's music. The reviewer's only duty in the matter is to express as honestly and clearly as possible his opinion.

Tonight's repetition of this "request program" will end a season which has marked the full, and it is to be hoped, the final restoration of the prestige of the Boston Symphony as an orchestra unsurpassed anywhere in the world. For this, credit must go both to Mr Monteux and to Mr Koussevitzky. Extended comment on the season will be made in the Sunday Globe Music and Musicians column tomorrow. P. R.

Pop Nights Planned by Many School Groups

May Day will bring the opening night of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, always one of the events of Boston's spring season. This will be the 44th year of the Pops.

Numerous schools and colleges have made it a custom to take a night at the Pops in their graduation week. These are to include this year Harvard, Simmons, Tufts, Technology, Boston University, Radcliffe, Roxbury Latin and others. Smaller groups, likewise, gather at groups of tables to take advantage of the particular kind of sociability which the Pops afford. These will include Portia Law School, Eliot Circle, Camp Fire Girls, Bryant & Stratton, Jewish Women's College, Boston Life Underwriters, Y. W. C. A., Daughters of Zion and numerous others.

Alfredo Casella, one of the foremost of living Italian musicians, has come from Italy to take over the destiny of the Pops for the third time. Casella will command an orchestra of more than 80 Symphony players.

Boston Symphony Concludes Season

THE forty-eighth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the fifth under the dictatorship of Serge Koussevitzky, comes to a conclusion with the concerts of this week, April 26 and 27. By way of innovation, the conductor permitted the audiences to arrange the final program, by balloting for favorites in three groups of works played during the season: symphonies, tone poems and music in other forms. This radical move, though it has been tried elsewhere, notably in Philadelphia and Cincinnati, was viewed by some with alarm. Yet the result of the experiment does not seem to threaten the foundations of the orchestra. The public's choice, though conservative, was by no means unintelligent. The compositions which received the largest number of votes were the Prelude to "Meistersinger," Ravel's "La Valse," Strauss's "Zarathustra" and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, in E minor. Since "Zarathustra" was too considerable a work to find place with the other items in a program that must be kept within time limits acceptable to an American audience, Mr. Koussevitzky substituted for it the third choice in the tone poem group, Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun."

A Glorious Climax

The performance of these works, all of which have been heard and commented on in recent months, was glorious climax to a brilliant season. The symphony had been played in every series of concerts given by the orchestra this year, but there is no let-down while Koussevitzky holds the stick. This symphony is singularly congenial to him, and his interpretation of it is one of his supreme accomplishments. Yet his genius adapts itself likewise to the exuberance of the "Meistersinger" Prelude and to the fantasy of the "The Afternoon of a Faun." His reading of "La Valse" excites admiration, though under his baton the work lacks the primitivism which the composer himself imparts to it. There were the usual warm leave-takings.

Thus is concluded one of the most brilliant seasons in the history of the orchestra; probably the most brilliant, but as the present commentator has not heard all 48 of them, he will not venture to say so. As usual, Mr. Koussevitzky bestowed novel pieces with a lavish hand; if they do not all promise to become permanent accessions to the repertory, the conductor cannot be blamed for that. Probably there will be no widespread demand for further hearing of any of the three works performed for the first time anywhere: Copland's Two Pieces for String Orchestra, Janin's Symphonie Spirituelle, "Alleluia," and Martinu's "La Symphonie."

But there were several items of deeper interest among the 27 compositions heard for the first time in Boston. Ernest Bloch's prize piece "America," attracted most public interest. As it was avowedly not written for "highbrows," it is perhaps not surprising that many of the learned were moved to condemn it. Within a week it had become a bromidium to call the final chorus "banal." But when the tumult has quieted down, it probably will be realized that Bloch accomplished with admirable artistry what he set out to do, and that even his anthem is no more banal musically than the two that were already competing for the national title; the only difficulty is, it is no better.

Halffter's Sinfonietta

An excellent impression was left by the Sinfonietta in D major of Halffter, who, although young, is able to set down his musical thoughts simply and directly, without proclaiming either new æsthetic theories or a "return" to the ancient masters. This was introduced by Mr. Arbós as guest conductor. The three most considerable of the remaining novelties were Mahler's "Song of the Earth," Miaskovsky's Eighth Symphony and Sibelius's Third; for acquaintance with which musical Boston should render thanks to Mr. Koussevitzky. "Apollon Musagète" indicated that the art of Stravinsky is still stationary. Toch's Piano Concerto, upon which a great deal of laudation has been lavished, seemed to the present observer merely meretricious. Nor were we amused by Dukelsky's Symphony in F major. The suite from Kodály's "Háry János," on the other hand, was a delightful addition to the repertory.

Alfredo Casella resumes on May 1 the direction of the Pop concerts, which he has brought to a new level of musical distinction.

Mr. Koussevitzky is returning next year. The length of his engagement is not announced, but it looks as if his stay might be indefinite. It is only necessary to hear other orchestras of the first rank which have been left for prolonged periods to the ministrations of guest conductors, to realize how important it is that one man should be on the dais permanently. If that man happens to be Koussevitzky, why then—so much the better for Boston. It used to be the fashion to praise the Boston orchestra by saying that it was at its best "since Muck's day." The Muck reservation may now safely be omitted. L. A. S.

Symphony

Close But Not Crown To Season

'Request' Symphony Concert, With Sundry Reflections On the Ending Year

FOR the reviewer, and possibly for sundry others, both on the stage and in the auditorium, it was holiday at the final matinée, for the season, of the Symphony Orchestra. For the fifth time within three months, conductor and orchestra played in Symphony Hall the Prelude to Wagner's operatic comedy, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." For the fifth time within six months in the same concert-room, they also played Debussy's Prelude to Mallarmé's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun." For the fifth time within two months and a half, Chaikovsky's Symphony in E minor rounded out a Symphony Concert. For the fourth time in the course of the season there was room for that persistent repertory piece, Ravel's tone-poem, "The Waltz."

The reviewer, trained to respect his readers and his calling and to prefer fresh matter to "old stuff," declines reasonably to re-traverse pieces so recently examined in these columns. He sets before him, as light and leading, the example of the eminent editor of the programbook. Through forty-eight seasons the Symphony Concerts have continued. Yesterday, for the first time in that long course, there were no program-notes. The erudite compiler is warm and frequent admirer of Artemus Ward. Perhaps, as he scanned this "request program," he recalled a favorite phrase of that humorist—"This is 2 mutch"—and forthwith shut his files. As it was, only the annual records, tables and indexes, with the familiar list of subscribers to current expenses, filled the weekly pamphlet. Vainly the desultory minded sought the usual pages of entertaining miscellany. There was none. With the advertisements they made shift. One, deliciously, announced the program "as a musical triumph in Boston history."

Perhaps it was, though some might have chosen the adjective differently. Certainly many good people believed they had beaten down the Satan of Mr. Koussevitzky's usual programs under their feet, not once, but for good and all. Not an unfamiliar piece disfigured the list. The newest, "The Waltz," had been played almost annually through eight seasons; the next in chronological order dated from 1902; the third from 1892; the fourth from the first year of the orchestra. A good riddance to such bad rubbish as young men who live and work in this our time, absorb its spirit and would infuse it into their music. If a composer must be "still living," at least let him be in Monsieur Ravel's becoming fifties. If we others are to believe a distinguished and resident observer, youth went out of the fashion in New England about 1830, and through a century, less one year, has known no restoration.

Besides, what is the purpose of the Symphony Concerts, their reason for being? Long since, an eminent citizen, as spokesman for the public when Mr. Gericke took final leave, defined both. Two audiences, he said in substance, sought them. They were weary with the domestic cares, the social pleasures, the professional or the business labors of the week. Upon a Friday and a Saturday conductor and orchestra soothed and refreshed them with the music of the masters, and the great mission of both was fulfilled. Of course, conductors and a few other restless and ambitious spirits have not quite agreed to these concepts. They have even cherished and practised a notion that "the great mission" of the concerts was two-fold: to keep alive and aglow in freshening and stimulating performance the heritage of music to these days descended; to publish also, with equal ardor, the music written out of our own life for our own time. Delusions and snares both—departure from "the tradition" that masterpieces might regain living voice and image; encouragement of youth and innovation, notorious disturbers of the peace.

The artistic temperament, however, will have its vagaries; in fact under Dr. Muck and Mr. Monteux rather managed to get its way with them and prepare the ground for the more courageous and insistent Mr. Koussevitzky. Dr. Muck and Mr. Monteux are memories of the past; while now a ballot in which 5200 subscribers might have voted and no piece mustered as many as 500 votes—or one-tenth—has shown Mr. Koussevitzky his true course. Possibly and possibly not. It is within belief, fortified by sound reason, that his programs next season, in cultivation of modernists, in revivals of overlooked and deserving pieces, in catholicity from the oldest ancient to the youngest innovator, in just regard for all these essentials to the prestige of an orchestra by him restored, will much resemble those of the five years now ending. It is also within as reasonable belief that the first and only venture of the Boston Symphony Orchestra into a "request program" will not for a long present be renewed.

Meanwhile it is reportorial duty to record the signs and wonders of what may prove a unique occasion in the orchestral annals: the rapt, yet easy, listening, the tumultuous applause; the audible passing of the word that everything was "tuneful" as they say of the musical plays; the happy content in the thrice-familiar; the all-pervading sense of an entertaining afternoon. There was Chaikovsky racking and baring his spirit that a less neurotic race might hear, stir and clap its hands. There was Ravel (as he told the Viennese when he handed them "The Waltz") foretelling in his final measures the end of this present pretty world, yet by a thousand elect ladies applauded. There, again, was Debussy of "The Faun," as hateful no more than twenty years ago to this same matinée public as is now, say, Dukelsky, dispensing "a message of beauty." So it went; while the casual observers on the outskirts watched amusedly, gave thanks for diversion and stored up useful reflections upon the cultural value of the art of music, symphonically embodied.

Yet chance, the ironist, would get its way. The Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" is not among Mr. Koussevitzky's most fortunate pieces; but he and the orchestra played it with finer-textured tone, less blurring pace, more songful beauty—"beauty" was the catchword of the afternoon—no farther away than the concert for the Pension Fund. Nor had "The Afternoon of A Faun" the flawless felicity of tone, the full glamour of sensuous imagery and motion that conductor and orchestra can bestow upon it. A little slower was the pace than on Tuesday last and the consequences were considerable. Not until they reached "The Waltz" and Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony were Mr. Koussevitzky and his forces quite their puissant and magnificent selves. Yet what did it matter? The applause heaped upon both—at the coming of the conductor to a standing orchestra and a semi-standing audience, at the intermission, at the close of the concert—might well be tribute, outside a few over-wrought spirits, less to a dubious occasion than to a season ended and crowned.

Perhaps it is truest to call it the season of an orchestra restored. Since the heyday of Dr. Muck, before the shadow of the German War over-clouded him, general and particular performance has not risen so high; been so steadily sustained; borne so clearly an individual stamp. Mr. Koussevitzky and the hundred men who now work with him rather than under him, have conquered not only the last doubters within their own city, but the larger and, possibly, the less partisan world beyond. Wherever there are individual judgments to be respected or attending publics to be regarded, the Boston Orchestra has regained its old-time prestige; translated it into the terms of a new musical day; re-asserted on many a score an ancient and honorable primacy. When the occasion is ripe and the means at hand, it may well persuade European capitals of music that prideful report does not exaggerate the high quality of orchestral performance in America; while the range and variety of such performance—program for program—puts the best European orchestras to shame.

Here in Boston, two, and sometimes three audiences weekly feed fat their pleasure in the orchestra as such an instrument. It were a twenty-four times told tale to dwell anew upon the splendor and the finesse, the sensibility and plasticity, the unity en masse, the charactered voice, division by division, of the string choir. As is Mr. Burgin who leads it, so in zest for their task are those who play beside him, down to the last of sixty-odd hands. Not every one of the woodwinds may be the ideal virtuoso for his chair, but enough sit in weekly duty to keep the choir at a clarity, euphony, vitalidness of tone that make it peer and complement to the strings. The octet of horns has felt the example of Mr. Boettcher, within his field virtuoso and musician of the first rank. In equal measure the brass can be sonorous or mellow with the classic composers, piercing or flaming with the modernists. The players upon the percussion instruments shade and rhythm and characte however exacting the task. Above a the orchestra has attained to unity variety. Plying the merits of each cho it plays as a co-ordinated, reciprocatin stylized whole. Wide indeed is the rang because its musical susceptibility is u failing. It is as true-voiced and graph with the ancients as with the moderns. From it, each individualized in tone and accent, sound Strauss and Schumann, Schubert and Stravinsky. It speaks for Becthoven and Debussy, for Mozart and Bloch. Its scope is the scope of music, opened upon all hearers' ears.

"There are no orchestras," said Strauss once upon a time, "there are only conductors" and, in a sense, weekly at Symphony Hall, his saying is fulfilled. It is an old story that after five years, Mr. Koussevitzky has re-constituted and re-made the Boston Orchestra in his own image; tuned it to be his susceptible and resilient instrument. True enough; but quite as much he has brought it to present pitch by the infusion of his rarest and most salient qualities. As long as listeners have ears to hear, minds to work, imaginations to feel, they will agree and disagree to Mr. Koussevitzky's versions of the pieces that he plays. They will go full course, half-course with him, or halt midway to argue it out as between friends of music. Yet there are two qualities within him from which there can be no dissent, by which he plainest shines.

No conductor ranges more widely, yet to every composer and to each piece he brings a signal openess of mind. He sees the man and the music clearly and sympathetically—the intent, the design, the substance, the manner. He would understand, and, having understood, imagine and project, all three with singular simplicity and directness. Then to the accomplishment with an energy as inexhaustible as it is devoted. Through five seasons in Boston he has come to every piece as though for the while it was to him the most engrossing, important and stimulating thing in the world. He has no traffic with routine. He is stranger to inertia. He lets no piece go by default. He "chances" no performance. To composer and music, to orchestra and audience, he passes white-hot. No wonder his concerts—and the season through—glow with an incandescence that Symphony Hall before him had never known. For him the playing of music is the will, the deed: the living of life itself. As the untranslatable French word has it, to whatever he touches he is animateur. There is no rarer, more signal, more conquering attribute in the whole art of conducting.

Choosing his programs, Mr. Koussevitzky would rightly foster the composers of this our living and fruitful day. Yet not always, as in this very year, have they served him too well. Only in Bloch's "America" and Toch's Piano-Concerto did they give him notable pieces. Only in Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" Hindemith's Concerto, Hill's Symphony, Loeffler's "Bonne Chanson" did repetition confirm them. Martinu and Dukelsky did no more than disclose again their waxing talents; the Stravinsky of "Apollo" worked in a narrow field; "Háry János," graphic, fantastic, flavorsome as Kodály was, remains light-waisted stuff. As the chance of guest-conducting would have it, Honegger, and not Mr. Koussevitzky, achieved so remarkable a modernist piece as "Horace Victorieux." The retort courteous was the conductor's performance of the composer's "Rugby" in far more vivid fashion than Honegger himself could compass. For other cities, Mr. Koussevitzky reserved it, again courteously. Next season it should be Boston's lot.

The obvious resource [illegible] overlooked composers re-animated [illegible] neglected pieces from eminent hands. For the first time since [illegible] day, Bruckner and Mahler, to general [illegible] use, resumed just place in the repertory of the Boston Orchestra. At the conductor's hands Sibelius's Third Symphony was recalled not only to hearing but life. Through him twice over Schumann sounded—memorable [illegible] though the composers are [illegible] Strauss's "Zarathustra." [illegible] the Great, King of Prussia and dilettante in the arts, emerged as agreeable composer. As animateur, Mr. Koussevitzky renewed the Choral Symphony of Beethoven, the Jupiter Symphony of Mozart as, peradventure, [illegible] and with what imagined [illegible] the Vienna in which the composers lived and wrought. Joining [illegible] with Mr. Heifetz, he saved Brahms's Violin-Concerto from itself. . . . The record in sketchiest outline; but see [illegible] gram-sheets of European or American orchestras for a comparable range, diversity and catholicity. Speech—and [illegible] not.

H. T. P.

REDUCTION

RATIO

15x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5

A4

A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

Morals from Programs Set Side by Side

Fiedler's, Muck's, Monteux's and Koussevitzky's When Compared

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY has conducted the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for five years.

Pierre Monteux, his predecessor, likewise conducted the concerts for five years. Ignoring the negligible interregnum of Monsieur Rabaud, Herr Doktor Karl Muck preceded him for six years (minus one concert). And Max Fiedler ruled for four years before Dr. Muck. Since this is not the first chapter of the Gospel according to Saint Matthew, we will not attempt to trace the succession back to the Adam of the orchestra, nor even to its David. Under the four conductors mentioned a period of twenty years is covered, of a reign as nearly equal as possible in length for the four individuals. Such a moment in the history of the orchestra seems a singularly appropriate time to institute an investigation into the programs of the orchestra during that period, to attempt to discover the idiosyncrasies of the four conductors, points of similarity, points of divergence, policies toward the classics, toward new and old composers not dignified by that high-sounding appellation.

The first thing that made its impression upon the investigator was the magnitude of the list of pieces played in the twenty years. He had approached the task with all the eagerness of ignorance of its size. Spare hours slipped into days, days into weeks, and still tabulation continued. The next surprise came in arranging the list in alphabetical order. Let us say the name of Debussy had just been written down. Surely one would soon end the "D's" with Dukelsky. But wait, there was DeFalla first, and of course, Delius had a few performances. And the list lengthened to Delmas, Dittensdorf, Dohnanyi, Ducasse and Dukas before Dukelsky was reached, and then to finish the "D's" one had to add Duparc and Dvorák. Similarly the name of Gluck allowed its head to appear with naive hope that the end of the "G's" was near. But there followed Goetz, two Goldmarks, Goossens, Gounod, Graedener, Grayn, Grétry, Grieg, Griffes. The thought came that one was compiling a musical dictionary. And when the list was complete it contained composers, composerlets, eminent musicians not really composers, and friends of conductors to the number of 246, and compositions reaching the total of 963! Probably not many—even of the wisest—have imagined that there could have been heard so formidable a body of writers of music in twenty-four concerts a year for twenty years. Which is precisely why we have spoken of them under the above four classifications.

A second surprise was in store for the investigator when he counted the whole number of works performed for each composer during the twenty years. A good guess, an expert guess even, might pardonably have given the greatest total to Beethoven or Wagner. But such an expert would have been wrong, for the prize goes to none other than the cheerful Mozart with fifty works to his credit. The list of totals of works (where it has exceeded ten) should be of interest:

Mozart	50	Schubert	16
Beethoven	35	Chaikovsky	15
Wagner	28	Franck	15
J. S. Bach	25	Haydn	14
Strauss	25	Saint-Saëns	14
Debussy	19	Dvorák	12
Berlioz	18	Schumann	12
Liszt	18	Chadwick	11
Sibelius	18	D'Indy	10
Brahms	17	Respighi	10
Handel	16	Stravinsky	10

Most of us can learn at least two lessons from the size of the Mozartean list. For few of us realize, unless it is in some way brought to our attention, that Mozart was one of the world's most prolific composers. We often stand aghast at the six hundred and more of Schubert's songs, without comprehending that whenever we see K.550 or whatever the number may be, after a Mozart title, it means that the work in question is the five hundred and fiftieth work of Mozart in Köchel's catalogue, and that many of Mozart's works being in the three or four-movement cycle of symphonic or sonata form, the total of complete movements which Mozart wrote would knock Schubert's six hundred songs into a cocked hat.

[illegible]nd lesson brings up a subject [illegible]y in a degree the above [illegible]nce of Mozart is not [illegible]ors' choice but over half probably due to soloists' choice. Before Mr. Koussevitzky's reign, the number of soloists at Symphony Hall was legion. Many of them, of course, chose their own works. And of all composers, Mozart furnished the one happy hunting ground for these soloists. Thirty of the fifty compositions were played or sung by them, including the many "grand airs" from no less than eight operas and concertos of various kinds and descriptions to the number of eleven. If soloists' numbers were deducted from the above list its order would be somewhat as follows:

Beethoven	25	Liszt	14
Mozart	20	Haydn	13
Wagner	20	Brahms	12
J. S. Bach	19	Dvorák	12
Debussy	19	Chadwick	12
Sibelius	18	Handel	10
Berlioz	16	D'Indy	10
Strauss	16	Respighi	10
Franck	15	Stravinsky	10
Chaikovsky	14

It should be explained in connection with this table that where the work in question has been obviously a conductor's choice and the soloist chosen for the work, rather than the work more or less thrust upon a conductor by a soloist, it has not been deducted. The list represents orchestral works plus a few concertos judged to be chosen for their own sake. Of individual works The Mastersinger Overture came first with fifteen performances. For second place the following tie with eleven each: Beethoven's Fifth, Egmont, Leonore III, Brahms's Symphonies I, II and IV.

One may perhaps next ask, what is the distribution of these works among the four conductors, and what is the frequency of performance of each work? To answer the question fully would lead into too much detail for a newspaper article. It may be answered by certain classifications and summaries. The first classification is of "composers who are repertory composers in the fullest sense. Not only have performances of their works been frequent, but among some of the conductors a regular routine of repetition was established. Certain of these works were almost sure to appear in alternate years, while another set of the same composer filled in the intervening years. The conductor who established such a routine most completely was Dr. Muck, followed by Mr. Fiedler, less by Mr. Monteux. Mr. Koussevitzky follows it practically not at all with the classics, but seems to be establishing it to a certain extent with a very few pieces of the newer composers. Near-modernism becoming routine! A second class would be of composers whose works are frequently played, but for whom there has never been established the honor (?) of a routine of repetition.

A third class is of composers who have had two or three performances of a reasonable number of works. A fourth class is of composers who have had several works performed, one or two of which have attained more than a single performance. A fifth class is of composers who are represented by more than one work, but never by more than one performance of any one single work. And the sixth class is of those composers who are represented by only one performance of only one work. It must be distinctly understood that frequency of performance does not necessarily predicate excellence. The choices of no four men for so short a period as twenty years could possibly establish definitely the excellence of the works they chose. Otherwise one could not possibly point to neglected composers. The list is bound to shed less light upon the composers than upon the conductors. The gentlemen of the baton are judged by their judgments upon composers fully as much as the composers are judged by the selections of the conductors.

Number of performances (excluding purely soloists) by:

Class I—	Fiedler	Muck	Monteux	Koussevitzky
Beethoven	29	26	25	25
Brahms	16	28	19	24
Chaikovsky	21	9	7	13
*Debussy	13	12	15	24
Dvorák	5	13	7	6
Franck	7	6	13	4
Liszt	10	17	11	5
Mozart	9	20	17	9
Schumann	7	10	9	6
Weber	8	9	3	5

*For certain of Debussy's works, as also for some of Scriabin and Musorgsky "Pictures" and for the K. P. E. Bach-Stamitz concerto, Mr. Koussevitzky has given performances in alternate years. And two of the Brahms symphonies have been played each for four consecutive years.
†Mr. Monteux followed no routine of repetition.

Class II—A.—Composers whom all conductors have played with considerable frequency: Berlioz, Dukas, Handel, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Rimsky-Korsakov, Saint-Saëns, Schubert, Sibelius (first symphony almost becomes routine), Strauss, Wagner. (These last two played with greater frequency than some of the routined composers of Class I, but with never any discoverable system of regular recurrence of individual works.)

B.—Cherubini belongs in this class for Mr. Fiedler and for Dr. Muck, but has only occasional performances with Mr. Monteux and Mr. Koussevitzky. Enesco and K. Goldmark have been performed frequently by all conductors before Mr. Koussevitzky; as has Smetana, whom Mr. Koussevitzky has given one performance.

C.—Borodin, Ravel, Stravinsky have been performed frequently by Dr. Muck, Mr. Monteux and Mr. Koussevitzky, but not at all by Mr. Fiedler.

D.—Bach has been performed by all four, but his orchestral works not with any great frequency until Mr. Koussevitzky.

Class III—Two or three performances for a reasonable number of works:

K. P. E. Bach			K
Balakirev	F	DrM	M
Bruckner	F	DrM	K
Charpentier		DrM	M
De Falla		M	K
Faure	F	DrM	M K
Gluck	F	DrM	K
Lindsay	F		M K
Loeffler	F	DrM	M K
V. Williams			M K
Wolf	F	DrM	K

Class IV.—(One or two works receiving more than one performance.)

This class includes the following composers, with Mr. Fiedler playing 13 of the composers, Dr. Muck 22, Mr. Monteux 30, Mr. Koussevitzky 18: Bloch, Bossi, Bruch, Carpenter, Chadwick, Chausson, Delius, Ducasse, Elgar, Foote, Glazunov, Hill, Hindemith, Honegger, Humperdinck, D'Indy, Lalo, Lianounov, MacDowell, Mahler, Musorgsky, Prokofiev, Rabaud, Respighi, Ropartz, Rubinstein, Schmitt, Schoenberg, Skriabin, D. S. Smith, Stokowski, Strube, Verdi, Vivaldi.

Class V.—(Composers represented by more than one work, but never more than one performance for each work.)

Albeniz, Ballantine, Bantock, Bartok, Bax, Bliss, Boccherini, Bridge, Busoni, Casella, Clapp, Converse, Copland, Corelli, Dohnanyi, Dukelsky, Eichheim, Fiedler, Fried, Gilbert, Glinka, Goetz, R. Goldmark, Goossens, Grétry, Grieg, Griffes, Hadley Holst, Ibert, Kelley, Lazar, Leken, Malipiero, Martinu, Massenet, Mason (D. G.), Mason (Stuart), Milhaud, Noren, Paderewski, Reger, Rossini, Roussel, Scarlatti, Schelling, Schillings, Sinding, Svendsen, Tailleferre, Tansman, Turina, Walton, Weingartner.

Of these for Mr. Fiedler 16, Muck 18, Monteux 27, Koussevitzky 27.

Class VI. Of composers represented by only a single performance of a single work, it will serve no conceivable purpose to list the names. Each of the conductors has a considerable number of them charged against him:

Fiedler	13	Monteux	24
Muck	18	Koussevitzky	27

Of Mr. Koussevitzky's list, however, it must be said that many have been so recent as to afford no time for repetition. Of the last season would be repeated. They ing the list de last year numb

Of perhaps gr introductions of posers who recei performance wer Fiedler to the nu 17, Mr. Monteux 15; which last n increased by re seasons. Noted ler's introduction tock, Converse, Reger, Scriabin, list—Bloch, Bor Ravel, Schmitt, teux—Albeniz, B Falla, Goossens, Novelties of this ld hardly have been number seven, bring- wn to 20. Those of er seven also.

eater interest are the each conductor. Com- ved more than a single e introduced by Mr. mber of 22, by Dr. Muck 28, Mr. Koussevitzky umber will probably be petitions of succeeding names among Mr. Fied- s are Balakirev, Ban- Delius, Foote, Hadley, Sinding; in Dr. Muck's odin, Carpenter, Hill, Vivaldi; for Mr. Mon- ax, Bliss, Casella, De Griffes, Holst, Honeg-repetition of a certain list of "classics" but is giving the same kind of repetition to a few newer works. He has a tendency to give to a work (new and otherwise) an earlier repetition than the other conductors. Mr. Koussevitzky's novelties range wider, both in point of historical and geographical source than those of any other conductor. Mr. Monteux's list of introductions of notables is larger than that of the others. But as to the differences of the conductors in relation to the six categories above established, it is that of tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee.

No immutable laws have been established or broken by any one of the four. Single composers, single works have been added to the list while others have been allowed to drop out. It is the law of all life, naturally manifesting itself. Mr. Higginson's rule is the one immutable

"By Magic Numbers and Persuasive Sound"

Koussevitzky as Audiences Look upon Him

(Sketched at the Symphony Concerts by Gordon Hansen)

Sa[illegible]e at Home, [illegible]ne Lingering Glance Behind

Le[illegible] Testy and More Kindly, [illegible]. John Ervine Recalls American Nights

BY the time this article appears I shall be again in England after a stay of seven months in New York, and it occurs to me that I must now sum up my impressions of the American theater. The critics in New York are all agreed that the season 1928-1929 was the worst in the recent history of their stage. An unusually interesting theatrical paper, Variety, which is more entertaining than any paper of its sort that we have, reports that 129 plays were produced in New York up to and including March 9, and that no fewer than ninety of them were total failures.

Variety's figures, of course, are based on financial returns, for it would be impossible to make a list of successes and failures of any value on any other basis. The failures, for instance, include "The Unknown Warrior," which was shockingly mishandled in New York—I shall have a few severe words to say to the people of London who, grasping at a larger advance on account of royalties, withdrew this piece from the Theater Guild and gave it to Mr. Charles Hopkins, with the result that the production was irretrievably ruined—and Mr. Somerset Maugham's "The Sacred Flame," both of which, on their merits, deserved to be successes. But, by and large, the substantial fact remains that only a third of the plays produced in New York in 1928-29 were financially successful. Any business or industry operating on terms so disastrous as those might fairly be regarded as dying. About twenty of the theaters in New York are "dark," and some of them have been "dark" for a considerable time. There can, then, be no doubt that the season has not paid its way.

An immense amount of money must have been lost in the New York theater since September, 1928. Yet I would not sign the statement of my New York colleagues that this has been a dreadful season. It may be less worthy than previous seasons, notably those of 1926-27 and 1927-28, but as I was not present in New York those seasons, I can say nothing of that, and I am not prepared to accept the word of the phrase-followers. They tell me that the season during which I was in New York was terrible, yet I know that such a season, had it been given at any time since 1918 in London, would have been considered a good one.

I lately made a list of plays that any intelligent person might patronise with pleasure in New York: It contained the names of eighteen, ranging from austere pieces down to musical comedies, and it might have been enlarged by the inclusion of other pieces which I happened not to have seen. I omitted from it a number of sensationally-successful pieces which I did not care about. In brief, the list could have been drawn up to include some thirty plays of all sorts that might be expected to give good entertainment to the majority of playgoers. That does not appear to me to be bad, and I wish with all my heart that it would be possible to do as much in London.

My first impression is that the New York theater is very vivacious. It is extraordinarily alive. That statement will astound some of my American readers who remember that I have asserted many times that it is on the point of death, but my mournful warnings refer only to its financial organization, and not to the quality of the plays produced in it or to the skill of the directors (whom we would call producers) or of the players. Given a better organization and managers of some taste and intelligence and education, the American theater might easily become the best theater in the world. All the elements of a successful theater are present in New York. There is an eager audience. Americans like the theater and want to go to it often. They do not treat it as a place to be visited only when all else fails, nor are they afraid of experiments, or reluctant to see plays that make some demand on their minds.

There are no Gallery Girls, thank God, in New York, or if there are, they have the sense to keep their mouths shut and their minds open. During the whole of the seven months that I have been in New York, I have only, on five occasions, heard an author called onto the stage, and three of the five authors were English, Mr. Lonsdale, Mr. Coward, and Mr. Robert Nicholls. The New York audience, although it is more eager to visit the theater, is less demonstrative, on first nights at all events, than the London audience. The legend that we are a cold people is a lie, so far as the theater is concerned. Compared with us, New Yorkers are glacial. They are, on the whole, much better behaved in the theater than we are, although I have had to modify my opinion of their manners considerably. New York is fortunate in possessing a large number of first-class directors or producers. Plays here are admirably put on the stage. Mr. George S. Kaufman, who is himself a dramatist of distinction, Mr. George Abbott, another clever dramatist, Mr. Guthrie McClintic, Mr. Philip Moeller, and Mr. Winchell Smith are brilliant directors. Many dramatists in New York direct the production of their own plays, for example, Mr. Sydney Howard, author of "They Knew What They Wanted" and "The Silver Cord," and Mr. Elmer Rice, whose play, "Street Scene," about which I did not care, is a huge success in New York. I am inclined to give some of the credit for this abundance of good directors to Professor George P. Baker, formerly of Harvard, and now of Yale.

When I visited the handsome theater, attached to Yale University, in which he instructs his students in the technique of the stage, I quickly realized that although he could never hope to teach anyone how to write a play, he could certainly teach the instructable in the business of stage-direction. Hundreds of young men and women have passed through his school and have acquired an intimate acquaintance with the apparatus of the stage. The result is that in every college in the United States there will presently be an accomplished technician in teaching pupils how to produce a play. Some critics complain that Professor Baker's theater is too good, that his students are trained with an apparatus superior to any that they are likely to use outside a Broadway theater; but I doubt if there is much in this complaint. The Yale theater certainly is a handsome one, finely equipped, and able to seat very comfortably 750 persons.

The New York theater is well-staffed with accomplished actresses. In musical comedy there is a remarkable number of clever girls, who can act and sing and dance and are beautiful. American actresses, generally speaking, are better than English actresses, and much better than American actors; but English actors, especially in drawing-room comedy, are, generally speaking, superior to American actors who, however, are superb in character-work. I have seen more good character-acting in New York in this season than I have seen in Lon-

Continued on Page Sixteen

A. H. M.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Morals from Programs Set Side by Side

Fiedler's, Muck's, Monteux's and Koussevitzky's When Compared

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY has conducted the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for five years. Pierre Monteux, his predecessor, likewise conducted the concerts for five years. Ignoring the negligible interregnum of Monsieur Rabaud, Herr Doktor Karl Muck preceded him for six years (minus one concert). And Max Fiedler ruled for four years before Dr. Muck. Since this is not the first chapter of the Gospel according to Saint Matthew, we will not attempt to trace the succession back to the Adam of the orchestra, nor even to its David. Under the four conductors mentioned a period of twenty years is covered, of a reign as nearly equal as possible in length for the four individuals. Such a moment in the history of the orchestra seems a singularly appropriate time to institute an investigation into the programs of the orchestra during that period, to attempt to discover the idiosyncrasies of the four conductors, points of similarity, points of divergence, policies toward the classics, toward new and old composers not dignified by that high-sounding appellation.

The first thing that made its impression upon the investigator was the magnitude of the list of pieces played in the twenty years. He had approached the task with all the eagerness of ignorance of its size. Spare hours slipped into days, days into weeks, and still tabulation continued. The next surprise came in arranging the list in alphabetical order. Let us say the name of Debussy had just been written down. Surely one would soon end the "D's" with Dukelsky. But wait, there was DeFalla first, and of course, Delius had a few performances. And the list lengthened to Delmas, Dittensdorf, Dohnanyi, Ducasse and Dukas before Dukelsky was reached, and then to finish the "D's" one had to add Duparc and Dvorák. Similarly the name of Gluck allowed its head to appear with naive hope that the end of the "G's" was near. But there followed Goetz, two Goldmarks, Goossens, Gounod, Graedener, Grayn, Grétry, Grieg, Griffes. The thought came that one was compiling a musical dictionary. And when the list was complete it contained composers, composerlets, eminent musicians not really composers, and friends of conductors to the number of 246, and compositions reaching the total of 963! Probably not many—even of the wisest—have imagined that there could have been heard so formidable a body of writers of music in twenty-four concerts a year for twenty years. Which is precisely why we have spoken of them under the above four classifications.

A second surprise was in store for the investigator when he counted the whole number of works performed for each composer during the twenty years. A good guess, an expert guess even, might pardonably have given the greatest total to Beethoven or Wagner. But such an expert would have been wrong, for the prize goes to none other than the cheerful Mozart with fifty works to his credit. The list of totals of works (where it has exceeded ten) should be of interest:

Mozart	50	Schubert	16
Beethoven	35	Chaikovsky	15
Wagner	28	Franck	15
J. S. Bach	25	Haydn	14
Strauss	25	Saint Saëns	14
Debussy	19	Dvorák	12
Berlioz	18	Schumann	12
Liszt	18	Chadwick	11
Sibelius	18	D'Indy	10
Brahms	17	Respighi	10
Handel	16	Stravinsky	10

Most of us can learn at least two lessons from the size of the Mozartean list. For few of us realize, unless it is in some way brought to our attention, that Mozart was one of the world's most prolific composers. We often stand aghast at the six hundred and more of Schubert's songs, without comprehending that whenever we see K.550 or whatever the number may be, after a Mozart title, it means that the work in question is the five hundred and fiftieth work of Mozart in Köchel's catalogue, and that many of Mozart's works being in the three or four-movement cycle of symphonic or sonata form, the total of complete movements which Mozart wrote would knock Schubert's six hundred songs into a cocked hat.

[illegible] lesson brings up a subject [illegible] in a degree the above [illegible] of Mozart is not [illegible] choice but over half probably due to soloists' choice. Before Mr. Koussevitzky's reign, the number of soloists at Symphony Hall was legion. Many of them, of course, chose their own works. And of all composers, Mozart furnished the one happy hunting ground for these soloists. Thirty of the fifty compositions were played or sung by them, including the many "grand airs" from no less than eight operas and concertos of various kinds and descriptions to the number of eleven. If soloists' numbers were deducted from the above list its order would be somewhat as follows:

Beethoven	25	Liszt	14
Mozart	20	Haydn	13
Wagner	20	Brahms	12
J. S. Bach	19	Dvorák	12
Debussy	19	Chadwick	12
Sibelius	18	Handel	10
Berlioz	16	D'Indy	10
Strauss	16	Respighi	10
Franck	15	Stravinsky	10
Chaikovsky	14

It should be explained in connection with this table that where the work in question has been obviously a conductor's choice and the soloist chosen for the work, rather than the work more or less thrust upon a conductor by a soloist, it has not been deducted. The list represents orchestral works plus a few concertos judged to be chosen for their own sake. Of individual works The Mastersinger Overture came first with fifteen performances. For second place the following tie with eleven each: Beethoven's Fifth, Egmont, Leonore III, Brahms's Symphonies I, II and IV.

One may perhaps next ask, what is the distribution of these works among the four conductors, and what is the frequency of performance of each work? To answer the question fully would lead into too much detail for a newspaper article. It may be answered by certain classifications and summaries. The first classification is of composers who are repertory composers in the fullest sense. Not only have performances of their class is of composers who have had several works performed, one or two of which have attained more than a single performance. A fifth class is of composers who are represented by more than one work, but never by more than one performance of any one single work. And the sixth class is of those composers who are represented by only one performance of only one work. It must be distinctly understood that frequency of performance does not necessarily predicate excellence. The choices of no four men for so short a period as twenty years could possibly establish definitely the excellence of the works they chose. Otherwise one could not possibly point to neglected composers. The list is bound to shed less light upon the composers than upon the conductors. The gentlemen of the baton are judged by their judgments upon composers fully siderable frequency: Berlioz, Dukas, Handel, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Rimsky-Korsakov, Saint-Saëns, Schubert, Sibelius (first symphony almost becomes routine), Strauss, Wagner. (These last two played with greater frequency than some of the routined composers of Class I, but with never any discoverable system of regular recurrence of individual works.)

B.—Cherubini belongs in this class for Mr. Fiedler and for Dr. Muck, but has only occasional performances with Mr. Monteux and Mr. Koussevitzky. Enesco and K. Goldmark have been performed frequently by all conductors before Mr. Koussevitzky; as has Smetana, whom Mr. Koussevitzky has given one performance.

C.—Borodin, Ravel, Stravinsky have been performed frequently by Mr. Monteux 30, Mr. Koussevitzky 18; Bloch, Bossi, Bruch, Carpenter, Chadwick, Chausson, Delius, Ducasse, Elgar, Foote, Glazunov, Hill, Hindemith, Honegger, Humperdinck, D'Indy, Lalo, Lianounov, MacDowell, Mahler, Musorgsky, Prokofiev, Rabaud, Respighi, Ropartz, Rubinstein, Schmitt, Schoenberg, Skriabin, D. S. Smith, Stokowski, Strube, Verdi, Vivaldi.

Class V.—(Composers represented by more than one work, but never more than one performance for each work.)

Albeniz, Ballantine, Bantock, Bartok, Bax, Bliss, Boccherini, Bridge, Busoni, Casella, Clapp, Converse, Copland, Corelli, Dohnanyi, Dukelsky, Eichheim, Fiedler, Fried, Gilbert, Glinka, Goetz, R. Goldmark, Goossens, Grétry, Grieg, Griffes, Hadley for repetition, last season wo repeated. They ing the list do last year numb

Of perhaps gr introductions of posers who recei performance we Fiedler to the nu 17, Mr. Monteux 15; which last n increased by re seasons. Noted ler's introductio tock, Converse, Reger, Scriabin, list—Bloch, Bor Ravel, Schmitt, teux—Albeniz, B Falla, Goossens, Novelties of this uld hardly have been number seven, bring- wn to 20. Those of er seven also.

eater interest are the each conductor. Com- ved more than a single e introduced by Mr. mber of 22, by Dr. Muck 28, Mr. Koussevitzky umber will probably be petitions of succeeding names among Mr. Fied- s are Balakirev, Ban- Delius, Foote, Hadley, Sinding; in Dr. Muck's odin, Carpenter, Hill, Vivaldi; for Mr. Mon- ax, Bliss, Casella, De Griffes, Holst, Honeg- repetition of a ce but is giving the to a few newer v dency to give to a wise) an earlier re conductors. Mr. ties range wider, torical and geog those of any other teux's list of intro larger than that to the differences relation to the six lished, it is that tweedle-dee.

No immutable l lished or broken b Single composers; added to the list w allowed to drop ou life, naturally ma Higginson's rule of composers who have had several works performed, one or two of them have attained more than a single performance. A fifth class is of composers who are represented by more than one work, but never by more than one performance of any one single work. A sixth class is of those composers represented by only one performance of only one work. It must be understood that frequency of performance does not necessarily predicate excellence. The choices of no four conductors, so short a period as twenty years, could possibly establish definitely the relative excellence of the works they chose. Nor, indeed, one could not possibly point out the neglected composers. The list is rather one to shed less light upon the composers than upon the conductors. The individuality of the baton are judged by their judgments upon composers fully considerable frequency: Berlioz, Dukas, Handel, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Rimsky-Korsakov, Saint-Saëns, Schubert, Sibelius (first symphony almost becomes routine), Strauss, Wagner. (These last two played with greater frequency than some of the routined composers of Class I, but with never any discoverable system of regular recurrence of individual works.)

"By Magic Numbers and Persuasive Sound"

Koussevitzky as Audiences Look upon Him

(Sketched at the Symphony Concerts by Gordon Hansen)

B.—Cherubini belongs in this class for Mr. Fiedler and for Dr. Muck, but has only occasional performances with Mr. Monteux and Mr. Koussevitzky. Enesco and K. Goldmark have been performed frequently by all conductors before Mr. Koussevitzky; as has Smetana, whom Mr. Koussevitzky has given one performance.

C.—Borodin, Ravel, Stravinsky have been performed frequently by Mr. Monteux 30, Mr. Koussevitzky 18: Bloch, Bossi, Bruch, Carpenter, Chadwick, Chausson, Delius, Ducasse, Elgar, Foote, Glazunov, Hill, Hindemith, Honegger, Humperdinck, D'Indy, Lalo, Lianounov, MacDowell, Mahler, Musorgsky, Prokofiev, Rabaud, Respighi, Ropartz, Rubinstein, Schmitt, Schoenberg, Skriabin, D. S. Smith, Stokowski, Strube, Verdi, Vivaldi.

Class V.—(Composers represented by more than one work, but never more than one performance for each work.)

Albeniz, Ballantine, Bantock, Bartok, Bax, Bliss, Boccherini, Bridge, Busoni, Casella, Clapp, Converse, Copland, Corelli, Dohnanyi, Dukelsky, Eichheim, Fiedler, Fried, Gilbert, Glinka, Goetz, R. Goldmark, Goossens, Grétry, Grieg, Griffes, Hadley for repetition, last season wo repeated. They ing the list d last year numb

Of perhaps g introductions of posers who recei performance we Fiedler to the nu 17, Mr. Monteux 15; which last n increased by re seasons. Noted ler's introductio tock, Converse, Reger, Scriabin, list—Bloch, Bor Ravel, Schmitt, teux—Albeniz, B Falla, Goossens, Novelties of this uld hardly have been number seven, bring- wn to 20. Those of r seven also.

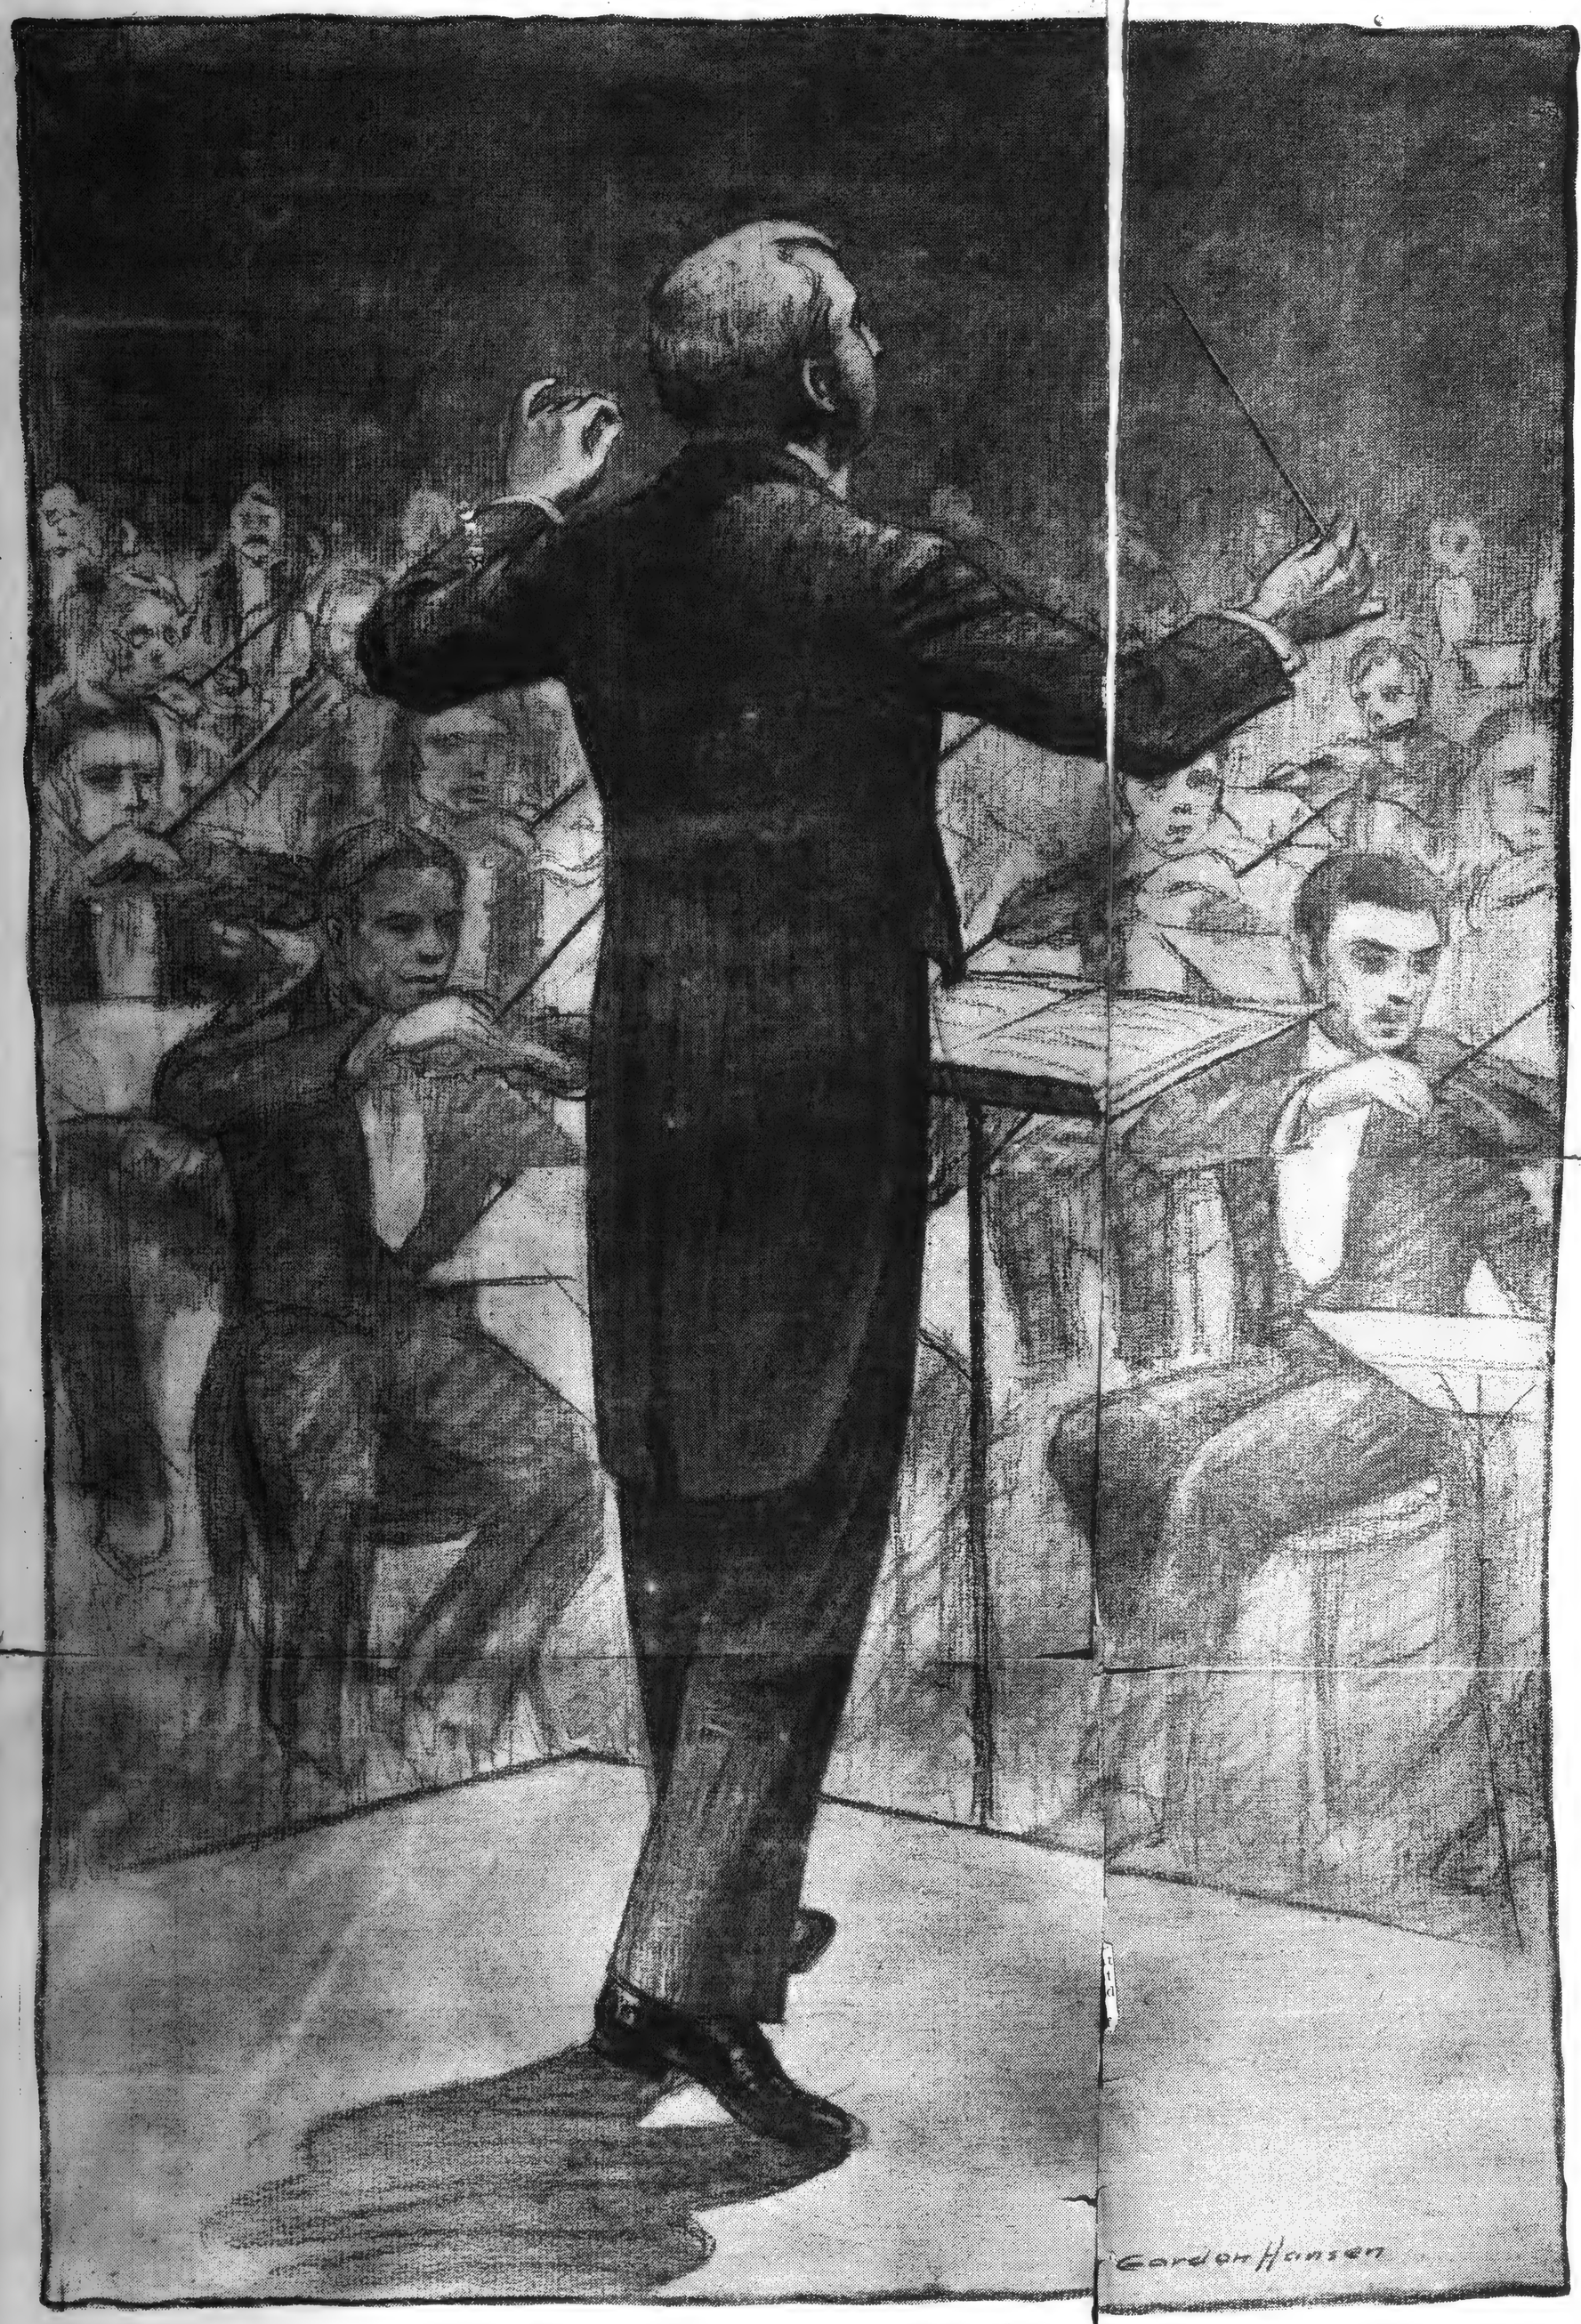
eater interest are the each conductor. Com- ved more than a single e introduced by Mr. mber of 22, by Dr. Muck 28, Mr. Koussevitzky umber will probably be petitions of succeeding names among Mr. Fied- s are Balakirev, Ban- Delius, Foote, Hadley, Sinding; in Dr. Muck's odin, Carpenter, Hill, Vivaldi; for Mr. Mon- ax, Bliss, Casella, De Griffes, Holst, Honeg- repetition of a certain list of "classics" but is giving the same kind of repetition to a few newer works. He has a tendency to give to a work (new and otherwise) an earlier repetition than the other conductors. Mr. Koussevitzky's novelties range wider, both in point of historical and geographical source than those of any other conductor. Mr. Monteux's list of introductions of notables is larger than that of the others. But as to the differences of the conductors in relation to the six categories above established, it is that of tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee.

No immutable laws have been established or broken by any one of the four. Single composers; single works have been added to the list while others have been allowed to drop out. It is the law of all life, naturally manifesting itself. Mr. Higginson's rule is the one immutable

"By Magic Numbers and Persuasive S ound"



Koussevitzky as Audiences Look upon Him

(Sketched at the Symphony Concerts by Gordon Hansen)

Sa e at Home, ne Lingering Glance Behind

Les Testy and More Kindly, John Ervine Recalls American Nights

BY the time this article appears I shall be again in England after a stay of seven months in New York, and it occurs to me that I must now sum up my impressions of the American theater. The critics in New York are all agreed that the season 1928-1929 was the worst in the recent history of their stage. An unusually interesting theatrical paper, Variety, which is more entertaining than any paper of its sort that we have, reports that 129 plays were produced in New York up to and including March 9, and that no fewer than ninety of them were total failures.

Variety's figures, of course, are based on financial returns, for it would be impossible to make a list of successes and failures of any value on any other basis. The failures, for instance, include "The Unknown Warrior," which was shockingly mishandled in New York —I shall have a few severe words to say to the people of London who, grasping at a larger advance on account of royalties, withdrew this piece from the Theater Guild and gave it to Mr. Charles Hopkins, with the result that the production was irretrievably ruined—and Mr. Somerset Maugham's "The Sacred Flame," both of which, on their merits, deserved to be successes. But, by and large, the substantial fact remains that only a third of the plays produced in New York in 1928-29 were financially successful. Any business or industry operating on terms so disastrous as those might fairly be regarded as dying. About twenty of the theaters in New York are "dark," and some of them have been "dark" for a considerable time. There can, then, be no doubt that the season has not paid its way.

An immense amount of money must have been lost in the New York theater since September, 1928. Yet I would not sign the statement of my New York colleagues that this has been a dreadful season. It may be less worthy than previous seasons, notably those of 1926-27 and 1927-28, but as I was not present in New York those seasons, I can say nothing of that, and I am not prepared to accept the word of the phrase-followers. They tell me that the season during which I was in New York was terrible, yet I know that such a season, had it been given at any time since 1918 in London, would have been considered a good one.

I lately made a list of plays that any intelligent person might patronise with pleasure in New York: It contained the names of eighteen, ranging from austere pieces down to musical comedies, and it might have been enlarged by the inclusion of other pieces which I happened not to have seen. I omitted from it a number of sensationally-successful pieces which I did not care about. In brief, the list could have been drawn up to include some thirty plays of all sorts that might be expected to give good entertainment to the majority of playgoers. That does not appear to me to be bad, and I wish with all my heart that it would be possible to do as much in London.

My first impression is that the New York theater is very vivacious. It is extraordinarily alive. That statement will astound some of my American readers who remember that I have asserted many times that it is on the point of death, but my mournful warnings refer only to its financial organization, and not to the quality of the plays produced in it or to the skill of the directors (whom we would call producers) or of the players. Given a better organization and managers of some taste and intelligence and education, the American theater might easily become the best theater in the world. All the elements of a successful theater are present in New York. There is an eager audience. Americans like the theater and want to go to it often. They do not treat it as a place to be visited only when all else fails, nor are they afraid of experiments, or reluctant to see plays that make some demand on their minds.

There are no Gallery Girls, thank God, in New York, or if there are, they have the sense to keep their mouths shut and their minds open. During the whole of the seven months that I have been in New York, I have only, on five occasions, heard an author called onto the stage, and three of the five authors were English, Mr. Lonsdale, Mr. Coward and Mr. Rob theater, is less demonstrative, on fir nights at all events, than the London audience. The legend that we are a cold people is a lie, so far as the theater is co erned. Compared with us, New Yorkers are glacial. They are, on the whole, m h better behaved in the theater than we are, although I have had to modify m opinion of their manners considerably.

ew York is fortunate in possessing a lar e number of first-class directors or pr ucers. Plays here are admirably put on he stage. Mr. George S. Kaufman, wh is himself a dramatist of distinction, Mr George Abbott, another clever dramat , Mr. Guthrie McClintic, Mr. Philip M ller, and Mr. Winchell Smith are br iant directors. Many dramatists in Ne York direct the production of their ow plays, for example, Mr. Sydney Howard, author of "They Knew What They Wanted" and "The Silver Cord," and Mr. Elmer Rice, whose play, "Street Scene," about which I did not care, is a hu success in New York. I am inclin to give some of the credit for this abu dance of good directors to Professor Geo e P. Baker, formerly of Harvard, and now of Yale.

When I visited the handsome theater, attached to Yale University, in which he instructs his students in the technique of the stage, I quickly realized that although he could never hope to teach anyone how to write a play, he could certainly teach the instructable in the business of stage-direction. Hundreds of young men and women have passed through his school and have acquired an intimate acquaintance with the apparatus of the stage. The result is that in every college in the United States there will presently be an accomplished technician teaching pupils how to produce a play. Some critics complain that down. Surely one would soon end the "D's" with Dukelsky. But wait, there was DeFalla first, and of course, Delius had a few performances. And the list lengthened to Delmas, Dittensdorf, Dohnanyi, Ducasse and Dukas before Dukelsky was reached, and then to finish the "D's" one had to add Duparc and Dvorák. Similarly the name of Gluck allowed its head to appear with naive hope that the end of the "G's" was near. But there followed Goetz, two Goldmarks, Goossens, Gounod, Graedener, Grayn, Grétry, Grieg, Griffes. The thought came that one was compiling a musical dictionary. And when the list was complete it contained composers, composerlets, eminent musicians not really composers, and friends of conductors to the number of 246, and compositions reaching the total of 963! Probably not many—even of the wisest—have imagined that there could have been heard so formidable a body of writers of music in twenty-four concerts a year for twenty years. Which is precisely why we have spoken of them under the above four classifications.

A second surprise was in store for the investigator when he counted the whole number of works performed for each composer during the twenty years. A good guess, an expert guess even, might pardonably have given the greatest total to Beethoven or Wagner. But such an expert would have been wrong, for the prize goes to none other than the cheerful Mozart with fifty works to his credit. The list of totals of works (where it has exceeded ten) should be of interest:

Mozart	50	Schubert	16
Beethoven	35	Chaikovsky	15
Wagner	28	Franck	15
J. S. Bach	25	Haydn	14
Strauss	25	Saint-Saëns	14
Debussy	19	Dvorák	12
Berlioz	18	Schumann	12
Liszt	18	Chadwick	11
Sibelius	18	D'Indy	10
Brahms	17	Respighi	10
Handel	16	Stravinsky	10

Most of us can learn at least two lessons from the size of the Mozartean list. For few of us realize, unless it is in some way brought to our attention, that Mozart was one of the world's most prolific composers. We often stand aghast at the six hundred and more of Schubert's songs, without comprehending that whenever we see K.550 or whatever the number may be, after a Mozart title, it means that the work in question is the five hundred and fiftieth work of Mozart in Köchel's catalogue, and that many of Mozart's works being in the three or four-movement cycle of symphonic or sonata form, the total of complete movements which Mozart wrote would knock Schubert's six hundred songs into a cocked hat.

The second lesson brings up a subject which will modify in a degree the above list. The preponderance of Mozart is not over half probably due to soloists' choice. Before Mr. Koussevitzky's reign, the number of soloists at Symphony Hall was legion. Many of them, of course, chose their own works. And of all composers, Mozart furnished the one happy hunting ground for these soloists. Thirty of the fifty compositions were played or sung by them, including the many "grand airs" from no less than eight operas and concertos of various kinds and descriptions to the number of eleven. If soloists' numbers were deducted from the above list its order would be somewhat as follows:

Beethoven	25	Liszt	14
Mozart	20	Haydn	13
Wagner	20	Brahms	12
J. S. Bach	19	Dvorák	12
Debussy	19	Chadwick	12
Sibelius	18	Handel	10
Berlioz	16	D'Indy	10
Strauss	16	Respighi	10
Franck	15	Stravinsky	10
Chaikovsky	14

It should be explained in connection with this table that where the work in question has been obviously a conductor's choice and the soloist chosen for the work, rather than the work more or less thrust upon a conductor by a soloist, it has not been deducted. The list represents orchestral works plus a few concertos judged to be chosen for their own sake. Of individual works The Mastersinger Overture came first with fifteen performances. For second place the following tie with eleven each: Beethoven's Fifth, Egmont, Leonore III, Brahms's Symphonies I, II and IV.

One may perhaps next ask, what is the distribution of these works among the four conductors, and what is the frequency of performance of each work? To answer the question fully would lead into too much detail for a newspaper article. It may be answered by certain classifications and summaries. The first classification is of composers who are repertory composers in the fullest sense. Not only have performances of their works been frequent, but among some of the conductors a regular routine of repetition was established. Certain of these works were almost sure to appear in alternate years, while another set of the same composer filled in the intervening years. The conductor who established such a routine most completely was Dr. Muck, followed by Mr. Fiedler, less by Mr. Monteux. Mr. Koussevitzky follows it practically not at all with the classics, but seems to be establishing it to a certain extent with a very few pieces of the newer composers. Near-modernism becoming routine! A second class would be of composers whose works are frequently played, but for whom there has never been established the honor (?) of a routine of repetition.

A third class is of composers who have had two or three performances of a reasonable number of works. A fourth as much as the composers are judged by the selections of the conductors.

Number of performances (excluding purely soloists) by:

Class I—	Fiedler	Muck	Monteux	Koussevitzky
Beethoven	29	26	23	25
Brahms	16	28	19	24
Chaikovsky	21	9	7	13
*Debussy	13	12	15	24
Dvorák	5	13	77	0
Franck	3	6	13	4
Liszt	10	17	14	5
Mozart	9	20	17	9
Schumann	10	10	9	6
Weber	8	9	3	5

*For certain of Debussy's works, as also for some of Scriabin and Musorgsky "Pictures" and for the K. P. E. Bach-Stamitz concerto, Mr. Koussevitzky has given performances in alternate years. And two of the Brahms symphonies have been played each for four consecutive years.
†Mr. Monteux followed no routine of repetition.

Class II—A.—Composers whom all conductors have played with consistency, but not with any great frequency. Dr. Muck, Mr. Monteux and Mr. Koussevitzky, but not at all by Mr. Fiedler.

D.—Bach has been performed by all four, but his orchestral works not with any great frequency until Mr. Koussevitzky.

Class III—Two or three performances for a reasonable number of works:

K. P. E. Bach				K
Balakirev	F	DrM	M
Bruckner	F	DrM		K
Charpentier		DrM	M
De Falla			M	K
Faure	F	DrM	M	K
Gluck	F	DrM		K
Liadov	F		M	K
Loeffler	F	DrM	M	K
V. Williams			M	K
Wolf	F	DrM		K

Class IV.—(One or two works receiving more than one performance.)

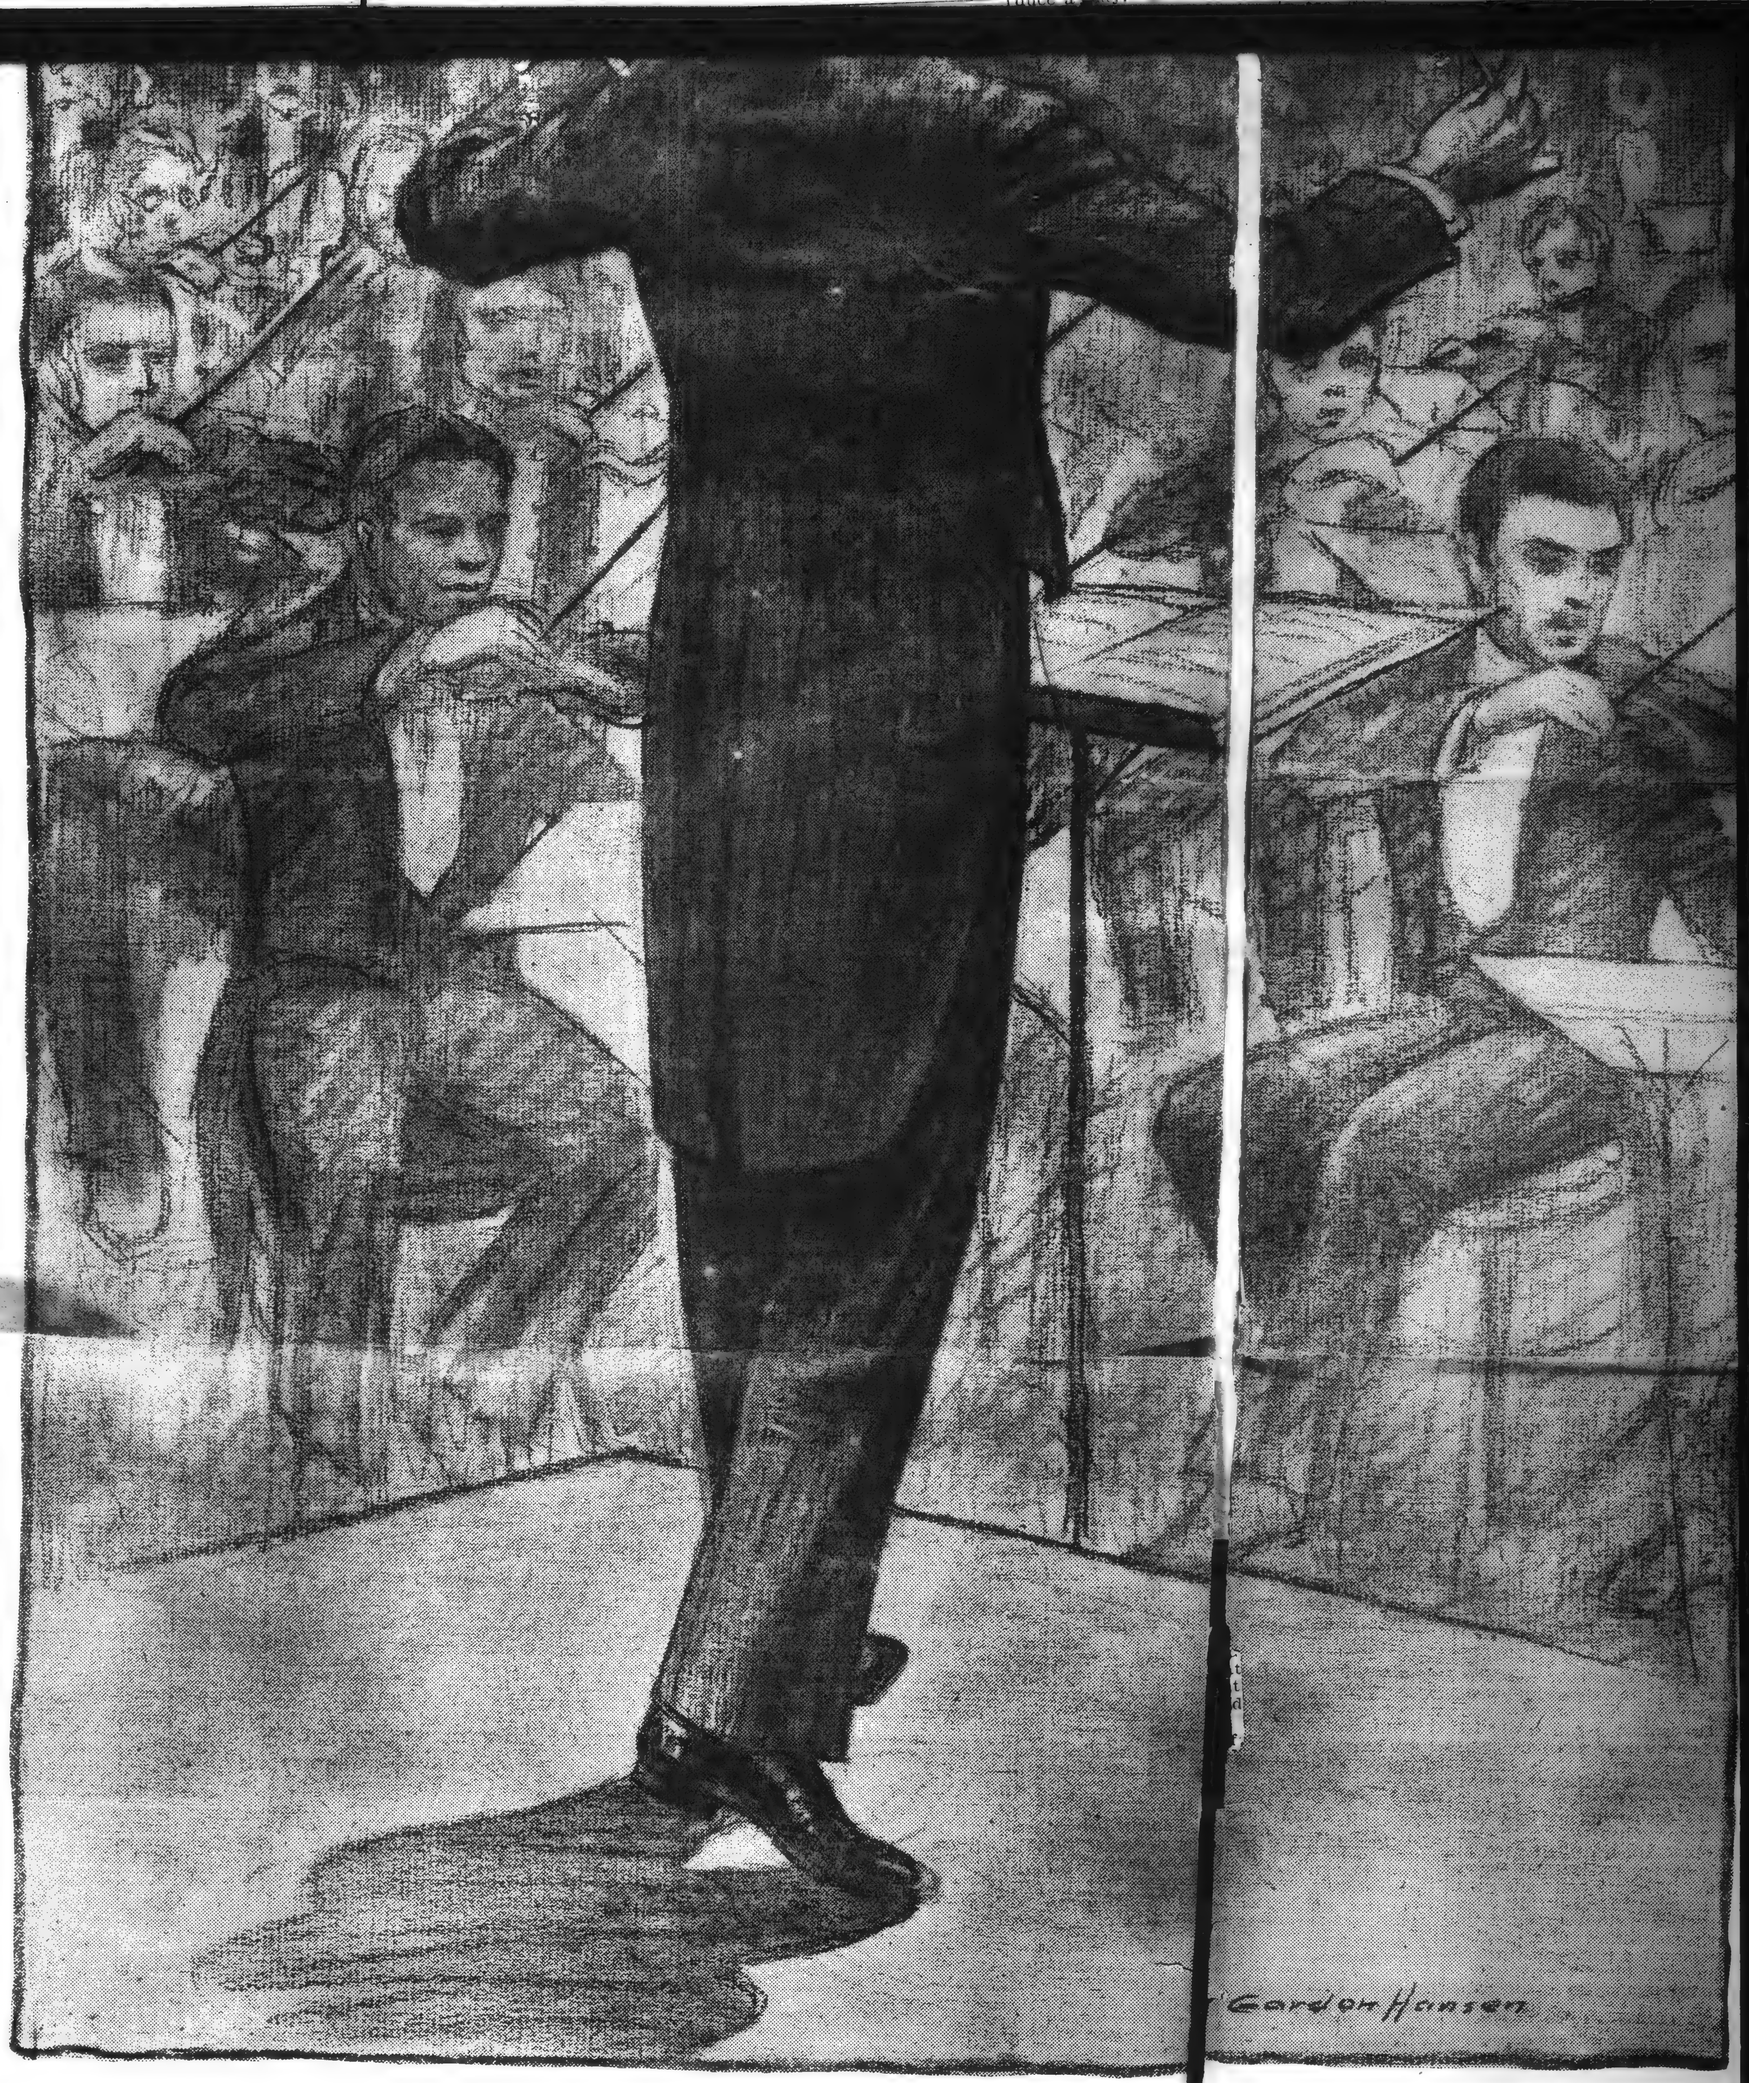
This class includes the following composers, with Mr. Fiedler playing 13 of the composers, Dr. Muck 22, Holst, Ibert, Kelley, Lazar, Lekeu, Malipiero, Martinu, Massenet, Mason (D. G.), Mason (Stuart), Milhaud, Noren, Paderewski, Reger, Rossini, Roussel, Scarlatti, Schelling, Schillings, Sinding, Svendsen, Tailleferre, Tansman, Turina, Walton, Weingartner.

Of these for Mr. Fiedler 16, Muck 18, Monteux 27, Koussevitzky 27.

Class VI.—Of composers represented by only a single performance of a single work, it will serve no conceivable purpose to list the names. Each of the conductors has a considerable number of them charged against him:

Fiedler	13	Monteux	24
Muck	18	Koussevitzky	27

Of Mr. Koussevitzky's list, however, it must be said that many have been so recent as to afford no time



Koussevitzky as Audiences Look upon Him

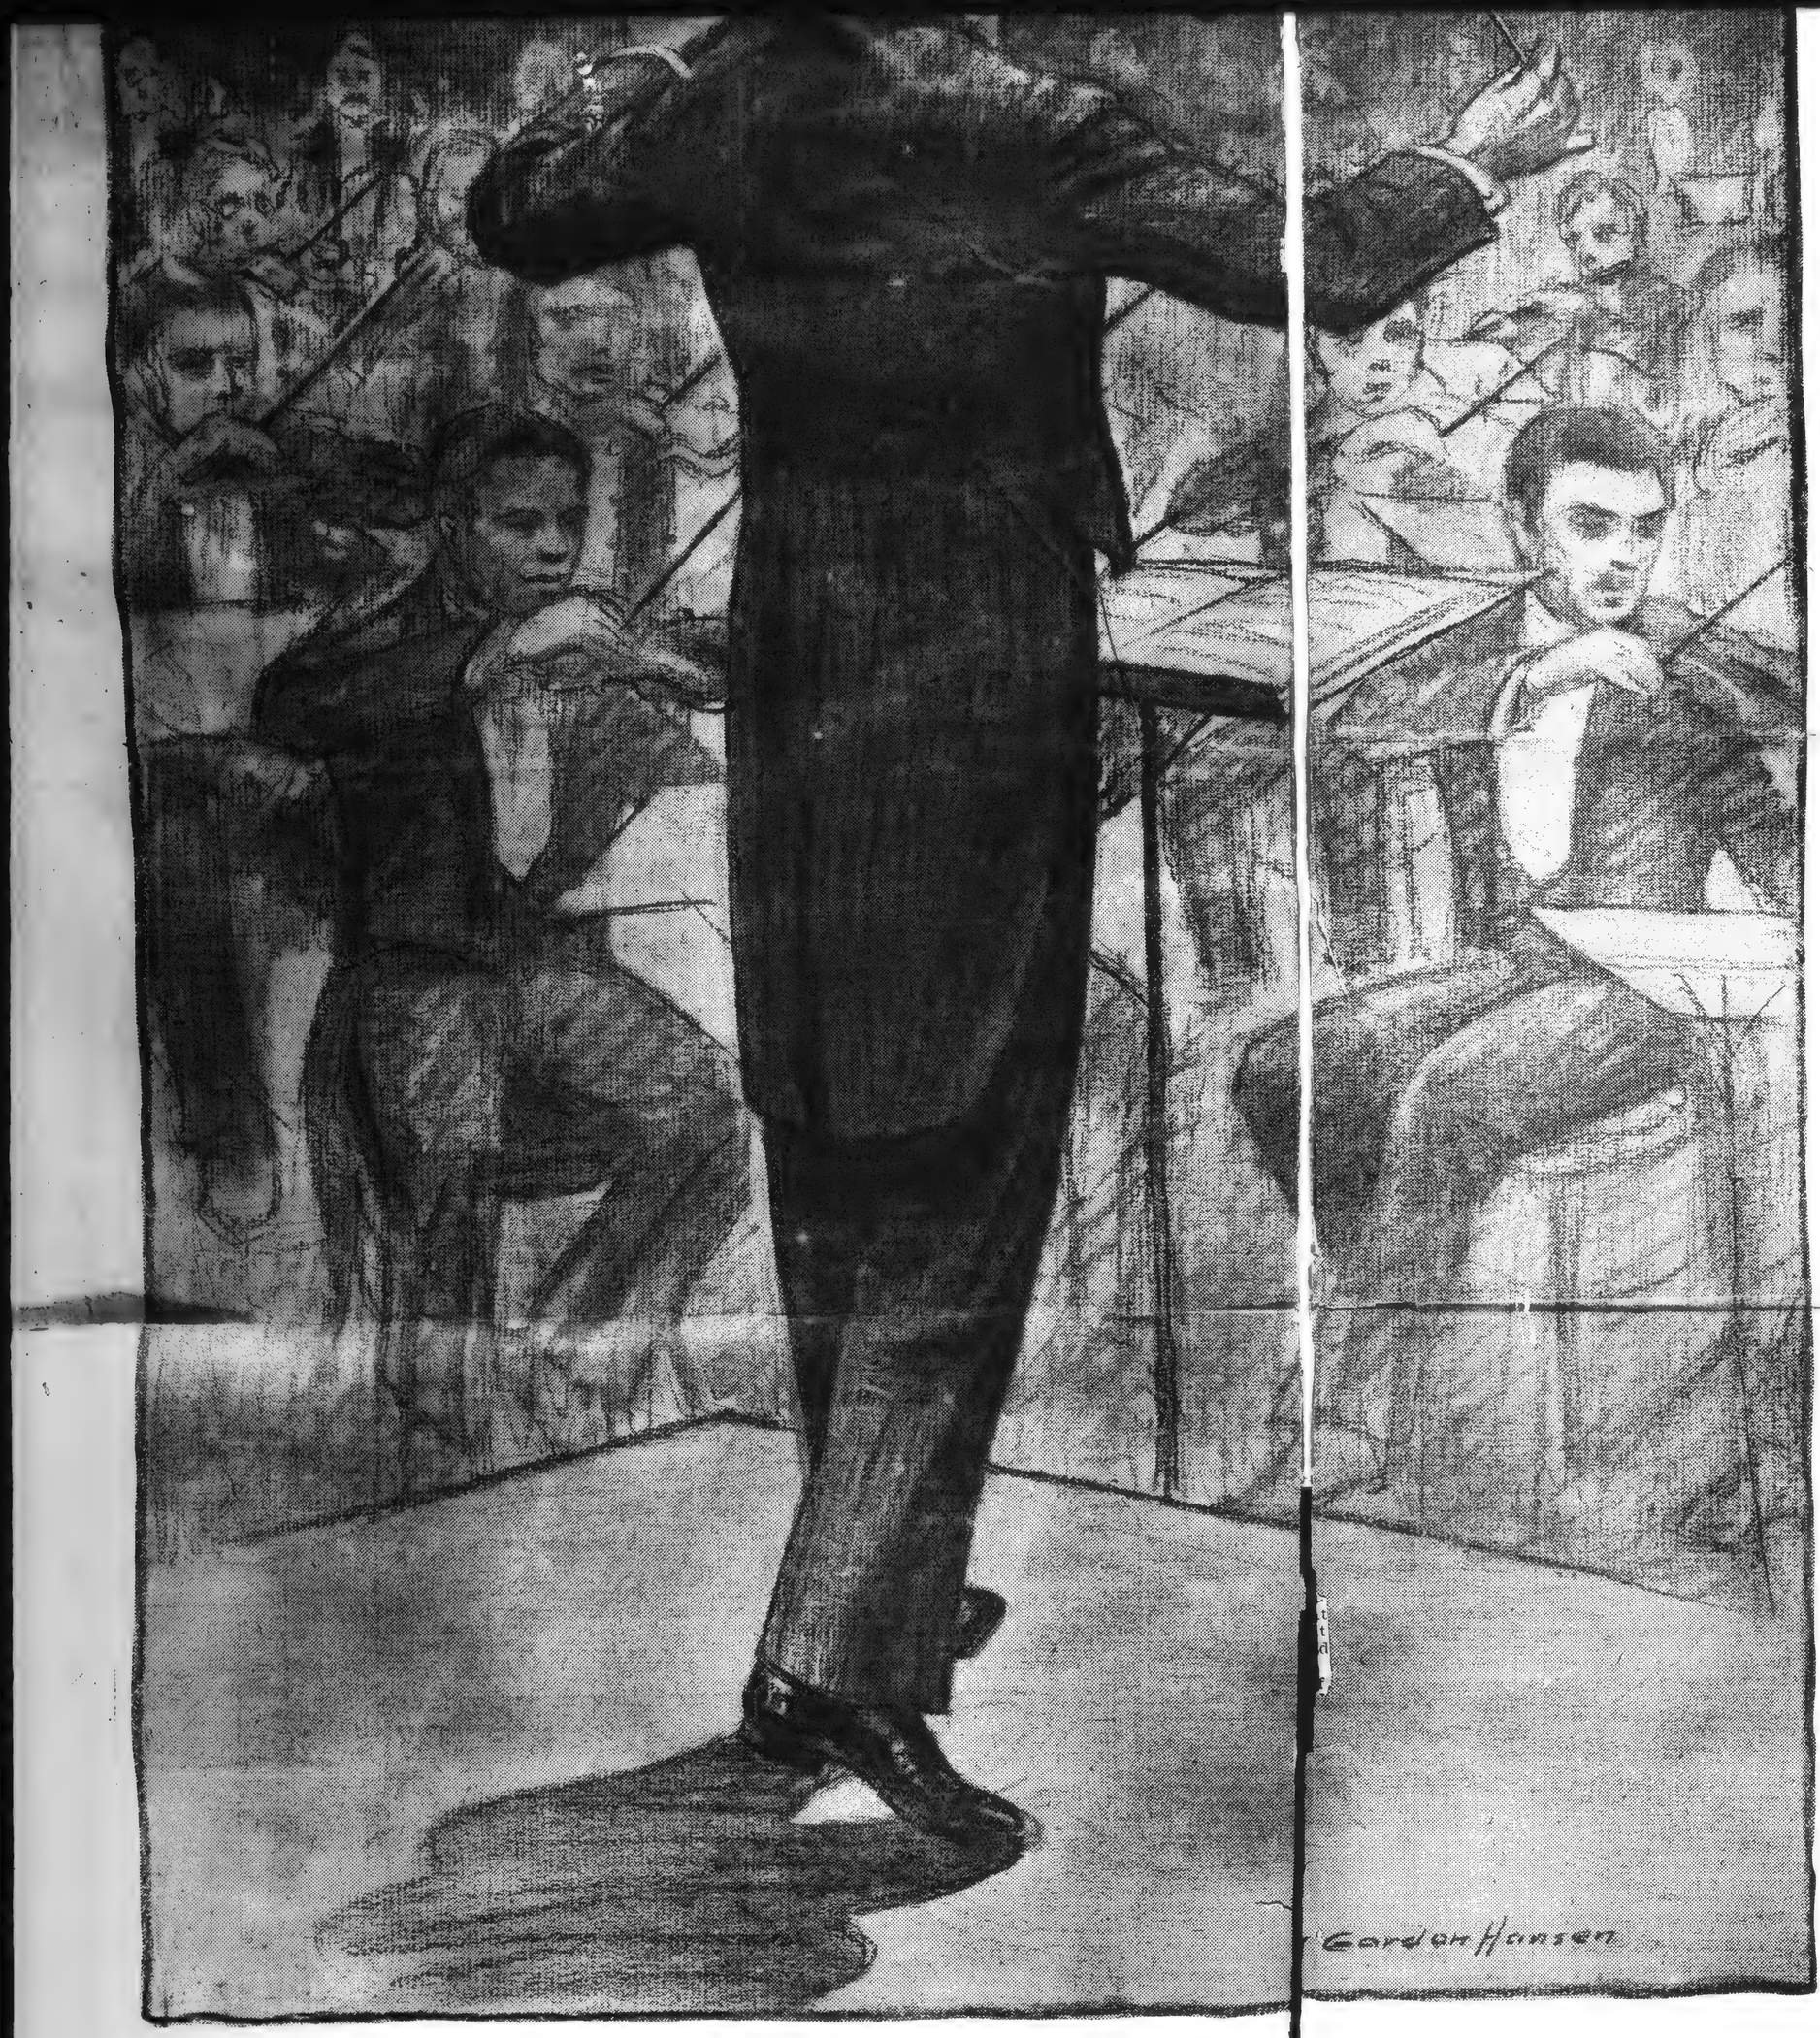
(Sketched at the Symphony Concerts by Gordon Hansen)

ger, Milhaud, Respighi, Rou liams. It is p a similar list mention must tion of the an relli, Glinka, formance of J whose previous t. And probably no one means frequen the selection of the names would object to Hindemith and Satie as of Bartok and One is inclined to include being notable. Copland on the list. the American s of the above tables and On the basi the basis of the master- lists, and on ich they were derived (too table from wh newspaper use) it is diffi- unwieldy for e at any marked distinc- cult to arriv the four conductors. Mr. tions between gave up even more than Koussevitzky eux the systematic routined had Mr. Mont

Musorgsky, Prokofiev, ssel, Schoenberg, V. Wil- robably too early to select for Mr. Koussevitzky, but be made of his introduc- cients, K. P. E. Bach, Co- Scarlatti, of frequent per- . S. Bach and of Vivaldi, performances were by no one of the orchestra: that no shall ever be interfered with in be it in discipline or in program As long as neither radicals nor tives are allowed to assail that future of the orchestra is saf were to crumble the matter serious. Upon no other can organization develop or even m endure.

One other matter one deduces tables. There have been and t neglected composers. Notable composers, the Viennese sym (Bruckner and Mahler) rate n than Class III in the above class and obtain entrance there by margin. And the distinguished Pizetti, appears not at all. Mr. vitzky has started to make amen power to him in his further pla

A.



Koussevitzky as Audiences Look upon Him

(Sketched at the Symphony Concerts by Gordon Hansen) much as the composers are judged by e selections of the conductors.

Number of performances (excluding purely oloists) by:

Class I—	Fiedler	Muck	Mon-teux	Kousse-vitzky
Beethoven	29	26	23	25
Brahms	16	28	19	24
Chaikovsky	21	9	7	13
*Debussy	13	12	15	24
Dvořák	5	13	17	0
Franck	3	6	13	4
Liszt	10	17	14	5
Mozart	9	20	17	9
Schumann	10	10	9	6
Weber	8	9	3	5

*For certain of Debussy's works, as also or some of Scriabin and Musorgsky 'Pictures" and for the K. P. E. Bach-Stamitz concerto, Mr. Koussevitzky has iven performances in alternate years. And two of the Brahms symphonies have been played each for four consecutive years. †Mr. Monteux followed no routine of epetition.

Class II—A.—Composers whom all conductors have played with con- Dr. Muck, Mr. Monteux and Mr. Koussevitzky, but not at all by Mr. Fiedler.

D.—Bach has been performed by all four, but his orchestral works not with any great frequency until Mr. Koussevitzky.

Class III—Two or three performances for a reasonable number of works:

K. P. E. Bach.....				K
Balakirev	F	DrM	M
Bruckner	F	DrM		K
Charpentier		DrM	M
De Falla			M	K
Faure	F	DrM	M	K
Gluck	F	DrM		K
Liadov	F		M	K
Loeffler	F	DrM	M	K
V. Williams			M	K
Wolf	F	DrM		K

Class IV.—(One or two works receiving more than one performance.)

This class includes the following composers, with Mr. Fiedler playing 13 of the composers, Dr. Muck 22, Holst, Ibert, Kelley, Lazar, Lekeu, Malipiero, Martinu, Massenet, Mason (D. G.), Mason (Stuart), Milhaud, Noren, Paderewski, Reger, Rossini, Roussel, Scarlatti, Schelling, Schillings, Sinding, Svendsen, Tailleferre, Tansman, Turina, Walton, Weingartner.

Of these for Mr. Fiedler 16, Muck 18, Monteux 27, Koussevitzky 27.

Class VI.—Of composers represented by only a single performance of a single work, it will serve no conceivable purpose to list the names. Each of the conductors has a considerable number of them charged against him:

Fiedler	13	Monteux	24
Muck	18	Koussevitzky ...	27

Of Mr. Koussevitzky's list, however, it must be said that many have been so recent as to afford no time ger, Milhaud, Respighi, Rou liams. It is p a similar list mention must tion of the an relli, Glinka, formance of J whose previous means frequer would object to of Bartok and being notable. the American

On the basi lists, and on table from wh unwieldy for cult to arriv tions between Koussevitzky had Mr. Monte Musorgsky, Prokofiev, ssel, Schoenberg, V. Wi robably too early to select for Mr. Koussevitzky, but be made of his introduc cients, K. P. E. Bach, Co Scarlatti, of frequent per S. Bach and of Vivaldi, s performances were by no t. And probably no one the selection of the names Hindemith and Satie as One is inclined to include Copland on the list.

s of the above tables and the basis of the master ich they were derived (too newspaper use) it is diffi at any marked distinc the four conductors. Mr. gave up even more than ux the systematic routined one of the orchestra: that no conductor shall ever be interfered with in any way, be it in discipline or in program-making. As long as neither radicals nor conservatives are allowed to assail that law the future of the orchestra is safe. If it were to crumble the matter would be serious. Upon no other can a living organization develop or even manage to endure.

One other matter one deduces from the tables. There have been and there are neglected composers. Notable English composers, the Viennese symphonists (Bruckner and Mahler) rate no higher than Class III in the above classification, and obtain entrance there by a scant margin. And the distinguished Italian, Pizetti, appears not at all. Mr. Koussevitzky has started to make amends. All power to him in his further planning.

A. H. M.

operating on terms so disastrous as those might fairly be regarded as dying. About twenty of the theaters in New York are "dark," and some of them have been "dark" for a considerable time. There can, then, be no doubt that the season has not paid its way.

An immense amount of money must have been lost in the New York theater since September, 1928. Yet I would not sign the statement of my New York colleagues that this has been a dreadful season. It may be less worthy than previous seasons, notably those of 1926-27 and 1927-28, but as I was not present in New York those seasons, I can say nothing of that, and I am not prepared to accept the word of the phrase-followers. They tell me that the season during which I was in New York was terrible, yet I know that such a season, had it been given at any time since 1918 in London, would have been considered a good one.

I lately made a list of plays that any intelligent person might patronise with pleasure in New York: It contained the names of eighteen, ranging from austere pieces down to musical comedies, and it might have been enlarged by the inclusion of other pieces which I happened not to have seen. I omitted from it a number of sensationally-successful pieces which I did not care about. In brief, the list could have been drawn up to include some thirty plays of all sorts that might be expected to give good entertainment to the majority of playgoers. That does not appear to me to be bad, and I wish with all my heart that it would be possible to do as much in London.

My first impression is that the New York theater is very vivacious. It is extraordinarily alive. That statement will astound some of my American readers who remember that I have asserted many times that it is on the point of death, but my mournful warnings refer only to its financial organization, and not to the quality of the plays produced in it or to the skill of the directors (whom we would call producers) or of the players. Given a better organization and managers of some taste and intelligence and education, the American theater might easily become the best theater in the world. All the elements of a successful theater are present in New York. There is an eager audience. Americans like the theater and want to go to it often. They do not treat it as a place to be visited only when all else fails, nor are they afraid of experiments, or reluctant to see plays that make some demand on their minds.

There are no Gallery Girls, thank God, in New York, or if there are, they have the sense to keep their mouths shut and their minds open. During the whole of the seven months that I have been in New York, I have only, on five occasions, heard an author called onto the stage, and three of the five authors were English, Mr. Lonsdale, Mr. Coward, and Mr. Robert Nicholls. The New York audience, although it is more eager to visit the theater, is less demonstrative, on first nights at all events, than the London audience. The legend that we are a cold people is a lie, so far as the theater is concerned. Compared with us, New Yorkers are glacial. They are, on the whole, much better behaved in the theater than we are, although I have had to modify my opinion of their manners considerably.

New York is fortunate in possessing a large number of first-class directors or producers. Plays here are admirably put on the stage. Mr. George S. Kaufman, who is himself a dramatist of distinction, Mr. George Abbott, another clever dramatist, Mr. Guthrie McClintic, Mr. Philip Moeller, and Mr. Winchell Smith are brilliant directors. Many dramatists in New York direct the production of their own plays, for example, Mr. Sydney Howard, author of "They Knew What They Wanted" and "The Silver Cord," and Mr. Elmer Rice, whose play, "Street Scene," about which I did not care, is a huge success in New York. I am inclined to give some of the credit for this abundance of good directors to Professor George P. Baker, formerly of Harvard, and now of Yale.

When I visited the handsome theater, attached to Yale University, in which he instructs his students in the technique of the stage, I quickly realized that although he could never hope to teach anyone how to write a play, he could certainly teach the instructable in the business of stage-direction. Hundreds of young men and women have passed through his school and have acquired an intimate acquaintance with the apparatus of the stage. The result is that in every college in the United States there will presently be an accomplished technician teaching pupils how to produce a play. Some critics complain that Professor Baker's theater is too good, that his students are trained with an apparatus superior to any that they are likely to use outside a Broadway theater; but I doubt if there is much in this complaint. The Yale theater certainly is a handsome one, finely equipped, and able to seat very comfortably 750 persons.

The New York theater is well-staffed with accomplished actresses. In musical comedy there is a remarkable number of clever girls, who can act and sing and dance and are beautiful. American actresses, generally speaking, are better than English actresses, and much better than American actors; but English actors, especially in drawing-room comedy, are, generally speaking, superior to American actors who, however, are superb in character-work. I have seen more good character-acting in New York in this season than I have seen in Lon-

Continued on Page Sixteen

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Koussevitzky, Torrid Music Leader, Works Himself Harder Than His Men

But Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Willing to Work Musicians Until They Drop in Their Tracks---Here Are Some Interesting Facts About Hub's Least Known Great Man

With the close last night of the symphony season in Boston the star of Serge Koussevitzky, one of the brightest planets in the musical firmament, will fade from the local universe of concerts for several months.

Who is Koussevitzky?

The name, of course, is known throughout the world as that of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But little is known of the man Koussevitzky.

Here are some inside facts. Here are the tales which Koussevitzky's closest companions tell—he has no bosom friends—here is the story of the least-known great man in Boston:

BY ROBERT LANING

A momentous situation occurred at Symphony Hall.

The cause of it came as Serge Koussevitzky, the great conductor, was making his entrance before a Symphony audience.

As he moved toward the conductor's stand, he caught a whisper—but not its meaning—from the ranks of the musicians. Then came quick and louder whispers, half-voiced warnings. And down from his pre-concert abstraction he tumbled with the realization that he was being informed that the collar of his dress suit was standing out wryly at the back of his neck. There was the devil to pay.

Now, this was a more serious mishap than appears on the surface.

Koussevitzky begins a concert with plans prepared in infinite detail—to such a degree, in fact, that he counts his entrance upon the stage as the real start of the concert. Accordingly, he bestows consummate care on a wealth of detail concerned in his entrance. And the incident mentioned had spoiled his entrance. —or at least an important detail of his entrance.

There is really something magic about Koussevitzky's dress suit.

From Boston to Detroit, that garment goes down in the public's memory along with the brilliant feats of interpretation displayed by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Koussevitzky's dress suit has been described as the perfection of tailoring. It is that, but the phrase is a mere nothing compared with the actual object. The suit and Koussevitzky are one entity. One finds oneself wondering whether its removal causes him the pangs of being skinned alive. The remarkable thing is, that along with the snugness of the suit, it never works against him. It neither pinions him nor leaves his forearms naked when he branishes his baton.

Valet Gives Final Inspection

The actual start of a concert at Boston Symphony Hall, as Koussevitzky minutely arranges it, is just before he steps upon the stage. It begins with the movement of the door. The door opens, and nothing follows for a moment. There is artistry in that little pause. It puts an edge on expectation. And enables Koussevitzky's valet to insure that his employer's dress suit is all to rights.

Then Koussevitzky crosses the threshold, and proceeds from the rear to the front of the stage with small, remarkably smooth-actioned paces. His dress suit sets him forth as small, and of well-proportioned, compact figure, slightly round-shouldered. His face has broad, slightly prominent cheek bones, with a moderate tendency toward fleshiness, as has his neck. To thunderous applause he responds with a more polite awareness. This he signalizes at first with a smile which avoids demonstrativeness, and a slight inclination of the head.

Then as he makes the turn necessary to take him to the conductor's stand, he gets in a most artistic bit of platform technique. Precisely in the act of turning to his right, he swings into a bow to the audience on his left, and keeps on going. It is a master stroke.

For by walking in one direction and bowing in the other, he automatically prevents himself from bowing too low, and provides an explanation. His air is of a mingled courtliness and reserve. He walks with a singular grace—perhaps the most graceful masculine walk ever seen on those boards. He reaches the conductor's stand without a step to spare or to gain, plants his left foot on it and hops up with his right with the suddenness of a jumping-jack.

Apparently Koussevitzky knows exactly how many steps he has to take from the door to the conductor's stand, and always takes exactly the same number. And he always bows at exactly the same number of paces from his entrance—beginning with his turning of the corner.

If one is incredulous that Koussevitzky's preconceived entrance effects have a legitimate place in a symphony programme, it is only fair to ask whether a concert gains by what is done or not done when his contemporaries make their entrances.

One leader will make his appearance with a rush and a smirk, as if he had just come through a paper hoop, and was sure he was going to be tumultuously applauded.

One will appear with all the solemnity of a municipal statue of a very distinguished personage, and appear to be conferring a privilege on his audience by permitting it to gaze on him.

Another will affect a super-modesty. The scheme is that, when he gets at the orchestra, he expects to knock the audience off their seats by daring effects one would not look for in such a shy little fellow.

Another will drag himself across the stage with equal clumsiness and apparent pain, as if the planking between himself and the conductor's stand were filled with soft asphalt and unexploded grenades.

Swimming Off Stage

Even the closest partisans of Monteux, Koussevitzky's immediate predecessor, will admit that while Monteux was a most artistic musician, he wounded certain artistic sensibilities of his audience by progressing to and from the conductor's stand as if swimming on and off the stage in his dress suit.

Muck wore his suit like a German army officer who knew how to do it, but didn't believe in being mistaken for a civilian.

Sir Thomas Beecham, as guest conductor, looked as if his suit had been shrunk on by exposure to a rain storm—with resulting advantages of fitting around the shoulders, but a shortage of covering at the wrists and ankles. His cuffs became extremely prominent, and one expected to see the tips of his garters at any moment.

Henry Gilbert, the late genius among American composers, told the writer during the intermission of a Boston Symphony concert led by Beecham, that that occasion gave support to his long contention that a symphony conductor—and his orchestra too—should be concealed from the view of the audience, as is the rule for Wagner opera at Bayreuth.

It is difficult to imagine what would happen if Mr. Gilbert's idea should be carried out, and Koussevitzky and his players whisked from sight.

The fame of the Metropolitan Opera as the "big show" in the world of music rests upon prodigality heaped on prodigality—a great array of singers of the first magnitude, a notable chorus and orchestra, brilliant conductors, splendors of scenery and costume.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, on the other hand, achieved some of the most extraordinarily spectacular effects possible in music with far fewer resources than the Metropolitan uses—first, Koussevitzky; second, his orchestra of 105 players.

Works Face Like Billy Sunday

Koussevitzky has made a visible art of symphonic music. Other "primadonna conductors" have posed for the satisfaction of their audiences' eyes, but he alone has achieved a thorough-going art of conducting-dramatics. To a careless, derisory onlooker, it might appear that Koussevitzy's arm movements vary between those of an Italian opera actor of the upper ranks and those of a Russian ballet dancer. It might seem that he bends his body forward, and stretches it up, like an American college cheer leader. It might be alleged that he works his face like Billy Sunday, in pleading with his orchestra. But an analytical mind will find something much finer than this in his technique.

Stop the music of a symphony, then let Koussevitzky go through the gestures, bodily attitudes and facial pantomime which he would use with that music—and through your eyes Koussevitzky would conjure up the symphony. He visualizes for his audiences—and with a high order of art—the structure, development and emotional content of an orchestral composition.

Rehearses Rehearsals

A striking detail of Koussevitzky's methods is that he has often rehearsed all his gestures before going to an orchestra rehearsal. With a very fine pianist "facilitating" the score, he has worked on his conducting in his own home.

In actual performance, to such an extent does Koussevitzky really experience within himself the music which he conducts, that the end of a concert finds him utterly exhausted mentally as well as physically. He could not keep on and cling to life and reason unless he took his now famous mid-winter vacation from the conductor's stand. This on the authority of two men eminent in Boston, one as a musician, one as a physician.

But however interesting the Koussevitzkian technique may be as an art in itself, supposedly an orchestral leader may be depended upon by his players to give them signals which lead them. A curious fact is, that Koussevitzky's men from time to time are unable so to depend upon him.

There have been times when Koussevitzky apparently has floated away on a cloud of poetic ecstacy, making his gestures beautifully—but of no avail to his musicians, through losing his place in the score for a page or two. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, on such occasions, has done its own leading, and done it brilliantly.

Truth to tell, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has often been a great teacher of Koussevitzky.

When the orchestra trustees decided to appoint him, he had won a spectacular fame in Paris, which was strongly reflected in London, Edinburgh and Madrid, where he had led concerts. But when he took up his duties in Boston, never before had he led an orchestra of such quality and ability (some of his "bands" having been only miscellaneous musicians temporarily associated and dispersing after his concerts).

Amazing Orchestra

It would not be unreasonable to state that the Boston Symphony Orchestra taught Koussevitzky a world of things he did not know when he first assumed charge. What he learned from it, combined with his own genius and his will to be continually progressing, has made him, after five years, a great conductor—whereas he was in large degree only a spectacular personality when he began.

Since his first concert, more people than ever before have yearly attended the programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, both at home and on tour. Now, for the fifth year, there have been waiting lists for subscribers to the regular series of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts. Additional series have been conducted on Tuesday afternoons and Monday evenings. The explanation is jointly Koussevitzky and his amazing orchestra.

Here is an interesting cartoon of Serge Koussevitzky the great composer-conductor. This cartoon is from the Glasgow Evening News, Scotland.

When Koussevitzky first exerted his authority over the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there were reservations of esteem on both sides. In an organization of such size—more than a hundred players—with many travelling about Europe in the summer, it was natural that a certain number had heard of Koussevitzky, and that some had heard concerts conducted by him. But there was nothing in what was known of him to cause the orchestra to receive him as a particularly great conductor. Koussevitzky, on the other hand, never from the first permitted the orchestra to feel that he knew it to be in a class by itself, and that it was far and away the greatest orchestra over which he had ever wielded the baton.

The very experienced, very distinguished, very brilliant Dr. Karl Muck (Doctor of Philosophy) had no compunctions at all in proclaiming what he thought of the orchestra as he found it. Before his first Boston audience, in 1906, looking him over with some little awe by reason of the advance notice of his greatness, Dr. Muck suddenly stopped conducting a Beethoven symphony. Laying down his baton, and folding his arms, he let the orchestra play on undirected. A magnificent compliment!

When Koussevitzky conducted his first Boston programme, he made it apparent that not one scrape or toot began, swelled, or diminished in the entire course of the concert except by his ever-present superfine mathematical dictation.

Was It an Initiation?

In Koussevitzky's very first rehearsal with the Boston organization, he put over a curious stroke. Possibly it was intended to score a victory of psychology.

He had the men rehearse Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

In its time that represented the ultimate achievement in music. Possibly the Russian felt that to begin with the ultimate would impress his men in the quickest and most indelible fashion with his true tastes and abilities. At any rate, the number was not to be played on the first programme. Koussevitzky started the players, then stopped them almost as soon as they had begun, criticising the first measure. After completing the third or fourth measure, he halted them again, and continued to interrupt and repeat the first three or four measures for perhaps a quarter of an hour. For two days he rehearsed the orchestra in Beethoven's Ninth—this number which was not on the opening programme.

To this day the orchestra is not impressed by that curious acquaintance manoeuver of Koussevitzky. It undoubtedly does remember it, however.

Some of the players took the "futuristic" pieces, which thenceforth peppered them, with pain, others with amusement. Likewise, some were pained, others amused, by the Russian's initial rehearsals with certain of accepted classics, old and new. Some had it that his modern pieces were a bid for easy fame, and a smoke screen for his shortcomings.

Of a Monday, he took up a standard classic.

"He'll learn it by Wednesday," someone murmured, and it stuck as a catch-phrase.

Koussevitzy, on his part, flung little barbs at the orchestra — this rather to the exclusion of compliments. The men responded with another catch-phrase. Suppose at rehearsal a moment of supreme beauty developed. It became the thing to unite in saying "Rotten!" under the breath.

It is true that the players found strangeness, confusion and a lack of appeal in the modernist compositions

A French cartoonist's impression of Serge Koussevitzky. The movements of this famous Russian director while conducting are reported to be altogether different from anything Boston has ever seen.

Koussevitzky introduced them to. But in technical ability they were equal to such material.

When it came to works of the accepted composers, the orchestra, with traditions of the conducting of Muck, Gericke, Nikisch and Pauer, took the Russian with many grains of salt. In fact, outside of a limited circle of classics, Koussevitzky seemed to them something of a four-flusher in various respects—feeling his way through compositions they knew like a book, and merely acting the role of a conductor, who knew what he wanted when he wanted it.

But once committed to exploring effects of tone and tempo for any composition, old or new, familiar or unfamiliar to him, the Russian would work himself and his men both off their feet impartially until he found what he wanted.

No industrial organization would stand up to the physical and nervous wear and tear to which Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky submits the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Unsparing to Own Appointees

The man is absolutely unsparing of himself and his men whether in rehearsal or performance. He hurls himself into his music with terrific intensity, whether a piece be placid or tempestuous. Every ounce of muscular and nervous energy in his body is brought into play when he conducts, and he exacts as much of that response as possible from his men. He rehearses them on an average of three hours with a very slight intermission. On occasion this is stretched out to another hour. The main index of the closing time of a rehearsal is the point at which both Koussevitzky and his men are utterly worn out.

Some of the veterans in the orchestra found themselves temperamentally disinclined to subject themselves to such treatment. Others, at least for reason of policy, were willing to attempt it, but buckled under the burden. And as these wheels in the mechanism collapsed they were replaced by new and more durable ones by the relentless engineer Koussevitzky—much as if his orchestra were to him a musical "Pacific 231" to be maintained at the highest mechanical efficiency.

A conductor is the almost uncurbed Czar of a symphony orchestra, but to make a sure thing surer he is able to surround himself with a collection of smaller Czars—the "first desks," or leaders of the separate instrumental sections of the orchestra.

At the beginning of his second season, Koussevitzky returned from Europe with a large number of new first desk men, to say nothing of new players for the rank and file of different sections. In part this was his answer to the fact that certain die-hards were still unpersuaded that he was in all respects their fit and proper chief. But there was more to it than that.

Some were unkind enough to suppose that he was determined either to conquer his players or wear them out and discard them. In this connection, it was supposed that he would be more lenient with his own appointees at the first desks. Not only were they his own choice, but they represented the payment of a sort of personal "war debt" of his to France.

It was France which had given him the acclaim which began his real renown as an orchestra leader and ended by putting him at the head of the Boston Symphony. The majority of his first desks were French, one a Swiss. They were not in all cases the world's best-qualified men to take the first desks handed over to them. But as sure as they showed any wavering, Koussevitzky showed them no more quarter than anyone else. One frankly admitted he could not carry the burden, and asked his chief to demote him —which he did. An interesting fact about the Russian's mind is, that he likes to play chess, and is drawn to good musicians who are also good chess players.

To Koussevitzky a symphonic performance seems to be stale and flat if the players are not "nerved up to it." His players sit on the edges of their chairs as if they were electric chairs, and as if the sitters expected the deadly current to burst through them at any moment. A most decided contrast to this was a performance of a Mozart concerto, for which Alfred Cassella was guest conductor, and Walter Gieseking the piano soloist. The music came with a sparkle—and an ease—which must have made the performance unforgettable to anyone who heard it. The men in the orchestra were carried into raptures of delight over the whole effect. Their faces wore beatific smiles during the whole number, whether they or the pianist was playing.

Koussevitzky was present at this concert, "out front." The next time he rehearsed his men he told them that. And he told them that their playing was sloppy at that concert.

"With Heart, Soul Always"

Apparently the Koussevitzkian precepts of unmercifulness in rehearsal and intensity in performance work a spell in the music which exerts a most potent fascination over the hearer. (One can close one's eyes to Koussevitzky's pantomime, and still be electrified by the effects.)

Koussevitzky displays superb showmanship in his programmes. He so arranges them as to keep his hearers abreast of the latest developments in music—whether the developments be of perminent value or no; to bring to their attention delightful tidbits and quaint curiosities from the past; and to enable them to pay deference to the accepted classics. In the course of arranging such contrasts of kind, he also provides for contrasts of musical effect and skill of execution—ranging in interesting succession the delicate, the rugged, the loud, the soft, formal, the formless, the simple, the complex.

As matters now stand, Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra seem to be able to achieve all that may be achieved in the rendition of orchestral music.

And in the midst of all his tremendous driving, and seeming quest of machine endurance and mathematical precision, Koussevitzky never fails to beg his men to play "with the heart, with the soul, always."

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Music Notes and Comment

This week marks the end of the Boston musical season. Roland Hayes' recital this afternoon is the last of the Symphony Hall Sunday concerts. The Apollo Club and the Bach Cantata Club end their series this week. There are as usual a certain number of musical events scheduled for May, however, aside from the Pops, which, under Casella, have attained a level of musical excellence far higher than ever before. The fortnightly Sunday Pops, in particular, are in all save the name Symphony concerts.

[illegible] is to conduct the [illegible] Club in a program of choral pieces. For the first time in many seasons there is no visiting soloist.

The Bach Cantata Club, continuing its policy of singing interesting and seldom heard choral pieces, will give its postponed second concert at Emmanuel Church Thursday night. Single tickets may be obtained at the door.

The Boston Civic Symphony Orchestra will give another Jordan Hall concert Sunday afternoon, May 12, at which Hazel Hallett, a promising young pianist, soon to depart for study in London under Matthay, will play the Chopin F minor concerto. The symphony will be by Boellmann, a composer known here only by his works for organ.

New York newspaper items shed some light on what became of the members of the ill-fated National Opera, which canceled its Boston engagement without warning. A few days after the company left Boston a "Manhattan Civic Opera" gave a performance of "Rigoletto" in Brooklyn, with Bertini, Valle and Mr Simeoni conducting. It is a pity that lack of sound financial backing ruined what seemed in so many ways a promising operatic venture here.

The Harvard Glee Club will give at the Museum of Fine Arts Thursday, May 9, the second and last of this season's free concerts, for which no tickets are required. The Museum will be open free from 7 to 11 p m.

An elaborate program, including many musical events, is planned for the convention of the National Federation of Music Clubs in Boston June 9-17. There will be concerts by a number of local organizations and by visiting choruses. The New York Chamber Music Society will perform Bloch's composition which won the prize offered last season by the C. C. Birchard Company.

Elinor Ahern will be one of the soloists at a soiree of songs Sunday evening, April 8, at the Hotel Somerset, Louis XIV ballroom, Commonwealth av, Boston, assisted by an ensemble from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Raffael Del Sordo.

The 17th German Bach festival of the New Bach Society will be held at Leipsig from June 8th to 10th. Like all previous Bach festivals at Leipzig, this year's will be opened by the famous motet at the Church of St Thomas. Choir, orchestra and studio concerts are to follow and lectures will be held. On Sunday, however, as the main feature of the event, a festival service will be held at the church service of St Thomas, after the fashion of the church service held at Bach's times. To give the Bach friends an opportunity to become personally acquainted with each other, social gatherings are intermingled with musical events. The Leipziger Bachverein (now "Associated Gewandhaus Choir"), the "Thomaner" Choir, the orchestras of the Municipal Theatre and the Gewandhaus, will be the [illegible] together with the greatest

Boston Symphony Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra ended its 48th season last night. The 49th season, and the sixth of Serge Koussevitzky's conductorship, will begin Friday, Oct 11. The customary second thoughts on the season just ended are accordingly now in order. The first impressions of the present writer have been set forth in the reviews of the several concerts printed in the Morning Globe.

The outstanding fact about this season is the fully restored prestige of the Boston Symphony. The orchestra was for many years prior to 1918 universally recognized as unequalled in America and unsurpassed in the world. But the dismissal of Dr Muck, the greatest conductor the Boston Symphony has yet had, the dropping of the German citizens from the orchestra, and the strike of a part of the players in 1920, which resulted in further changes in personnel, came nearer than most people realize to putting an end to the Boston Symphony.

Mr Monteux, in the years following 1920, steadily improved the quality of the orchestra. Mr Koussevitzky, who took his place in October, 1924, has also strengthened the quality of the orchestra on the whole, though in his time the retirement of such outstanding players as Messrs Longy, Kroeder, Holy and Hoffman has not invariably resulted in a net gain in quality. The present orchestra is in the main a body made up of first rate players, some of them of superlative excellence. There are at least two other orchestras in America as good, the Philadelphia and New York Philharmonic-Symphony, but none anywhere that is better.

Koussevitzky's Temperament

Mr Koussevitzky is, of course, one of the most interesting of present day orchestral conductors. He has the kind of personality which cannot be ignored, which colors all he does, which attracts and holds audiences. Those who have heard him play the double bass will not need to be told that he is a performer of genius. He has not even now as fully mastered the technique of conducting as he has that of the almost equally difficult art of playing solos on the double bass. But his ardent temperament, his flaming musical imagination, his personality makes his conducting remarkably stimulating, and save him, even at the hands of his enemies from the reproach of mediocrity and dullness.

He is in his way a genius, and, like all geniuses, a remarkably hard and intense worker. Those in close touch with what goes on behind the scenes at Symphony Hall agree that no previous conductor has been more indefatigible, more conscientious at rehearsals than Mr Koussevitzky.

When, therefore, reviewers in New York are practically unanimous in saying this season that the Boston Symphony is again of the first rank, they are paying tribute largely to the personal achievement of Koussevitzky. The present Boston Symphony is his orchestra. Its faults and defects are his faults and defects. Its merits are his merits. This might also have been written of the orchestra under Muck, though Muck never obtruded his personality, never seemed aware that he was the center of attention at the concerts.

The unprecedented demand for season tickets for the concerts is tangible evidence of Mr Koussevitzky's popularity. The waiting list is already long enough to absorb all or nearly all the season tickets for next year released by present subscribers, unless the raised prices just announced should have the unforseen effect of reducing the demand, which seems improbable.

Voicing Grievances

There is, however, a minority which occasionally voices its grievances against Mr Koussevitzky as conductor. There are three frequent complaints, first that his programs contain too much modern music and not enough of the particular dead-and-gone composers whom the complainant happens to prefer to Bartok, Honnegger, Stravinsky, et al; second, that he permits mistakes, such as false entrances, slovenly attacks, and so on to happen far more often than they should with a first-rate orchestra and unlimited rehearsal time; and third, that he disregards the intentions of composers, indicated in the printed music, and plays everything, not as it is written, or traditionally performed, but as he personally feels it. Let us consider each of these.

First, it is true that Koussevitzky plays a good deal of music by living composers, many of them, however, like Arthur Foote or Richard Strauss, not ultra-modern. To make room for it he omits some pieces, such as Liszt's tone poems, far more often heard here in the past.

But is it not the duty of the Boston Symphony to let audiences hear new music in order that the repertory may be strengthened? Some of this season's novelties, such as Dukelsky's symphony and Janin's "Symphonie Spirituelle" seemed pretty poor stuff, to be sure, but it is hard to tell in advance of public performance how a new work will go.

Mr Koussevitzky may perhaps succumb at times to what seems the omniversal desire of present-day conductors to lead "the first performance anywhere" of a new work. But otherwise his policy about modern music is wise, save that he might well avoid bunching modern pieces on a single program.

For the mistakes, the false entrances, the slovenly attacks and so on, there seems no valid excuse. Mr Koussevitzky's beat is not always clear, nor does he seem to value perfect precision of ensemble as highly as some people value it. "The letter killeth, the spirit maketh alive" might be his retort to this objection.

Brilliant Conducting

The disregard of such directions as the "andante con moto" at the head of the slow movements in Beethoven's Fifth and Schubert's "Unfinished" symphonies, and of the contrast in tempi in the slow movement of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony seems to the present writer wrong. The conductor should, according to his point of view, follow every direction in the printed score scrupulously, and supplement the inadequacies of musical notation by adding nuances. But there are many who argue, as does Ernest Newman, for example, that a performer is justified in playing music as he feels it.

Tradition is certainly a very uncertain guide to the performance of music.

It was Muck, not Koussevitzky, who remarked once upon a time that there is no authentic Wagner tradition. Yet Muck heard Wagner himself conduct, and has been in touch with Bayreuth ever since.

But even if all these faults in Koussevitzky are faults without excuse one should still be thankful for the brilliance, the dramatic quality of his conducting, and for the splendid playing of the orchestra under his leadership if one considers, not minor errors of detail, but the big general effect.

The trustees, all things considered, have been very wise in renewing Mr Koussevitzky's contract for what is rumored to be an indefinite number of years. Whom could they find to replace him if he left?

Pop Concerts Begin This Week Wednesday at Symphony Hall

May Day and opening night at the Pops will formally usher in Boston's Spring next Wednesday. Tables having been installed on the floor of Symphony Hall and a barroom to supply refreshments to the balconies, the Pops will thenceforth provide this city with music of direct appeal, in admi[illegible]able performance, each night through May and June. The Pops, nearly as venerable as the Boston Symphony concerts, from which they are derived, are to open their 44th season. They are fortunate in having for their third successive year, Alfredo Casella, the eminent Italian composer, conductor and pianist. Casella will preside over more than 80 Symphony players.

Numerous schools and colleges have made it a custom to take a night at the Pops in their graduation week. These are to include this year Harvard, Simmons, Tufts, Technology, Boston University, Radcliffe, Roxbury Latin and others. Smaller groups, likewise, gather at groups of tables to take advantage of the particular kind of sociability which the Pops afford. These will include Portia Law School, Eliot Circle, Campfire Girls, Bryant & Stratton, Jewish Women's College, Boston Life Underwriters, Y. W. C. A., Daughters of Zion and numerous others.

Casella announces the following programs for the opening week:

Wednesday, May 1—Wedding march from "Le Coq d'Or," Rimsky-Korsakov; song without words, Tchaikovsky; valse triste, Sibelius; overture to "La Forza del Destino," Verdi; "Les Preludes," Liszt; "Pavane pour une Infante Defunte," Ravel; "Italia," Casella; overture to "William Tell," Rossini; largo, Handel; "Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner.

Thursday, May 2—"Entrance of the Guests Into the Wartburg," Wagner; minuet, Boccherini; suite from "Carmen," Bizet; overture "The Roman Carnival," Berlioz; "Don Juan," R. Strauss; "Espana," Chabrier; First Hungarian Dance, Brahms; intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni; "Marche Slave," Tchaikovsky.

Friday, May 3—Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; Air, Bach; Dance-Suite for String Orchestra, Purcell-Bliss; Overture to "Oberon," Weber; Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; "The Fountains of Rome," Respighi; "Ballet of the Hours," from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; Waltz, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss; Second Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt.

Saturday, May 4—Wedding March, "A Mid-Summer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; Invitation to the Dance, Weber-Berlioz; Overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven; Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished," Schubert; Overture to "Cinderella," Rossini; Slavonic Dance, Dvorak; Overture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky.

Programs of the Week

SYMPHONY HALL—Today at 3:30, Roland Hayes, tenor. Final concert of Sunday afternoon series. "Per la Gloria," Bononcini; "Fermez vous pour jamais, mes yeux," Lulli; "Would You Gain the Tender Creature," Handel; "Adelaide," Beethoven; "When I Am Laid in Earth," Purcell; "Hoffnung," "Der Jungling and der Quelle," Schubert; "Ich hab im Traum Geweinet," "Geistesnahe," Schumann; "O, wusset ich doch der Weg zuruck," "O, Komme, holde Sommer Nacht," Brahms. Negro Spirituals: "Wade in de Water," "I Want Two Wings," "Campmeetin'," "Deep River," "New Born Again," "Were You There (unaccompanied).

JORDAN HALL, Tuesday at 8:15. The Apollo Club of Boston; Thompson Stone, conductor.

EMMANUEL CHURCH, Newbury st, Thursday at 8:30. The Bach Cantata Club; G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor. Final concert.

Soloists, Mrs Amy Townsend, soprano, and Joseph Lautner, tenor. "Our Father" (Gretchaninow); "O Gladsome Light" (Kastalsky); "Stabat Mater" (Palestrina); "Jeptha" (Carissimi).

152

HERALD APR 28

POPS WEDNESDAY

May day and opening night at the Pops will formally usher in Boston's spring next Wednesday. Tables having been installed on the floor of Symphony hall, and a barroom to supply refreshments to the balconies, the Pops will thenceforth provide this city with music of direct appeal, in superlative performance, each night through May and June. The Pops, nearly as venerable as the Boston symphony concerts from which they are derived, will open the 44th season. They are fortunate in having for their third successive year Alfredo Casella, the eminent Italian composer, conductor and pianist. Casella will conduct more than 80 Symphony players.

Numerous schools and colleges have made it a custom to take a night at the Pops in their graduation week. These will include this year Harvard, Simmons, Tufts, Technology, Boston University, Radcliffe, Roxbury Latin and others. Smaller groups, likewise, gather at groups of tables to take advantage of the particular kind of sociability which the Pops afford. These will include Portia Law School, Eliot Circle, Camp Fire Girls, Bryant & Stratton, Jewish Women's College, Boston Life Underwriters, Y. W. C. A., Daughters of Zion and numerous others.

Casella announces the following programs for the opening week:

WEDNESDAY MAY 1
Wedding march from Le Coq d'Or, Rimsky-Korsakov
Song Without Words.....Tchaikovsky
Valse Triste.....Sibelius
Overture to Lo Forza del Destino.....Verdi

Les Preludes, symphonic poem.....Liszt
Pavane pour une Infante Defunte....Ravel
Italia, rhapsody.....Casella
Overture to William Tell.....Rossini
Largo.....Handel
Ride of Valkyries.....Warner

THURSDAY, MAY 2
Entrance of the guests into the Wartburg, Tannhauser.....Wagner
Minuet.....Boccherini
Suite from Carmen.....Bizet
Overture to The Roman Carnival....Berlioz
Don Juan, tone poem.....R. Strauss
Espana, rhapsody.....Chabrier
First Hungarian Dance.....Brahms
Intermezzo, Cavalleria Rusticana, Mascagni
Marche Slave.....Tchaikovsky

FRIDAY, MAY 3
Overture to The Marriage of Figaro..Mozart
Air.....Bach
Dance-suite for string orchestra.Purcell-Bliss
Overture to Oberon.....Weber
Prelude and love-death from Tristan and Isolde.....Wagner
The Fountains of Rome, symphonic poem. Respighi
Ballet of the Hours, from La Gioconda.....Ponchielli
Waltz, By the Beautiful Blue Danube.....Strauss
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt

SATURDAY, MAY 4
Wedding march, A Midsummer Night's Dream.....Mendelssohn
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz
Overture to Tannhauser.....Wagner
Overture to Leonore, No. 3.....Beethoven
Symphony in B minor, Unfinished..Schubert
Overture to Cinderella.....Rossini
Slavonic Dance.....Dvorak
Overture Solennelle, 1812.....Tchaikovsky

CANTATA CLUB

The Bach Cantata Club, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, will sing in the Emmanuel Church on Thursday, May 2, at 8:30 o'clock. The program will comprise, Gretchaninov's "Our Father"; Kastalsky's "O Gladsome Light." Palestrina's "Stabat Mater"; Carissimi's "Jeptha" (Filia, Mrs. Amy Townsend; Jeptha, Joseph Lautner.)

Alexander Dmitrievitch Kastalsky was

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
TIMES UNION
APR 3 - 1929

Boston Symphony Orchestra at Woolsey Hall, Next Week

The Boston Symphony orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky have produced in the four years of their association something quite remarkable as symphony concerts go—a fact not wholly surprising when one considers the qualities of both orchestra and leader. And this city can be assured of a rare musical treat when the famous orchestra plays at Woolsey hall next Wednesday evening as the concluding offering of this season's annual Woolsey hall concert series under the auspices of the Yale School of Music.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has from its first glories of the "eighties" stood for the utmost in symphonic performance. The best musicians of Europe and America could provide were rigorously trained by a succession of great conductors into an ensemble which sent the name and fame of this organization over the world.

In Serge Koussevitkzy, the Boston Symphony orchestra found an inexorable drillmaster and a persuasive artist combined. His magnetic presence, extraordinary imaginative sweep have inspired the illustrious orchestra to new heights of eloquence and beauty, and they have electrified the symphony public with the spectacle of a new achievement in symphonic performance.

In a word, there is but one Boston Symphony orchestra, and but one Koussevitzky. The combination has proved a supreme achievement in symphonic performance.

Tickets for the event, which can easily be classed one of the finest of the season on the musical calendar, are now on sale at Steinert's, 183 Church street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
APR 7 - 1929

Boston Symphony, Under Koussevitzky to Present Brilliant Program

Serge Koussevitzky offers a program of engrossing interest and great brilliance and beauty for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New Haven for a concert under the auspices of the Yale University School of Music. The concert will be given in Woolsey Hall, Wednesday evening, at 8:15.

The principal number on the program will be Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E Minor. This master work of Tchaikovsky is one of the most impressive and popular of his scores. The lovely andante cantabile of the second movement, introduced by a horn solo, is particularly famous. The interpretation of this symphony by the remarkable Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is looked upon as one of his finest achievements.

The first part of the program will consist of three shorter classics of the French [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
SUN
Lewiston Me.

MUSICAL NOTES

Youngster's Symphony

Despite recent protests in the public prints and elsewhere, says the Boston Post, Serge Koussevitsky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, continues to offer the music of the youthful moderns whom he so valiantly espouses. For the first time in the United States the Symphony has played a Symphony by the twenty-six-year-old Russian Vladimir Dukelsky, already known here through a ballet-suite. The symphony is said to be amiably and ingeniously written with much melody and an unfailing gusto. But while copious and fluent it is sadly without distinction, and greatly at variance with the arbitrarily dissonant harmony that is used spasmodically.

The Boston Herald remarks: Mr. Diaghiley has called him (Dukelsky), a younger brother of Stravinsky and Prokofieff. He does not seem to be so closely related. Whatever his musical parentage, he does not need any family recommendation. Perhaps he is musically an illigitimate child, a rather unruly one, but of a vigorous nature as have been many famous men born out of wedlock. The symphony is interesting. Like all the compositions of young men who are at all worthy of attention in their desire to strike out a new path, to be individual, the symphonic first movement is yeasty. Here was need of the self-criticism that comes only with greater maturity.

The thematic material is not in itself alluring. There are incongruous episodes interrupting noisily and ineffectively any development. It is as if the hearer were subject to galvanic shocks. Yet even in this movement there is a proud independence—call it not arrogance or a foolish defiance—that wins respect if not whole-hearted admiration. Better this wild irregularity than obsequious following in the footsteps of smug, dull music makers of whose works the damning compliment "Anyhow they are well made," is all that can be said.

TRANS — APR. 30 →

Incidents and Prospects

As already noted in this place, the Symphony Concerts will be renewed for a forty-ninth year on Friday and Saturday, Oct. 11 and 12. They will continue through Friday and Saturday, May 2 and 3, with six weekly intervals—in November, January, February, March and April, when the orchestra goes on a journey. The supplementary concerts on Monday evenings will be increased to six, at monthly intervals from November through March. The supplementary matinées on Tuesday's, likewise to be six in number, will begin in November and end in April.

Summarizing the symphonic season in Manhattan, Mr. Robert Simon found this to say, in The New Yorker, about the Boston Orchestra:

The best argument against the guest-conductor system was presented whenever the Boston Symphony, which is the exclusive property of Mr. Koussevitzky, came to town—in spite of at least one Boston concert which sounded as though Mr. Koussevitzky had been converted suddenly into a guest-conductor. For general sustained excellence, the Boston Symphony must be awarded first place, although the most brilliant individual evenings were those of the Philharmonic when Mr. Toscanini was in command.

Six of the Sunday Concerts at Symphony Hall next season have been segregated into a "course." They will befall on Sunday afternoons, Nov. 10 and 24, Dec. 15, Jan. 12, Feb. 23, March 16. At them Mr. Horowitz and Mr. Sanroma, for pianists; Mr. Spalding, for a violinist; Mr. Hayes, Mme. Van Gordon of the Chicago Opera, Mme. Homer and her eldest daughter, for singers, will all be heard. For those who subscribe to the course prices will be appreciably reduced, ranging from $12 to $5. Inquiries and subscriptions should be addressed to Symphony Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
APR 2 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HERE IN CONCERT NEXT WEEK

At Woolsey Hall next Wednesday evening, April 10, the concluding event of the annual Woolsey Hall concert series will be given, the occasion being no less an important offering than the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of its far famed conductor, Serge Koussetzky.

This city is indeed fortunate in the coming visit of the famous musical organization, not because of the supreme qualities of its music, because its engagements are few indeed outside of the Boston and New York itineracy. These latter include 84 concerts, and since by far the largest part of the orchestra's days are spent in rehearsal, time is left only for single concerts in a few of the cities elsewhere.

Practically all of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts are subscription concerts, and such is the demand for performances by the great musical organization under its remarkable leader, that Symphony and Carnegie Halls, in Boston and New York respectively, are subscribed to the last for every series, with waiting lists which takes any seats released in the Spring.

It is therefore next to impossible for a visitor to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its own city A rare experience indeed awaits those who will hear the celebrated orchestra of 110 musicians which Serge Koussevitzky has wrought to such an extraordinary degree of tonal splendor when they visit New Haven next week.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
APR 3 - 1929

Music News and Gossip

Joseph Wolfe's fine baritone voice was heard to advantage last evening in Town Hall in a group of arias by Bloch, the monologue from "Boris Godunoff" and German, Russian and English songs.

Carola Goya and Carlos de Vega will give their season's farewell joint recital this evening in Carnegie Hall. The program includes twenty-two traditional and modern Spanish dances, four of which are duets. Beatrice Weller will be heard in harp solos and Ramon Gonzalez in piano numbers.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play Beethoven's Ninth Symphony for the first time in its regular New York series when Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra visit this city for the final concerts of the season, in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, April 11 and 13. The choral part will be sung by the Schola Cantorum, Hugh Ross, conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN
JOURNAL COURIER
APR 2 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE ON WEDNESDAY, APRIL 10

At Woolsey hall next week Wednesday evening, April 10, the concluding event of the annual Woolsey hall concert series will be given, the occasion being no less an important offering than the Boston symphony orchestra, under the direction of its far-famed conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

This city is indeed fortunte in the coming visit of the famous musical organization, not only because of the supreme qualities of its music but because its engagements are few indeed outside of the Boston and New York itinerary. These latter include 84 concerts, and since by far the largest part of the orchestra's days are spent in rehearsal, time is left only for single concerts in a few of the cities elsewhere.

Practically all of the Boston symphony orchestra's concerts are subscription concerts, and such is the demand for performances by the great musical organization under its remarkable leader, that Symphony and Carnegie halls, in Boston and New York, respectively, are subscribed to the last for every series, with waiting lists which take any seats released in the spring.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN
JOURNAL COURIER
APR 3 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT WOOLSEY HALL NEXT WEEK

The Boston symphonyq orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky have produced in the four years of their association something quite remarkable as symphony concerts go —a fact not wholly surprising when one considers the qualities of both orchestra and leader. And this city can be assured of a rare musical treat when the famous orchestra plays at Woolsey hall next Wednesday evening, as the concluding offering of this season's annual Woolsey hall concert series under the auspices of the Yale School of Music.

The Boston symphony orchestra has, from its first glories of the "eighties," stood for the utmost in symphonic performance. The best musicians Europe and America could provide were rigorously trained by a succession of great conductors into an ensemble which sent the name and fame of this organization over the world.

In Serge Koussovetzky the Boston symphony orchestra found an inexorable drillmaster and a persuasive artist combined. His magnetic presence, extraordinary imaginative sweep have inspired the illustrious orchestra to new heights of eloquence and beauty, and they have electrified the symphony public with the spectacle of a new achievement in symphonic performance.

In a word, there is but one Boston symphony orchestra, and but one Koussevitzky. The combination has proved a supreme achievement in symphonic performance.

Tickets for the event, which can easily be classed one of the finest of the season on the musical calender, are now on sale at Steinert's, 183 Church street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
TIMES UNION

Splendid Program By the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky offers a program of engrossing interest and great brilliance and beauty for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra to New Haven for a concert under the auspices of the Yale University School of Music. The concert will be given in Woolsey hall, Wednesday evening, April 10th, at 8:15.

The principal number on the program will be Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor. This master work of Tchaikovsky is one of the most impressive and popular of his scores. The lovely andante cantabile of the second movement, introduced by a horn solo, is particularly famous. The interpretation of this symphony by the remarkable Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra is looked upon as one of his finest achievements.

The first part of the program will consist of three shorter classics of the French school—Berlioz' overture to "The Roman Carnival," Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerere's Apprentice."

Berlioz' resplendent Overture owes its color largely to the use of the English horn, which as an orchestral instrument was comparatively new in the composer's day. Perhaps the most characteristic single instrument of Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" is the solo flute which contributes largely to the mood picture of the Faun, lying on a grassy bank and dreaming of his amours with a group of nymphs. Debussy thus set in music the verses of Mallarme, the impressionist poet.

Paul Dukas, the living French composer, is perhaps best known by his "Sorcerer's Apprentice." It is a humorous piece, quite in the vein of the fantastic ballad of Goethe, which bears the same name. The Magician's apprentice picks up enough of his master's art to experiment with it in his absence by using the proper incantations. He sets up the broom as a scarecrow, gives it a pail of water and orders it to clean up the place, but what he has started he has not the power to stop. There is a general flood and the master, returning, finally restores order.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION
APR 1 - 1929

The Boston Symphony.

From the Providence Journal.

It would be a public misfortune if the Boston Symphony were to omit its regular visits to Providence in 1930.

For many years this premier organization has been coming to this city, and, as a result, not only has our sum total of musical knowledge and attainment been increased, but there has been a general enlargement of our cultural outlook This is one of the happy effects of artistic or intellectual progress along any one line—we are stimulated to excursions along other cultural paths as well.

Boston, which hears the symphony 65 times in a season, is taking steps to complete a fund of $132,000 for the continuation of that privilege; we in Providence are asked to pledge the small sum of $4000 to insure the coming of these fine musicians to this city five times next fall, winter and spring. The needed amount should be given at once and willingly.

It used to be said that "Providence is not a musical city." If that was ever true is it true no longer. Every Boston Symphony concert nowadays packs the Albee Theater, with its seating capacity of 2400, and on Tuesday evening many lovers of music stood at the rear of the house. Mr. Albee has agreed to permit the symphony to appear in the theater again next season, and it would be highly unfortunate if the opportunity were neglected; there are too many people in Providence who depend upon this exceptional group of musicians to help them keep in touch with the best that has been produced in symphonic

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
APR 3 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT WOOLSEY HALL NEXT WEEK

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky have produced in the four years of their association something quite remarkable as symphony concerts go—a fact not wholly surprising when one considers the qualities of both orchestra and leader. And this city can be assured of a rare musical treat when the famous orchestra plays at Woolsey Hall next Wednesday evening as the concluding offering of this season's annual Woolsey Hall Concert Series under the auspices of the Yale School of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has from its first glories of the "eighties," stood for the utmost in symphonic performance. The best musicians Europe and America could provide were rigorously trained by a succession of great conductors into an ensemble which sent the name and fame of this organization over the world.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL
APR 6 - 1929

KOUSSEVITZKY TO GIVE 9TH SYMPHONY

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which Serge Koussevitzky will direct for the first time in New York, will be the feature of the concerts by the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday and Saturday. These will be the orchestra's last visit of the season. The choral finale will be sung by the Schola Cantorum. The soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van Der Veer, Paul Althouse and Fraser Gange. The symphony will be preceded by an orchestral concerto by Philip Emanuel Bach.

152

HERALD APR 28

POPS WEDNESDAY

May day and opening night at the Pops will formally usher in Boston's spring next Wednesday. Tables having been installed on the floor of Symphony hall, and a barroom to supply refreshments to the balconies, the Pops will thenceforth provide this city with music of direct appeal, in superlative performance, each night through May and June. The Pops, nearly as venerable as the Boston symphony concerts from which they are derived, will open the 44th season. They are fortunate in having for their third successive year Alfredo Casella, the eminent Italian composer, conductor and pianist. Casella will conduct more than 80 Symphony players.

Numerous schools and colleges have made it a custom to take a night at the Pops in their graduation week. These will include this year Harvard, Simmons, Tufts, Technology, Boston University, Radcliffe, Roxbury Latin and others. Smaller groups, likewise, gather at groups of tables to take advantage of the particular kind of sociability which the Pops afford. These will include Portia Law School, Eliot Circle, Camp Fire Girls, Bryant & Stratton, Jewish Women's College, Boston Life Underwriters, Y. W. C. A., Daughters of Zion and numerous others.

Casella announces the following programs for the opening week:

WEDNESDAY MAY 1
Wedding march from Le Coq d'Or, Rimsky-Korsakov
Song Without Words.....Tchaikovsky
Valse Triste.....Silbelius
Overture to Lo Forza del Destino.....Verdi
Les Preludes, symphonic poem.....Liszt
Pavane pour une Infante Defunte....Ravel
Italia, rhapsody.....Casella
Overture to William Tell.....Rossini
Largo.....Handel
Ride of Valkyries.....Wagner

THURSDAY, MAY 2
Entrance of the guests into the Wartburg, Tannhauser.....Wagner
Minuet.....Boccherini
Suite from Carmen.....Bizet
Overture to The Roman Carnival.....Berlioz
Don Juan, tone poem.....R. Strauss
Espana, rhapsody.....Chabrier
First Hungarian Dance.....Brahms
Intermezzo, Cavalleria Rusticana..Mascagni
Marche Slave.....Tchaikovsky

FRIDAY, MAY 3
Overture to The Marriage of Figaro..Mozart
Air.....Bach
Dance-suite for string orchestra.Purcell-Bliss
Overture to Oberon.....Weber
Prelude and love-death from Tristan and Isolde.....Wagner
The Fountains of Rome, symphonic poem. Respighi
Ballet of the Hours, from La Gioconda Ponchielli
Waltz, By the Beautiful Blue Danube, Strauss
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt

SATURDAY, MAY 4
Wedding march, A Midsummer Night's Dream.....Mendelssohn
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz
Overture to Tannhauser.....Wagner
Overture to Leonore, No. 3.....Beethoven
Symphony in B minor, Unfinished..Schubert
Overture to Cinderella.....Rossini
Slavonic Dance.....Dvorak
Overture Solennelle, 1812.....Tchaikovsky

CANTATA CLUB

The Bach Cantata Club, C. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, will sing in the Emmanuel Church on Thursday, May 2, at 8:30 o'clock. The program will comprise, Gretchaninov's "Our Father"; Kastalsky's "O Gladsome Light." Palestrina's "Stabat Mater"; Carissimi's "Jeptha" (Filia, Mrs. Amy Townsend; Jeptha, Joseph Lautner.)

Alexander Dmitrievitch Kastalsky was

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
TIMES UNION

Boston Symphony Orchestra at Woolsey Hall, Next Week

The Boston Symphony orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky have produced in the four years of their association something quite remarkable as symphony concerts go—a fact not wholly surprising when one considers the qualities of both orchestra and leader. And this city can be assured of a rare musical treat when the famous orchestra plays at Woolsey hall next Wednesday evening as the concluding offering of this season's annual Woolsey hall concert series under the auspices of the Yale School of Music.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has from its first glories of the "eighties," stood for the utmost in symphonic performance. The best musicians of Europe and America could provide were rigorously trained by a succession of great conductors into an ensemble which sent the name and fame of this organization over the world.

In Serge Koussevitkzy, the Boston Symphony orchestra found an inexorable drillmaster and a persuasive artist combined. His magnetic presence, extraordinary imaginative sweep have inspired the illustrious orchestra to new heights of eloquence and beauty, and they have electrified the symphony public with the spectacle of a new achievement in symphonic performance.

In a word, there is but one Boston Symphony orchestra, and but one Koussevitzky. The combination has proved a supreme achievement in symphonic performance.

Tickets for the event, which can easily be classed one of the finest of the season on the musical calendar, are now on sale at Steinert's, 183 Church street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
APR 7 -

Boston Symphony, Under Koussevitzky to Present Brilliant Program

Serge Koussevitzky offers a program of engrossing interest and great brilliance and beauty for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New Haven for a concert under the auspices of the Yale University School of Music. The concert will be given in Woolsey Hall, Wednesday evening, at 8:15.

The principal number on the program will be Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E Minor. This master work of Tchaikovsky is one of the most impressive and popular of his scores. The lovely andante cantabile of the second movement, introduced by a horn solo, is particularly famous. The interpretation of this symphony by the remarkable Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is looked upon as one of his finest achievements.

The first part of the program will consist of three shorter classics of the French school [illegible] musicians of Europe and America could provide were rigorously trained by a succession of great conductors into an ensemble which sent the name and fame of this organization over the world.

In Serge Koussevitkzy, the Boston Symphony orchestra found an inexorable drillmaster and a persuasive artist combined. His magnetic presence, extraordinary imaginative sweep have inspired the illustrious orchestra to new heights of eloquence and beauty, and they have electrified the symphony public with the spectacle of a new achievement in symphonic performance.

In a word, there is but one Boston Symphony orchestra, and but one Koussevitzky. The combination has proved a supreme achievement in symphonic performance.

Tickets for the event, which can easily be classed one of the finest of the season on the musical calendar, are now on sale at Steinert's, 183 Church street.

its

[illegible] the use of the English horn, which is an orchestral instrument was comparatively new in the composer's day. Perhaps the most characteristic single instrument of Debussy's "Afternoon of A Faun" is the solo flute which contributes largely to the mood picture of the Faun, lying on a grassy bank and dreaming of his amours with a group of nymphs. Debussy thus set in music the verses of Mallarme, the impressionist poet.

Paul Dukas, the living French composer, is perhaps best known by his "Sorcerer's Apprentice." It is a humorous piece, quite in the vein of the fantastic ballad of Goethe, which bears the same name.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SUN
Leviatan

MUSICAL NOTES

Youngster's Symphony

Despite recent protests in the public prints and elsewhere, says the Boston Post, Serge Koussevitsky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, continues to offer the music of the youthful moderns whom he so valiantly espouses. For the first time in the United States the Symphony has played a Symphony by the twenty-six-year-old Russian Vladimir Dukelsky, already known here through a ballet-suite. The symphony is said to be amiably and ingeniously written with much melody and an unfailing gusto. But while copious and fluent it is sadly without distinction, and greatly at variance with the arbitrarily dissonant harmony that is used spasmodically.

The Boston Herald remarks: Mr. Diaghilev has called him (Dukelsky), a younger brother of Stravinsky and Prokofieff. He does not seem to be so closely related. Whatever his musical parentage, he does not need any family recommendation. Perhaps he is musically an illegitimate child, a rather unruly one, but of a vigorous nature as have been many famous men born out of wedlock. The symphony is interesting. Like all the compositions of young men who are not all worthy of attention in their desire to strike out a new path, to be individual, the symphonic first movement is yeasty. Here was need of the self-criticism that comes only with greater maturity.

The thematic material is not in itself alluring. There are incongruous episodes interrupting noisily and ineffectively any development. It is as if the hearer were subject to galvanic shocks. Yet even in this movement there is a proud independence—call it not arrogance or a foolish defiance—that wins respect if not whole-hearted admiration. Better this wild irregularity than obsequious following in the footsteps of sinuous, dull music makers of whose works the damning compliment "Anyhow they are well made." is all that can be said.

TRANS — APR. 30 —

Incidents and Prospects

As already noted in this place, the Symphony Concerts will be renewed for a forty-ninth year on Friday and Saturday, Oct. 11 and 12. They will continue through Friday and Saturday, May 2 and 3, with six weekly intervals—in November, January, February, March and April, when the orchestra goes on a journey. The supplementary concerts on Monday evenings will be increased to six, at monthly intervals from November through March. The supplementary matinées on Tuesday's, likewise to be six in number, will begin in November and end in April.

Summarizing the symphonic season in Manhattan, Mr. Robert Simon found this to say, in The New Yorker, about the Boston Orchestra:

> The best argument against the guest-conductor system was presented whenever the Boston Symphony, which is the exclusive property of Mr. Koussevitzky, came to town—in spite of at least one Boston concert which sounded as though Mr. Koussevitzky had been converted suddenly into a guest-conductor. For general sustained excellence, the Boston Symphony must be awarded first place, although the most brilliant individual evenings were those of the Philharmonic when Mr. Toscanini was in command.

Six of the Sunday Concerts at Symphony Hall next season have been segregated into a "course." They will befall on Sunday afternoons, Nov. 10 and 24, Dec. 15, Jan. 12, Feb. 23, March 16. At them Mr. Horowitz and Mr. Sanromá, for pianists; Mr. Spalding, for a violinist; Mr. Hayes, Mme. Van Gordon of the Chicago Opera, Mme. Homer and her eldest daughter, for singers, will all be heard. For those who subscribe to the course prices will be appreciably reduced, ranging from $12 to $5. Inquiries and subscriptions should be addressed to Symphony Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
APR 2 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HERE IN CONCERT NEXT WEEK

At Woolsey Hall next Wednesday evening, April 10, the concluding event of the annual Woolsey Hall concert series will be given, the occasion being no less an important offering than the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of its far famed conductor, Serge Koussetzky.

This city is indeed fortunate in the coming visit of the famous musical organization, not because of the supreme qualities of its music, but because its engagements are few indeed outside of the Boston and New York itineracy. These latter include 34 concerts, and since by far the largest part of the orchestra's days are spent in rehearsal, time is left only for single concerts in a few of the cities elsewhere.

Practically all of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts are subscription concerts, and such is the demand for performances by the great musical organization under its remarkable leader, that Symphony and Carnegie Halls, in Boston and New York respectively, are subscribed to the last for every series, with waiting lists which takes any seats released in the Spring.

It is therefore next to impossible for a visitor to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its own city A rare experience indeed awaits those who will hear the celebrated orchestra of 110 musicians which Serge Koussevitzky has wrought to such an extraordinary degree of tonal splendor when they visit New Haven next week

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
APR 9 -

Music News and Gossip

Joseph Wolfe's fine baritone voice was heard to advantage last evening in Town Hall in a group of arias by Bloch, the monologue from "Boris Godunoff" and German, Russian and English songs.

Carola Goya and Carlos de Vega will give their season's farewell joint recital this evening in Carnegie Hall. The program includes twenty-two traditional and modern Spanish dances, four of which are duets. Beatrice Weller will be heard in harp solos and Ramon Gonzalez in piano numbers.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play Beethoven's Ninth Symphony for the first time in its regular New York series when Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra visit this city for the final concerts of the season, in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, April 11 and 13. The choral part will be sung by the Schola Cantorum, Hugh Ross, conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN
JOURNAL COURIER
APR 2 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE ON WEDNESDAY, APRIL 10

At Woolsey hall next week Wednesday evening, April 10, the concluding event of the annual Woolsey hall concert series will be given, the occasion being no less an important offering than the Boston symphony orchestra, under the direction of its far-famed conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

This city is indeed fortunte in the coming visit of the famous musical organization, not only because of the supreme qualities of its music but because its engagements are few indeed outside of the Boston and New York itinerary. These latter include 84 concerts, and since by far the largest part of the orchestra's days are spent in rehearsal, time is left only for single concerts in a few of the cities elsewhere.

Practically all of the Boston symphony orchestra's concerts are subscription concerts, and such is the demand for performances by the great musical organization under its remarkable leader, that Symphony and Carnegie halls, in Boston and New York, respectively, are subscribed to the last for every series, with waiting lists which take any seats released in the spring.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN
JOURNAL COURIER

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT WOOLSEY HALL NEXT WEEK

The Boston symphonyq orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky have produced in the four years of their association something quite remarkable as symphony concerts go —a fact not wholly surprising when one considers the qualities of both orchestra and leader. And this city can be assured of a rare musical treat when the famous orchestra plays at Woolsey hall next Wednesday evening, as the concluding offering of this season's annual Woolsey hall concert series under the auspices of the Yale School of Music.

The Boston symphony orchestra has, from its first glories of the "eighties," stood for the utmost in symphonic performance. The best musicians Europe and America could provide were rigorously trained by a succession of great conductors into an ensemble which sent the name and fame of this organization over the world.

In Serge Koussovetzky the Boston symphony orchestra found an inexorable drillmaster and a persuasive artist combined. His magnetic presence, extraordinary imaginative sweep have inspired the illustrious orchestra to new heights of eloquence and beauty, and they have electrified the symphony public with the spectacle of a new achievement in symphonic performance.

In a word, there is but one Boston symphony orchestra, and but one Koussevitzky. The combination has proved a supreme achievement in symphonic performance.

Tickets for the event, which can easily be classed one of the finest of the season on the musical calender, are now on sale at Steinert's, 183 Church street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
TIMES UNION

Splendid Program By the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky offers a program of engrossing interest and great brilliance and beauty for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra to New Haven for a concert under the auspices of the Yale University School of Music. The concert will be given in Woolsey hall, Wednesday evening, April 10th, at 8:15.

The principal number on the program will be Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor. This master work of Tchaikovsky is one of the most impressive and popular of his scores. The lovely andante cantabile of the second movement, introduced by a horn solo, is particularly famous. The interpretation of this symphony by the remarkable Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra is looked upon as one of his finest achievements.

The first part of the program will consist of three shorter classics of the French school—Berlioz' overture to "The Roman Carnival," Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and Dukas' [illegible] Sorcerere's Apprentice."

Berlioz' resplendent overture owes its color largely to the use of the English horn, which is an orchestral instrument comparatively new in the composer's day. Perhaps the most characteristic single instrument of Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" is the solo flute which contributes largely to the mood picture of the Faun, lying on a grassy bank and dreaming of his amours with a group of nymphs. Debussy thus set in music the verses of Mallarme, the impressionist poet.

Paul Dukas, the living French composer, is perhaps best known by his "Sorcerer's Apprentice." It is a humorous piece, quite in the vein of the fantastic ballad of Goeth. The which bears the same name. The Magician's apprentice picks up enough of his master's art to experiment with it in his absence by using the proper incantations. He sets up the broom as a scarecrow, gives it a pail of water and orders it to clean up the place, but what he has started he has not the power to stop. There is a general flood and the master returning, finally restores order.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION
APR 1 - 1929

The Boston Symphony.

From the Providence Journal.

It would be a public misfortune if the Boston Symphony were to omit its regular visits to Providence in 1930.

For many years this premier organization has been coming to this city, and, as a result, not only has our sum total of musical knowledge and attainment been increased, but there has been a general enlargement of our cultural outlook This is one of the happy effects of artistic or intellectual progress along any one line—we are stimulated to excursions along other cultural paths as well.

Boston, which hears the symphony 65 times in a season, is taking steps to complete a fund of $132,000 for the continuation of that privilege; we in Providence are asked to pledge the small sum of $4000 to insure the coming of these fine musicians to this city five times next fall, winter and spring. The needed amount should be given at once and willingly.

It used to be said that "Providence is not a musical city." If that was ever true is it true no longer. Every Boston Symphony concert nowadays packs the Albee Theater, with its seating capacity of 2400, and on Tuesday evening many lovers of music stood at the rear of the house. Mr. Albee has agreed to permit the symphony to appear in the theater again next season, and it would be highly unfortunate if the opportunity were neglected; there are too many people in Providence who depend upon this exceptional group of musicians to help them keep in touch with the best that has been produced in symphonic music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
APR 3 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT WOOLSEY HALL NEXT WEEK

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky have produced in the four years of their association something quite remarkable as symphony concerts go—a fact not wholly surprising when one considers the qualities of both orchestra and leader. And this city can be assured of a rare musical treat when the famous orchestra plays at Woolsey Hall next Wednesday evening as the concluding offering of this season's annual Woolsey Hall Concert Series under the auspices of the Yale School of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has from its first glories of the "eighties," stood for the utmost in symphonic performance. The best musicians Europe and America could provide were rigorously trained by a succession of great conductors into an ensemble which sent the name and fame of this organization over the world.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL
APR 8 -

KOUSSEVITZKY TO GIVE 9TH SYMPHONY

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which Serge Koussevitzky will direct for the first time in New York, will be the feature of the concerts by the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday and Saturday. These will be the orchestra's last visit of the season. The choral finale will be sung by the Schola Cantorum. The soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van Der Veer, Paul Althouse and Fraser Gange. The symphony will be preceded by an orchestral concerto by Philip Emanuel Bach.

152

HERALD APR 28

POPS WEDNESDAY

May day and opening night at the Pops will formally usher in Boston's spring next Wednesday. Tables having been installed on the floor of Symphony hall, and a barroom to supply refreshments to the balconies, the Pops will thenceforth provide this city with music of direct appeal, in superlative performance, each night through May and June. The Pops, nearly as venerable as the Boston symphony concerts from which they are derived, will open the 44th season. They are fortunate in having for their third successive year Alfredo Casella, the eminent Italian composer, conductor and pianist. Casella will conduct more than 80 Symphony players.

Numerous schools and colleges have made it a custom to take a night at the Pops in their graduation week. These will include this year Harvard, Simmons, Tufts, Technology, Boston University, Radcliffe, Roxbury Latin and others. Smaller groups, likewise, gather at groups of tables to take advantage of the particular kind of sociability which the Pops afford. These will include Portia Law School, Eliot Circle, Camp Fire Girls, Bryant & Stratton, Jewish Women's College, Boston Life Underwriters, Y. W. C. A., Daughters of Zion and numerous others.

Casella announces the following programs for the opening week:

WEDNESDAY MAY 1

Wedding march from Le Coq d'Or, Rimsky-Korsakov
Song Without Words.....Tchaikovsky
Valse Triste.....Sibelius
Overture to Lo Forza del Destino.....Verdi
Les Preludes, symphonic poem.....Liszt
Pavane pour une Infante Defunte....Ravel
Italia, rhapsody.....Casella
Overture to William Tell.....Rossini
Largo.....Handel
Ride of Valkyries.....Wagner

THURSDAY, MAY 2

Entrance of the guests into the Wartburg, Tannhauser.....Wagner
Minuet.....Boccherini
Suite from Carmen.....Bizet
Overture to The Roman Carnival.....Berlioz
Don Juan, tone poem.....R. Strauss
Espana, rhapsody.....Chabrier
First Hungarian Dance.....Brahms
Intermezzo, Cavalleria Rusticana..Mascagni
Marche Slave.....Tchaikovsky

FRIDAY, MAY 3

Overture to The Marriage of Figaro..Mozart
Air.....Bach
Dance-suite for string orchestra..Purcell-Bliss
Overture to Oberon.....Weber
Prelude and love-death from Tristan and Isolde.....Wagner
The Fountains of Rome, symphonic poem. Respighi
Ballet of the Hours, from La Gioconda. Ponchielli
Waltz, By the Beautiful Blue Danube. Strauss
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt

SATURDAY, MAY 4

Wedding march, A Midsummer Night's Dream.....Mendelssohn
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz
Overture to Tannhauser.....Wagner
Overture to Leonore, No. 3.....Beethoven
Symphony in B minor, Unfinished..Schubert
Overture to Cinderella.....Rossini
Slavonic Dance.....Dvorak
Overture Solennelle, 1812.....Tchaikovsky

CANTATA CLUB

The Bach Cantata Club, C. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, will sing in the Emmanuel Church on Thursday, May 2, at 8:30 o'clock. The program will comprise, Gretchaninov's "Our Father"; Kastalsky's "O Gladsome Light." Palestrina's "Stabat Mater"; Carissimi's "Jeptha" (Filia, Mrs. Amy Townsend; Jeptha, Joseph Lautner.)

Alexander Dmitrievitch Kastalsky was

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
TIMES UNION

Apr 2 - 29

Boston Symphony Orchestra at Woolsey Hall, Next Week

The Boston Symphony orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky have produced in the four years of their association something quite remarkable as symphony concerts go—a fact not wholly surprising when one considers the qualities of both orchestra and leader. And this city can be assured of a rare musical treat when the famous orchestra plays at Woolsey hall next Wednesday evening as the concluding offering of this season's annual Woolsey hall concert series under the auspices of the Yale School of Music.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has from its first glories of the "eighties," stood for the utmost in symphonic performance. The best musicians of E... could ... the ... tion. ... Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony orchestra found an inexorable drillmaster and a persuasive artist combined. His magnetic presence, extraordinary imaginative sweep have inspired the illustrious orchestra to new heights of eloquence and beauty, and they have electrified the symphony public with the spectacle of a new achievement in symphonic performance.

In a word, there is but one Boston Symphony orchestra, and but one Koussevitzky. The combination has proved a supreme achievement in symphonic performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

APR 7 - 1...

Boston Symphony, Under Koussevitzky to Present Brilliant Program

Serge Koussevitzky offers a program of engrossing interest and great brilliance and beauty for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New Haven for a concert under the auspices of the Yale University School of Music. The concert will be given in Woolsey Hall, Wednesday evening, at 8:15.

The principal number on the program will be Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E Minor. This master work of Tchaikovsky is one of the most impressive and popular of his scores. The lovely andante cantabile of the second movement, introduced by a horn solo, is particularly famous. The interpretation of this symphony by the remarkable Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is looked upon as one of his finest achievements.

The first part of the program will consist of three shorter classics of the French school—Berlioz' Overture to "The Roman Carnival," Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

Berlioz' resplendent Overture owes its color largely to the use of the English horn, which is an orchestral instrument was comparatively new in the composer's day. Perhaps the most characteristic single instrument of Debussy's "Afternoon of A Faun" is the solo flute which contributes largely to the mood picture of the Faun, lying on a grassy bank and dreaming of his amours with a group of nymphs. Debussy thus set in music the verses of Mallarme, the impressionist poet.

Paul Dukas, the living French composer, is perhaps best known by his "Sorcerer's Apprentice." It is a humorous piece, quite in the vein of the fantastic ballad of Goethe, which bears the same name.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
SUN
Lewiston Me.

MUSICAL NOTES

Youngster's Symphony

Despite recent protests in the public prints and elsewhere, says the Boston Post, Serge Koussevitsky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, continues to offer the music of the youthful moderns whom he so valiantly espouses. For the first time in the United States the Symphony has played a Symphony by the twenty-six-year-old Russian Vladimir Dukelsky, already known here through a ballet-suite. The symphony is said to be amiably and ingeniously written with much melody and an unfailing gusto. But while copious and fluent it is sadly without distinction, and greatly at variance with the arbitrarily dissonant harmony that is used spasmodically.

The Boston Herald remarks: Mr. Diaghiley has called him (Dukelsky), a younger brother of Stravinsky and Prokofieff. He does not seem to be so closely related. Whatever his musical parentage, he does not need any family recommendation. Perhaps he is musically an illigitimate child, a rather unruly one, but of a vigorous nature as have been many famous men born out of wedlock. The symphony is interesting. Like all the compositions of young men who are at all worthy of attention in their desire to strike out a new path, to be individual, the symphonic first movement is yeasty. Here was need of the self-criticism that comes only with greater maturity.

The thematic material is not in itself alluring. There are incongruous episodes interrupting noisily and ineffectively any development. It is as if the hearer were subject to galvanic shocks. Yet even in this movement there is a proud independence—call it not arrogance or a foolish defiance—that wins respect if not whole-hearted admiration. Better this wild irregularity than obsequious following in the footsteps of smug, dull music makers of whose works the damning compliment "Anyhow they are well made," is all that can be said.

TRANS — APR. 30 —

Incidents and Prospects

As already noted in this place, the Symphony Concerts will be renewed for a forty-ninth year on Friday and Saturday, Oct. 11 and 12. They will continue through Friday and Saturday, May 2 and 3, with six weekly intervals—in November, January, February, March and April, when the orchestra goes on a journey. The supplementary concerts on Monday evenings will be increased to six, at monthly intervals from November through March. The supplementary matinées on Tuesday's, likewise to be six in number, will begin in November and end in April.

Summarizing the symphonic season in Manhattan, Mr. Robert Simon found this to say, in The New Yorker, about the Boston Orchestra:

> The best argument against the guest-conductor system was presented whenever the Boston Symphony, which is the exclusive property of Mr. Koussevitzky, came to town—in spite of at least one Boston concert which sounded as though Mr. Koussevitzky had been converted suddenly into a guest-conductor. For general sustained excellence, the Boston Symphony must be awarded first place, although the most brilliant individual evenings were those of the Philharmonic when Mr. Toscanini [illegible] in command.

Six of the Sunday Concerts at Symphony Hall next season have been segregated into a "course." They will befall on Sunday afternoons, Nov. 10 and 24, Dec. 15, Jan. 12, Feb. 23, March 16. At them Mr. Horowitz and Mr. Sanromá, for pianists; Mr. Spalding, for a violinist; Mr. Hayes, Mme. Van Gordon of the Chicago Opera, Mme. Homer and her eldest daughter, for singers, will all be heard. For those who subscribe to the course prices will be appreciably reduced, ranging from $12 to $5. Inquiries and subscriptions should be addressed to Symphony Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

APR 2 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HERE IN CONCERT NEXT WEEK

At Woolsey Hall next Wednesday evening, April 10, the concluding event of the annual Woolsey Hall concert series will be given, the occasion being no less an important offering than the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of its far famed conductor, Serge Koussetzky.

This city is indeed fortunate in the coming visit of the famous musical organization, not because of the supreme qualities of its music, because its engagements are few indeed outside of the Boston and New York itineracy. These latter include 84 concerts, and since by far the largest part of the orchestra's days are spent in rehearsal, time is left only for single concerts in a few of the cities elsewhere.

Practically all of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts are subscription concerts, and such is the demand for performances by the great musical organization under its remarkable leader, that Symphony and Carnegie Halls, in Boston and New York respectively, are subscribed to the last for every series, with waiting lists which takes any seats released in the Spring.

It is therefore next to impossible for a visitor to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its own city A rare experience indeed awaits those who will hear the celebrated orchestra of 110 musicians which Serge Koussevitzky has wrought to such an extraordinary degree of tonal splendor when they visit New Haven next week

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST

APR 3 - 192[illegible]

Music News and Gossip

Joseph Wolfe's fine baritone voice was heard to advantage last evening in Town Hall in a group of arias by Bloch, the monologue from "Boris Godunoff" and German, Russian and English songs.

Carola Goya and Carlos de Vega will give their season's farewell joint recital this evening in Carnegie Hall. The program includes twenty-two traditional and modern Spanish dances, four of which are duets. Beatrice Weller will be heard in harp solos and Ramon Gonzalez in piano numbers.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play Beethoven's Ninth Symphony for the first time in its regular New York series when Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra visit this city for the final concerts of the season, in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, April 11 and 13. The choral part will be sung by the Schola Cantorum, Hugh Ross, conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN
JOURNAL COURIER

APR 3 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT WOOLSEY HALL NEXT WEEK

The Boston symphonyq orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky have produced in the four years of their association something quite remarkable as symphony concerts go —a fact not wholly surprising when one considers the qualities of both orchestra and leader. And this city can be assured of a rare musical treat when the famous orchestra plays at Woolsey hall next Wednesday evening, as the concluding offering of this season's annual Woolsey hall concert series under the auspices of the Yale School of Music.

The Boston symphony orchestra has, from its first glories of the "eighties," stood for the utmost in symphonic performance. The best musicians Europe and America could provide were rigorously trained by a succession of great conductors into an ensemble which sent the name and fame of this organization over the world.

In Serge Koussovetzky the Boston symphony orchestra found an inexorable drillmaster and a persuasive artist combined. His magnetic presence, extraordinary imaginative sweep have inspired the illustrious orchestra to new heights of eloquence and beauty, and they have electrified the symphony public with the spectacle of a new achievement in symphonic performance.

In a word, there is but one Boston symphony orchestra, and but one Koussevitzky. The combination has proved a supreme achievement in symphonic performance.

Tickets for the event, which can easily be classed one of the finest of the season on the musical calender, are now on sale at Steinert's, 183 Church street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
TIMES UNION

Splendid Program By the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky offers a program of engrossing interest and great brilliance and beauty for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra to New Haven for a concert under the auspices of the Yale University School of Music. The concert will be given in Woolsey hall, Wednesday evening, April 10th, at 8:15.

The principal number on the program will be Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor. This master work of Tchaikovsky is one of the most impressive and popular of his scores. The lovely andante cantabile of the second movement, introduced by a horn solo, is particularly famous. The interpretation of this symphony by the remarkable Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra is looked upon as one of his finest achievements.

The first part of the program will consist of three shorter classics of the French school—Berlioz' overture to "The Roman Carnival," Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerere's Apprentice."

Berlioz' resplendent Overture owes its color largely to the use of the English horn, which is an orchestral instrument was comparatively new in the composer's day. Perhaps the most characteristic single instrument of Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" is the solo flute which contributes largely to the mood picture of the Faun, lying on a grassy bank and dreaming of his amours with a group of nymphs. Debussy thus set in music the verses of Mallarme, the impressionist poet.

Paul Dukas, the living French composer, is perhaps best known by his "Sorcerer's Apprentice." It is a humorous piece, quite in the vein of the fantastic ballad of Goeth. The Magician's apprentice picks up enough of his master's art to experiment with it in his absence by using the proper incantations. He sets up the broom as a scarecrow, gives it a pail of water and orders it to clean up the place, but what he has started he has not the power to stop. There is a general flood and the master returning, finally restores order.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

APR 1 - 1929

The Boston Symphony.

From the Providence Journal.

It would be a public misfortune if the Boston Symphony were to omit its regular visits to Providence in 1930.

For many years this premier organization has been coming to this city, and, as a result, not only has our sum total of musical knowledge and attainment been increased, but there has been a general enlargement of our cultural outlook This is one of the happy effects of artistic or intellectual progress along any one line—we are stimulated to excursions along other cultural paths as well.

Boston, which hears the symphony 65 times in a season, is taking steps to complete a fund of $132,000 for the continuation of that privilege; we in Providence are asked to pledge the small sum of $4000 to insure the coming of these fine musicians to this city five times next fall, winter and spring. The needed amount should be given at once and willingly.

It used to be said that "Providence is not a musical city." If that was ever true is it true no longer. Every Boston Symphony concert nowadays packs the Albee Theater, with its seating capacity of 2400, and on Tuesday evening many lovers of music stood at the rear of the house. Mr. Albee has agreed to permit the symphony to appear in the theater again next season, and it would be highly unfortunate if the opportunity were neglected; there are too many people in Providence who depend upon this exceptional group of musicians to help them keep in touch with the best that has been produced in symphonic music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN
JOURNAL COURIER

APR 2 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE ON WEDNESDAY, APRIL 10

At Woolsey hall next week Wednesday evening, April 10, the concluding event of the annual Woolsey hall concert series will be given, the occasion being no less an important offering than the Boston symphony orchestra, under the direction of its far-famed conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

This city is indeed fortunte in the coming visit of the famous musical organization, not only because of the supreme qualities of its music but because its engagements are few indeed outside of the Boston and New York itinerary. These latter include 84 concerts, and since by far the largest part of the orchestra's days are spent in rehearsal, time is left only for single concerts in a few of the cities elsewhere.

Practically all of the Boston symphony orchestra's concerts are subscription concerts, and such is the demand for performances by the great musical organization under its remarkable leader, that Symphony and Carnegie halls, in Boston and New York, respectively, are subscribed to the last for every series, with waiting lists which take any seats released in the spring.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

APR 3 - 192[illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT WOOLSEY HALL NEXT WEEK

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky have produced in the four years of their association something quite remarkable as symphony concerts go—a fact not wholly surprising when one considers the qualities of both orchestra and leader. And this city can be assured of a rare musical treat when the famous orchestra plays at Woolsey Hall next Wednesday evening as the concluding offering of this season's annual Woolsey Hall Concert Series under the auspices of the Yale School of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has from its first glories of the "eighties," stood for the utmost in symphonic performance. The best musicians Europe and America could provide were rigorously trained by a succession of great conductors into an ensemble which sent the name and fame of this organization over the world.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL

APR 6 - 192[illegible]

KOUSSEVITZKY TO GIVE 9TH SYMPHONY

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which Serge Koussevitzky will direct for the first time in New York, will be the feature of the concerts by the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday and Saturday. These will be the orchestra's last visit of the season. The choral finale will be sung by the Schola Cantorum. The soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van Der Veer, Paul Althouse and Fraser Gange. The symphony will be preceded by an orchestral concerto by Philip Emanuel Bach.

152

HERALD APR 28

POPS WEDNESDAY

May day and opening night at the Pops will formally usher in Boston's spring next Wednesday. Tables having been installed on the floor of Symphony hall, and a barroom to supply refreshments to the balconies, the Pops will thenceforth provide this city with music of direct appeal, in superlative performance, each night through May and June. The Pops, nearly as venerable as the Boston symphony concerts from which they are derived, will open the 44th season. They are fortunate in having for their third successive year Alfredo Casella, the eminent Italian composer, conductor and pianist. Casella will conduct more than 80 Symphony players.

Numerous schools and colleges have made it a custom to take a night at the Pops in their graduation week. These will include this year Harvard, Simmons, Tufts, Technology, Boston University, Radcliffe, Roxbury Latin and others. Smaller groups, likewise, gather at groups of tables to take advantage of the particular kind of sociability which the Pops afford. These will include Portia Law School, Eliot Circle, Camp Fire Girls, Bryant & Stratton, Jewish Women's College, Boston Life Underwriters, Y. W. C. A., Daughters of Zion and numerous others.

Casella announces the following programs for the opening week:

WEDNESDAY MAY 1
Wedding march from Le Coq d'Or, Rimsky-Korsakov
Song Without Words.....Tchaikovsky
Valse Triste.....Sibelius
Overture to Lo Forza del Destino.....Verdi
Les Preludes, symphonic poem.....Liszt
Pavane pour une Infante Defunte....Ravel
Italia, rhapsody.....Casella
Overture to William Tell.....Rossini
Largo.....Handel
Ride of Valkyries.....Wagner

THURSDAY, MAY 2
Entrance of the guests into the Wartburg, Tannhauser.....Wagner
Minuet.....Boccherini
Suite from Carmen.....Bizet
Overture to The Roman Carnival....Berlioz
Don Juan, tone poem.....R. Strauss
Espana, rhapsody.....Chabrier
First Hungarian Dance.....Brahms
Intermezzo, Cavalleria Rusticana..Mascagni
Marche Slave.....Tchaikovsky

FRIDAY, MAY 3
Overture to The Marriage of Figaro..Mozart
Air.....Bach
Dance-suite for string orchestra.Purcell-Bliss
Overture to Oberon.....Weber
Prelude and love-death from Tristan and Isolde.....Wagner
The Fountains of Rome, symphonic poem. Respighi
Ballet of the Hours, from La Gioconda Ponchielli
Waltz, By the Beautiful Blue Danube, Strauss
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt

SATURDAY, MAY 4
Wedding march, A Midsummer Night's Dream.....Mendelssohn
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz
Overture to Tannhauser.....Wagner
Overture to Leonore, No. 3.....Beethoven
Symphony in B minor, Unfinished..Schubert
Overture to Cinderella.....Rossini
Slavonic Dance.....Dvorak
Overture Solennelle, 1812.....Tchaikovsky

CANTATA CLUB

The Bach Cantata Club, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, will sing in the Emmanuel Church on Thursday, May 2, at 8:30 o'clock. The program will comprise, Gretchaninov's "Our Father"; Kastalsky's "O Gladsome Light." Palestrina's "Stabat Mater"; Carissimi's "Jeptha" (Filia, Mrs. Amy Townsend; Jeptha, Joseph Lautner.)

Alexander Dmitrievitch Kastalsky was

TRANS — APR. 30 →

Incidents and Prospects

As already noted in this place, the Symphony Concerts will be renewed for a forty-ninth year on Friday and Saturday, Oct. 11 and 12. They will continue through Friday and Saturday, May 2 and 3, with six weekly intervals—in November, January, February, March and April, when the orchestra goes on a journey. The supplementary concerts on Monday evenings will be increased to six, at monthly intervals from November through March. The supplementary matinées on Tuesday's, likewise to be six in number, will begin in November and end in April.

Summarizing the symphonic season in Manhattan, Mr. Robert Simon found this to say, in The New Yorker, about the Boston Orchestra:

> The best argument against the guest-conductor system was presented whenever the Boston Symphony, which is the exclusive property of Mr. Koussevitzky, came to town—in spite of at least one Boston concert which sounded as though Mr. Koussevitzky had been converted suddenly into a guest-conductor. For general sustained excellence, the Boston Symphony must be awarded first place, although the most brilliant individual evenings were those of the Philharmonic when Mr. Toscanini was in command.

Six of the Sunday Concerts at Symphony Hall next season have been segregated into a "course." They will befall on Sunday afternoons, Nov. 10 and 24, Dec. 15, Jan. 12, Feb. 23, March 16. At them Mr. Horowitz and Mr. Sanromá, for pianists; Mr. Spalding, for a violinist; Mr. Hayes, Mme. Van Gordon of the Chicago Opera, Mme. Homer and her eldest daughter, for singers, will all be heard. For those who subscribe to the course prices will be appreciably reduced, ranging from $12 to $5. Inquiries and subscriptions should be addressed to Symphony Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

APR 1 - 1929

The Boston Symphony.

From the Providence Journal.

It would be a public misfortune if the Boston Symphony were to omit its regular visits to Providence in 1930.

For many years this premier organization has been coming to this city, and, as a result, not only has our sum total of musical knowledge and attainment been increased, but there has been a general enlargement of our cultural outlook This is one of the happy effects of artistic or intellectual progress along any one line—we are stimulated to excursions along other cultural paths as well.

Boston, which hears the symphony 65 times in a season, is taking steps to complete a fund of $132,000 for the continuation of that privilege; we in Providence are asked to pledge the small sum of $4000 to insure the coming of these fine musicians to this city five times next fall, winter and spring. The needed amount should be given at once and willingly.

It used to be said that "Providence is not a musical city." If that was ever true is it true no longer. Every Boston Symphony concert nowadays packs the Albee Theater, with its seating capacity of 2400, and on Tuesday evening many lovers of music stood at the rear of the house. Mr. Albee has agreed to permit the symphony to appear in the theater again next season, and it would be highly unfortunate if the opportunity were neglected; there are too many people in Providence who depend upon this exceptional group of musicians to help them keep in touch with the best that has been produced in symphonic

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

APR 2 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HERE IN CONCERT NEXT WEEK

At Woolsey Hall next Wednesday evening, April 10, the concluding event of the annual Woolsey Hall concert series will be given, the occasion being no less an important offering than the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of its far famed conductor, Serge Koussetzky.

This city is indeed fortunate in the coming visit of the famous musical organization, not because of the supreme qualities of its music, because its engagements are few indeed outside of the Boston and New York itineracy. These latter include 84 concerts, and since by far the largest part of the orchestra's days are spent in rehearsal, time is left only for single concerts in a few of the cities elsewhere.

Practically all of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts are subscription concerts, and such is the demand for performances by the great musical organization under its remarkable leader, that Symphony and Carnegie Halls, in Boston and New York respectively, are subscribed to the last for every series, with waiting lists which takes any seats released in the spring.

It is therefore next to impossible for a visitor to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its own city A rare experience indeed awaits those who will hear the celebrated orchestra of 110 musicians which Serge Koussevitzky has wrought to such an extraordinary degree of tonal splendor when they visit New Haven next week.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN
JOURNAL COURIER

APR 2 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE ON WEDNESDAY, APRIL 10

At Woolsey hall next week Wednesday evening, April 10, the concluding event of the annual Woolsey hall concert series will be given, the occasion being no less an important offering than the Boston symphony orchestra, under the direction of its far-famed conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

This city is indeed fortunte in the coming visit of the famous musical organization, not only because of the supreme qualities of its music but because its engagements are few indeed outside of the Boston and New York itinerary. These latter include 84 concerts, and since by far the largest part of the orchestra's days are spent in rehearsal, time is left only for single concerts in a few of the cities elsewhere.

Practically all of the Boston symphony orchestra's concerts are subscription concerts, and such is the demand for performances by the great musical organization under its remarkable leader, that Symphony and Carnegie halls, in Boston and New York, respectively, are subscribed to the last for every series, with waiting lists which take any seats released in the spring.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
TIMES UNION

A[illegible] 2 - 29

Boston Symphony Orchestra at Woolsey Hall, Next Week

The Boston Symphony orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky have produced in the four years of their association something quite remarkable as symphony concerts go—a fact not wholly surprising when one considers the qualities of both orchestra and leader. And this city can be assured of a rare musical treat when the famous orchestra plays at Woolsey hall next Wednesday evening as the concluding offering of this season's annual Woolsey hall concert series under the auspices of the Yale School of Music.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has from its first glories of the "eighties," stood for the utmost in symphonic performance. The best musicians of E[illegible] could [illegible] the [illegible] tion.

TORRID LOVE LETTERS READ

In [illegible]evitzky, the Boston Symphony orchestra found an inexorable drillmaster and a persuasive artist combined. His magnetic presence, extraordinary imaginative sweep have inspired the illustrious orchestra to new heights of eloquence and beauty, and they have electrified the symphony public with the spectacle of a new achievement in symphonic performance.

In a word, there is but one Boston Symphony orchestra, and but one Koussevitzky. The combination has proved a supreme achievement in symphonic performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST

APR 3 - 1929

Music News and Gossip

Joseph Wolfe's fine baritone voice was heard to advantage last evening in Town Hall in a group of arias by Bloch, the monologue from "Boris Godunoff" and German, Russian and English songs.

Carola Goya and Carlos de Vega will give their season's farewell joint recital this evening in Carnegie Hall. The program includes twenty-two traditional and modern Spanish dances, four of which are duets. Beatrice Weller will be heard in harp solos and Ramon Gonzalez in piano numbers.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play Beethoven's Ninth Symphony for the first time in its regular New York series when Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra visit this city for the final concerts of the season, in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, April 11 and 13. The choral part will be sung by the Schola Cantorum, Hugh Ross, conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

APR 3 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT WOOLSEY HALL NEXT WEEK

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky have produced in the four years of their association something quite remarkable as symphony concerts go—a fact not wholly surprising when one considers the qualities of both orchestra and leader. And this city can be assured of a rare musical treat when the famous orchestra plays at Woolsey Hall next Wednesday evening as the concluding offering of this season's annual Woolsey Hall Concert Series under the auspices of the Yale School of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has from its first glories of the "eighties," stood for the utmost in symphonic performance. The best musicians Europe and America could provide were rigorously trained by a succession of great conductors into an ensemble which sent the name and fame of this organization over the world.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

APR 7 - 1929

Boston Symph[illegible]

[illegible]ram [illegible] brilliant coming visit [illegible]ymphony Orchestra to [illegible] for a concert under the [illegible]s of the Yale University School of Music. The concert will be given in Woolsey Hall, Wednesday evening, at 8:15.

The principal number on the program will be Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E Minor. This master work of Tchaikovsky is one of the most impressive and popular of his scores. The lovely andante cantabile of the second movement, introduced by a horn solo, is particularly famous. The interpretation of this symphony by the remarkable Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is looked upon as one of his finest achievements.

The first part of the program will consist of three shorter classics of the French school—Berlioz' Overture to "The Roman Carnival," Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

Berlioz' resplendent Overture owes its color largely to the use of the English horn, which is an orchestral instrument was comparatively new in the composer's day. Perhaps the most characteristic single instrument of Debussy's "Afternoon of A Faun" is the solo flute which contributes largely to the mood picture of the Faun, lying on a grassy bank and dreaming of his amours with a group of nymphs. Debussy thus set in music the verses of Mallarme, the impressionist poet.

Paul Dukas, the living French composer, is perhaps best known by his "Sorcerer's Apprentice." It is a humorous piece, quite in the vein of the fantastic ballad of Goethe, which bears the same name.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN
JOURNAL COURIER

APR 3 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT WOOLSEY HALL NEXT WEEK

The Boston symphonyq orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky have produced in the four years of their association something quite remarkable as symphony concerts go —a fact not wholly surprising when one considers the qualities of both orchestra and leader. And this city can be assured of a rare musical treat when the famous orchestra plays at Woolsey hall next Wednesday evening, as the concluding offering of this season's annual Woolsey hall concert series under the auspices of the Yale School of Music.

The Boston symphony orchestra has, from its first glories of the "eighties," stood for the utmost in symphonic performance. The best musicians Europe and America could provide were rigorously trained by a succession of great conductors into an ensemble which sent the name and fame of this organization over the world.

In Serge Koussovetzky the Boston symphony orchestra found an inexorable drillmaster and a persuasive artist combined. His magnetic presence, extraordinary imaginative sweep have inspired the illustrious orchestra to new heights of eloquence and beauty, and they have electrified the symphony public with the spectacle of a new achievement in symphonic performance.

In a word, there is but one Boston symphony orchestra, and but one Koussevitzky. The combination has proved a supreme achievement in symphonic performance.

Tickets for the event, which can easily be classed one of the finest of the season on the musical calender, are now on sale at Steinert's, 183 Church street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL

APR 6 - 1929

KOUSSEVITZKY TO GIVE 9TH SYMPHONY

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which Serge Koussevitzky will direct for the first time in New York, will be the feature of the concerts by the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday and Saturday. These will be the orchestra's last visit of the season. The choral finale will be sung by the Schola Cantorum. The soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van Der Veer, Paul Althouse and Fraser Gange. The symphony will be preceded by an orchestral concerto by Philip Emanuel Bach.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
SUN
Lewiston, Me.

APR 5 1929

MUSICAL NOTES

Youngster's Symphony

Despite recent protests in the public prints and elsewhere, says the Boston Post, Serge Koussevitsky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, continues to offer the music of the youthful moderns whom he so valiantly espouses. For the first time in the United States the Symphony has played a Symphony by the twenty-six-year-old Russian Vladimir Dukelsky, already known here through a ballet-suite. The symphony is said to be amiably and ingeniously written with much melody and an unfailing gusto. But while copious and fluent it is sadly without distinction, and greatly at variance with the arbitrarily dissonant harmony that is used spasmodically.

The Boston Herald remarks: Mr. Diaghiley has called him (Dukelsky), a younger brother of Stravinsky and Prokofieff. He does not seem to be so closely related. Whatever his musical parentage, he does not need any family recommendation. Perhaps he is musically an illigitimate child, a rather unruly one, but of a vigorous nature as have been many famous men born out of wedlock. The symphony is interesting. Like all the compositions of young men who are at all worthy of attention in their desire to strike out a new path, to be individual, the symphonic first movement is yeasty. Here was need of the self-criticism that comes only with greater maturity.

The thematic material is not in itself alluring. There are incongruous episodes interrupting noisily and ineffectively any development. It is as if the hearer were subject to galvanic shocks. Yet even in this movement there is a proud independence —call it not arrogance or a foolish defiance—that wins respect if not whole-hearted admiration. Better this wild irregularity than obsequious following in the footsteps of smug, dull music makers of whose works the damning compliment "Anyhow they are well made," is all that can be said.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
TIMES UNION

Splendid Program By the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky offers a program of engrossing interest and great brilliance and beauty for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra to New Haven for a concert under the auspices of the Yale University School of Music. The concert will be given in Woolsey hall, Wednesday evening, April 10th, at 8:15.

The principal number on the program will be Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor. This master work of Tchaikovsky is one of the most impressive and popular of his scores. The lovely andante cantabile of the second movement, introduced by a horn solo, is particularly famous. The interpretation of this symphony by the remarkable Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra is looked upon as one of his finest achievements.

The first part of the program will consist of three shorter classics of the French school—Berlioz' overture to "The Roman Carnival," Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerere's Apprentice."

Berlioz' resplendent Overture owes its color largely to the use of the English horn, which as an orchestral instrument was comparatively new in the composer's day. Perhaps the most characteristic single instrument of Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" is the solo flute which contributes largely to the mood picture of the Faun, lying on a grassy bank and dreaming of his amours with a group of nymphs. Debussy thus set in music the verses of Mallarme, the impressionist poet.

Paul Dukas, the living French composer, is perhaps best known by his "Sorcerer's Apprentice." It is a humorous piece, quite in the vein of the fantastic ballad of Goeth, which bears the same name. The Magician's apprentice picks up enough of his master's art to experiment with it in his absence by using the proper incantations. He sets up the broom as a scarecrow, gives it a pail of water and orders it to clean up the place, but what he has started he has not the power to stop. There is a general flood and the master returning, finally restores order.

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

FROM THE SUN
R 5 1929

ICAL NOTES

ker's Symphony

nt protests in the pub-
d elsewhere, says the Serge Koussevitsky, the
the Boston Symphony
continues to offer the youthful moderns whom tly espouses. For the the United States the has played a Symphony
nty-six-year-old Russian kelsky, already known
h a ballet-suite. The said to be amiably and written with much mel-unfailing gusto. But and fluent it is sadly uction, and greatly at the arbitrarily dissonhat is used spasmodi-

Herald remarks: Mr.
alls him (Dukelsky), ers of Stravinsky and does not seem to be
d. Whatever his mu-
he does not need mmendation. Perhaps an illigitimate child,
one, but of a vigor-
ve been many famut of wedlock. The esting. Like all the oung men who are attention in their a new path, to be symphonic first
. Here was need that comes only ty.
aterial is not in re any incongruupting noisily and evelopment. It is e subject to gai-en in this mond independence nce or a foolish respect if not iration. Better than obsequi-
the footsteps of nakers of whose ng compliment ell made," is all

G FROM , CONN.
UNION

ram
Boston ny Orchestra sky offers a pro g interest and d beauty for the

the Boston Symp to New Haven for he auspices of the School of Music.
be given in Wool-
day evening, April

umber on the pro-
Tchaikovsky's Fifth
minor. This master
ikovsky is one of the e and popular of his ely andante cantabile
movement, introduced
o, is particularly faterpretation of this he remarkable Rus-
of the Boston Sym-
is looked upon as achievements.
of the program will shorter classics of l—Berlioz' overture
Carnival," Debussy's
Afternoon of a as' Scherzo, "The ntice," ndent Overture
rgely to the use of n, which as an or-ent was compara-
the composer's day.
st characteristic sini-of Debussy's "After-un", is the solo flute
utes largely to the f the Faun, lying on and dreaming of his
a group of nymphs
t in music the verses
e impressionist poet,
the living French
rhaps best known by Apprentice." It is a
, quite in the vein
c ballad of Goeth, same name. The rentice picks up
aster's art to experi-
his absence by using ntations. He sets
e scarecrow, gives it
nd orders it to clean
what he has started ower to stop. There
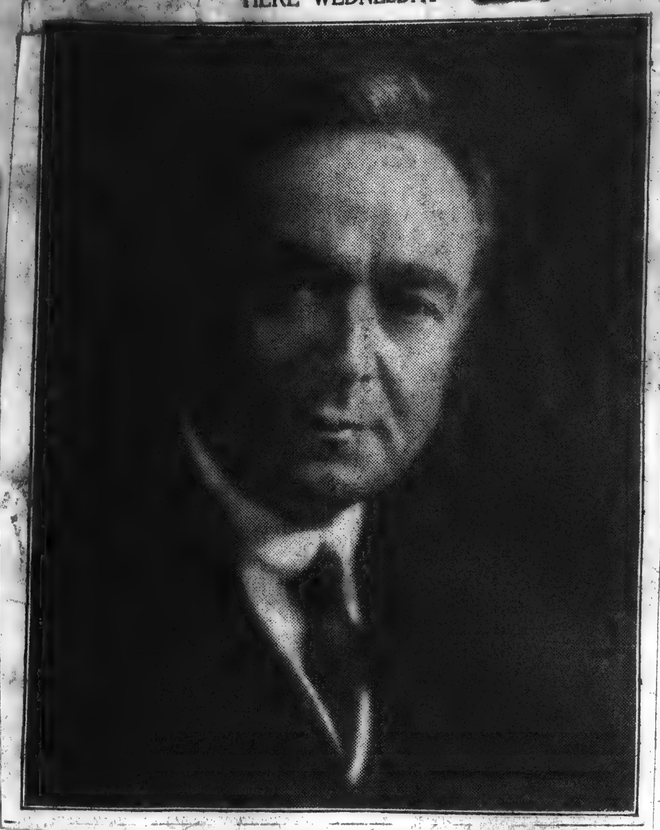
d and the master
restores order.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN
JOURNAL COURIER
APR 6 - 1929

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, LEADER OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY, HERE WEDNESDAY



THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
APR 6 - 192

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. SUN

Closing Orchestral Concerts

Boston Symphony in Beethoven's Ninth—Brahms and Strauss for Last Philharmonic—Friends of Music in "Samson"

BEETHOVEN'S Ninth Symphony, which Serge Koussevitzky will give for the first time in New York, will be the feature of both concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. These will be this orchestra's last visits to New York of the season. In the performance of this work the choral part will be taken by the Schola Cantorum, which has been trained by Hugh Ross. The quartet of soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, bass. At each performance the symphony will be preceded by an orchestral concerto in D Major by Philip Emanuel Bach, which has been re-orchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg.

The Philharmonic-Symphony Society begins the last week of its eighty-seventh season tomorrow afternoon with a concert at Carnegie Hall under the direction of Clemens Krauss, guest conductor. The program includes the Tchaikovsky Fifth Symphony, and four Wagner numbers, overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Siegfried's Rhine Journey from "Goetterdaemmerung," "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" and the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." For Thursday afternoon, Friday evening and Saturday evening Mr. Kraus has scheduled the overture to "Abu Hassan" of Weber, Korngold's "Much Ado About Nothing" Suite, the Hungarian Dances Nos. 10, 3 and 1 of Brahms and Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben." A Brahms-Strauss program comprising the First Symphony, the Love Scene from "Feuershot," "Don Juan," and "Salome's Dance" ends the season next Sunday afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

[illegible] April 11 and 13. This will be the orchestra's last visit to New York of the season. In the performance of this work, the choral part will be taken by the Schola Cantorum, which has been trained by Hugh Ross. The quartet of soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van de Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, bass. At each performance the symphony will be preceded by an orchestral concerto in D major by Philip Emanuel Bach, which has been reorchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
APR 6 - 1929

* * *

The Boston Symphony orchestra is giving its final New York concerts of the season this week, the first taking place on Thursday evening and the second this afternoon. On both occasions Mr. Koussevitzky presented the "Ninth Symphony by Beethoven, with the chorus of the Schola Cantorum taking part. The soloists are Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Grange, basso. The orchestra was heard in concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, last evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

Boston Symphony in Brooklyn

The season's concluding concert in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will be given at the Academy of Music next Friday evening (April 12). The programme includes:

"Unfinished" Symphony (Schubert), "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" Symphonic Schergo (Dukas), Second Symphony (Brahms).

153

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE
APR 7 - 1929

Greatness and Conductors

By EDWARD CUSHING

CONTRARY to the belief of many who have from time to time been given audience in these columns, such is the native and charming enthusiasm of the American public that there has grown up the warm-hearted practice of saluting the idol of the moment, or the season, as the greatest, whatever he may be, in the world. Butterfingers is the greatest fiddler, Bumpff is the greatest pianist, Leonini is the greatest conductor—the greatest, the greatest, the greatest in the world. It is not our intention now to question the sagacity of this custom, since other matters are afoot. Let us rather accept it for what it is, the indication of our amiable and generous temperament, and in pursuance thereof consider for a little while the contemporary claimants to Leonini's wreath of bay. Who is the Leonini of the hour, the greatest conductor, if not in the world which is large, then the most salient, or, shall we say, the least disputable conductor now before us? It has been suggested before that the honors of supremacy are in this connection sometimes too hastily bestowed, that their disposition is not unlikely to depend upon the emotion aroused by a few startling and superlative performances rather than upon a patient and judicious appraisal of the candidate's pretensions. So, lest we be led astray by that seductive error, let us take ourselves firmly in hand and—ruling out for the moment our most treasured recollections of Mr. Toscanini's Wagner, Mr. Mengelberg's Strauss, Mr. Koussewitsky's Russians and the Brahms and Bach of Mr. Stokowski—endeavor first of all to give definition to what we mean when we apply to a conductor the epithet great.

* * *

IMMEDIATELY, in the search for definition, we find ourselves up against the indefinable, the prime requisite of greatness, without which all other qualities are unavailing—namely, genius. It is the idiosyncrasy of music that until it is recreated, made audible, it must lie dormant, passive, almost in a state of not-being. It is nothing more than so much ink on paper, a schedule of directions having as little resemblance to the musical entity imagined by the composer as the architect's blueprints bear to the cathedral that will be erected from them. The analogy, of course, is slight; for the contractor, if he faithfully carry out the specifications supplied him, will achieve exactly the cathedral that the architect intended. But the builder in tones, the musician, has a far more difficult problem on his hands. A composer's blueprints cannot be so explicit as an architect's. It is literally true that the composer's intention cannot be set down on paper, that it can only be suggested by a formal system of notation supplemented with indications of tempo and dynamics and expression—a system which leaves open a wide possibility of misinterpretation. Essentially the composer's intention is incommunicable except by the meeting of minds across an unfathomable gulf, and to accomplish that meeting, that merging of spirits, is the first necessity of the conductor. He must, by a magic indispensable to his art, become a sort of projection of the composer, the composer's other self, and at the same time an unobstructed and, if the term is admissible, propulsive channel for the communication of the composer's logos. If it happens that the composer was a genius, then it follows that only a conductor who is also a genius can achieve this feat. Mr. Flutterarm makes an admirable impression with "Les Preludes" or the 1812 Overture, but he whips with a helpless baton the introduction to "Tristan," or the Passacaglia of the Brahms E minor Symphony—for the power of miracle is not his and the reanimation fails to occur.

* * *

THE direction of the modern orchestra of well over an hundred players and the competent performance of its vast and diverse literature require that the conductor be also possessed of an enormous technical equipment. Many of the second and even third-rate orchestral directors today are dazzling executants whose virtuosity would have completely overwhelmed their foremost predecessors two generations back. But despite their control of ways and means, it is a singular fact—which we shall not attempt to explain—that only the truly great conductor can build up and sustain a great orchestra, fusing its hundred-odd component parts into a single responsive instrument, developing that beauty of tone which is the ultimate test of its excellence. and imbuing it with the fire of his own genius. And with what other qualities must our least dispensable conductor be endowed? He must have taste and a reasonable amount of skill in the arranging of programs. He will not bore and irritate his audiences with the frequent performance, however magnificent, of inferior compositions. For, when all is said and done, the fact remains that one goes to concerts to hear music, and the better the music the better the concert, whereas the better the performance of poor music the more exasperating it becomes that splendid ability should be wasted upon ignoble material. Finally, the conductor must be highly sympathetic and receptive to new music, yet as discriminating in selecting it for performance as the current supply will permit. His musicianship must be both wide and deep, and, if he has original talent of his own, so much the better. This last may hardly be regarded as a sine qua non to greatness—indeed, most of the outstanding conductors in the history of the profession never played or published a bar of their own composition; but the value of a conductor to the community will be tremendously enhanced if he is also a distinguished musician.

* * *

NOW it is, as the reader will already have perceived, abundantly evident that no living conductor, and no dead one either for that matter, corresponds in every respect to the ideal figure that we have compelled ourselves to imagine. The most exalted among them always manage to leave something to be desired, although god-like, they are human; which is to say they all have their faults. One of [illegible] Leonini, the greatest conductor in the world, is that he plays everything better than his compeers could possibly play anything. And nothing, it need hardly be said, could be further from the truth. Dr. Karl Muck in the days before the war was the undisputed leader among the conductors before the American public. From Boston he brought his superb orchestra on ritualistic visits to New York, very much like a high priest in procession with the Ark of the Covenant for the edification of the worshipful provincials. An almost perfect conductor, Dr. Muck occasionally had his less impeccable moments. He would, for example, play "Scheherazade" as if it were something left over that he had found in the icebox—with a frigid distaste that omitted the dimmest suggestion of its coruscant, if slightly obvious, splendor. It may very well be that you have become a little weary of Rimsky's sumptuous evocation of the Thousand and One Nights—the thousand and one repetitions it has enjoyed in New York would dull the edge of far nobler music and has—but the fact remains that this suite is breathlessly and brilliantly alive from the first measure to the last, and for Dr. Muck to treat it as he might treat one of the less gaudy works of Max Reger was a lapse on the part of the great man that even his most catholic admirers found difficulty in condoning.

Dr. Muck, however, has long been incorporated in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mr. Koussewitsky, the most fortunate of his successors in securing the affections of the public, now directs its destinies. No one who has heard Mr. Koussewitsky conduct performances of, say, music by Debussy, Ravel, Strawinsky or Scriabine will care to deny that he is a great conductor. His limitations, however, are not to be overlooked. For his levitous interpretations of the classics, of Beethoven, Schubert and Brahms he has long been notorious. Foremost among his contemporaries and rivals in New York [illegible] have [illegible] recently, [illegible]. Now the characteristics of Mr. Mengelberg's conducting, since in all probability we will hear little more of it, there is no need to linger. An ardent spirit certainly, he does many things incomparably well—his Strauss, for example. But much also that he has done has a pedestrian quality, a mere competence over which one cannot enthuse, and as years have passed his programs have grown more and more indifferent in quality. Conducting appears no longer to be an art in his case, but to have degenerated, at its worst, into a routine, and so he can press no serious claim upon our attention.

With Mr. Toscanini it is otherwise, though even he is not infallible. His programs, certainly, are little better than Mr. Mengelberg's; the novelties that he has offered have been commonplace or worse, for his is an unfortunate fondness for blatantly second-rate Italian music. He has played many a witless composition by some one of his compatriots and contemporaries for all it was worth, but since it was worth nothing (alas, how often!) the whole matter amounted in the end to exactly that. There remains, of course, his pre-eminence as an executant of the composer's will. Yet Mr. Toscanini has occasionally, and is matters not now rarely, failed even here—in the recreation of the slow movement of the Brahms D major Symphony, for example, or of Debussy's "Iberia," or the overture to "Tannhaeuser." But on the whole, we suppose, as the servant of the composer, Mr. Toscanini deserves to be considered great—indeed, very great. The trouble is merely that he chooses so often to serve composers who do not merit his ministrations, to lavish upon an unworthy object the precious, the incalculable benefit of his care and devotion.

* * *

WHICH brings us to Mr. Stokowski. One remembers the gallant leader of the Philadelphia Orchestra galloping through a pompously vacant symphony by Bruckner with the air of a commuter whose eye is on his wrist watch and whose whole mind is anxiously concentrated on the 10:26 train for Philadelphia. Nobody, so far as is known, made Mr. Stokowski play Bruckner's symphony; it was evident that he did not enjoy it, and neither did any one else—a circumstance which in any case was probable, but which was rendered unavoidable by Mr. Stokowski. That was several years ago, however, and it is to be remembered that the eminent Philadelphian no longer behaves quite so cavalierly toward his New York audience (though last Tuesday evening he inflicted upon them a trying program and a very unsatisfactory reading of Mozart's G minor Symphony). Still a young man, for a conductor of his rank, he presents, in a felicitous combination, many of the qualities which determine a conductor's value to his audience. He is, without question, an unsurpassable virtuoso of orchestral technique, one who plays upon the most intricate and difficult of instruments with a mastery of its every recourse that is often breath-taking. And he is—one cannot deny it—a profound and often exquisitely perceptive musician, a sensitive, passionate and nobly eloquent expositor of at least two of the four gospels of music. His Bach and his Brahms stand alone; his Beethoven has been equalled, maybe it has been surpassed. But only as exegete of the Fourth Book is he surely lower than the highest—for when Mr. Toscanini discourses upon Wagner he is a prophet speaking to us from a mountain-top whose lightning-girded crest none but he can scale.

It is not Wagner, not Beethoven, then, but Bach and Brahms that are the measure of Mr. Stokowski's greatness. No one who has heard him conduct the Philadelphia Orchestra in his own arrangement of the C minor Passacaglia can doubt the primacy of that genius. To those who would know this man's stature, we recommend the study of his phonographic recording of the Brahms C minor and F major Symphonies; play them over and follow them attentively with the score: everything that you read on those astonishing pages is there, and yet there is infinitely more—there is the living flame that is enkindled only by the contact of genius with genius. Such things are the very miracles of our latter day, not to be explained * * *

Mr. Toscanini and Mr. Stokowski are, therefore, the least dispensable conductors now before us? The question, we believe, admits of only one answer. They are not the ideal conductors that the imagination conjures into being, but within human limitations they are great. It would be a splendid thing if the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra were to be delivered finally and permanently into their hands, to be perfected by them, and employed as the instrument for the revelation not so much of their genius as of the genius which at their command springs into ardent and indomitable life from music's printed page. And perhaps—who can tell?—we may rejoice in this blessing.

PING FROM THE
SUN
R 5 1929

ICAL NOTES

ater's Symphony.
ent protests in the pub-
d elsewhere, says the Serge Koussevitsky, the
the Boston Symphony
continues to offer the youthful moderns whom ntly espouses. For the n the United States the has played a Symphony
nty-six-year-old Russian kelsky, already known
h a ballet-suite. The said to be amiably and written with much meln' unfailing gusto. But s and fluent it is sadly nction, and greatly at the arbitrarily disson-
that is used spasmodi-

Herald remarks: Mr.
called him (Dukelsky), ther of Stravinsky and does not seem to be
ed. Whatever his mu-
, he does not need ommendation. Perhaps an illigitimate child.
one, but of a vigor-
have been many famout of wedlock. The eresting. Like all the young men who are attention in their ut a new path, to be symphonic first
ty. Here was need m that comes only rity.
material is not in here are incongru-rupting noisily and development. It is re subject to gal-
ven in this move-
roud independence ance or a foolish
s respect if not miration. Better
ty than obsequi-
the footsteps of makers of whose ning compliment well made," is all

NG FROM N, CONN.
UNION

gram
Boston ony Orchestra

tzky offers a pro
ing interest and nd beauty for the
the Boston Sym-
to New Haven for the auspices of the School of Music.
be given in Wool-
day evening, April

number on the pro-
Tchaikovsky's Fifth
minor. This master
kovsky is one of the e and popular of his ely andante cantabile
movement, introduced
, is particularly fa-
terpretation of this he remarkable Rus-
of the Boston Sym-
is looked upon as achievements.
of the program will shorter classics of l—Berlioz' overture
Carnival," Debussy's
Afternoon of a kas' Scherzo, "The ntické," plendent Overture
argely to the use of rn, which as an or-ment was compara-
the composer's day.
st characteristic sin-
of Debussy's "After-un" is the solo flute
utes largely to the f the Faun, lying on and dreaming of his
a group of nymphs.
t in music the verses
he impressionist poet.
the living French
rhaps best known by Apprentice." It is a e, quite in the vein ic ballad of Goeth.
same name. The prentice picks up
aster's art to experi-
his absence by using antations. He sets a scarecrow, gives it
nd orders it to clean
what he has started
ower to stop. There od and the master
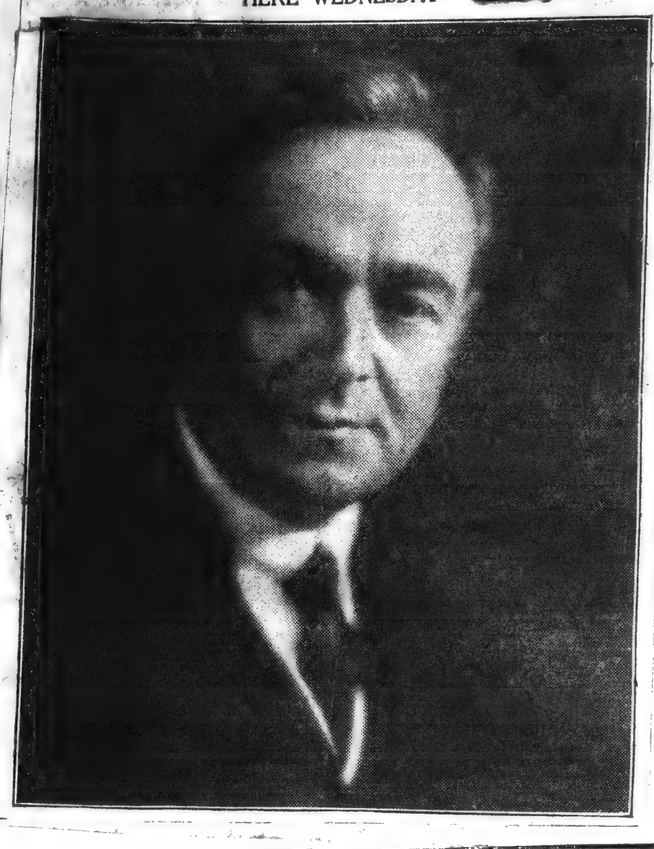
y restores order.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN
JOURNAL COURIER
APR 6 - 1929

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, LEADER OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY, HERE WEDNESDAY



THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
APR 6 - 1

Closing

H'S EFFECT
SITIVE MIND

Symphony, which Serge Koussevitzky will give for the first time in New York, will be the feature of both concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. These will be this orchestra's last visits to New York of the season. In the performance of this work the choral part will be taken by the Schola Cantorum, which has been trained by Hugh Ross. The quartet of soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, bass. At each performance the symphony will be preceded by an orchestral concerto in D Major by Philip Emanuel Bach, which has been re-orchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg.

The Philharmonic-Symphony Society begins the last week of its eighty-seventh season tomorrow afternoon with a concert at Carnegie Hall under the direction of Clemens Krauss, guest conductor. The program includes the Tchaikovsky Fifth Symphony, and four Wagner numbers, overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Siegfried's Rhine Journey from "Goetterdaemmerung," "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" and the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." For Thursday afternoon, Friday evening and Saturday evening Mr. Kraus has scheduled the overture to "Abu Hassan" of Weber, Korngold's "Much Ado About Nothing" Suite, the Hungarian Dances Nos. 10, 3 and 1 of Brahms and Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben." A Brahms-Strauss program comprising the First Symphony, the Love Scene from "Feuersnot," "Don Juan," and "Salome's Dance" ends the season next Sunday afternoor at Carnegie Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. SUN

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which will be heard for the first time in New York under Mr. Kousevitzky, will be the feature of both concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, April 11 and 12. This will be the orchestra's last visit to New York of the season. In the performance of this work, the choral part will be taken by the Schola Cantorum, which has been trained by Hugh Ross. The quartet of soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van de Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, bass. At each performance the symphony will be preceded by an orchestral concerto in D major by Philip Emanuel Bach, which has been reorchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
6 - 1929

* * *

The Boston Symphony orchestra is giving its final New York concerts of the season this week, the first taking place on Thursday evening and the second this afternoon. On both occasions Mr. Koussevitzky presented the "Ninth Symphony" by Beethoven, with the chorus of the Schola Cantorum taking part. The soloists are Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Grange, basso. The orchestra was heard in concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, last evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

Boston Symphony in Brooklyn

The season's concluding concert in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will be given at the Academy of Music next Friday evening (April 12). The programme includes:

"Unfinished" Symphony (Schubert), "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" Symphonic Schergo (Dukas), Second Symphony (Brahms).

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE
APR 7 - 1929

153

Greatness and Conductors

By EDWARD CUSHING

CONTRARY to the belief of many who have from time to time been given audience in these columns, such is the native and charming enthusiasm of the American public that there has grown up the warm-hearted practice of saluting the idol of the moment, or the season, as the greatest, whatever he may be, in the world. Butterfingers is the greatest fiddler, Bumpff is the greatest pianist, Leonini is the greatest conductor—the greatest, the greatest, the greatest in the world. It is not our intention now to question the sagacity of this custom, since other matters are afoot. Let us rather accept it for what it is, the indication of our amiable and generous temperament, and in pursuance thereof consider for a little while the contemporary claimants to Leonini's wreath of bay. Who is the Leonini of the hour, the greatest conductor, if not in the world which is large, then the most salient, or, shall we say, the least dispensable conductor now before us? It has been suggested before that the honors of supremacy are in this connection sometimes too hastily bestowed, that their disposition is not unlikely to depend upon the emotions aroused by a few startling and superlative performances rather than upon a patient and judicious appraisal of the candidate's pretensions. So, lest we be led astray by that seductive error, let us take ourselves firmly in hand and—ruling out for the moment our most treasured recollections of Mr. Toscanini's Wagner, Mr. Mengelberg's Strauss, Mr. Koussewitsky's Russians and the Brahms and Bach of Mr. Stokowski—endeavor first of all to give definition to what we mean when we apply to a conductor the epithet great.

* *

IMMEDIATELY, in the search for definition, we find ourselves up against the indefinable, the prime requisite of greatness, without which all other qualities are unavailing—namely, genius. It is the idiosyncrasy of music that until it is recreated, made audible, it must lie dormant, passive, almost in a state of not-being. It is nothing more than so much ink on paper, a schedule of directions having as little resemblance to the musical entity imagined by the composer as the architect's blueprints bear to the cathedral that will be erected from them. The analogy, of course, is slight; for the contractor, if he faithfully carry out the specifications supplied him, will achieve exactly the cathedral that the architect intended. But the builder in tones, the musician, has a far more difficult problem on his hands. A composer's blueprints cannot be so explicit as an architect's. It is literally true that the composer's intention cannot be set down on paper, that it can only be suggested by a formal system of notation supplemented with indications of tempo and dynamics and expression—a system which leaves open a wide possibility of misinterpretation. Essentially the composer's intention is incommunicable except by the meeting of minds across an unfathomable gulf, and to accomplish that meeting, that merging of spirits, is the first necessity of the conductor. He must, by a magic indispensable to his art, become a sort of projection of the composer, the composer's other self, and at the same time an unobstructed and, if the term is admissible, propulsive channel for the communication of the composer's logos. If it happens that the composer was a genius, then it follows that only a conductor who is also a genius can achieve this feat. Mr. Flutterarm makes an admirable impression with "Les Preludes" or the 1812 Overture, but he whips with a helpless baton the introduction to "Tristan," or the Passacaglia of the Brahms E minor Symphony—for the power of miracle is not his and the reanimation fails to occur.

* * *

THE direction of the modern orchestra of well over an hundred players and the competent performance of its vast and diverse literature require that the conductor be also possessed of an enormous technical equipment. Many of the second and even third-rate orchestral directors today are dazzling executants whose virtuosity would have completely overwhelmed their foremost predecessors two generations back. But despite their control of ways and means, it is a singular fact—which we shall not attempt to explain—that only the truly great conductor can build up and sustain a great orchestra, fusing its hundred-odd component parts into a single responsive instrument, developing that beauty of tone which is the ultimate test of its excellence. and imbuing it with the fire of his own genius. And with what other qualities must our least dispensable conductor be endowed? He must have taste and a reasonable amount of skill in the arranging of programs. He will not bore and irritate his audiences with the frequent performance, however magnificent, of inferior compositions. For, when all is said and done, the fact remains that one goes to concerts to hear music, and the better the music the better the concert, whereas the better the performance of poor music the more exasperating it becomes that splendid ability should be wasted upon ignoble material. Finally, the conductor must be highly sympathetic and receptive to new music, yet as discriminating in selecting it for performance as the current supply will permit. His musicianship must be both wide and deep, and, if he has original talent of his own, so much the better. This last may hardly be regarded as a sine qua non to greatness—indeed, most of the outstanding conductors in the history of the profession never played or published a bar of their own composition; but the value of a conductor to the community will be tremendously enhanced if he is also a distinguished musician.

* *

NOW it is, as the reader will already have perceived, abundantly evident that no living conductor, and no dead one either for that matter, corresponds in every respect to the ideal figure that we have compelled ourselves to imagine. The most exalted among them always manage to leave something to be desired, although god-like, they are human; which is to say they all have their faults. One of [illegible] and stubborn[illegible] about Leonini, the greatest conductor in the world, is that he plays everything better than his compeers could possibly play anything. And nothing, it need hardly be said, could be further from the truth. Dr. Karl Muck in the days before the war was the undisputed leader among the conductors before the American public. From Boston he brought his superb orchestra on ritualistic visits to New York, very much like a high priest in procession with the Ark of the Covenant for the edification of the worshipful provincials. An almost perfect conductor, Dr. Muck occasionally had his less impeccable moments. He would, for example, play "Scheherazade" as if it were something left over that he had found in the icebox—with a frigid distaste that omitted the dimmest suggestion of its coruscant, if slightly obvious, splendor. It may very well be that you have become a little weary of Rimsky's sumptuous evocation of the Thousand and One Nights—the thousand and one repetitions it has enjoyed in New York would dull the edge of far nobler music and has—but the fact remains that this suite is breathlessly and brilliantly alive from the first measure to the last, and for Dr. Muck to treat it as he might treat one of the less gaudy works of Max Reger was a lapse on the part of the great man that even his most catholic admirers found difficulty in condoning.

Dr. Muck, however, has long been incorporated in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mr. Koussewitsky, the most fortunate of his successors in securing the affections of the public, now directs its destinies. No one who has heard Mr. Koussewitsky conduct performances of, say, music by Debussy, Ravel, Strawinsky or Scriabin will care to deny that he is a great conductor. His limitations, however, are not to be overlooked. For his levitous interpretations of the classics, of Beethoven, Schubert and Brahms he has long been notorious. Foremost among his contemporaries and rivals in New York have [illegible]. Now the characteristics of Mr. Mengelberg's conducting, since in all probability we will hear little more of it, there is no need to linger. An ardent spirit certainly, he does many things incomparably well—his Strauss, for example. But much also that he has done has a pedestrian quality, a mere competence over which one cannot enthuse, and as years have passed his programs have grown more and more indifferent in quality. Conducting appears no longer to be an art in his case, but to have degenerated, at its worst, into a routine, and so he can press no serious claim upon our attention.

With Mr. Toscanini it is otherwise, though even he is not infallible. His programs, certainly, are little better than Mr. Mengelberg's; the novelties that he has offered have been commonplace or worse, for his is an unfortunate fondness for blatantly second-rate Italian music. He has played many a witless composition by some one of his compatriots and contemporaries for all it was worth, but since it was worth nothing (alas, how often!) the whole matter amounted in the end to exactly that. There remains, of course, his pre-eminence as an executant of the composer's will. Yet Mr. Toscanini has occasionally, and it matters not how rarely, failed even here—in the recreation of the slow movement of the Brahms D major Symphony, for example, or of Debussy's "Iberia," or the overture to "Tannhaeuser." But on the whole, we suppose, as the servant of the composer, Mr. Toscanini deserves to be considered great—indeed, very great. The trouble is merely that he chooses so often to serve composers who do not merit his ministrations, to lavish upon an unworthy object the precious, the incalculable benefit of his care and devotion.

* * *

WHICH brings us to Mr. Stokowski. One remembers the gallant leader of the Philadelphia Orchestra galloping through a pompously vacant symphony by Bruckner with the air of a commuter whose eye is on his wrist watch and whose whole mind is anxiously concentrated on the 10:25 train for Philadelphia. Nobody, so far as is known, made Mr. Stokowski play Bruckner's symphony; it was evident that he did not enjoy it, and neither did any one else—a circumstance which in any case was probable, but which was rendered unavoidable by Mr. Stokowski. That was several years ago, however, and it is to be remembered that the eminent Philadelphian no longer behaves quite so cavalierly toward his New York audience (though last Tuesday evening he inflicted upon them a trying program and a very unsatisfactory reading of Mozart's G minor Symphony). Still a young man, for a conductor of his rank, he presents, in a delicitous combination, many of the qualities which determine a conductor's value to his audience. He is, without question, an unsurpassable virtuoso of orchestral technique, one who plays upon the most intricate and difficult of instruments with a mastery of its every recourse that is often breath-taking. And he is—one cannot deny it—a profound and often exquisitely perceptive musician, a sensitive, passionate and nobly eloquent expositor of at least two of the four gospels of music. His Bach and his Brahms stand alone; his Beethoven has been equaled, maybe if has been surpassed. But only as exegete of the Fourth Book is he surely lower than the highest—for when Mr. Toscanini discourses upon Wagner he is a prophet speaking to us from a mountain-top whose lightning-girded crest none but he can scale.

It is not Wagner, not Beethoven, then, but Bach and Brahms that are the measure of Mr. Stokowski's greatness. No one who has heard him conduct the Philadelphia Orchestra in his own arrangement of the C minor Passacaglia can doubt the primacy of that genius. To those who would know this man's stature, we recommend the study of his phonographic recording of the Brahms C minor and F major Symphonies; play them over and follow them attentively with the score: everything that you read on those astonishing pages is there, and yet there is infinitely more—there is the living flame that is enkindled only by the contact of genius with genius. Such things are the very miracles of our latter day, not to be explained * * *

Mr. Toscanini and Mr. Stokowski are, therefore, the least dispensable conductors now before us? The question, we believe, admits of only one answer. They are not the ideal conductors that the imagination conjures into being, but within human limitations they are great. It would be a splendid thing if the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra were to be delivered finally and permanently into their hands, to be perfected by them, and employed as the instrument for the revelation not so much of their genius as of the genius which at their command springs into ardent and indomitable life from music's printed page. And perhaps—who can tell?—we may rejoice in this blessing.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

154

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
APR 7 - 192

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN

Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its last concert of its season, in Brooklyn, next Friday evening, April 12, in the Academy of Music. The program will begin with Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony in B minor, which has naturally been a feature of the season which has marked the centennial of the composer's death.

Koussevitzky will also present the scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," of Paul Dukas, the living French composer, which is a humorous musical characterization of Goethe's fanciful ballad. The Magician's apprentice picks up enough of his master's art to experiment with it in his absence by using the proper incantations. He sets up the broom as a scarecrow, gives it a pail of water and orders it to clean up the place, but what he has started he has not the power to stop. There is a general flood, and the master, returning, finally restores order.

The program at the season will end with Brahm's lyric masterpiece, the Second Symphony in D major.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
APR 7 - 192

BEETHOVEN'S Choral Symphony, better known as the Ninth, has been chosen by Serge Koussevitzky for two of his farewell concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season in New York. There will be a more general program in Brooklyn on Friday. The Beethoven classic will be heard in Manhattan at the concerts in Carnegie Hall on both Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

In the performance of this work, adds an official note, the choral part will be taken by the Schola Cantorum, which has been trained by Hugh Ross. The quartet of soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van der Veer, Paul Althouse and Fraser Gange.

At each performance the symphony will be preceded by an orchestral concerto in D major by Philip Emanuel Bach, which has been reorchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg.

When the Ninth Symphony was done in Boston last week it was preceded by what Philip Hale described as an "incomparably beautiful performance" of Beethoven's First Symphony, for which Mr. Koussevitzky reduced the size of the orchestra. The soloists in the Ninth on that occasion were Ethyl Hayden, Devora Nadvorney, Charles Stratton and the bass, who alone will be in the quartet for the New York hearing, Fraser Gange.

Before the other music at their Boston concert, Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave the funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica" in memory of Field Marshal Foch.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE
APR 7 - 192

Under the direction of Serge Koussewitsky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its final pair of New York concerts this season in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week. The programs for both occasions are identical:

C. P. E. Bach .....Concerto in B
Beethoven .....Ninth Symphony

The orchestra will be assisted by the chorus of the Schola Cantorum and by four soloists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
TIMES
APR 7 - 192

Sergei Koussevitsky closes out his Brooklyn season on Friday night when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will offer at the Academy of Music Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, the scherzo from Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice" and Brahms' second symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
APR 7 - 1929

Koussevitzky Leads Here

...Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. This will be this orchestra's last visit to New York of the season. In the performance of this work, the choral part will be taken by the Schola Cantorum, which has been trained by Hugh Ross. The quartet of soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van Der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, bass.

At each performance the symphony will be preceded by an orchestral concerto in D major by Philip Emanuel Bach, which has been reorchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN
JOURNAL COURIER
APR 7 - 192

SPLENDID PROGRAM BY BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCH.

Serge Koussevitzky offers a program of engrossing interest and great brilliance and beauty for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New Haven for a concert under the auspices of the Yale University School of Music. The concert will be given in Woolsey hall tomorrow evening.

The principal number on the program will be Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor. This master work of Tchaikovsky is one of the most impressive and popular of his scores. The lovely andante cantabile of the second movement, introduced by a horn solo, is particularly famous. The interpretation of this symphony by the remarkable Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is looked upon as one of his finest achievements.

The first part of the program will consist of three shorter classics of the French school—Berlioz' Overture to "The Roman Carnival," Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

Berliozs resplendent Overture owesits color largely to the use of the English horn, which as an orchestral instrument was comparatively new in the composer's day. Perhaps the most characteristic single instrument of Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" is the solo flute, which contributes largely to the mood picture of the Faun, lying on a grassy bank and dreaming of his amours with a group of nymphs. Debussy thus set in music the verses of Mallarme, the impressionist poet.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune
APR 7 - 192

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, paying its last New York visit of the season this week, will devote its Thursday night and Saturday afternoon programs to Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, preceded by Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach's concerto in D, as arranged by Maximilian Steinberg. The Schola Cantorum, trained by Hugh Ross, will be the assisting chorus in the finale of the Beethoven work, with Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada van der Veer, Paul Althouse and Fraser Gange as the soloists.

These will be Mr. Koussevitzky's first performances of the Boston Symphony in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
APR 7 - 1

An Ear for Music

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Woolsey Hall on the evening of April 10, has in the four years he has directed this remarkable ensemble of musicians advanced the high standard always maintained by this organization to even greater heights. The program to be presented by the brilliant Russian and the 110 musicians under the sway of his baton is a particularly stimulating one.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
APR 7 - 192

Howard Hanson's Nordic Symphony will be heard for the first time in Boston on April 5 and 6, when it will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
APR 7 - 192

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 8:30 P. M. Conductor, Serge Koussevitzky; assisting artists, the Schola Cantorum of New York, conducted by Hugh Ross. Soloists, Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van der Veer, Paul Althouse and Fraser Gange.

Concerto for Orchestra in D major..C. P. E. Bach.....Arr. by Maxmillan Steinberg
Symphony No. 9 in D minor, with final Chorus on Schiller's "Ode to Joy," Op. 125 .....Beethoven

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
APR 8 - 192

THE CAREER OF SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Nothing, save his eloquent performances, reveals more clearly the artistic sincerity and devotion of Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which comes to Woolsey Hall Wednesday evening, than the circumstances of his career.

He first conducted as a boy of twelve when he led the local theatre orchestra at his birthplace in the province of Tver, in northern Russia. Attending the Conservatory at Moscow, he was required to study an instrument. He chose the doublebass, and the noted master, Ramboussec, was his teacher. His proficiency upon this unusual instrument became so extraordinary that he toured all of Europe and became famous before he was even known as a conductor.

Koussevitzky's abilities, indeed, were not of the sort to be so confined to a limited field, and from 1909 he devoted all his energies to conducting. He organized his own symphony orchestra in Moscow, which soon came to be considered the finest in Russia. In Moscow and Petrograd he conducted the classics gave Beethoven, Bach, Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, and other festivals each season, and championed works by young composers then unknown but since accepted.

But Koussevitzky could not rest content with bringing music to the city folk of Russia. There lay about him a vast agrarian population, most of whom had never even heard a symphony concert. He chartered a large steamer on the Volga River, and, taking his entire orchestra, together with soloists and a group of friends, made several voyages along the 2,500 miles of its basin. The party would port at each town along its bank, and announce a symphony concert in the local town hall. The country folk were of course astonished at this wonderful new kind of music, but they were also both delighted and moved by it.

In 1909, in partnership with his wife, Koussevitzky inaugurated in Russia what has come to be one of the most important of music publishing concerns. In this way there have been published works by such Russian composers as Stranvinsky, Rachmaninoff, Prokofieff, and Sciabin. Thus, in championing a new score which he believes significant, Koussevitzky can give it public performance and publication as well.

The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his Orchestra, but not of his energies. He became conductor of the Russian State Orchestra (formerly the Court Orchestra).

It was in 1920 that Koussevitzky was first heard as a conductor in western Europe. He assembled an orchestra in Paris, and has since conducted annually his series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" at the Opera House. He is also invited annually to conduct a series as guest of Sir Henry Wood's Orchestra in London. Principally through these concerts, but also by virture of operatic performances in Paris and elsewhere, Koussevitzky has come to be regarded as the most brilliant, inspired, and inspiring conductor in that part of the world.

Each Spring since Koussevitzky became the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924, he has returned at the conclusion of his American season to conduct his Paris and London series, which the European public evidently, hold to be an indispensable part of his musical life.

America's admiration of Koussevitzky need scarcely be pointed out. The Boston Symphony Orchestra's sensitive response as one man to his least gesture bespeaks the leader of command and authority. The fine clarity with which he presents the music of the older masters, his inspired eloquence with the "romantics", and his discernment in choosing and his brilliance in performing the significant music of our own day; these things reveal an extraordinary range of artistic sympathy. And not least, there are qualities of illuminating imagination in his performances which are said to be quite without equal.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
TIMES UNION
APR 9 - 1929

Growth of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

In 47 years, the Boston Symphony orchestra which comes to Woolsey hall tomorrow evening, has become a great cultural force and one of the finest musical organizations in the world. In size, in schedule, in cultural influence, and in prestige, it has grown from relatively small beginnings to a present estate as busy as it is glorious.

EMINENCE THROUGH YEARS OF ENDEAVOR.

The gradual growth of the Boston Symphony orchestra is interesting to follow. In 1881 the orchestra, as founded by Major Henry Lee Higginson, numbered 60 players, a personnel which has since grown to 110. Its original season of 20 concerts in Boston, and occasional appearances elsewhere, has increased to more than 73 concerts in greater Boston, and concerts on tour, which brings the total number of each season to considerably over 100. The most illlustrious personnel which could be obtained, under the guiding hand of a succession of great conductors, has resulted in an orchestra—the name of which has long stood throughout the musical world as a by-word of the nearest thing to perfection in symphonic performance humanly possible.

HOW ITS SCHEDULE OF CONCERTS HAS GROWN.

The Boston Symphony orchestra began its career by giving 20 concerts on successive Saturday evenings in Boston. Soon the practice was started of admitting the public to the last rehearsal on the preceding Friday afternoon, for the small fee of 25 cents. These rehearsals eventually took on the aspect of a regular concert, except the name which likewise was finally dropped. Thus a weekly Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concert, at which the program was played brought the annual number of concerts in Boston to 48. When the demand for seats became greater than these concerts could supply a series of five Monday evening concerts was added, and later still another series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts. These, together with pension fund concerts on Sunday afternoons, concerts for the young people, and nine concerts which are given in Cambridge, across the Charles river, under the auspices of Harvard university, gives the total of 75 annual concerts by this orchestra in its own city.

CONCERTS AFIELD.

On five weeks during the season, which lasts from early October until the end of April, the orchestra visits New York, giving each time a concert in Carnegie hall on Thursday evening, a concert in Brooklyn on Friday evening, and another concert with a different program in Carnegie hall on Saturday afternoon. The full itinerary also includes a series of five concerts in Providence, R. I., orchestral concerts in New England, and an annnual tour of the north, middle west, or south, which carries the orchestra as far as Canada, Chicago, or Washington.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has traveled so far as Chicago, and in 1915, the summer of the Panama Pacific Exposition at San Francisco, traveled in a body across 3,000 miles of the continent to the Pacific coast, giving a notable series on the exposition grounds.

CONCERTS AT UNIVERSITIES.

The principal universities in New England, engage the orchestra each year to give a concert under their auspices, notably: Harvard university in Cambridge, Yale university in New Haven, Wellesley college at Wellesley, Cornell university in Ithaca, N. Y., Brown university in Rhode Island, and Smith college at Northampton, Mass.

EACH SERIES SOLIDLY SUBSCRIBED.

So great is the demand for tickets for the Boston Symphony concerts that for all of these nine series, with a single minor exception, all seats are engaged in advance by subscription. In certain series, such as the 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturdaw evening concerts in Boston, such seats as are released each spring are allotted to those upon the waiting lists, so that there is no public sale for these series. It is, therefore, next to impossible for any one otherwise than a subscriber to buy a reserved seat for a Boston Symphony concert in Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
APR 9 - 192

HISTORY OF BOSTON SYMPHONY A RECORD OF HIGH ENDEAVOR

The superlative performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be heard at Woolsey Hall tomorrow evening, are indeed a thing to wonder at. But just how and why this organization has come to be one of the very greatest in the world leaves little room for speculation or debate. The simple facts of its history are self-explanatory.

In 1881, the late Major Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston a full-sized symphony orchestra —a rare phonomenon in those days. This noted musician, soldier, financier, and public-spirited citizen believed that there was a musical public for such an undertaking. Sparing no expense, he engaged the finest musicians then available in Europe to fill up its ranks, and brought to this country one after another of the world's greatest conductors to lend their individual genius to the cumulative improvement of the Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in its original form had only sixty players, and its conduetor was George Henschel, a celebrated musician of the day. The initial aims (always since adhered to) were that the musicians should play under one conductor in one orchestra, and not debase their talents by routine engagements; that the symphony concerts should provide only the finest music; that artistic considerations should always be paramount, and that the conductor be given absolute control. Controversy waxed hot in those days. The policies, the programmes, even the venture itself were violently attacked and staunchley defended. But the wisdom of the founder was justified as each succeeding year of the Orchestra added growth and success to the last. In 1900 Symphony Hall was built, to become the Orchestra's special and permanent home.

The second conductor, Wilhelm Gericke, had two terms (1884-9 and 1898-1906). Through years of tireless training, this through and arduous musician gradually built up the fine ensemble for which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has since held its special renown. In the interim of Gericke's periods of service came Arthur Nikisch, the great Hungarian leader, and Emil Pauer who conducted through 1893-8.

Dr. Karl Muck was the conductor from 1906 to 1918, with the exception of the years 1908-12, which was held by Max Fielder. To Dr. Muck's exacting hand the great Orchestra responded like a single marvelously perfect instrument.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra had two French conductors—Henri Rabaud in the season of 1918-19, a distinguished musician and composer, now head of the Paris Conservatoire,—and Pierre Monteux (1919-24), who ably carried on the then established tradition of a finely blended ensemble.

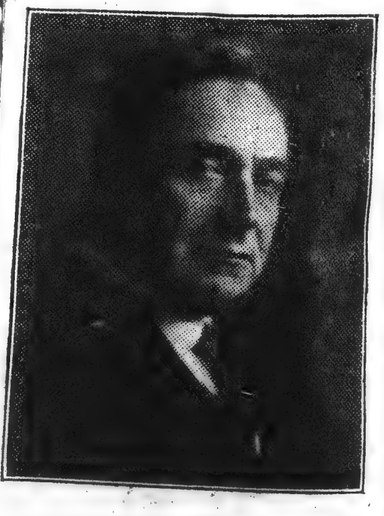
In the autumn of 1924, Serge Koussevitzky first crossed the Atlantic to become the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. From Europe come many reports of his remarkable qualities as a leader as an artist.

Expectations were more than fulfilled. America, having heard perhaps all of the "great" conductors living, has found qualities in Kousseitzky's leadership which are said to be quite without equal.

With such a combination of a great orchestra and a great leader it is not surprising that a Boston Symphony concert is regarded as one of the finest achievements in the musical performances of our day. There are waiting lists for every subscription series, and seats for any concert are at a premium.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN
JOURNAL COURIER
APR 10 192

Serge Koussevitzky, Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra



154

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

APR 7

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN

Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its last concert of its season, in Brooklyn, next Friday evening, April 12, in the Academy of Music. The program will begin with Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony in B minor, which has naturally been a feature of the season which has marked the centennial of the composer's death.

Koussevitzky will also present the scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," of Paul Dukas, the living French composer, which is a humorous musical characterization of Goethe's fanciful ballad. The Magician's apprentice picks up enough of his master's art to experiment with it in his absence by using the proper incantations. He sets up the broom as a scarecrow, gives it a pail of water and orders it to clean up the place, but what he has started he has not the power to stop. There is a general flood, and the master, returning, finally restores order.

The program at the season will end with Brahm's lyric masterpiece, the Second Symphony in D major.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

APR 7 - 1

BEETHOVEN'S Choral Symphony, better known as the Ninth, has been chosen by Serge Koussevitzky for two of his farewell concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season in New York. There will be a more general program in Brooklyn on Friday. The Beethoven classic will be heard in Manhattan at the concerts in Carnegie Hall on both Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

In the performance of this work, adds an official note, the choral part will be taken by the Schola Cantorum, which has been trained by Hugh Ross. The quartet of soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van der Veer, Paul Althouse and Fraser Gange.

At each performance the symphony will be preceded by an orchestral concerto in D major by Philip Emanuel Bach, which has been reorchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg.

When the Ninth Symphony was done in Boston last week it was preceded by what Philip Hale described as an "incomparably beautiful performance" of Beethoven's First Symphony, for which Mr. Koussevitzky reduced the size of the orchestra. The soloists in the Ninth on that occasion were Ethyl Hayden, Devora Nadvorney, Charles Stratton and the bass, who alone will be in the quartet for the New York hearing, Fraser Gange.

Before the other music at their Boston concert, Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave the funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica" in memory of Field Marshal Foch.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE

APR 7 -

Under the direction of Serge Koussewitsky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its final pair of New York concerts this season in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week. The programs for both occasions are identical:

C. P. E. Bach .....Concerto in B
Beethoven .....Ninth Symphony

The orchestra will be assisted by the chorus of the Schola Cantorum and by four soloi

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
TIMES

Sergei Koussevitsky closes out his Brooklyn season on Friday night when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will offer at the Academy of Music Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, the scherzo from Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice" and Brahms' second symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

APR 7 - 192

Koussevitzky Leads Here

...st

...ny. Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its last concert of its season, in Brooklyn, next Friday evening, April 12, in the Academy of Music. The program will begin with Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony in B minor, which has naturally been a feature of the season which has marked the centennial of the composer's death.

...will be heard at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. This will be this orchestra's last visit to New York of the season. In the performance of this work, the choral part will be taken by the Schola Cantorum, which has been trained by Hugh Ross. The quartet of soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van Der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, bass.

At each performance the symphony will be preceded by an orchestral concerto in D major by Philip Emanuel Bach, which has been reorchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN
JOURNAL COURIER

SPLENDID PROGRAM BY BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCH.

Serge Koussevitzky offers a program of engrossing interest and great brilliance and beauty for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New Haven for a concert under the auspices of the Yale University School of Music. The concert will be given in Woolsey hall tomorrow evening.

The principal number on the program will be Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor. This master work of Tchaikovsky is one of the most impressive and popular of his scores. The lovely andante cantabile of the second movement, introduced by a horn solo, is particularly famous. The interpretation of this symphony by the remarkable Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is looked upon as one of his finest achievements.

The first part of the program will consist of three shorter classics of the French school—Berlioz' Overture to "The Roman Carnival," Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

Berliozs resplendent Overture owesits color largely to the use of the English horn, which as an orchestral instrument was comparatively new in the composer's day. Perhaps the most characteristic single instrument of Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" is the solo flute, which contributes largely to the mood picture of the Faun, lying on a grassy bank and dreaming of his amours with a group of nymphs. Debussy thus set in music the verses of Mallarme, the impressionist poet.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, paying its last New York visit of the season this week, will devote its Thursday night and Saturday afternoon programs to Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, preceded by Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach's concerto in D, as arranged by Maximilian Steinberg. The Schola Cantorum, trained by Hugh Ross, will be the assisting chorus in the finale of the Beethoven work, with Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada van der Veer, Paul Althouse and Fraser Gange as the soloists.

These will be Mr. Koussevitzky's first performances of the Ninth Symphony in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

An Ear for Music

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Woolsey Hall on the evening of April 10, has in the four years he has directed this remarkable ensemble of musicians advanced the high standard always maintained by this organization to even greater heights. The program to be presented by the brilliant Russian and the 110 musicians under the sway of his baton is a particularly stimulating one.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

APR 7 - 192

Howard Hanson's Nordic Symphony will be heard for the first time in Boston on April 5 and 6, when it will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

APR 7 - 192

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 8:30 P. M. Conductor, Serge Koussevitzky; assisting artists, the Schola Cantorum of New York, conducted by Hugh Ross. Soloists, Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van der Veer, Paul Althouse and Fraser Gange.

Concerto for Orchestra in D major..C. P. E. Bach.....Arr. by Maxmillan Steinberg
Symphony No. 9 in D minor, with final Chorus on Schiller's "Ode to Joy," Op. 125 .....Beethoven

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

THE CAREER OF SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Nothing, save his eloquent performances, reveals more clearly the artistic sincerity and devotion of Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which comes to Woolsey Hall Wednesday evening, than the circumstances of his career.

He first conducted as a boy of twelve when he led the local theatre orchestra at his birthplace in the province of Tver, in northern Russia. Attending the Conservatory at Moscow, he was required to study an instrument. He chose the doublebass, and the noted master, Ramboussec, was his teacher. His proficiency upon this unusual instrument became so extraordinary that he toured all of Europe and became famous before he was even known as a conductor.

Koussevitzky's abilities, indeed, were not of the sort to be so confined to a limited field, and from 1909 he devoted all his energies to conducting. He organized his own symphony orchestra in Moscow, which soon came to be considered the finest in Russia. In Moscow and Petrograd he conducted the classics gave Beethoven, Bach, Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, and other festivals each season, and championed works by young composers then unknown but since accepted.

But Koussevitzky could not rest content with bringing music to the city folk of Russia. There lay about him a vast agrarian population, most of whom had never even heard a symphony concert. He chartered a large steamer on the Volga River, and, taking his entire orchestra, together with soloists and a group of friends, made several voyages along the 2,500 miles of its basin. The party would port at each town along its bank, and announce a symphony concert in the local town hall. The country folk were of course astonished at this wonderful new kind of music, but they were also both delighted and moved by it.

In 1909, in partnership with his wife, Koussevitzky inaugurated in Russia what has come to be one of the most important of music publishing concerns. In this way there have been published works by such Russian composers as Stranvinsky, Rachmaninoff, Prokofieff, and Sciabin. Thus, in championing a new score which he believes significant, Koussevitzky can give it public performance and publication as well.

The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his Orchestra, but not of his energies. He became conductor of the Russian State Orchestra (formerly the Court Orchestra).

It was in 1920 that Koussevitzky was first heard as a conductor in western Europe. He assembled an orchestra in Paris, and has since conducted annually his series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" at the Opera House. He is also invited annually to conduct a series as guest of Sir Henry Wood's Orchestra in London. Principally through these concerts, but also by virture of operatic performances in Paris and elsewhere, Koussevitzky has come to be regarded as the most brilliant, inspired, and inspiring conductor in that part of the world.

Each Spring since Koussevitzky became the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924, he has returned at the conclusion of his American season to conduct his Paris and London series, which the European public evidently, hold to be an indispensable part of his musical life.

America's admiration of Koussevitzky need scarcely be pointed out. The Boston Symphony Orchestra's sensitive response as one man to his least gesture bespeaks the leader of command and authority. The fine clarity with which he presents the music of the older masters, his inspired eloquence with the "romantics", and his discernment in choosing and his brilliance in performing the significant music of our own day; these things reveal an extraordinary range of artistic sympathy. And not least, there are qualities of illuminating imagination in his performances which are said to be quite without equal.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
TIMES UNION

APR 9 - 1925

Growth of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

In 47 years, the Boston Symphony orchestra which comes to Woolsey hall tomorrow evening, has become a great cultural force and one of the finest musical organizations in the world. In size, in schedule, in cultural influence, and in prestige, it has grown from relatively small beginnings to a present estate as busy as it is glorious.

EMINENCE THROUGH YEARS OF ENDEAVOR.

The gradual growth of the Boston Symphony orchestra is interesting to follow. In 1881 the orchestra, as founded by Major Henry Lee Higginson, numbered 60 players, a personnel which has since grown to 110. Its original season of 20 concerts in Boston, and occasional appearances elsewhere, has increased to more than 73 concerts in greater Boston, and concerts on tour, which brings the total number of each season to considerably over 100. The most illlustrious personnel which could be obtained, under the guiding hand of a succession of great conductors, has resulted in an orchestra—the name of which has long stood throughout the musical world as a by-word of the nearest thing to perfection in symphonic performance humanly possible.

HOW ITS SCHEDULE OF CONCERTS HAS GROWN.

The Boston Symphony orchestra began its career by giving 20 concerts on successive Saturday evenings in Boston. Soon the practice was started of admitting the public to the last rehearsal on the preceding Friday afternoon, for the small fee of 25 cents. These rehearsals eventually took on the aspect of a regular concert, except the name which likewise was finally dropped. Thus a weekly Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concert, at which the program was played brought the annual number of concerts in Boston to 48. When the demand for seats became greater than these concerts could supply a series of five Monday evening concerts was added, and later still another series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts. These, together with pension fund concerts on Sunday afternoons, concerts for the young people, and nine concerts which are given in Cambridge, across the Charles river, under the auspices of Harvard university, gives the total of 75 annual concerts by this orchestra in its own city.

CONCERTS AFIELD.

On five weeks during the season, which lasts from early October until the end of April, the orchestra visits New York, giving each time a concert in Carnegie hall on Thursday evening, a concert in Brooklyn on Friday evening, and another concert with a different program in Carnegie hall on Saturday afternoon. The full itinerary also includes a series of five concerts in Providence, R. I., orchestral concerts in New England, and an annnual tour of the north, middle west, or south, which carries the orchestra as far as Canada, Chicago, or Washington.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has traveled so far as Chicago, and in 1915, the summer of the Panama Pacific Exposition at San Francisco, traveled in a body across 3,000 miles of the continent to the Pacific coast, giving a notable series on the exposition grounds.

CONCERTS AT UNIVERSITIES.

The principal universities in New England, engage the orchestra each year to give a concert under their auspices, notably: Harvard university in Cambridge, Yale university in New Haven, Wellesley college at Wellesley, Cornell university in Ithaca, N. Y., Brown university in Rhode Island, and Smith college at Northampton, Mass.

EACH SERIES SOLIDLY SUBSCRIBED.

So great is the demand for tickets for the Boston Symphony concerts that for all of these nine series, with a single minor exception, all seats are engaged in advaince by subscription. In certain series, such as the 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturdaw evening concerts in Boston, such seats as are released each spring are allotted to those upon the waiting lists, so that there is no public sale for these series. It is, therefore, next to impossible for any one otherwise than a subscriber to buy a reserved seat for a Boston Symphony concert in Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

APR 9 - 192

HISTORY OF BOSTON SYMPHONY A RECORD OF HIGH ENDEAVOR

The superlative performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be heard at Woolsey Hall tomorrow evening, are indeed a thing to wonder at. But just how and why this organization has come to be one of the very greatest in the world leaves little room for speculation or debate. The simple facts of its history are self-explanatory.

In 1881, the late Major Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston a full-sized symphony orchestra —a rare phonomenon in those days. This noted musician, soldier, financier, and public-spirited citizen believed that there was a musical public for such an undertaking. Sparing no expense, he engaged the finest musicians then available in Europe to fill up its ranks, and brought to this country one after another of the world's greatest conductors to lend their individual genius to the cumulative improvement of the Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in its original form had only sixty players, and its conductor was George Henschel, a celebrated musician of the day. The initial aims (always since adhered to) were that the musicians should play under one conductor in one orchestra, and not debase their talents by routine engagements; that the symphony concerts should provide only the finest music; that artistic considerations should always be paramount, and that the conductor be given absolute control. Controversy waxed hot in those days. The policies, the programmes, even the venture itself were violently attacked and staunchley defended. But the wisdom of the founder was justified as each succeeding year of the Orchestra added growth and success to the last. In 1900 Symphony Hall was built, to become the Orchestra's special and permanent home.

The second conductor, Wilhelm Gericke, had two terms (1884-9 and 1898-1906). Through years of tireless training, this through and arduous musician gradually built up the fine ensemble for which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has since held its special renown. In the interim of Gericke's periods of service came Arthur Nikisch, the great Hungarian leader, and Emil Pauer who conducted through 1893-8.

Dr. Karl Muck was the conductor from 1906 to 1918, with the exception of the years 1908-12, which was held by Max Fielder. To Dr. Muck's exacting hand the great Orchestra responded like a single marvelously perfect instrument.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra had two French conductors—Henri Rabaud in the season of 1918-19, a distinguished musician and composer, now head of the Paris Conservatoire,—and Pierre Monteux (1919-24), who ably carried on the then established tradition of a finely blended ensemble.

In the autumn of 1924, Serge Koussevitzky first crossed the Atlantic to become the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. From Europe come many reports of his remarkable qualities as a leader as an artist.

Expectations were more than fulfilled. America, having heard perhaps all of the "great" conductors living, has found qualities in Kousseitzky's leadership which are said to be quite without equal.

With such a combination of a great orchestra and a great leader it is not surprising that a Boston Symphony concert is regarded as one of the finest achievements in the musical performances of our day. There are waiting lists for every subscription series, and seats for any concert are at a premium.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN
JOURNAL COURIER

Serge Koussevitzky, Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra

154

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
APR 7

The Morning Cho... St. Paul's S... Aft...

The Morning Choral, of wh... conductor, and Mrs. Morris ... hold its spring concert on T...

Orc... Fri... gra... min... has...

K...

scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," of Paul Dukas, the living French composer, which is a humorous musical characterization of Goethe's fanciful ballad. The Magician's apprentice picks up enough of his master's art to experiment with it in his absence by using the proper incantations. He sets up the broom as a scarecrow, gives it a pail of water and orders it to clean up the place, but what he has started he has not the power to stop. There is a general flood, and the master, returning, finally restores order.

The program at the season will end with Brahm's lyric masterpiece, the Second Symphony in D major.

The "Wh... Vocal Quartets."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
APR 7 - 2...

BEETHOVEN'S Choral Symphony, better known as the Ninth, has been chosen by Serge Koussevitzky for two of his farewell concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season in New York. There will be a more general program in Brooklyn on Friday. The Beethoven classic will be heard in Manhattan at the concerts in Carnegie Hall on both Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

In the performance of this work, adds an official note, the choral part will be taken by the Schola Cantorum, which has been trained by Hugh Ross. The quartet of soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van der Veer, Paul Althouse and Fraser Gange.

At each performance the symphony will be preceded by an orchestral concerto in D major by Philip Emanuel Bach, which has been reorchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg.

When the Ninth Symphony was done in Boston last week it was preceded by what Philip Hale described as an "incomparably beautiful performance" of Beethoven's First Symphony, for which Mr. Koussevitzky reduced the size of the orchestra. The soloists in the Ninth on that occasion were Ethyl Hayden, Devora Nadvorney, Charles Stratton and the bass, who alone will be in the quartet for the New York hearing, Fraser Gange.

Before the other music at their Boston concert, Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave the funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica" in memory of Field Marshal Foch.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE
APR 7 -

Under the direction of Serge Koussewitsky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its final pair of New York concerts this season in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week. The programs for both occasions are identical:

C. P. E. Bach .....Concerto in B
Beethoven .....Ninth Symphony

The orchestra will be assisted by the chorus of the Schola Cantorum and by four soloists: Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
APR 7 - 1...

Koussevitzky Leads Here Saturday

Boston Orchestra's Last Visit Features Ninth of Beethoven

BEETHOVEN'S "Choral" symphony, in which Serge Koussevitzky will be heard for the first time in New York, will be the feature of both concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. This will be this orchestra's last visit to New York of the season. In the performance of this work, the choral part will be taken by the Schola Cantorum, which has been trained by Hugh Ross. The quartet of soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van Der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, bass.

At each performance the symphony will be preceded by an orchestral concerto in D major by Philip Emanuel Bach, which has been reorchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN
JOURNAL COURIER

SPLENDID PROGRAM BY BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCH.

Serge Koussevitzky offers a program of engrossing interest and great brilliance and beauty for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New Haven for a concert under the auspices of the Yale University School of Music. The concert will be given in Woolsey hall tomorrow evening.

The principal number on the program will be Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor. This master work of Tchaikovsky is one of the most impressive and popular of his scores. The lovely andante cantabile of the second movement, introduced by a horn solo, is particularly famous. The interpretation of this symphony by the remarkable Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is looked upon as one of his finest achievements.

The first part of the program will consist of three shorter classics of the French school—Berlioz' Overture to "The Roman Carnival," Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

Berliozs resplendent Overture owesits color largely to the use of the English horn, which as an orchestral instrument was comparatively new in the composer's day. Perhaps the most characteristic single instrument of Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" is the solo flute, which contributes largely to the mood picture of the Faun, lying on a grassy bank and dreaming of his amours with a group of nymphs. Debussy thus set in music the verses of Mallarme, the impressionist poet.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

The Boston ... Orchestra, paying its last New York visit of the season this week, will devote its Thursday night and Saturday afternoon programs to Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, preceded by Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach's concerto in D, as arranged by Maximilian Steinberg. The Schola Cantorum, trained by Hugh Ross, will be the assisting chorus in the finale of the Beethoven work, with Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada van der Veer, Paul Althouse and Fraser Gange as the soloists.

These will be Mr. Koussevitzky's first performances of the ... Symphony in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

An Ear for Music

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Woolsey Hall on the evening of April 10, has in the four years he has directed this remarkable ensemble of musicians advanced the high standard always maintained by this organization to even greater heights. The program to be presented by the brilliant Russian and the 110 musicians under the sway of his baton is a particularly stimulating one.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
APR 7 - 19...

Howard Hanson's Nordic Symphony will be heard for the first time in Boston on April 5 and 6, when it will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
APR 7 - 19...

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 8:30 P. M. Conductor, Serge Koussevitzky; assisting artists, the Schola Cantorum of New York, conducted by Hugh Ross. Soloists, Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van der Veer, Paul Althouse and Fraser Gange.

Concerto for Orchestra in D major..C. P. E. Bach.....Arr. by Maxmillan Steinberg
Symphony No. 9 in D minor, with final Chorus on Schiller's "Ode to Joy," Op. 125 .....Beethoven

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

THE CAREER OF SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Nothing, save his eloquent performances, reveals more clearly the artistic sincerity and devotion of Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which comes to Woolsey Hall Wednesday evening, than the circumstances of his career.

He first conducted as a boy of twelve when he led the local theatre orchestra at his birthplace in the province of Tver, in northern Russia. Attending the Conservatory at Moscow, he was required to study an instrument. He chose the doublebass, and the noted master, Ramboussec, was his teacher. His proficiency upon this unusual instrument became so extraordinary that he toured all of Europe and became famous before he was even known as a conductor.

Koussevitzky's abilities, indeed, were not of the sort to be so confined to a limited field, and from 1909 he devoted all his energies to conducting. He organized his own symphony orchestra in Moscow, which soon came to be considered the finest in Russia. In Moscow and Petrograd he conducted the classics gave Beethoven, Bach, Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, and other festivals each season, and championed works by young composers then unknown but since accepted.

But Koussevitzky could not rest content with bringing music to the city folk of Russia. There lay about him a vast agrarian population, most of whom had never even heard a symphony concert. He chartered a large steamer on the Volga River, and, taking his entire orchestra, together with soloists and a group of friends, made several voyages along the 2,500 miles of its basin. The party would port at each town along its bank, and announce a symphony concert in the local town hall. The country folk were of course astonished at this wonderful new kind of music, but they were also both delighted and moved by it.

In 1909, in partnership with his wife, Koussevitzky inaugurated in Russia what has come to be one of the most important of music publishing concerns. In this way there have been published works by such Russian composers as Stranvinsky, Rachmaninoff, Prokofieff, and Sciabin. Thus, in championing a new score which he believes significant, Koussevitzky can give it public performance and publication as well.

The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his Orchestra, but not of his energies. He became conductor of the Russian State Orchestra (formerly the Court Orchestra).

It was in 1920 that Koussevitzky was first heard as a conductor in western Europe. He assembled an orchestra in Paris, and has since conducted annually his series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" at the Opera House. He is also invited annually to conduct a series as guest of Sir Henry Wood's Orchestra in London. Principally through these concerts, but also by virture of operatic performances in Paris and elsewhere, Koussevitzky has come to be regarded as the most brilliant, inspired, and inspiring conductor in that part of the world.

Each Spring since Koussevitzky became the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924, he has returned at the conclusion of his American season to conduct his Paris and London series, which the European public evidently, hold to be an indispensable part of his musical life.

America's admiration of Koussevitzky need scarcely be pointed out. The Boston Symphony Orchestra's sensitive response as one man to his least gesture bespeaks the leader of command and authority. The fine clarity with which he presents the music of the older masters, his inspired eloquence with the "romantics", and his discernment in choosing and his brilliance in performing the significant music of our own day; these things reveal an extraordinary range of artistic sympathy. And not least, there are qualities of illuminating imagination in his performances which are said to be quite without equal.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
TIMES UNION
APR 9 - 192...

Growth of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

In 47 years, the Boston Symphony orchestra which comes to Woolsey hall tomorrow evening, has become a great cultural force and one of the finest musical organizations in the world. In size, in schedule, in cultural influence, and in prestige, it has grown from relatively small beginnings to a present estate as busy as it is glorious.

EMINENCE THROUGH YEARS OF ENDEAVOR.

The gradual growth of the Boston Symphony orchestra is interesting to follow. In 1881 the orchestra, as founded by Major Henry Lee Higginson, numbered 60 players, a personnel which has since grown to 110. Its original season of 20 concerts in Boston, and occasional appearances elsewhere, has increased to more than 73 concerts in greater Boston, and concerts on tour, which brings the total number of each season to considerably over 100. The most illustrious personnel which could be obtained, under the guiding hand of a succession of great conductors, has resulted in an orchestra—the name of which has long stood throughout the musical world as a by-word of the nearest thing to perfection in symphonic performance humanly possible.

HOW ITS SCHEDULE OF CONCERTS HAS GROWN.

The Boston Symphony orchestra began its career by giving 20 concerts on successive Saturday evenings in Boston. Soon the practice was started of admitting the public to the last rehearsal on the preceding Friday afternoon, for the small fee of 25 cents. These rehearsals eventually took on the aspect of a regular concert, except the name which likewise was finally dropped. Thus a weekly Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concert, at which the program was played brought the annual number of concerts in Boston to 48. When the demand for seats became greater than these concerts could supply a series of five Monday evening concerts was added, and later still another series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts. These, together with pension fund concerts on Sunday afternoons, concerts for the young people, and nine concerts which are given in Cambridge, across the Charles river, under the auspices of Harvard university, gives the total of 75 annual concerts by this orchestra in its own city.

CONCERTS AFIELD.

On five weeks during the season, which lasts from early October until the end of April, the orchestra visits New York, giving each time a concert in Carnegie hall on Thursday evening, a concert in Brooklyn on Friday evening, and another concert with a different program in Carnegie hall on Saturday afternoon. The full itinerary also includes a series of five concerts in Providence, R. I., orchestral concerts in New England, and an annual tour of the north, middle west, or south, which carries the orchestra as far as Canada, Chicago, or Washington.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has traveled so far as Chicago, and in 1915, the summer of the Panama Pacific Exposition at San Francisco, traveled in a body across 3,000 miles of the continent to the Pacific coast, giving a notable series on the exposition grounds.

CONCERTS AT UNIVERSITIES.

The principal universities in New England, engage the orchestra each year to give a concert under their auspices, notably: Harvard university in Cambridge, Yale university in New Haven, Wellesley college at Wellesley, Cornell university in Ithaca, N. Y., Brown university in Rhode Island, and Smith college at Northampton, Mass.

EACH SERIES SOLIDLY SUBSCRIBED.

So great is the demand for tickets for the Boston Symphony concerts that for all of these nine series, with a single minor exception, all seats are engaged in advance by subscription. In certain series, such as the 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturdaw evening concerts in Boston, such seats as are released each spring are allotted to those upon the waiting lists, so that there is no public sale for these series. It is, therefore, next to impossible for any one otherwise than a subscriber to buy a reserved seat for a Boston Symphony concert in Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
APR 9 - 192...

HISTORY OF BOSTON SYMPHONY A RECORD OF HIGH ENDEAVOR

The superlative performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be heard at Woolsey Hall tomorrow evening, are indeed a thing to wonder at. But just how and why this organization has come to be one of the very greatest in the world leaves little room for speculation or debate. The simple facts of its history are self-explanatory.

In 1881, the late Major Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston a full-sized symphony orchestra —a rare phonomenon in those days. This noted musician, soldier, financier, and public-spirited citizen believed that there was a musical public for such an undertaking. Sparing no expense, he engaged the finest musicians then available in Europe to fill up its ranks, and brought to this country one after another of the world's greatest conductors to lend their individual genius to the cumulative improvement of the Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in its original form had only sixty players, and its conductor was George Henschel, a celebrated musician of the day. The initial aims (always since adhered to) were that the musicians should play under one conductor in one orchestra, and not debase their talents by routine engagements; that the symphony concerts should provide only the finest music; that artistic considerations should always be paramount, and that the conductor be given absolute control. Controversy waxed hot in those days. The policies, the programmes, even the venture itself were violently attacked and staunchley defended. But the wisdom of the founder was justified as each succeeding year of the Orchestra added growth and success to the last. In 1900 Symphony Hall was built, to become the Orchestra's special and permanent home.

The second conductor, Wilhelm Gericke, had two terms (1884-9 and 1898-1906). Through years of tireless training, this through and arduous musician gradually built up the fine ensemble for which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has since held its special renown. In the interim of Gericke's periods of service came Arthur Nikisch, the great Hungarian leader, and Emil Pauer who conducted through 1893-8.

Dr. Karl Muck was the conductor from 1906 to 1918, with the exception of the years 1908-12, which was held by Max Fielder. To Dr. Muck's exacting hand the great Orchestra responded like a single marvelously perfect instrument.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra had two French conductors—Henri Rabaud in the season of 1918-19, a distinguished musician and composer, now head of the Paris Conservatoire,—and Pierre Monteux (1919-24), who ably carried on the then established tradition of a finely blended ensemble.

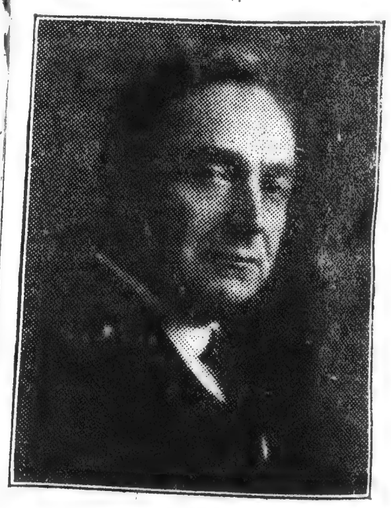
In the autumn of 1924, Serge Koussevitzky first crossed the Atlantic to become the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. From Europe come many reports of his remarkable qualities as a leader as an artist.

Expectations were more than fulfilled. America, having heard perhaps all of the "great" conductors living, has found qualities in Kousseitzky's leadership which are said to be quite without equal.

With such a combination of a great orchestra and a great leader it is not surprising that a Boston Symphony concert is regarded as one of the finest achievements in the musical performances of our day. There are waiting lists for every subscription series, and seats for any concert are at a premium.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN
JOURNAL COURIER

Serge Koussevitzky, Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra



HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram
APR 10 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY ARTISTS PLAY AT HIGH SCHOOL

Paul Shirley Conducts Orchestral Group in Program for School Children.

More than 1000 children and many adults enjoyed the third annual children's concert given yesterday afternoon at the high school auditorium by 16 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Paul Shirley.

For the past few weeks John Wilsbach, supervisor of music, and Miss Mary Sullivan, assistant supervisor of music in the public schools, had devoted the music periods to the study of the selections that were to be played yesterday. By means of Victrola records they had acquainted the children with the music and had also told them the interesting stories they represented.

When the children gathered yesterday in the high school auditorium they were all eager to hear how the Boston Symphony group would play the numbers they knew so well. Many of the boys and girls rolled up their programs and used them as batons, keeping time with the music and they were so appreciative that the members of the orchestra were quite impressed.

The Blue Danube Waltz by Strauss, always a favorite with audiences, delighted the children yesterday, for it was played with all the mastery of a truly great orchestra. Three of the other selections which particularly pleased the audience was Koehler's "The Mouse and the Trap"; the march from "Tannhauser" and the Peer Gynt suite. The March of the Lead Soldier was played as an encore.

The program opened with the brilliant march from "Tannhauser," which won the enthusiastic applause of the children. Throughout the entire program the playing by the string group was unusually choice and contributed immensely to the success o the concert. It is of interest that 1 members in the group are first-prize winners from the Academy of France

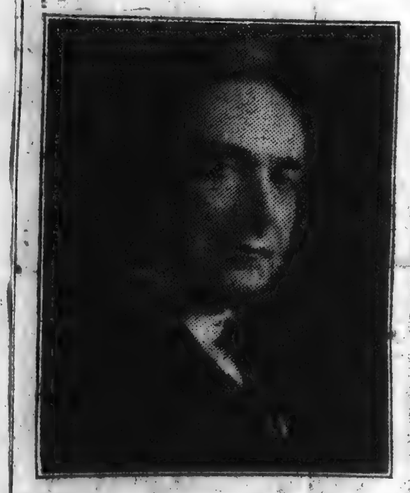
Among those who assist... mak... ing yesterday's...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
TIMES UNION
APR 10 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WILL BE HERE TONIGHT

One of the finest musical programs ever rendered in New Haven is promised at Woolsey hall this evening when the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of its noted leader, Serge Koussevitzky, will be heard for its annual local concert.

The occasion will mark the conclusion of the Woolsey Hall concert series, under the auspices of the Yale



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Leads Boston Symphony Orchestra, Woolsey Hall, Tonight.

School of Music and Rudolph Steinert for the season of 1928-9, and as always the case a great gathering of music lovers wil be on hand for the sumptuous musical event.

The program in its entirety is as follows:

Berlioz, Overture to "The Roman Carnival", Op. 9.

Debussy, "Prelude a l'Aprez-Midi d'un Faune" (Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun). Eclogue by S. Mallarme.

Dukas, "L'Apprenti Sorcier" (The Sorcerer's Apprentice). Scherzo (After a Ballad by Goethe).

Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64
I. Andante.
II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza
III. Valse (Allegro moderato)
IV. Finale: Andante maestoso; Allegro vivace

Tickets for tonight's sterling musical event may be secured during the day at Steinert's, 183 Church street, and at the Woolsey Hall box office.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
APR 10 1929

SYMPHONY FUND IS LACKING $1100

City Must Give Up Orchestra Dates if Guarantee of $4000 Is Not Filled.

The fund which would bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra back again to Providence next season rested still below $3000 last night with $1015 added to the amount previously acknowledged. The appeal for guarantors who would underwrite the next series was made a full two weeks ago, and another generous thousand dollars is needed before the lowest hope of the Music Association is realized.

Seven subscriptions of $100 each are included in the list of 23 additional underwriters, although smaller sums have been welcomed. The seven major subscriptions were from: Miss Ellen D. Sharpe, Mrs. Edgar J. Lownes, Samuel M. Nicholson, Mrs. James R. MacColl, Mr. and Mrs. Frank L. Hinckley, John Russell Gladding and R. Clinton Fuller.

The quota of the Music Association has been lessened for the next season by the unusual offer by the orchestra to increase its share of the rental by $800. As a result the Providence guarantee must be only $4000 instead of $4800, but without this guarantee the Boston orchestra will not return to this city. The danger of a break in this series of years' standing has been emphasized by Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, honorary president of the association, who declared that the loss of the orchestra for one year might mean its loss for ten. Other cities are eager to take over the Providence dates.

The exact total to date is $2919, $1904 of which had been previously acknowledged. Subscriptions to help underwrite the Symphony season should be sent to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., Treasurer of the Music Association, Box 1536, Providence, or to the Providence Journal.

The most recent guarantors include:

Miss Ellen D. Sharpe	$100.00
Mrs. James B. Richardson	25.00
Mrs. Edgar J. Lownes	100.00
Mrs. George S. Mathews	10.00
Samuel M. Nicholson	100.00
Mrs. Harrison B. Huntoon	50.00
C. B. McCullough	5.00
John S. Coggeshall	5.00
Eleanor B. Green	25.00
Mrs. James Richardson	25.00
Mrs. Frank H. Brown	50.00
Mr. and Mrs. Joel A. Goldthwait	10.00
Mrs. James R. MacColl	100.00
Dorothy Goulding Gilman	10.00
Elizabeth N. White	25.00
Carrie Schmitt	5.00
Edith W. Edwards	5.00
Anonymous	5.00
Mrs. Dexter B. Potter	10.00
Mr. and Mrs. Frank L. Hinckley	100.00
Mrs. Harry C. Curtis	50.00
John Russell Gladding	100.00
R. Clinton Fuller	100.00
Total	$1015.00
Previously acknowledged	1904.00
Total to date	$2919.00

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
TIMES UNION
APR 11 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVE WONDERFUL CONCERT

Music lovers had a rich treat in Woolsey hall last evening when the far-famed Boston Symphony orchestra gave a concert that delighted all who heard it.

Under the leadership of the world-famous conductor, Serge Konssevitzky, the orchestra gave a wonderful exhibition of artistic talent.

The program was carried out to a brilliant finish, closing the season with the most delightful program presented in any city during this concert season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
APR 11 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS BRILLIANT IN WOOLSEY CONCERT

Rarely has this reviewer heard a conductor and band more clearly on its mettle than was the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, last night in Woolsey Hall. Not always can musicians impart to the music the enkindling flame of genuine absorption in the evening's task. There must be times when the giving of a concert is an irksome necessity. But last night was one of those fairly rare occasions when performers rise well beyond the limits of competence to something very close to inspiration.

Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain" was perhaps an exception to this. The piece is displayful, superficial music making, not without its rewards to the listener, but at best merely the clever work of a second rate composer. As if limited by the content of the music the orchestra and conductor gave the piece no more than a workmanlike performance.

But Debussy's Prelude to "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun" was quite another matter. This is undubitably a work of genius. Every measure of the Prelude drenched in the slumbrous beauty of a twilit forest, with the languorous note of a flute, the soughing of strings, the melancholy cry of the oboe making a perfect evocation of mood. This was obviously music close to Mr. Koussevitsky's heart, and he gave to it a reading of singular beauty. Every subtlety of the complex score, every nuance of melody, every undercurrent received its right emphasis, as the conductor wove a spell of rapt loveliness. His satisfied nod to his men at the end of the reading was clear indication of the affection he felt for this piece.

The Scherzo, "l'Apprenti Sorcier" of Dukas, next on the program was music of vastly different character, but none the less delightful in its humor and its grotesquerie. Again, Mr. Koussevitzky and his men outdid themselves with a stirring and vivid performance.

In the final number, the Fifth Symphony of Tschaikowsky, conductors and orchestra were, to our mind, far above the quality of the piece, itself. Exciting the music frequently is; beautiful it occasionally is; but great it never is, and the orchestra under Koussevitzky gave a reading that came very close to being great.

Tschaikowsky is like a man who had never outgrown his adolescence, and who continued all his life to write from the standpoint of puppy love, growing pains, and schoolboy introspection. He had great melodic gifts, but he lacked completely the discrimination and fastidousness to select from among his copious ideas only those that were worthy of explotation. The result is that in his symphonies we find flights of the purest inspiration side by side with passages that sound as if they might have come out of a Shubert musical comedy.

The Fifth Symphony is like the others, with all their blatancy, all their self-pity, all their vulgarity, but like them, with moments of richly rewarding beauty. Unfortunately, to this reviewer at least, the tawdry

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE
APR 12 1929

Music of the Day

There is an inevitability about the Ninth Symphony: we must hear it once, at least, a year. The obsequies of no season are complete without it, and if Mr. Damrosch or Mr. Mengelberg or Mr. Toscanini fail in its celebration, another of their colleagues are alert and eager to sustain tradition.

Last evening in Carnegie Hall Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Symphony appeared to take leave of their New York audiences and, despatching first the Steinberg arrangement of C. P. E. Bach's D major Concerto, devoted themselves, the chorus of the Schola Cantorum and four soloists to the last of Beethoven's symphonies.

Mr. Koussewitsky, never before a convincing classicist, surprised his most devoted admirers. It was possible that his reading of the slow movement suffered from injudicious tempi, but otherwise he conducted a performance of the Ninth Symphony that was distinguished by its fidelity to the score, by vigor and nobility of conception, by splendid virtuosity of execution. The chorus, trained by Hugh Ross, sang admirably; the soloists—Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone—left little to be desired. Memory does not recall a performance of the Ninth Symphony so successful in its presentation of the final choral movement. The orchestra, surely one of the finest of existing bands, played with extraordinary beauty of tone, with virtuosity that seemed inherent and effortless, and the audience, roused to enthusiasm, applauded long after the conclusion of the concert.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
APR 12 1929

155

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Koussevitzky Conducts the Ninth Symphony for the First Time Here

Fifth and last evening concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Carnegie Hall.

Program

Bach, C. P. E.,
Concerto for Orchestra in D major (Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg).
Beethoven,
Symphony No. 9, in D minor with final chorus on Schiller's Ode to Joy, Op. 125

CHORUS
Schola Cantorum of New York, Hugh Ross, Conductor.

SOLO QUARTET
Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van Der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor; Fraser Gange, bass.

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY'S interpretation of the Ninth Symphony has long been a critical storm-center in Europe. For some, it is too emotional, suffers from "an attempt at more 'expression' than the music will bear," is overstressed and over-romanticized. For others, it is a just revaluation of Beethoven—a "genuinely classic" reading, "since it places Beethoven before us in the composer's own image."

The critical air would be cleared if we should candidly admit that this whole question of the interpretation of masterworks is to a surprisingly large extent a matter of personal feeling and preference. The interpreter, as well as his critics, is here very much in the position of Walt Whitman contemplating the unknown region beyond the open grave, "where neither ground is for the feet nor any path to follow, . . . no map there, nor guide."

There is neither map nor guide, nor any certain path to follow, for the musical interpreter confronting a masterwork. The impressiveness of the account that he gives us of that masterwork will depend, for each of us, upon the extent to which we happen to share his temperamental and imaginative point of view.

* * *

FOR example, Mr. Koussevitzky last night took the Adagio molto of the Symphony at a tempo that was not in accordance with Beethoven's metronome-mark in the score. But who is so say that Mr. Koussevitzky was wrong—or right, for that matter? Beethoven's metronome direction for the opening of the slow movement is: "crotchet=60." But we have long known that Beethoven's metronome marks are undependable. He himself, according to Schindler, made two lists of metronome marks for the Ninth Symphony—the second from memory, after the original had been mislaid. When the first list came to light, a comparison showed a deviation in all the movements. Upon which, says Schindler, Beethoven flew into a rage, exclaiming: "No metronome at all! Whoever has the right feeling does not require it, and to him who has not got that, it is useless!"

* * *

VERY well; but how is any one of us to know or to demonstrate that he has "the right feeling"? Take this matter of the tempo of the Adagio molto of the Ninth. Beethoven's metronome mark, we saw, is "crotchet=60." But Mr. Weingartner, a famous authority on Beethoven, says bluntly in his treatise on the performance of the symphonies that Beethoven's metronome-mark "is too quick." He recommends that we change Beethoven's 60 to 48-50. That is his "right feeling."

Mr. Koussevitzky's "right feeling" led him to adopt last night a slower tempo than either Beethoven's or Mr. Weingartner's—it was about 42. But Mr. Toscanini's tempo is even slower; he alters Beethoven's 60 to 38. That is his "right feeling." Theodore Thomas's "right feeling" was 40; Seidl's was about the same. Unfortunately, we do not know what metronome mark guided Wagner for the Adagio in his famous interpretation of the Ninth; but he tells us somewhere that he was perhaps the first conductor to take the beginning of this movement really Adagio, "and thus succeed in emphasizing the difference between the opening Adagio section and the following Andante moderato."

* * *

ENOUGH has been said to show that Beethoven's metronome mark has seemed wrong to many great conductors (and, if Schindler is to be believed, it seems to have been regarded as wrong by Beethoven himself at one time!). Certainly most of us feel that a metronome direction of "crochet=60" is scarcely the equivalent of "Adagio molto." But the point is, that if Beethoven's own specific directions leave us unconvinced and bewildered, where are we to look for guidance? To talk of "keeping strictly to the score," or "playing the music as it is written," is to talk nonsense. As every musician knows, the score of the Ninth Symphony is seldom in our time played "as it is written." If it were, it would sound grotesque at many points. One need only instance, in passing, the famous C major passage for the strings and wind at page 77 (full score) of the Scherzo, or the fortissimo passage later in the movement where the first violins and flute should go to a high B-flat, but do not. These, and numerous other passages, the concert-goer never hears as Beethoven wrote them—any more than he hears, as a rule, Beethoven's tempi.

Serge Koussevitzky

Who conducted Beethoven's Ninth Symphony here last night for the first time in New York

Clearly, then, it is idle to talk about playing this masterpiece "as it is written." Such being the fact, are we not pretty much at sea in discussing this whole matter of interpretation? It would seem so. It would seem, also, as if the only rational thing we can do in the circumstances is to test each individual reading by our own imaginative relation to the work in hand. We need not assert that we are right, but at least we may know that we are honest. Of course there are limits: there is a point beyond which we may confidently say, "This certainly is wrong"—as we were tempted to say to ourselves last night when Mr. Koussevitzky passed from the Adagio molto of the slow movement to its andante moderato with no indication of the contrast in tempo that Beethoven plainly intended.

* * *

YET the special virtue of Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of the Ninth last night was that it gave us a curiously vivid sense of the subliminal quality of the greater portions of the work. Even though the tremendous first movement was somewhat reduced in scale and impact, the mysteriousness and the awe of the music spoke from the orchestra—and these things are of its essence.

Wagner, like Shakespeare, gave us a matchless expression of the natural world—its men and women and its seasons: that world exists for us, in the evocations of those masters, in the fullness of an overwhelming beauty and an infinite magic. But Wagner's world, and Shakespeare's, was an insubstantial one. It was not the durable world of Beethoven or of Blake. For Blake, as Gardner has justly said, the natural world was but the shadow of the real. Blake's world was the supersensuous world of the mystics, and it had the definiteness and clarity that belong to the visions of the mystic. It is not a world drenched in magic, as Shakespeare and Wagner drenched theirs, but a world perceived with so sharp a sense of its reality that the casual are driven to call its terror and its beauty those of supermundane things.

The Ninth Symphony is full of the sense of that mystical real world, and of the quality of utterance that is proper to its perception. Like Paul, both Blake and Beethoven uttered words that we had thought unspeakable. We are aware of Beethoven's travail, of his despair over the consciousness that what he perceived was unutterable; yet we, who listen, know that those words did actually pass his lips.

Perhaps because he approached these great mysteries and clarities of Beethoven's imaginative world with simplicity of spirit, with honesty of purpose, with affection and with awe, Mr. Koussevitzky was able last night to give us so often a sense of the special quality of the Ninth—its strange blend of fatefulness and transport, wild humor and superterrestrial beauty, mystery and exaltation, its tragical despair and its shouting among the stars.

* * *

THE vocal music that has troubled singers and auditors alike for more than a century was no more completely mastered last night than it has been in the past. It is much to say that most of the great moments in the Finale came off, to the glory of Beethoven—and also in spite of him. If that Recording Angel who watches over singer's misdeeds was obliged to take note last evening of some dubious intonation, some poor tone, some misjudged rhythms, he must surely have remembered to allot part of the blame to the marvelous tone-poet for whom the bounds and limitations of the factual world had almost ceased to count—whose tumultuous and soaring imagination re-created man in the image of his own unconquerable will.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

APR 10 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY ARTISTS PLAY AT HIGH SCHOOL

Paul Shirley Conducts Orchestral Group in Program for School Children.

More than 1000 children and many adults enjoyed the third annual children's concert given yesterday afternoon at the high school auditorium by 16 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Paul Shirley.

For the past few weeks John Wilsbach, supervisor of music, and Miss Mary Sullivan, assistant supervisor of music in the public schools, had devoted the music periods to the study of the selections that were to be played yesterday. By means of Victrola records they had acquainted the children with the music and had also told them the interesting stories they represented.

When the children gathered yesterday in the high school auditorium they were all eager to hear how the Boston Symphony group would play the numbers they knew so well. Many of the boys and girls rolled up their programs and used them as batons, keeping time with the music and they were so appreciative that the members of the orchestra were quite impressed.

The Blue Danube Waltz by Strauss, always a favorite with audiences, delighted the children yesterday, for it was played with all the mastery of a truly great orchestra. Three of the other selections which particularly pleased the audience was Koehler's "The Mouse and the Trap"; the march from "Tannhauser" and the Peer Gynt suite. The March of the Lead Soldier was played as an encore.

The program opened with the brilliant march from "Tannhauser," which won the enthusiastic applause of the children. Throughout the entire program the playing by the string group was unusually choice and contributed immensely to the success o the concert. It is of interest that 1 members in the group are first-prize winners from the Academy of France.

Among those who assisted ... mak... ing yesterday's ... suc... ...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
TIMES UNION

APR 10 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WILL BE HERE TONIGHT

One of the finest musical programs ever rendered in New Haven is promised at Woolsey hall this evening when the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of its noted leader, Serge Koussevitzky, will be heard for its annual local concert.

The occasion will mark the conclusion of the Woolsey Hall concert series, under the auspices of the Yale School of Music and Rudolph Steinert for the season of 1928-9, and as always the case a great gathering of music lovers will be on hand for the sumptuous musical event.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Leads Boston Symphony Orchestra, Woolsey Hall, Tonight.

The program in its entirety is as follows:

Berlioz, Overture to "The Roman Carnival", Op. 9.
Debussy, "Prelude a l'Aprez-Midi d'un Faune" (Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun). Eclogue by S. Mallarme.
Dukas, "L'Apprenti Sorcier" (The Sorcerer's Apprentice). Scherzo (After a Ballad by Goethe).
Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64
I. Andante.
II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza
III. Valse (Allegro moderato)
IV. Finale; Andante maestoso; Allegro vivace

Tickets for tonight's sterling musical event may be secured during the day at Steinert's, 183 Church street, and at the Woolsey Hall box office.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

APR 10 1929

SYMPHONY FUND IS LACKING $1100

City Must Give Up Orchestra Dates if Guarantee of $4000 Is Not Filled.

The fund which would bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra back again to Providence next season rested still below $3000 last night with $1015 added to the amount previously acknowledged. The appeal for guarantors who would underwrite the next series was made a full two weeks ago, and another generous thousand dollars is needed before the lowest hope of the Music Association is realized.

Seven subscriptions of $100 each are included in the list of 23 additional underwriters, although smaller sums have been welcomed. The seven major subscriptions were from: Miss Ellen D. Sharpe, Mrs. Edgar J. Lownes, Samuel M. Nicholson, Mrs. James R. MacColl, Mr. and Mrs. Frank L. Hinckley, John Russell Gladding and R. Clinton Fuller.

The quota of the Music Association has been lessened for the next season by the unusual offer by the orchestra to increase its share of the rental by $800. As a result the Providence guarantee must be only $4000 instead of $4800, but without this guarantee the Boston orchestra will not return to this city. The danger of a break in this series of years' standing has been emphasized by Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, honorary president of the association, who declared that the loss of the orchestra for one year might mean its loss for ten. Other cities are eager to take over the Providence dates.

The exact total to date is $2919. $1904 of which had been previously acknowledged. Subscriptions to help underwrite the Symphony season should be sent to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., Treasurer of the Music Association, Box 1536, Providence, or to the Providence Journal.

The most recent guarantors include:

Miss Ellen D. Sharpe	$100.00
Mrs. James B. Richardson	25.00
Mrs. Edgar J. Lownes	100.00
Mrs. George S. Mathews	10.00
Samuel M. Nicholson	100.00
Mrs. Harrison B. Huntoon	50.00
C. B. McCullough	5.00
John S. Coggeshall	5.00
Eleanor B. Green	25.00
Mrs. James Richardson	25.00
Mrs. Frank H. Brown	50.00
Mr. and Mrs. Joel A. Goldthwait	10.00
Mrs. James R. MacColl	100.00
Dorothy Goulding Gilman	10.00
Elizabeth N. White	25.00
Carrie Schmitt	5.00
Edith W. Edwards	5.00
Anonymous	5.00
Mrs. Dexter B. Potter	10.00
Mr. and Mrs. Frank L. Hinckley	100.00
Mrs. Harry C. Curtis	50.00
John Russell Gladding	100.00
R. Clinton Fuller	100.00
Total	$1015.00
Previously acknowledged	1904.00
Total to date	$2919.00

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
TIMES UNION

APR 11 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVE WONDERFUL CONCERT

Music lovers had a rich treat in Woolsey hall last evening when the far-famed Boston Symphony orchestra gave a concert that delighted all who heard it.

Under the leadership of the world-famous conductor, Serge Konssevitzky, the orchestra gave a wonderful exhibition of artistic talent.

The program was carried out to a brilliant finish, closing the season with the most delightful program presented in any city during this concert season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

APR 11 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS BRILLIANT IN WOOLSEY CONCERT

Rarely has this reviewer heard a conductor and band more clearly on its mettle than was the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, last night in Woolsey Hall. Not always can musicians impart to the music the enkindling flame of genuine absorption in the evening's task. There must be times when the giving of a concert is an irksome necessity. But last night was one of those fairly rare occasions when performers rise well beyond the limits of competence to something very close to inspiration.

Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain" was perhaps an exception to this. The piece is displayful, superficial music making, not without its rewards to the listener, but at best merely the clever work of a second rate composer. As if limited by the content of the music the orchestra and conductor gave the piece no more than a workmanlike performance.

But Debussy's Prelude to "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun" was quite another matter. This is undubitably a work of genius. Every measure of the Prelude drenched in the slumbrous beauty of a twilit forest, with the languorous note of a flute, the soughing of strings, the melancholy cry of the oboe making a perfect evocation of mood. This was obviously music close to Mr. Koussevitsky's heart, and he gave to it a reading of singular beauty. Every subtlety of the complex score, every nuance of melody, every undercurrent received its right emphasis, as the conductor wove a spell of rapt loveliness. His satisfied nod to his men at the end of the reading was clear indication of the affection he felt for this piece.

The Scherzo, "l'Apprenti Sorcier" of Dukas, next on the program was music of vastly different character, but none the less delightful in its humor and its grotesquerie. Again, Mr. Koussevitzky and his men outdid themselves with a stirring and vivid performance.

In the final number, the Fifth Symphony of Tscheaikowsky, conductors and orchestra were, to our mind, far above the quality of the piece, itself. Exciting the music frequently is; beautiful it occasionally is; but great it never is, and the orchestra under Koussevitzky gave a reading that came very close to being great.

Tschaikowsky is like a man who had never outgrown his adolescence, and who continued all his life to write from the standpoint of puppy love, growing pains, and schoolboy introspection. He had great melodic gifts, but he lacked completely the discrimination and fastidousness to select from among his copious ideas only those that were worthy of explotation. The result is that in his symphonies we find flights of the purest inspiration side by side with passages that sound as if they might have come out of a Shubert musical comedy.

The Fifth Symphony is like the others, with all their blatancy, all their self-pity, all their vulgarity, but like them, with moments of richly rewarding beauty. Unfortunately, to this reviewer at least, the tawdry

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE

APR 12 1929

Music of the Day

There is an inevitability about the Ninth Symphony: we must hear it once, at least, a year. The obsequies of no season are complete without it, and if Mr. Damrosch or Mr. Mengelberg or Mr. Toscanini fail in its celebration, another of their colleagues are alert and eager to sustain tradition.

Last evening in Carnegie Hall Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Symphony appeared to take leave of their New York audiences and, despatching first the Steinberg arrangement of C. P. E. Bach's D major Concerto, devoted themselves, the chorus of the Schola Cantorum and four soloists to the last of Beethoven's symphonies.

Mr. Koussewitsky, never before a convincing classicist, surprised his most devoted admirers. It was possible that his reading of the slow movement suffered from injudicious tempi, but otherwise he conducted a performance of the Ninth Symphony that was distinguished by its fidelity to the score, by vigor and nobility of conception, by splendid virtuosity of execution. The chorus, trained by Hugh Ross, sang admirably; the soloists—Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone—left little to be desired. Memory does not recall a performance of the Ninth Symphony so successful in its presentation of the final choral movement. The orchestra, surely one of the finest of existing bands, played with extraordinary beauty of tone, with virtuosity that seemed inherent and effortless, and the audience, roused to enthusiasm, applauded long after the conclusion of the concert.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

APR 12 1929

155

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Koussevitzky Conducts the Ninth Symphony for the First Time Here

Fifth and last evening concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Carnegie Hall.

Program

Bach, C. P. E., Concerto for Orchestra in D major (Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg).
Beethoven, Symphony No. 9, in D minor with final chorus on Schiller's Ode to Joy, Op. 125

CHORUS

Schola Cantorum of New York, Hugh Ross, Conductor,

SOLO QUARTET

Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van Der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor; Fraser Gange, bass.

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY'S interpretation of the Ninth Symphony has long been a critical storm-center in Europe. For some, it is too emotional, suffers from "an attempt at more 'expression' than the music will bear," is overstressed and over-romanticized. For others, it is a just revaluation of Beethoven—a "genuinely classic" reading, "since it places Beethoven before us in the composer's own image."

The critical air would be cleared if we should candidly admit that this whole question of the interpretation of masterworks is to a surprisingly large extent a matter of personal feeling and preference. The interpreter, as well as his critics, is here very much in the position of Walt Whitman contemplating the unknown region beyond the open grave, "where neither ground is for the feet nor any path to follow, . . . no map there, nor guide."

There is neither map nor guide, nor any certain path to follow, for the musical interpreter confronting a masterwork. The impressiveness of the account that he gives us of that masterwork will depend, for each of us, upon the extent to which we happen to share his temperamental and imaginative point of view.

* * *

FOR example, Mr. Koussevitzky last night took the Adagio molto of the Symphony at a tempo that was not in accordance with Beethoven's metronome-mark in the score. But who is so say that Mr. Koussevitzky was wrong—or right, for that matter? Beethoven's metronome direction for the opening of the slow movement is: "crotchet=60." But we have long known that Beethoven's metronome marks are undependable. He himself, according to Schindler, made two lists of metronome marks for the Ninth Symphony—the second from memory, after the original had been mislaid. When the first list came to light, a comparison showed a deviation in all the movements. Upon which, says Schindler, Beethoven flew into a rage, exclaiming: "No metronome at all! Whoever has the right feeling does not require it, and to him who has not got that, it is useless!"

* * *

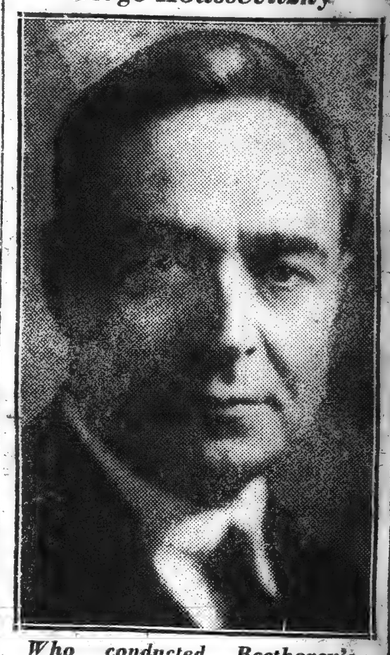
VERY well; but how is any one of us to know or to demonstrate that he has "the right feeling"? Take this matter of the tempo of the Adagio molto of the Ninth. Beethoven's metronome mark, we saw, is "crotchet=60." But Mr. Weingartner, a famous authority on Beethoven, says bluntly in his treatise on the performance of the symphonies that Beethoven's metronome-mark "is too quick." He recommends that we change Beethoven's 60 to 48-50. That is his "right feeling."

Mr. Koussevitzky's "right feeling" led him to adopt last night a slower tempo than either Beethoven's or Mr. Weingartner's—it was about 42. But Mr. Toscanini's tempo is even slower; he alters Beethoven's 60 to 38. That is his "right feeling." Theodore Thomas's "right feeling" was 40; Seidl's was about the same. Unfortunately, we do not know what metronome mark guided Wagner for the Adagio in his famous interpretation of the Ninth; but he tells us somewhere that he was perhaps the first conductor to take the beginning of this movement really Adagio, "and thus succeed in emphasizing the difference between the opening Adagio section and the following Andante moderato."

* * *

ENOUGH has been said to show that Beethoven's metronome mark has seemed wrong to many great conductors (and, if Schindler is to be believed, it seems to have been regarded as wrong by Beethoven himself at one time!). Certainly most of us feel that a metronome direction of "crochet—60" is scarcely the equivalent of "Adagio molto." But the point is, that if Beethoven's own specific directions leave us unconvinced and bewildered, where are we to look for guidance? To talk of "keeping strictly to the score," or "playing the music as it is written," is to talk nonsense. As every musician knows, the score of the Ninth Symphony is seldom in our time played "as it is written." If it were, it would sound grotesque at many points. One need only instance, in passing, the famous C major passage for the strings and wind at page 77 (full score) of the Scherzo, or the fortissimo passage later in the movement where the first violins and flute should go to a high B-flat, but do not. These, and numerous other passages, the concert-goer never hears as Beethoven wrote them—any more than he hears, as a rule, Beethoven's tempi.

Serge Koussevitzky



Who conducted Beethoven's Ninth Symphony here last night for the first time in New York

Clearly, then, it is idle to talk about playing this masterpiece "as it is written." Such being the fact, are we not pretty much at sea in discussing this whole matter of interpretation? It would seem so. It would seem, also, as if the only rational thing we can do in the circumstances is to test each individual reading by our own imaginative relation to the work in hand. We need not assert that we are right, but at least we may know that we are honest. Of course there are limits: there is a point beyond which we may confidently say, "This certainly is wrong"—as we were tempted to say to ourselves last night when Mr. Koussevitzky passed from the Adagio molto of the slow-movement to its andante moderato with no indication of the contrast in tempo that Beethoven plainly intended.

* * *

YET the special virtue of Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of the Ninth last night was that it gave us a curiously vivid sense of the subliminal quality of the greater portions of the work. Even though the tremendous first movement was somewhat reduced in scale and impact, the mysteriousness and the awe of the music spoke from the orchestra—and these things are of its essence.

Wagner, like Shakespeare, gave us a matchless expression of the natural world—its men and women and its seasons: that world exists for us, in the evocations of those masters, in the fullness of an overwhelming beauty and an infinite magic. But Wagner's world, and Shakespeare's, was an insubstantial one. It was not the durable world of Beethoven or of Blake. For Blake, as Gardner has justly said, the natural world was but the shadow of the real. Blake's world was the supersensuous world of the mystics, and it had the definiteness and clarity that belong to the visions of the mystic. It is not a world drenched in magic, as Shakespeare and Wagner drenched theirs, but a world perceived with so sharp a sense of its reality that the casual are driven to call its terror and its beauty those of supermundane things.

The Ninth Symphony is full of the sense of that mystical real world, and of the quality of utterance that is proper to its perception. Like Paul, both Blake and Beethoven uttered words that we had thought unspeakable. We are aware of Beethoven's travail, of his despair over the consciousness that what he perceived was unutterable; yet we, who listen, know that those words did actually pass his lips.

Perhaps because he approached these great mysteries and clarities of Beethoven's imaginative world with simplicity of spirit, with honesty of purpose, with affection and with awe, Mr. Koussevitzky was able last night to give us so often a sense of the special quality of the Ninth—its strange blend of fatefulness and transport, wild humor and superterrestrial beauty, mystery and exaltation, its tragical despair and its shouting among the stars.

* * *

THE vocal music that has troubled singers and auditors alike for more than a century was no more completely mastered last night than it has been in the past. It is much to say that most of the great moments in the Finale came off, to the glory of Beethoven—and also in spite of him. If that Recording Angel who watches over singer's misdeeds was obliged to take note last evening of some dubious intonation, some poor tone, some misjudged rhythms, he must surely have remembered to allot part of the blame to the marvelous tone-poet for whom the bounds and limitations of the factual world had almost ceased to count—whose tumultuous and soaring imagination re-created man in the image of his own unconquerable will.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram
APR 10 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY ARTISTS PLAY AT HIGH SCHOOL

Paul Shirley Conducts Orchestral Group in Program for School Children.

More than 1000 children and many adults enjoyed the third annual children's concert given yesterday afternoon at the high school auditorium by 16 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Paul Shirley.

For the past few weeks John Wilsbach, supervisor of music, and Miss Mary Sullivan, assistant supervisor of music in the public schools, had devoted the music periods to the study of the selections that were to be played yesterday. By means of Victrola records they had acquainted the children with the music and had also told them the interesting stories they represented.

When the children gathered yesterday in the high school auditorium they were all eager to hear how the Boston Symphony group would play the numbers they knew so well. Many of the boys and girls rolled up their programs and used them as batons, keeping time with the music and they were so appreciative that the members of the orchestra were quite impressed.

The Blue Danube Waltz by Strauss, always a favorite with audiences, delighted the children yesterday, for it was played with all the mastery of a truly great orchestra. Three of the other selections which particularly pleased the audience was Koehler's "The Mouse and the Trap"; the march from "Tannhauser" and the Peer Gynt suite. The March of the Lead Soldier was played as an encore.

The program opened with the brilliant march from "Tannhauser," which won the enthusiastic applause of the children. Throughout the entire program the playing by the string group was unusually choice and contributed immensely to the success o the concert. It is of interest that 1 members in the group are first-priz winners from the Academy of France

Among those who assisted in mak ing yesterday's concert such a suc cess were the students at the High land junior high school, vocationa school and the high school art department. The Girl Scouts who acted as ushers were: Charlotte Hall, Ruth Mescart, Mildred Knight, Dorothy Collins, Doris Preiss, Grace Burnett, Jeanette Zirlin, Rowena Gaunt.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Leads Boston Symphony Orchestra, Woolsey Hall, Tonight.

School of Music and Rudolph Steinert for the season of 1928-9, and as always the case a great gathering of music lovers wil be on hand for the sumptuous musical event.

The program in its entirety is as follows:

Berlioz, Overture to "The Roman Carnival", Op. 9.

Debussy, "Prelude a l'Aprez-Midi d'un Faune" (Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun). Eclogue by S. Mallarme.

Dukas, "L'Apprenti Sorcier" (The Sorcerer's Apprentice). Scherzo (After a Ballad by Goethe).

Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64
I. Andante.
II. Andante cantabile, con alouns licenza
III. Valse (Allegro moderato)
IV. Finale; Andante maestoso; Allegro vivace

Tickets for tonight's sterling musical event may be secured during the day at Steinert's, 188 Church street, and at the Woolsey Hall box office.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
APR 10 1929

SYMPHONY FUND IS LACKING $1100

City Must Give Up Orchestra Dates if Guarantee of $4000 Is Not Filled.

The fund which would bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra back again to Providence next season rested still below $3000 last night with $1015 added to the amount previously acknowledged. The appeal for guarantors who would underwrite the next series was made a full two weeks ago, and another generous thousand dollars is needed before the lowest hope of the Music Association is realized.

Seven subscriptions of $100 each are included in the list of 23 additional underwriters, although smaller sums have been welcomed. The seven major subscriptions were from: Miss Ellen D. Sharpe, Mrs. Edgar J. Lownes, Samuel M. Nicholson, Mrs. James R. MacColl, Mr. and Mrs. Frank L. Hinckley, John Russell Gladding and R. Clinton Fuller.

The quota of the Music Association has been lessened for the next season by the unusual offer by the orchestra to increase its share of the rental by $800. As a result the Providence guarantee must be only $4000 instead of $4800, but without this guarantee the Boston orchestra will not return to this city. The danger of a break in this series of years' standing has been emphasized by Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, honorary president of the association, who declared that the loss of the orchestra for one year might mean its loss for ten. Other cities are eager to take over the Providence dates.

The exact total to date is $2919, $1904 of which had been previously acknowledged. Subscriptions to help underwrite the Symphony season should be sent to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., Treasurer of the Music Association, Box 1536, Providence, or to the Providence Journal.

The most recent guarantors include:

Miss Ellen D. Sharpe	$100.00
Mrs. James B. Richardson	25.00
Mrs. Edgar J. Lownes	100.00
Mrs. George S. Mathews	10.00
Samuel M. Nicholson	100.00
Mrs. Harrison B. Huntoon	50.00
L. C. B. McCullough	5.00
John S. Coggeshall	5.00
Eleanor B. Green	25.00
Mrs. James Richardson	25.00
Mrs. Frank H. Brown	50.00
Mr. and Mrs. Joel A. Goldthwait	10.00
Mrs. James R. MacColl	100.00
Dorothy Goulding Gilman	10.00
Elizabeth N. White	25.00
Carrie Schmitt	5.00
Edith W. Edwards	5.00
Anonymous	5.00
Mrs. Dexter B. Potter	10.00
Mr. and Mrs. Frank L. Hinckley	100.00
Mrs. Harry C. Curtis	50.00
John Russell Gladding	100.00
R. Clinton Fuller	100.00
Total	$1015.00
Previously acknowledged	1904.00
Total to date	$2919.00

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
TIMES UNION
APR 11 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVE WONDERFUL CONCERT

Music lovers had a rich treat in Woolsey hall last evening when the far-famed Boston Symphony orchestra gave a concert that delighted all who heard it.

Under the leadership of the world-famous conductor, Serge Konssevitzky, the orchestra gave a wonderful exhibition of artistic talent.

The program was carried out to a brilliant finish, closing the season with the most delightful program presented in any city during this concert season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
APR 11 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS BRILLIANT IN WOOLSEY CONCERT

Rarely has this reviewer heard a conductor and band more clearly on its mettle than was the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, last night in Woolsey Hall. Not always can musicians impart to the music the enkindling flame of genuine absorption in the evening's task. There must be times when the giving of a concert is an irksome necessity. But last night was one of those fairly rare occasions when performers rise well beyond the limits of competence to something very close to inspiration.

Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain" was perhaps an exception to this. The piece is displayful, superficial music making, not without its rewards to the listener, but at best merely the clever work of a second rate composer. As if limited by the content of the music the orchestra and conductor gave the piece no more than a workmanlike performance.

But Debussy's Prelude to "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun" was quite another matter. This is undubitably a work of genius. Every measure of the Prelude drenched in the slumbrous beauty of a twilit forest, with the languorous note of a flute, the soughing of strings, the melancholy cry of the oboe making a perfect evocation of mood. This was obviously music close to Mr. Koussevitsky's heart, and he gave to it a reading of singular beauty. Every subtlety of the complex score, every nuance of melody, every undercurrent received its right emphasis, as the conductor wove a spell of rapt loveliness. His satisfied nod to his men at the end of the reading was clear indication of the affection he felt for this piece.

The Scherzo, "l'Apprenti Sorcier" of Dukas, next on the program was music of vastly different character, but none the less delightful in its humor and its grotesquerie. Again, Mr. Koussevitzky and his men outdid themselves with a stirring and vivid performance.

In the final number, the Fifth Symphony of Tscheaikowsky, conductors and orchestra were, to our mind, far above the quality of the piece, itself. Exciting the music frequently is; beautiful it occasionally is; but great it never is, and the orchestra under Koussevitzky gave a reading that came very close to being great.

Tschaikowsky is like a man who had never outgrown his adolescence, and who continued all his life to write from the standpoint of puppy love, growing pains, and schoolboy introspection. He had great melodic gifts, but he lacked completely the discrimination and fastidousness to select from among his copious ideas only those that were worthy of explotation. The result is that in his symphonies we find flights of the purest inspiration side by side with passages that sound as if they might have come out of a Shubert musical comedy.

The Fifth Symphony is like the others, with all their blatancy, all their self-pity, all their vulgarity, but like them, with moments of richly rewarding beauty. Unfortunately, to this reviewer at least, the tawdry passages so far outnumber the fine ones that we are quite unable to accept the symphony. Nevertheless we were able to perceive and admire the the orchestra in their interpretation of the music, and if anything could ever have made it live for us, last night's performance would have.

J. L. SHUTE

once, at least, a year. The obsequies of no season are complete without it, and if Mr. Damrosch or Mr. Mengelberg or Mr. Toscanini fail in its celebration, another of their colleagues are alert and eager to sustain tradition.

Last evening in Carnegie Hall Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Symphony appeared to take leave of their New York audiences and, despatching first the Steinberg arrangement of C. P. E. Bach's D major Concerto, devoted themselves, the chorus of the Schola Cantorum and four soloists to the last of Beethoven's symphonies.

Mr. Koussewitsky, never before a convincing classicist, surprised his most devoted admirers. It was possible that his reading of the slow movement suffered from injudicious tempi, but otherwise he conducted a performance of the Ninth Symphony that was distinguished by its fidelity to the score, by vigor and nobility of conception, by splendid virtuosity of execution. The chorus, trained by Hugh Ross, sang admirably; the soloists—Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone—left little to be desired. Memory does not recall a performance of the Ninth Symphony so successful in its presentation of the final choral movement. The orchestra, surely one of the finest of existing bands, played with extraordinary beauty of tone, with virtuosity that seemed inherent and effortless, and the audience, roused to enthusiasm, applauded long after the conclusion of the concert.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
APR 12 1929

153

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Koussevitzky Conducts the Ninth Symphony for the First Time Here

Fifth and last evening concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Carnegie Hall.

Program

Bach, C. P. E.,
Concerto for Orchestra in D major (Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg).

Beethoven,
Symphony No. 9, in D minor with final chorus on Schiller's Ode to Joy, Op. 125

CHORUS

Schola Cantorum of New York, Hugh Ross, Conductor.

SOLO QUARTET

Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van Der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor; Fraser Gange, bass.

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY'S interpretation of the Ninth Symphony has long been a critical storm-center in Europe. For some, it is too emotional, suffers from "an attempt at more 'expression' than the music will bear," is overstressed and over-romanticized. For others, it is a just revaluation of Beethoven—a "genuinely classic" reading, "since it places Beethoven before us in the composer's own image."

The critical air would be cleared if we should candidly admit that this whole question of the interpretation of masterworks is to a surprisingly large extent a matter of personal feeling and preference. The interpreter, as well as his critics, is here very much in the position of Walt Whitman contemplating the unknown region beyond the open grave, "where neither ground is for the feet nor any path to follow, . . . no map there, nor guide."

There is neither map nor guide, nor any certain path to follow, for the musical interpreter confronting a masterwork. The impressiveness of the account that he gives us of that masterwork will depend, for each of us, upon the extent to which we happen to share his temperamental and imaginative point of view.

* * *

FOR example, Mr. Koussevitzky last night took the Adagio molto of the Symphony at a tempo that was not in accordance with Beethoven's metronome-mark in the score. But who is so say that Mr. Koussevitzky was wrong—or right, for that matter? Beethoven's metronome direction for the opening of the slow movement is: "crotchet=60." But we have long known that Beethoven's metronome marks are undependable. He himself, according to Schindler, made two lists of metronome marks for the Ninth Symphony—the second from memory, after the original had been mislaid. When the first list came to light, a comparison showed a deviation in all the movements. Upon which, says Schindler, Beethoven flew into a rage, exclaiming: "No metronome at all! Whoever has the right feeling does not require it, and to him who has not got that, it is useless!"

* * *

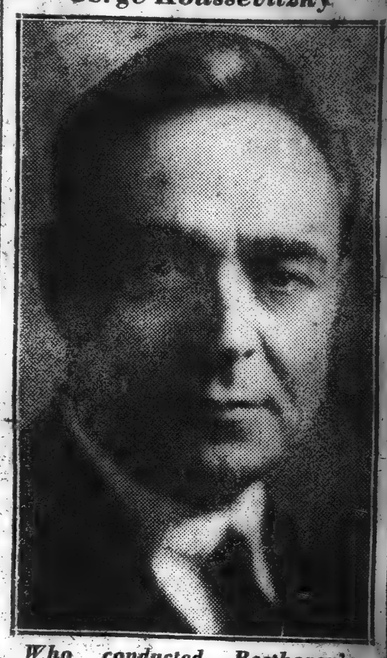
VERY well; but how is any one of us to know or to demonstrate that he has "the right feeling"? Take this matter of the tempo of the Adagio molto of the Ninth. Beethoven's metronome mark, we saw, is "crotchet=60." But Mr. Weingartner, a famous authority on Beethoven, says bluntly in his treatise on the performance of the symphonies that Beethoven's metronome-mark "is too quick." He recommends that we change Beethoven's 60 to 48-50. That is his "right feeling."

Mr. Koussevitzky's "right feeling" led him to adopt last night a slower tempo than either Beethoven's or Mr. Weingartner's—it was about 42. But Mr. Toscanini's tempo is even slower; he alters Beethoven's 60 to 38. That is his "right feeling." Theodore Thomas's "right feeling" was 40; Seidl's was about the same. Unfortunately, we do not know what metronome mark guided Wagner for the Adagio in his famous interpretation of the Ninth; but he tells us somewhere that he was perhaps the first conductor to take the beginning of this movement really Adagio, "and thus succeed in emphasizing the difference between the opening Adagio section and the following Andante moderato."

* * *

ENOUGH has been said to show that Beethoven's metronome mark has seemed wrong to many great conductors (and, if Schindler is to be believed, it seems to have been regarded as wrong by Beethoven himself at one time!). Certainly most of us feel that a metronome direction of "crochet—60" is scarcely the equivalent of "Adagio molto." But the point is, that if Beethoven's own specific directions leave us unconvinced and bewildered, where are we to look for guidance? To talk of "keeping strictly to the score," or "playing the music as it is written," is to talk nonsense. As every musician knows, the score of the Ninth Symphony is seldom in our time played "as it is written." If it were, it would sound grotesque at many points. One need only instance, in passing, the famous C major passage for the strings and wind at page 77 (full score) of the Scherzo, or the fortissimo passage later in the movement where the first violins and flute should go to a high B-flat, but do not. These, and numerous other passages, the concert-goer never hears as Beethoven wrote them—any more than he hears, as a rule, Beethoven's tempi.

Serge Koussevitzky



Who conducted Beethoven's Ninth Symphony here last night for the first time in New York

Clearly, then, it is idle to talk about playing this masterpiece "as it is written." Such being the fact, are we not pretty much at sea in discussing this whole matter of interpretation? It would seem so. It would seem, also, as if the only rational thing we can do in the circumstances is to test each individual reading by our own imaginative relation to the work in hand. We need not assert that we are right, but at least we may know that we are honest. Of course there are limits: there is a point beyond which we may confidently say, "This certainly is wrong"—as we were tempted to say to ourselves last night when Mr. Koussevitzky passed from the Adagio molto of the slow movement to its andante moderato with no indication of the contrast in tempo that Beethoven plainly intended.

* * *

YET the special virtue of Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of the Ninth last night was that it gave us a curiously vivid sense of the subliminal quality of the greater portions of the work. Even though the tremendous first movement was somewhat reduced in scale and impact, the mysteriousness and the awe of the music spoke from the orchestra—and these things are of its essence.

Wagner, like Shakespeare, gave us a matchless expression of the natural world—its men and women and its seasons: that world exists for us, in the evocations of those masters, in the fullness of an overwhelming beauty and an infinite magic. But Wagner's world, and Shakespeare's, was an insubstantial one. It was not the durable world of Beethoven or of Blake. For Blake, as Gardner has justly said, the natural world was but the shadow of the real; Blake's world was the supersensuous world of the mystics, and it had the definiteness and clarity that belong to the visions of the mystic. It is not a world drenched in magic, as Shakespeare and Wagner drenched theirs, but a world perceived with so sharp a sense of its reality that the casual are driven to call its terror and its beauty those of supermundane things.

The Ninth Symphony is full of the sense of that mystical real world, and of the quality of utterance that is proper to its perception. Like Paul, both Blake and Beethoven uttered words that we had thought unspeakable. We are aware of Beethoven's travail, of his despair over the consciousness that what he perceived was unutterable; yet we, who listen, know that those words did actually pass his lips.

Perhaps because he approached these great mysteries and clarities of Beethoven's imaginative world with simplicity of spirit, with honesty of purpose, with affection and with awe, Mr. Koussevitzky was able last night to give us so often a sense of the special quality of the Ninth—its strange blend of fatefulness and transport, wild humor and superterrestrial beauty, mystery and exaltation, its tragical despair and its shouting among the stars.

* * *

THE vocal music that has troubled singers and auditors alike for more than a century was no more completely mastered last night than it has been in the past. It is much to say that most of the great moments in the Finale came off, to the glory of Beethoven—and also in spite of him. If that Recording Angel who watches over singer's misdeeds was obliged to take note last evening of some dubious intonation, some poor tone, some misjudged rhythms, he must surely have remembered to allot part of the blame to the marvelous tone-poet for whom the bounds and limitations of the factual world had almost ceased to count—whose tumultuous and soaring imagination re-created man in the image of his own unconquerable will.

156

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
APR 12 1929

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, preceded by a delicious "concerto for orchestra" of C. P. E. Bach, in the arrangement of Maximilian Steinberg, made the program of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, last night in Carnegie Hall. The orchestra was assisted by the chorus of the Schola Cantorum, which had been prepared for this occasion and by a quartet consisting of Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone. The same program will be given at the Boston Symphony's final New York concert of the season, tomorrow afternoon in Carnegie Hall.

This symphony, colossal, incomprehensible to the majority when it was produced, as great symphonies are likely to be, is now sure fire with an audience. The big choral effects can always be relied upon to stir the listeners. Beethoven writes cruelly for the voices, but with inescapable dramatic power. The finale, the least symphonic of the movements, is always the most effective. This also held true, last night, of Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation.

It should be added to this last remark that of all the Beethoven symphonies this one is the most discussed and disputed, as regards both its value and its interpretation. Its size and purpose and design were doubtless among the causes of its designation as the greatest symphony Beethoven ever wrote. But there may well be other bases of estimate and criticism, and certainly the symphony is poorly proportioned and misshapen.

There are incongruities of style and purpose—three genuinely symphonic movements, superbly inspired and composed, cheek by jowl with a fourth movement that does not achieve unity with them, in spite of Beethoven's quotations, in this movement of themes from the preceding sections. And the finale is program music, oratorio, music-drama in one strange whole. It has passages of a commonplace character—the choral tune by which Beethoven sought to convey the sentiments of Schiller's "Ode to Joy," and his own profound and intense humanity is not free from this reproach—and it has seldom the continuity of effect that it was given last night. We know that Beethoven's original sketches for the finale were purely instrumental and that this material eventually found its way into his late A minor quartet. The Ninth Symphony is deformed by the change and substitution of the choral passages. But the dramatic and humanitarian emotion of the finale is another matter. The genius of Beethoven can be wrong by all traditional, or even artistic, standards of judgment and right by virtue of a spirit and inspiration which, perforce, impose themselves on lesser people and become their own vindication.

But it is easy to understand Wagner's conclusions regarding the future of the symphonic form, based on the Ninth symphony's finale. He saw in it Beethoven's unconscious confession that the purely symphonic form had reached its extreme limit of development, and the foreshadowing of his own creations in the domain of the music-drama. These matters are recalled, not for the sake of mouthing ancient history, but in connection with the fact that Mr. Koussevitzky was most effective, indeed overwhelming, when he presented the avowedly dramatic, even programmatic Beethoven, and was more debatable in the movements of purely symphonic music.

Some agreed, and some did not agree with the distinguished musician in these earlier passages. Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of the first movement of the Ninth Symphony includes a more deliberate pace than most conductor's adopt. It is intended, no doubt, to bestow upon the movement special nobility and rugged power. For the writer a degree of emotional force and turbulent splendor is lost by this tempo. For him, also, the interpretation of the opening movement was somewhat fixed, not entirely spontaneous, giving the impression of having been too carefully and precisely planned. The scherzo had more of the fantasy and the wild energy that fairly shakes the orchestra, as it should in accordance with the nature of the passage. The slow movement was gloriously sung. Some prefer a broader tempo here, but it would be hard to surpass the warmth and expressiveness of the strings and the radiance of the coloring.

The triumph of the performance was certainly the finale. Here the conductor's dramatic temperament, his personal ability to bring response from his interpretators, his instinct for effect, welded all the forces of interpretation into a single unit of will and feeling. Here again, Mr. Koussevitzky had his own ideas of tempo, nuance and the like. He conveyed them with such logic, such conviction, such imperious command of the other interpretors, that the finale had a wonderful sweep and length of line and cumulative power. It was not a series of episodes, an ineffectual warbling of the quartet one moment, then an instrumental interlude, then shouts from the chorus, then a variation for orchestra, and onward. The listeners did not gasp at the simple grandeur of Beethoven's "vor Gott," and marvel the next moment at the thinness of a passage of instrumentation.

Surely and grandly, and with the most dramatic punctuation, this movement gathered to its close. The chorus did not sing what it could sing, but what it had to sing. The quartet was a firmly sustained and adjusted part of a mighty ensemble, and under the circumstances acquitted itself with uncommon credit. Temperament, leadership, a dramatic vision conveyed the finale of the Ninth Symphony, and, assent or dissent of individuals to the contrary, profoundly impressed the audience. At the last there was long applause and many recalls for the conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. WORLD
APR 12 1929

MUSIC

By Richard L. Stokes

BEETHOVEN'S Symphony No. 9, in D Minor, Op. 125, better known as the "Choral," was prepared by Mr. Serge Koussevitzky for his fifth and final pair of programs this season at Carnegie Hall. His first essay of this masterpiece in New York befell yesterday evening, and the second will occur to-morrow afternoon. The conductor and the Boston Symphony Orchestra were assisted by the Schola Cantorum of this city and a distinguished quartet of soloists—Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van Der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor; and Fraser Gange, baritone.

Since Mr. Toscanini refrained from presenting the Ninth Symphony during his recent engagement—to say nothing of his unfulfilled promise of a production of the "Missa Solemnis"—the eminent Bostonian's enterprise in leaping into the gap excited eager anticipations. With regret it must be reported that these were largely disappointed. Certain passages of the score were animated with fresh and vivid meanings. The choral section has rarely stamped upon the mind so imperious a conviction of its grandeur—thanks, one fears, to ghostly brandishings of Mr. Toscanini's absent wand above the ranks of the Schola Cantorum. But on the whole, Mr. Koussevitsky gave an impression of being as yet a mere student of the mighty classic, which was ill studied, ill rehearsed and ill performed.

* * *

The opening of the symphony was not inauspicious—those hollow fifths in second violins and violoncellos which strike the imagination with the hush, the awe, the tremulous tension and immensity of cosmic space, while the first violins, sotto voce, whisper mysteries of galactic import. But the conductor had no sooner plunged into the main body of the movement than he was obviously nonplussed. Like an orator who finds himself unprepared upon his feet and struggles to face out the predicament with a bluster of rant, Mr. Koussevitsky set his orchestra to roaring and shouting. This did not conceal the fact that his grasp upon the music was spasmodic. The Allegro, one of the vast rolling oceans of man's creation in tones, fell asunder into a congeries of inlets and bays.

The Scherzo, with the enlivening notations of molto vivace and presto, should dance as lightly and swiftly as flame. Instead it became leaden of foot and strangely laggard in its impression of pace, despite the director's rapid beat. The tone quality grew raucous, and the tympani—this symphony is known as the "kettledrum concerto"—got far out of hand. The only relief was the lyrical D Major interlude, which enforced a welcome delicacy upon the instruments.

* * *

The orchestra recaptured its celebrated beauty of tone in the Adagio, but the reading was one of the least uplifting and imaginative in memory. The divine melodies turned pedestrian and earthbound. The time signature is, of course, "very slow," but even the most loitering examples of linked sweetness long drawn out may be made to pulsate with vitality. The movement proved on the contrary so inert that for once it seemed interminable.

The Presto section opening the fourth movement assumed the clamorous texture of a band on the Midway Pleasance. The great recitatives for violoncellos and doublebasses which interrupt the orchestra were delivered with no discernible sense of their dramatic import. With restive and fiery impatience, mounting with each interjection, they implore and command the other instruments to stand aside for the entrance of the voices. Here they uttered meaningless brawls, as the orchestra tried passages from the first, second and third movements, which the recitatives should sweep impetuously away, only to burst forth with a transport of joy when an oboe at last catches the idea and murmurs a fragment of the giant vocal theme which is to come.

To clinch their purpose, the bass strings then confide to the orchestra the choral theme in its entirety. This critical passage Mr. Koussevitzky treated with a solemnity, a hushed and pregnant suspense, which told the principal character of the symphony was at last upon the boards. From that point the performance fell mostly into the hands of the soloists and of the chorus, which had many times sung the work under Mr. Toscanini's baton.

* * *

It is in the baritone voice that the yearning music at last finds human utterance and articulation. Mr. Gange acquitted himself of this momentous task with a desperate and jolting fury. And soon afterward, when the quartet entered with its statement of the theme, it was found that the excellent voices refused to blend, and conveyed the false notion that their music is unsingable. The elaborately decorated variation that follows for the soloists was not easy to endure, and was annihilated by the harmonies in cloth of gold with which the chorus took up the phrase, "Und der Cherub steht vor Gott."

The variation entitled "Alla marcia," which Mr. Koussevitsky clattered off with tingling vivacity, brought forward the one markworthy solo achievement of the night. It was Mr. Althouse's admirable projection of the tenor air, "Froh wie seine Sonnen fliegen." Thereafter the evening belonged to the chorus, which soared into the barbarously ethereal regions enforced by Beethoven as if the spirit of Mr. Toscanini were present to swing their voices aloft. Much derision has been expended upon Beethoven's setting of Schiller's "Ode to Joy." All is said in praise of last night's choristers with the assertion that in their hands the Finale of the Ninth Symphony became one of the prime masterpieces of choral composition. There is nothing more lofty and magnificent in the "Missa Solemnis."

Mr. Koussevitsky began his program with a presentation of C. P. E. Bach's Concerto in D Major, colorfully arranged by Maximilian Steinberg, which was the last word in classic elegance, and which almost persuaded one that Emanuel Bach might have ranked as a great composer if he had not been swallowed up in his father's voracious fame.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAM
APR 12 1929

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
APR 12 1929

Music

By Samuel Chotzinoff

The "Ninth"

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitsky conducting. Carnegie Hall, 8.30. Assisted by Schola Cantorum of New York and Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada van der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

Concerto for orchestra in D Major, C. P. E. Bach-Steinberg
Symphony No. 9, in D Minor.....Beethoven
Orchestra, chorus and soloists.

By the numerous standees and the crowded aspect of Carnegie Hall last night it was evident that Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra had kept their advertised promise to give their hungry New York subscribers Beethoven's "Ninth" Symphony. A concerto in D major by Carl Philip Emanuel Bach also figured on the program, but it was the "Ninth" that, last night, attracted the largest audience that the Bostonians had faced this season.

One wonders what would have been the fate of this symphony if Beethoven hadn't changed his mind at the last minute and written a choral finale instead of the instrumental last movement he had originally intended. For it is the vocal last movement with its talismanic text that is chiefly responsible, I am certain, for the enormous popularity of a work that might otherwise have been as caviar to the average concertgoer as the last pianoforte sonata and the later string quartets.

I had the feeling last night, as I always have at a performance of the "Ninth," that the audience endures the first three movements, but at the first discord of the presto which ushers in the finale pricks up its ears for a revelation. And, indeed, for all the artificiality with which the choral portion is made to fit smoothly into the scheme of the symphony the effect of the moment is truly terrific. On a close examination of Schiller's text one finds no actual democratic sentiment, yet the words and the music affect one like some magnificent proletarian propaganda.

Mr. Koussevitzky, the Schola Cantorum chorus, Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van Der Veer, Paul Althouse and Fraser Gange all labored devotedly in the cause, whatever it is, of Beethoven's Last Symphony, but the spiritual quality of the work eluded all the participants. It is ungracious to compare one man's interpretation with another, but Mr. Toscanini has set a standard for the "Ninth" which cannot be easily effaced.

Old Music for New

PHILHARMONIC - SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Clemens Krauss conducting. Carnegie Hall, 2.30.

Overture to "Abu Hassan".....Weber
Symphony No. 7, C Major.....Haydn
Hungarian Dances Nos. 10, 3, 1.....Brahms
Ein Heldenleben.....Strauss

For some new music by Erich Korngold which Mr. Clemens Krauss had intended to offer the Philharmonic-Symphony subscribers yesterday afternoon Mr. Toscanini's successor substituted a symphony in C major by Josef Haydn, the parts of the Korngold novelty having failed to arrive in time. The substitution was not to be regretted, for no matter how fine the new piece might have proved to be the Haydn was sure to be better.

The fact is the Haydn symphony seemed even better music than Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben," the big matter of yesterday's matinee. That this should be so is a curious commentary on the belief that evolution informs art as well as science.

The Haydn is an old-fashioned work, modeled on a conventional frame postulating emotions that seem as alien to our complex psychological existence as its composer's pigtail and satin knee-breeches. Certainly Strauss's hero's life, picturing a heroism which, in Strauss's own words, "relates to the inward battles of life, and which aspires, through struggle and renunciation, toward the elevation of the soul," should hold up the mirror to our modern spiritual travail.

Yet to this listener, at least, the Haydn symphony, with its conventional array of musical ideas, its naive beauty and hearty humor, appeared more veristic, more modern, even, than the gigantic tone poem of Strauss. The hero of the ancient symphony—for every piece of music has a hero—is an innocent, modest little soul compared with the Strauss superman who constantly "does things," as the phrase goes. But Haydn's average man, though lacking the recognizable attributes of heroism, is yet a living person, while the superman appears increasingly to bear a resemblance to a loud speaker.

This sad estimate of a work that not so long ago was considered the essential echo of the modern spirit may have been induced by the mock-heroic treatment it is generally accorded by our visiting and stationary maestri. Mr. Krauss yesterday did all the things to "Ein Heldenleben" which his colleagues had made familiar to us, —the overcharged heroics, the raucous jubilations, the succulent introspection and the gooey love proclamations. The Haydn, I thought, fared better, though not perfectly.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN

Boston Symphony Gives Concert

Kraus Again Wields Baton at Philharmonic's Final Thursday Matinee.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Orchestral concerts occupied Carnegie Hall afternoon and evening yesterday, each one being the last of a series. In the afternoon the Philharmonic-Symphony Society gave its final Thursday matinee and in the evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared for the last time except at tomorrow's matinee. Clemens Kraus much to the bewilderment of the inner brotherhood continued to direct the doings of the Philharmonic. The more he conducts, the more the wonder grows. It certainly was not lessened by the activities of yesterday afternoon.

Mr. Kraus presented Haydn's symphony in C major, No. 97, in the Breitkopf & Haertel edition, the well-known three Hungarian dances arranged by Brahms, and Richard Strauss's tone poem "Ein Heldenleben." The symphony is not played often and doubtless for that reason most of the audience enjoyed hearing it. But there was nothing in the performance of it according to the dictates of Mr. Kraus to add to the fame of the composer. It was a singularly dull and pointless performance in spite of the quite obvious attempts to make points at any cost.

The Hungarian dances were rushed along with every evidence of belief in movement. The general effect except in the No. 3, which cannot be played rapidly, was breathless. "Ein Heldeleben" is a composition tolerably familiar to Philharmonic audiences since it was dedicated to Mr. Mengelberg and is often presented by him. Just why Mr. Kraus selected it would be difficult to conjecture, but he received the customary tribute of applause for his interpretation.

The concert of the Boston orchestra in the evening was of impressive type. It began with Carl Philip Emanuel Bach's concerto in D major for orchestra, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg and concluded with Beethoven's ninth symphony. When the latter work is performed commentators are expected to emit prolonged and unfathomed essays, just why no one has ever been able to explain satisfactorily. There is nothing to be said about the ninth symphony that has not been said many times. Most of what is said now consists of quotations. There is also always much historical matter, all of which has been published over and over again. Berlioz and Richard Wagner are called into count as witnesses to the greatness of the work and there is a considerable to do about the entire matter.

It is Mr. Koussevitzky's purpose to repeat the [illegible] at the final matinee of the season tomorrow. If it should seem imperative to this writer to launch an essay after that performance perhaps he will launch, but he has his doubts. The solo singers in last evening's offering were Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, barytone. The chorus was that of the Schola Cantorum.

The Bach number was a delight. Here is music by one of the sons of the great Sebastian, rich in scholarship and filled with youthful and ebullient spirit in the faster movements and a haunting beauty in the slow movement. The composition was played with tone and finish of the best Boston quality. Mr. Koussevitzky brought out all the charm of the concerto and the audience rewarded him and the musicians with most hearty applause.

JOSEPH RUMSHINSKY.

Wrote score of "Second Avenue Follies," Molly Picon's new show, which opens tonight in Kessler's Second Avenue Theater.

156

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
APR 12 1929

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, preceded by a delicious "concerto for orchestra" of C. P. E. Bach, in the arrangement of Maximilian Steinberg, made the program of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, last night in Carnegie Hall. The orchestra was assisted by the chorus of the Schola Cantorum, which had been prepared for this occasion and by a quartet consisting of Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone. The same program will be given at the Boston Symphony's final New York concert of the season, tomorrow afternoon in Carnegie Hall.

This symphony, colossal, incomprehensible to the majority when it was produced, as great symphonies are likely to be, is now sure fire with an audience. The big choral effects can always be relied upon to stir the listeners. Beethoven writes cruelly for the voices, but with inescapable dramatic power. The finale, the least symphonic of the movements, is always the most effective. This also held true, last night, of Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation.

It should be added to this last remark that of all the Beethoven symphonies this one is the most discussed and disputed, as regards both its value and its interpretation. Its size and purpose and design were doubtless among the causes of its designation as the greatest symphony Beethoven ever wrote. But there may well be other bases of estimate and criticism, and certainly the symphony is poorly proportioned and misshapen.

There are incongruities of style and purpose—three genuinely symphonic movements, superbly inspired and composed, cheek by jowl with a fourth movement that does not achieve unity with them, in spite of Beethoven's quotations, in this movement of themes from the preceding sections. And the finale is program music, oratorio, music-drama in one strange whole. It has passages of a commonplace character—the choral tune by which Beethoven sought to convey the sentiments of Schiller's "Ode to Joy," and his own profound and intense humanity is not free from this reproach—and it has seldom the continuity of effect that it was given last night. We know that Beethoven's original sketches for the finale were purely instrumental and that this material eventually found its way into his late A minor quartet. The Ninth Symphony is deformed by the change and substitution of the choral passages. But the dramatic and humanitarian emotion of the finale is another matter. The genius of Beethoven can be wrong by all traditional, or even artistic, standards of judgment and right by virtue of a spirit and inspiration which, perforce, impose themselves on lesser people and become their own vindication.

But it is easy to understand Wagner's conclusions regarding the future of the symphonic form, based on the Ninth symphony's finale. He saw in it Beethovan's unconscious confession that the purely symphonic form had reached its extreme limit of development, and the foreshadowing of his own creations in the domain of the music-drama. These matters are recalled, not for the sake of mouthing ancient history, but in connection with the fact that Mr. Koussevitzky was most effective, indeed overwhelming, when he presented the avowedly dramatic, even programmatic Beethoven, and was more debatable in the movements of purely symphonic music.

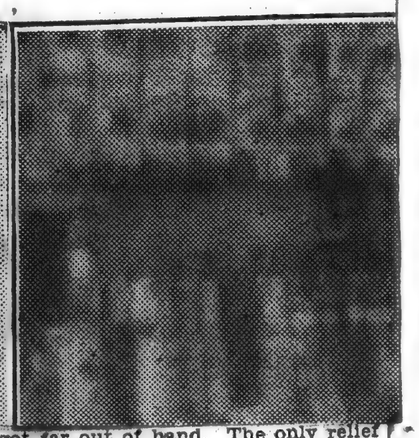
Some agreed, and some did not agree with the distinguished musician in these earlier passages, Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of the first movement of the Ninth Symphony includes a more deliberate pace than most conductor's adopt. It is intended, no doubt, to bestow upon the movement special nobility and rugged power. For the writer a degree of emotional force and turbulent splendor is lost by this tempo. For him, also, the interpretation of the opening movement was somewhat fixed, not entirely spontaneous, giving the impression of having been too carefully and precisely planned. The scherzo had more of the fantasy and the wild energy that fairly shakes the orchestra, as it should in accordance with the nature of the passage. The slow movement was gloriously sung. Some prefer a broader tempo here, but it would be hard to surpass the warmth and expressiveness of the strings and the radiance of the coloring.

The triumph of the performance was certainly the finale. Here the conductor's dramatic temperament, his personal ability to bring response from his interpretators, his instinct for effect, welded all the forces of interpretation into a single unit of will and feeling. Here again, Mr. Koussevitzky had his own ideas of tempo, nuance and the like. He conveyed them with such logic, such conviction, such imperious command of the other interpretors, that the finale had a wonderful sweep and length of line and cumulative power. It was not a series of episodes, an ineffectual warbling of the quartet one moment, then an instrumental interlude, then shouts from the chorus, then a variation for orchestra, and onward. The listeners did not gasp at the simple grandeur of Beethovan's "vor Gott," and marvel the next moment at the thinness of a passage of instrumentation.

Surely and grandly, and with the most dramatic punctuation, this movement gathered to its close. The chorus did not sing what it could sing, but what it had to sing. The quartet was a firmly sustained and adjusted part of a mighty ensemble, and under the circumstances acquitted itself with uncommon credit. Temperament, leadership, a dramatic vision conveyed the finale of the Ninth Symphony, and, assent or dissent of individuals to the contrary, profoundly impressed the audience. At the last there was long applause and many recalls for the conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. WORLD
APR 12 1929

30
La
Her
Met



—got far out of hand. The only relief was the lyrical D Major interlude, which enforced a welcome delicacy upon the instruments.

* * *

The orchestra recaptured its celebrated beauty of tone in the Adagio, but the reading was one of the least uplifting and imaginative in memory. The divine melodies turned pedestrian and earthbound. The time signature is, of course, "very slow," but even the most loitering examples of linked sweetness long drawn out may be made to pulsate with vitality. The movement proved on the contrary so inert that for once it seemed interminable.

The Presto section opening the fourth movement assumed the clamorous texture of a band on the Midway Pleasance. The great recitatives for violoncellos and doublebasses which interrupt the orchestra were delivered with no discernible sense of their dramatic import. With restive and fiery impatience, mounting with each interjection, they implore and command the other instruments to stand aside for the entrance of the voices. Here they uttered meaningless brawls, as the orchestra tried passages from the first, second and third movements, which the recitatives should sweep impetuously away, only to burst forth with a transport of joy when an oboe at last catches the idea and murmurs a fragment of the giant vocal theme which is to come.

To clinch their purpose, the bass strings then confide to the orchestra the choral theme in its entirety. This critical passage Mr. Koussevitzky treated with a solemnity, a hushed and pregnant suspense, which told the principal character of the symphony was at last upon the boards. From

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAM
APR 12 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PERFORMS BEETHOVEN'S NINTH

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts—Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van Der Veer, Paul Althouse and Fraser Gange Make Up the Quartet of Soloists.

By PITTS SANBORN.

FOR the first time in several decades of New York concerts the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall last evening, treated its patrons of Manhattan to Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. A local chorus, that of the Schola Cantorum, participated in the finale, and the four soloists were Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van Der Veer, Paul Althouse and Fraser Gange—all familiar to our public, Mr. Gange being even something of a specialist in his appointed task.

Thus Serge Koussevitzky was enabled to demonstrate to us further his qualities as an interpreter of Beethoven. His reading of the symphony was cerebral throughout—some felt deficient in appreciation of its true character, certainly deficient in what is ordinarily called feeling. The first movement I liked best. Lacking though it was in mystery and poor though it was in drama, it stood forth in a rare clarity of form.

But this firm sense of design got a good deal upset in the scherzo (take, for instance, those overdone accelerandi) and in the adagio was lost completely. The andante, which Beethoven himself said should be played in "grandioso" fashion, suggested a tripping allegretto. As for the finale, it was so mannered and finicky that there could be no question of a great inevitable onward sweep.

Technically the orchestra was admirable. The chorus discharged its superhuman duty rather more successfully than choruses usually do. Of the harried soloists Mr. Gange came best through a terrific ordeal.

The program included only one other number, prefatory to the symphony—the concerto for orchestra in D major of Philip Emanuel Bach that Maximilian Steinberg has arranged for Mr. Koussevitzky. To one listener the feature of the evening was the "Andante Lento Molto" of this concerto—music of a noble melancholy, fascinating in its coloring, which Mr. Koussevitzky led with evident sympathy and which his men played superbly. In the two allegros of the concerto, however, would not a reduced body of strings have produced a still finer effect? An audience which packed Carnegie Hall seemed to enjoy the concert greatly.

"Ninth," that the audience endures the first three movements, but at the first discord of the presto which ushers in the finale pricks up its ears for a revelation. And, indeed, for all the artificiality with which the choral portion is made to fit smoothly into the scheme of the symphony the effect of the moment is truly terrific. On a close examination of Schiller's text one finds no actual democratic sentiment, yet the words and the music affect one like some magnificent proletarian propaganda.

Mr. Koussevitzky, the Schola Cantorum chorus, Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van Der Veer, Paul Althouse and Fraser Gange all labored devotedly in the cause, whatever it is, of Beethoven's Last Symphony, but the spiritual quality of the work eluded all the participants. It is ungracious to compare one man's interpretation with another, but Mr. Toscanini has set a standard for the "Ninth" which cannot be easily effaced.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN
APR 12

Boston Symphony Gives Concert

Kraus Again Wields Baton at Philharmonic's Final Thursday Matinee.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Orchestral concerts occupied Carnegie Hall afternoon and evening yesterday, each one being the last of a series. In the afternoon the Philharmonic-Symphony Society gave its final Thursday matinee and in the evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared for the last time except at tomorrow's matinee. Clemens Kraus much to the bewilderment of the inner brotherhood continued to direct the doings of the Philharmonic. The more he conducts, the more the wonder grows. It certainly was not lessened by the activities of yesterday afternoon.

Mr. Kraus presented Haydn's symphony in C major, No. 97, in the Breitkopf & Haertel edition, the well-known three Hungarian dances arranged by Brahms, and Richard Strauss's tone poem "Ein Heldenleben." The symphony is not played often and doubtless for that reason most of the audience enjoyed hearing it. But there was nothing in the performance of it according to the dictates of Mr. Kraus to add to the fame of the composer. It was a singularly dull and pointless performance in spite of the quite obvious attempts to make points at any cost.

The Hungarian dances were rushed along with every evidence of belief in movement. The general effect except in the No. 3, which cannot be played rapidly, was breathless. "Ein Heldeleben" is a composition tolerably familiar to Philharmonic audiences since it was dedicated to Mr. Mengelberg and is often presented by him. Just why Mr. Kraus selected it would be difficult to conjecture, but he received the customary tribute of applause for his interpretation.

The concert of the Boston orchestra in the evening was of impressive type. It began with Carl Philip Emanuel Bach's concerto in D major for orchestra, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg and concluded with Beethoven's ninth symphony. When the latter work is performed commentators are expected to emit prolonged and unfathomed essays, just why no one has ever been able to explain satisfactorily. There is nothing to be said about the ninth symphony that has not been said many times. Most of what is said now consists of quotations. There is also always much historical matter, all of which has been published over and over again. Berlioz and Richard Wagner are called into count as witnesses to the greatness of the work and there is a considerable to do about the entire matter.

It is Mr. Koussevitzky's purpose to repeat the [redacted] at the final matinee of the season tomorrow. If it should seem imperative to this writer to launch an essay after that performance perhaps he will launch, but he has his doubts. The solo singers in last evening's offering were Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, barytone. The chorus was that of the Schola Cantorum.

The Bach number was a delight. Here is music by one of the sons of the great Sebastian, rich in scholarship and filled with youthful and ebullient spirit in the faster movements and a haunting beauty in the slow movement. The composition was played with tone and finish of the best Boston quality. Mr. Koussevitzky brought out all the charm of the concerto and the audience rewarded him and the musicians with most hearty applause.

JOSEPH RUMSHINSKY.

Wrote score of "Second Avenue Follies," Molly Picon's new show, which opens tonight in Kessler's Second Avenue Theater.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
APR 12 1929

Music

Samuel Chotzinoff

Old Music for New

PHILHARMONIC SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Clemens Krauss conducting, Carnegie Hall, 2.30.

Overture to "Abu Hassan".....Weber
Symphony No. 7, C Major.....Haydn
Hungarian Dances Nos. 10, 3, 1.....Brahms
Ein Heldenleben.....Strauss

For some new music by Erich Korngold which Mr. Clemens Krauss had intended to offer the Philharmonic-Symphony subscribers yesterday afternoon Mr. Toscanini's successor substituted a symphony in C major by Josef Haydn, the parts of the Korngold novelty having failed to arrive in time. The substitution was not to be regretted, for no matter how fine the new piece might have proved to be the Haydn was sure to be better.

The fact is the Haydn symphony seemed even better music than Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben," the big matter of yesterday's matinee. That this should be so is a curious commentary on the belief that evolution informs art as well as science.

The Haydn is an old-fashioned work, modeled on a conventional frame postulating emotions that seem as alien to our complex psychological existence as its composer's pigtail and satin knee-breeches. Certainly Strauss's hero's life, picturing a heroism which, in Strauss's own words, "relates to the inward battles of life, and which aspires, through struggle and renunciation, toward the elevation of the soul," should hold up the mirror to our modern spiritual travail.

Yet to this listener, at least, the Haydn symphony, with its conventional array of musical ideas, its naive beauty and hearty humor, appeared more veristic, more modern, even, than the gigantic tone poem of Strauss. The hero of the ancient symphony—for every piece of music has a hero—is an innocent, modest little soul compared with the Strauss superman who constantly "does things," as the phrase goes. But Haydn's average man, though lacking the recognizable attributes of heroism, is yet a living person, while the superman appears increasingly to bear a resemblance to a loud speaker.

This sad estimate of a work that not so long ago was considered the essential echo of the modern spirit may have been induced by the mock-heroic treatment it is generally accorded by our visiting and stationary maestri. Mr. Krauss yesterday did all the things to "Ein Heldenleben" which his colleagues had made familiar to us, —the overcharged heroics, the raucous jubilations, the succulent introspection and the gooey love proclamations. The Haydn, I thought, fared better, though not perfectly.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

157

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK AMERICAN
APR 12 192[illegible]

MILK FUND OPERA BRILLIANTLY SUNG AT METROPOLITAN

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

AN annual event at the Metropolitan which never fails to fill that house, both because of musical and sentimental appeal, is the representation for the Free Milk Fund For Babies, Inc.

Yesterday afternoon marked this season's operatic effort of Mrs. William Randolph Hearst, president of the Fund, and her helpful associates toward the kindly and touching charity which they have taken under their especial sponsorship.

The performance was "Mignon," and the artists whose services aided the cause constituted the brilliant cast which has given new life for several seasons to a work which had been generally regarded as hopelessly paled and out of date.

No doubt the nature of the occasion yesterday influenced the singers, for they voiced the light and gracious melodies of "Mignon" and acted its simple pathos, comedy and romance with a degree of tenderness and spirit which moved the auditors to the utmost display of enthusiasm which "Mignon" has won during its current revival at the Metropolitan.

Lucrezia Bori, love-tried maid, gave a polished and charming interpretation. Her voice was at its bright best. As for Beniamino Gigli, a humanitarian if ever there was one, his heart was in his every tone yesterday. He pealed out an unceasing flow of lovely lyricism. Cavalierly refinement and restraint mark his acting at Meister.

It has been my belief for quite a while that Marion Talley's top-notch of vocal and histrionic achievement is reached in the role of Philine. That conviction ripened even further at the matinee yesterday. The nature and atmosphere of "Mignon" bring out fully the youthful sweetness of much of Miss Talley's singing, and in the "Polonaise" she exhibits a measure of tonal abandon and brilliance that it seems difficult for her to express in "Lucia" and "Rigoletto."

Ovation for Miss Talley

She makes a fetching appearance as Philine and is thoroughly at home in the mischief and sly fun of the part.

Miss Talley earned an honest share of the ovations that were lavished upon the bowing artists after each act.

The Lothario of Clarence Whitehill is a recognized classic in dignity and style. Ellen Dalossy did a tellingly dashing bit as Frederic. Some excellent buffoonery was furnished by Messrs. Ananian, Bada and Cehanovsky. Louis Hasselmans and his orchestra, principals and chorus in finished and tasteful accord.

There were other interesting features of the afternoon which helped to make it a picturesque success, and the inquiring reader may find them related veraciously in the news pages of this issue.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION
APR 13 1929

Boston Orchestra Concert

Under the baton of the redoubtable Serge Koussevitzky the Boston Symphony Orchestra was thoroughly admirable at the Academy of Music last night. It was the orchestra's concluding concert of the current Brooklyn season. Had the programme been just a trifle more evenly balanced, it too might have been more thoroughly admirable, but after the rendition of Brahms' D major symphony there was difficulty in remembering Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice." Brahms came last. It was conducted with the usual Koussevitzky grace and elegance, plus a modicum of eloquence, not to mention an individual freedom of interpretation.

The audience was large and duly appreciative.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
APR 12 1929

In the World of Music

The Ever-Popular Ninth of Beethoven Is Gratifyingly Performed by Koussevitzky's Men

WHEN great music is exposed, "debunked," humanized and satirized by critics just as great men have been dealt with by modern biographers, Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will probably be the target for much word-slinging. For the present, however, this last of the master's symphonies retains its tight corner on the sacred awe market, and persons who are deaf to the drama and nobility of the Fourth and Fifth bow down in reverence before the Ninth.

What is more, the devotees of the Ninth are no mere handful. Last night's performance at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky demonstrated the usual box-office appeal of the work. Standees, as many as could be crowded in, lent increased volume to the gratifying reception of the performance.

I have never heard a performance of the Ninth more persuasive of its merits than the one Mr. Koussevitzky gave us. The customary interpretation leaves the various movements so disjointed and of uneven development as to confirm the statement, said to have been made by Beethoven, that only his poverty compelled him to write it. Still, the various interpreters of the work have found plausible significance in it.

The Ninth is sometimes said to be, for instance, a poetic recollection of the melodic line of Beethoven's earlier symphonic works, a mellowed and understanding restatement of earlier themes of struggle, of fate, of frustrated love and of religious exaltation. It is my suspicion that an audience unfamiliar with the symphony and unaware of what it was hearing, would find at least half of the work monotonous, part of the famous Adagio oversentimentalized, and the contrast of choral and orchestral passages in the Finale extremely disruptive.

Mr. Koussevitzky, however, lent a homogeneity to the third movement which almost made one forget the sharp break in the score which makes that movement a strange marriage of two entirely unrelated themes. His deft embroidery of the three themes of the delightful Scherzo in the "dotted triplet" rhythm was good to hear, and his despotic direction of the vocal chorus seemed to impress unity and cohesion on the entire performance.

The Schola Cantorum of New York was the victim of Beethoven's unreasonable demands on the human throat this time, and rarely have the difficulties of the singing been so efficiently surmounted. Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van Der Veer, Paul Althouse and Fraser Gange negotiated the solo parts and the quartet passages with equal effectiveness.

To open the program the resonant string[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
TIMES
APR 13 1929

MUSIC

By HAROLD A. STRICKLAND

FINAL BOSTON CONCERT

Brooklyn's symphony season was brought to a close last night when Serge Koussevitsky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra paid its final visit to the Academy and presented the fifth of its series of programs for local subscribers.

Mr. Koussevitsky reverted to previous practices in the matter of program making and offered but three numbers, none of which was a novelty. But then, his last concert here did include a new work and he gave Brooklyn an opportunity to hear it even before Manhattan.

Last night's numbers included Schubert's "Unfinished," in two movements, the conductor not concerning himself with any of the many arrangements of the final section which were handed about during the recent Schubertian observances. Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice" was the second number and the conductor closed his program with Brahms' second symphony.

But if the program was conservative and lacking in novelty, it cannot be said that the conductor or orchestra read it in sterotyped style. The Schubert was treated delicately with the Dukas read as a bit of froth.

In the Brahms, Mr. Koussevitsky gave us a lyric reading rather than a grave and philosophic presentation as some have taken this symphony to be. Grace and humanness stood out with the romantic flair predominating.

And the orchestra was in splendid form. After hearing so many sorts of orchestral fone this season, it was a genuine pleasure to listen to the Bostonians last night. Verily as an ensemble they stand out over any orchestra which this city has heard during a rather hectic period.

The dates were announced for next year. Five concerts will be given, all but one on Friday evenings.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE
APR 13 1929

Rumbough. Major McSweeney, is of a musician, his prejudices and his preferences, and it intends no discourtesy when it discriminates between what he does well and what he does badly. Mr. Koussewitsky is certainly an admirable conductor, one of the most salient now before us, an illuminating expositor of much French and Russian music; but Bach and Beethoven and Brahms, Mozart, Schubert and Schumann, the great masters of German classic and romantic tradition, have in the past suffered often at his hands, in readings of their works curiously superficial in conception, eccentric and theatrical.

But as on Thursday night in Carnegie Hall Mr. Koussewitsky conducted, we understand, a splendid performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, so last evening he gave interpretations of Schubert and Brahms far more satisfying than those that we have known him to offer in the past. Formerly, indeed, these identical symphonies, the B minor of the first and the D major of the last great Romantic, afforded us what was at the time a convincing demonstration of Mr. Koussewitsky's inability to cope with the classics. Yet at the Academy of Music the Andante of the Schubert seemed to us poetically felt (we did not hear the first movement), not unpardonably exaggerated in its sentiment, and the Brahms, though certainly an inferior and rather dull performance, not so gross a misconception as memory recalled it.

Both Mr. Koussewitsky and the orchestra sketched the Allegro ma non troppo tentatively, disturbing the unity of its form and design with slight but uncalled-for alterations of tempo, with abrupt, unsubtle dynamic changes, and they made little indeed of its delicious coda, surely one of the most exquisite pages in all the Brahms symphonies The adagio Mr. Koussewitsky read liberally as an andante, thus robbing it of its gravity and profundity, but his treatment of the scherzo was admirable. He has a habit, this Russian conductor, when he faces the development of a climax, of making an almost imperceptible pause, drawing his energy and that of his orchestra together, and launching into a broad tempo, with marked rhythmic emphasis. It is a little trick not in the best of taste, seldom invited by the music to which he applies it, as in the finale of the Brahms, last evening, and toward the close of the Dukas scherzo. Perhaps Mr. Koussewitsky thinks it effective; it really isn't, and he should overcome the temptation to indulge in it.

Because Mr. Toscanini played the "Sorcerer's Apprentice" with such reviving delicacy and brilliance only a few weeks ago, Mr. Koussewitsky's version of this agreeable music seemed heavy and coarse—an odd circumstance, since it is the sort of music to which his talents are most of[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
APR 14 1929

The annual concert on March 24 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the benefit of its pension fund was sold out well in advance [illegible] fund for pensioning former members of the orchestra and their dependents was founded in 1903 and there are now seventy-one beneficiaries on its payroll, receiving a little more than $17,000 yearly. Each member of the orchestra contributes annual dues until he has paid in $750, but this, even with the proceeds of the benefit concerts, would be inadequate without the aid of gifts. As it is, the maximum pension paid is $500 per annum to pensioners, a sum which it is hoped may be increased. Only musicians who have served for ten years or more with the orchestra are entitled to assistance, which varies according to age, residence and earnings.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
APR 13 1929

SYMPHONY FUND NEARS FIRST GOAL

New Guarantees of $1020 Raise Total to $3939 of $4000 Minimum Needed.

Within reach of its first objective, the Music Association last night acknowledged new guarantees totalling $1020 and turned its efforts to securing the last sums necessary to insure the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Providence next season. A minimum of $4000 is needed to continue this winter concert series that has become the feature of the year's music, and $3939 have been subscribed to date.

It is the hope of the association, however, that an additional three or four thousand dollars will be forthcoming to underwrite a concert group to correspond with that which has included the enormously successful appearances of Jascha Heifetz, Dusolina Giannini and Alexander Brailowsky this spring. The Cleveland Orchestra and Richard Bonelli are still to fill engagements under the Music Association's auspices.

Any surplus from the Symphony underwriting will be diverted to another popular series, and officers of the association are appealing for more subcriptions with that in mind.

Seven major guarantees are cited on the latest list, including one of $150 from Mr. and Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, and six of $100 each from Mr. and Mrs. T. I. Hare Powel, Wilson G. Wing, Mr. and Mrs. William S. Innis, Mr. and Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., James C. Collins, and Donald E. Jackson.

The complete roster of new guarantors follows:

Mary Carver Smith	5.00
Mr. and Mrs. J. D. E. Jones	50.00
Mr. and Mrs. T. I. Hare Powel	100.00
Annette M. Ham	25.00
Mrs. William B. M. Miller	10.00
Mrs. Walter Savage Ball	10.00
Evangeline Larry	5.00
A. P. S.	25.00
Mrs. Henry B. Gardner	10.00
Mrs. C. J. Steedman	25.00
W. H. P. Faunce	20.00
Monday Morning Musical Club	10.00
Wilson G. Wing	100.00
Mr. and Mrs. Carl B. Marshall	25.00
Mr. and Mrs. William S. Innis	100.00
Mr. and Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe	150.00
Mr. and Mrs. William Gammell, Jr.	100.00
James C. Collins	100.00
John O. Ames	50.00
Donald E. Jackson	100.00
Total	$1020.00
Previously acknowledged	2919.00
Total to date	$3939.00

CLASSIFIED ADS spell opportunity for both readers and advertisers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
Apr 14 1929

A BRILLIANT CONCERT.

Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony Close Engagement Here.

Sergei Koussevitzky's festival performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony for the second time in three days here brought to a brilliant close the season's visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. There was again an overflowing house, many persons standing throughout the performance, while the performers, including the chorus, numbered some 350 on the stage. The concert opened, as on Thursday night, with the much applauded three movements of Maximilian Steinberg's arrangement of the orchestral concerto in D major by Carl Philip Emanuel Bach.

The Boston season of the orchestra will end April 27, and Mr. Koussevitzky will return to New York to sail May 1 on the Mauretania for Paris. There he is to direct performances of "Boris Godunoff" later in the month at the Paris Opéra. Moussorgsky's work will be performed, as hitherto, in the version arranged by Rimsky-Korsakoff. Alfredo Casella for the third time is to conduct the Boston Symphony "pop" concerts, which will run from May 1 to July 2. The orchestra's next season will start in Boston on Oct. 11 and in New York on Nov. 21. A season after that, in the Winter of 1930-31, Koussevitzky and his men will celebrate the Boston Symphony's golden jubilee year.

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra faces a deficit this year of $134,000, of which $32,000 was for broadcast charges. This is the greatest deficit in its history.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER
APR 14 [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph
APR 13 1929

Bostonians' Last Visit

Koussevitzky Leads Symphony in Beethoven's Ninth at Carnegie.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra began the round of its last New York visit of the year when, on Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall, Serge Koussevitzky stood among the towering human heights of orchestra, chorus and soloists gathered to perform the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven.

Conductors are in the same position to the famous Ninth as most actors are to Hamlet. It is their dream of final achievement. But not all actors, nor even all tragedians, are fitted temperamentally to summon the Prince of Denmark. Nor are all conductors able to set free the strangely imprisoned qualities of the Ninth.

Serge Koussevitzky has not been given the mystic understanding, nor provided with the key which is as an "open sesame" to the mountain.

▼

THE Russian has his specialties. They are many. He is versatile. He is not one-sided. He is delightful in Mozart, convincing in Bach, arousing in modernistic enterprises and extraordinary where mighty climaxes must be achieved. He has a good ear for sound effects, for contrasts, for tonal beauties. At all times do the Bostonians make beautiful music. At all times is the ensemble of true musical worth.

Surely the second movement, Molto Vivace, with its bright scherzo effect, was charming, and the two-themed Adagio Molto sensuously appealing. The opening of the symphony, light, delicate, ethereal, had qualities of sound. What was missing was the philosophy of Beethoven, the solemnity, the majesty, the deeply melancholy passages, and the transition to the riotous abandon of the Finale and Chorus.

▼

THE Schola Cantorum provided the chorale background; they sang lustily and generally satisfactorily. The soloists were Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada van der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, basso. Nobody had any real opportunity to demonstrate his or her worth; the music allows little leeway and Mr. Koussevitzky reduced that considerably. Yet, out of it the rich, open voice of Althouse and the virility of Gange came through. Miss Vreeland, eager to make the opportunity for herself, shrieked until her notes were painful to hear.

The Symphony was preceded by Maximilian Stei[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN
APR 15 1929

Philharmonic Finishes Season

Boston Symphony Also Concludes Its Series of Concerts at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Philharmonic-Symphony Society concluded its season with the concert of yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra finished its local series in the same auditorium on Saturday afternoon. At this concert, as at the Thursday evening one of the Bostonians, Serge Koussevitzky conducted Carl Philip Emanuel Bach's concerto in D major for orchestra and Beethoven's ninth symphony. About the music of the Hamburg Bach something has already been said here.

Let us hope that this composition will not be permitted to lapse into disuse again for so long a period. It is a work of excellent musicianship and bestows upon an audience the increasingly rare blessing of spontaneous and unaffected beauty.

tant business in Milan. He has been observed with attention and the active methods of his conducting watched with the deep interest habitually accorded in this town to moving pictures. He will leave behind him no disturbing memories.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

157

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK AMERICAN
APR 12 1929

MILK FUND OPERA BRILLIANTLY SUNG AT METROPOLITAN

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

AN annual event at the Metropolitan which never fails to fill that house, both because of musical and sentimental appeal, is the representation for the Free Milk Fund For Babies, Inc.

Yesterday afternoon marked this season's operatic effort of Mrs. William Randolph Hearst, president of the Fund, and her helpful associates toward the kindly and touching charity which they have taken under their especial sponsorship.

The performance was "Mignon," and the artists whose services aided the cause constituted the brilliant cast which has given new life for several seasons to a work which had been generally regarded as hopelessly paled and out of date.

No doubt the nature of the occasion yesterday influenced the singers, for they voiced the light and gracious melodies of "Mignon" and acted its simple pathos, comedy and romance with a degree of tenderness and spirit which moved the auditors to the utmost display of enthusiasm which "Mignon" has won during its current revival at the Metropolitan.

Lucrezia Bori, love-tried maid, gave a polished and charming interpretation. Her voice was at its bright best. As for Beniamino Gigli, a humanitarian if ever there was one, his heart was in his every tone yesterday. He pealed out an unceasing flow of lovely lyricism. Cavalierly refinement and restraint mark his acting at Meister.

It has been my belief for quite a while that Marion Talley's top-notch of vocal and histrionic achievement is reached in the role of Philine. That conviction ripened even further at the matinee yesterday. The nature and atmosphere of "Mignon" bring out fully the youthful sweetness of much of Miss Talley's singing, and in the "Polonaise" she exhibits a measure of tonal abandon and brilliance that it seems difficult for her to express in "Lucia" and "Rigoletto."

Ovation for Miss Talley

She makes a fetching appearance as Philine and is thoroughly at home in the mischief and sly fun of the part.

Miss Talley earned an honest share of the ovations that were lavished upon the bowing artists after each act.

The Lothario of Clarence Whitehill is a recognized classic in dignity and style. Ellen Dalossy did a tellingly dashing bit as Frederic. Some excellent buffoonery was furnished by Messrs. Ananian, Bada and Cehanovsky. Louis Hasselmans and his orchestra, principals and chorus in finished and tasteful accord.

There were other interesting features of the afternoon which helped to make it a picturesque success, and the inquiring reader may find them related veraciously in the news pages of this issue.

• • •

Another matinee of music intensely enjoyed materialized at Carnegie Hall, where the Philharmonic Orchestra (only one day [illegible] ort the close of its season concert under the [illegible]ing and vivid [illegible] audi-ton Symphony [illegible]estra was thoroughly admirable at the Academy of Music last night. It was the orchestra's concluding concert of the current Brooklyn season. Had the programme been just a trifle more evenly balanced, it too might have been more thoroughly admirable, but after the rendition of Brahms' D major symphony there was difficulty in remembering Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice." Brahms came last. It was conducted with the usual Koussevitzky grace and elegance, plus a modicum of eloquence, not to mention an individual freedom of interpretation.

The audience was large and duly [illegible]ive.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
APR 12 1929

Hip Slide Key to Right Downswing

By SOL METZGER

Next time you see "Wild Bill" Mehlhorn drive from the tee, place yourself directly in front of him and watch his hips and knees as he starts his downswing.

The first move noticeable will be

I have never [illegible] the Ninth more persuasive of its merits than the one Mr. Koussevitzky gave us. The customary interpretation leaves the various movements so disjointed and of uneven development as to confirm the statement, said to have been made by Beethoven, that only his poverty compelled him to write it. Still, the various interpreters of the work have found plausible significance in it.

The Ninth is sometimes said to be, for instance, a poetic recollection of the melodic line of Beethoven's earlier symphonic works, a mellowed and understanding restatement of earlier themes of struggle, of fate, of frustrated love and of religious exaltation. It is my suspicion that an audience unfamiliar with the symphony and unaware of what it was hearing, would find at least half of the work monotonous, part of the famous Adagio oversentimentalized, and the contrast of choral and orchestral passages in the Finale extremely disruptive.

Mr. Koussevitzky, however, lent a homogeneity to the third movement which almost made one forget the sharp break in the score which makes that movement a strange marriage of two entirely unrelated themes. His deft embroidery of the three themes of the delightful Scherzo in the "dotted triplet" rhythm was good to hear, and his despotic direction of the vocal chorus seemed to impress unity and cohesion on the entire performance.

The Schola Cantorum of New York was the victim of Beethoven's unreasonable demands on the human throat this time, and rarely have the difficulties of the singing been so efficiently surmounted. Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van Der Veer, Paul Althouse and Fraser Gange negotiated the solo parts and the quartet passages with equal effectiveness.

To open the program the resonant strings of the Boston or[illegible] played Maximilian Steinberg's [illegible]ment for the orc[illegible] Bach's Conc[illegible] which [illegible]

[illegible]3 192[illegible]

MUSIC

By HAROLD A. STRICKLAND

FINAL BOSTON CONCERT

Brooklyn's symphony season was brought to a close last night when Serge Koussevitsky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra paid its final visit to the Academy and presented the fifth of its series of programs for local subscribers.

Mr. Koussevitsky reverted to previous practices in the matter of program making and offered but three numbers, none of which was a novelty. But then, his last concert here did include a new work and he gave Brooklyn an opportunity to hear it even before Manhattan.

Last night's numbers included Schubert's "Unfinished," in two movements, the conductor not concerning himself with any of the many arrangements of the final section which were handed about during the recent Schubertian observances. Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice" was the second number and the conductor closed his program with Brahms' second symphony.

But if the program was conservative and lacking in novelty, it cannot be said that the conductor or orchestra read it in sterotyped style. The Schubert was treated delicately with the Dukas read as a bit of froth.

In the Brahms, Mr. Koussevitsky gave us a lyric reading rather than a grave and philosophic presentation as some have taken this symphony to be. Grace and humanness stood out with the romantic flair predominating.

And the orchestra was in splendid form. After hearing so many sorts of orchestral tone this season, it was a genuine pleasure to listen to the Bostonians last night. Verily as an ensemble they stand out over any orchestra which this city has heard during a rather hectic period.

The dates were announced for next year. Five concerts will be given, all but one on Friday evenings.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE
APR 13 1929

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

Mr. Koussewitsky Conducts Schubert and Brahms at the Academy of Music—Tschaikowsky's "Eugene Onegin."

UNDER the direction of Mr. Koussewitsky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its final concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening, and although the program was attractively arranged, including two symphonies, the B minor of Schubert and the D major of Brahms, and Dukas' orchestral scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," the audience was neither so large nor so enthusiastic as has been customary on these Friday evenings. Perhaps the word has gone about that Mr. Koussewitsky does not excel as a classicist, that by temperament and experience his sympathies extend more to the Russians and the moderns—Scriabin, Debussy, Strawinsky, Ravel, Prokofiew. For, in time, a public learns the bent of a musician, his prejudices and his preferences, and it intends no discourtesy when it discriminates between what he does well and what he does badly. Mr. Koussewitsky is certainly an admirable conductor, one of the most salient now before us, an illuminating expositor of much French and Russian music; but Bach and Beethoven and Brahms, Mozart, Schubert and Schumann, the great masters of German classic and romantic tradition, have in the past suffered often at his hands, in readings of their works curiously superficial in conception, eccentric and theatrical.

But as on Thursday night in Carnegie Hall Mr. Koussewitsky conducted, we understand, a splendid performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, so last evening he gave interpretations of Schubert and Brahms far more satisfying than those that we have known him to offer in the past. Formerly, indeed, these identical symphonies, the B minor of the first and the D major of the last great Romantic, afforded us what was at the time a convincing demonstration of Mr. Koussewitsky's inability to cope with the classics. Yet at the Academy of Music the Andante of the Schubert seemed to us poetically felt (we did not hear the first movement), not unpardonably exaggerated in its sentiment, and the Brahms, though certainly an inferior and rather dull performance, not so gross a misconception as memory recalled it.

Both Mr. Koussewitsky and the orchestra sketched the Allegro ma non troppo tentatively, disturbing the unity of its form and design with slight but uncalled-for alterations of tempo, with abrupt, unsubtle dynamic changes, and they made little indeed of its delicious coda, surely one of the most exquisite pages in all the Brahms symphonies The adagio Mr. Koussewitsky read liberally as an andante, thus robbing it of its gravity and profundity, but his treatment of the scherzo was admirable. He has a habit, this Russian conductor, when he faces the development of a climax, of making an almost imperceptible pause, drawing his energy and that of his orchestra together, and launching into a broad tempo, with marked rhythmic emphasis. It is a little trick not in the best of taste, seldom invited by the music to which he applies it, as in the finale of the Brahms, last evening, and toward the close of the Dukas scherzo. Perhaps Mr. Koussewitsky thinks it effective; it really isn't, and he should overcome the temptation to indulge in it.

Because Mr. Toscanini played the "Sorcerer's Apprentice" with such reviving delicacy and brilliance only a few weeks ago, Mr. Koussewitsky's version of this agreeable music seemed heavy and coarse—an odd circumstance, since it is the sort of music to which his talents are most often best devoted. Perhaps some of the fault may be laid at the door of the orchestra, which played throughout the evening with neither its fabled beauty of tone nor its customary virtuosity.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
APR 13 1929

[illegible]HARMONY FUND

[illegible]020 of [illegible]howl- $1020 the

[illegible]e re- lestra

[illegible]mum win- e the $3939

[illegible]four

[illegible]ing to underwrite a concert group to correspond with that which has included the enormously successful appearances of Jascha Heifetz, Dusolina Giannini and Alexander Brailowsky this spring. The Cleveland Orchestra and Richard Bonelli are still to fill engagements under the Music Association's auspices.

Any surplus from the Symphony underwriting will be diverted to another popular series, and officers of the association are appealing for more subscriptions with that in mind.

Seven major guarantees are cited on the latest list, including one of $150 from Mr. and Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe and six of $100 each from Mr. and Mrs. T. I. Hare Powel, Wilson G. Wing, Mr. and Mrs. William S. Innis, Mr. and Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., James C. Collins, and Donald E. Jackson.

The complete roster of new guarantors follows:

Mary Carver Smith	5.00
Mr. and Mrs. J. D. E. Jones	50.00
Mr. and Mrs. T. I. Hare Powel	100.00
Annette M. Ham	25.00
Mrs. William B. M. Miller	10.00
Mrs. Walter Savage Ball	10.00
Evangeline Larry	5.00
A. P. S.	25.00
Mrs. Henry B. Gardner	10.00
Mrs. C. J. Steedman	25.00
W. H. P. Faunce	20.00
Monday Morning Musical Club	10.00
Wilson G. Wing	100.00
Mr. and Mrs. Carl B. Marshall	25.00
Mr. and Mrs. William S. Innis	100.00
Mr. and Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe	150.00
Mr. and Mrs. William Gammell, Jr.	100.00
James C. Collins	100.00
John O. Ames	50.00
Donald E. Jackson	100.00
Total	$1020.00
Previously acknowledged	2919.00
Total to date	$3939.00

CLASSIFIED ADS spell opportunity for both readers and advertisers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
APR 14 1929

A BRILLIANT CONCERT.

Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony Close Engagement Here.

Sergei Koussevitzky's festival performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony for the second time in three days here brought to a brilliant close the season's visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. There was again an overflowing house, many persons standing throughout the performance, while the performers, including the chorus, numbered some 350 on the stage. The concert opened, as on Thursday night, with the much applauded three movements of Maximilian Steinberg's arrangement of the orchestral concerto in D major by Carl Philip Emanuel Bach.

The Boston season of the orchestra will end April 27, and Mr. Koussevitzky will return to New York to sail May 1 on the Mauretania for Paris. There he is to direct performances of "Boris Godunoff" later in the month at the Paris Opéra. Moussorgsky's work will be performed, as hitherto, in the version arranged by Rimsky-Korsakoff. Alfredo Casella for the third time is to conduct the Boston Symphony "Pop" concerts, which will run from May 1 to July 2. The orchestra's next season will start in Boston on Oct. 11 and in New York on Nov. 21. A season after that, in the Winter of 1930-31, Koussevitzky and his men will celebrate the Boston Symphony's golden jubilee year.

THIS CLIP[illegible]
SAN FRANC[illegible]
EXAMI[illegible]
APR 14 [illegible]

The [illegible] Orchestra faces a deficit this year of $134,000, of which $32,000 was for broadcast charges. This is the greatest deficit in its history.

was founded in 1903 and there are now seventy-one beneficiaries on its payroll, receiving a little more than $17,000 yearly. Each member of the orchestra contributes annual dues until he has paid in $750, but this, even with the proceeds of the benefit concerts, would be inadequate without the aid of gifts. As it is, the maximum pension paid is $500 per annum to pensioners, a sum which it is hoped may be increased. Only musicians who have served for ten years or more with the orchestra are entitled to assistance, which varies according to age, residence and earnings.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph
APR 13 1929

Bostonians' Last Visit

Koussevitzky Leads Symphony in Beethoven's Ninth at Carnegie.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra began the round of its last New York visit of the year when, on Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall, Serge Koussevitzky stood among the towering human heights of orchestra, chorus and soloists gathered to perform the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven.

Conductors are in the same position to the famous Ninth as most actors are to Hamlet. It is their dream of final achievement. But not all actors, nor even all tragedians, are fitted temperamentally to summon the Prince of Denmark. Nor are all conductors able to set free the strangely imprisoned qualities of the Ninth.

Serge Koussevitzky has not been given the mystic understanding, nor provided with the key which is as an "open sesame" to the mountain.

▼

THE Russian has his specialties. They are many. He is versatile. He is not one-sided. He is delightful in Mozart, convincing in Bach, arousing in modernistic enterprises and extraordinary where mighty climaxes must be achieved. He has a good ear for sound effects, for contrasts, for tonal beauties. At all times do the Bostonians make beautiful music. At all times is the ensemble of true musical worth.

Surely the second movement, Molto Vivace, with its bright scherzo effect, was charming, and the two-themed Adagio Molto sensuously appealing. The opening of the symphony, light, delicate, ethereal, had qualities of sound. What was missing was the philosophy of Beethoven, the solemnity, the majesty, the deeply melancholy passages, and the transition to the riotous abandon of the Finale and Chorus.

▼

THE Schola Cantorum provided the chorale background; they sang lustily and generally satisfactorily. The soloists were Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada van der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, basso. Nobody had any real opportunity to demonstrate his or her worth; the music allows little leeway and Mr. Koussevitzky reduced that considerably. Yet, out of it the rich, open voice of Althouse and the virility of Gange came through. Miss Vreeland, eager to make the opportunity for herself, shrieked until her notes were painful to hear.

The Symphony was preceded by Maximilian Steinberg's arrangement of Carl P. Bach's D Major Concerto for Orchestra. Originally written for the small string orchestra of the eighteenth century, Mr. Koussevitzky had heard it played in Paris by the Society of Ancient Instruments and commissioned Steinberg to make the new setting. A faithful and effective score did Steinberg create and in [illegible] of

Finishes Season

lso Concludes Its Series t Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Philharmonic-Symphony Society concluded its season with the concert of yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra finished its local series in the same auditorium on Saturday afternoon. At this concert, as at the Thursday evening one of the Bostonians, Serge Koussevitzky conducted Carl Philip Emanuel Bach's concerto in D major for orchestra and Beethoven's ninth symphony. About the music of the Hamburg Bach something has already been said here.

Let us hope that this composition will not be permitted to lapse into disuse again for so long a period. It is a work of excellent musicianship and bestows upon an audience the increasingly rare blessing of spontaneous and unaffected beauty.

tant business in Milan. He has been observed with attention and the active methods of his conducting watched with the deep interest habitually accorded in this town to moving pictures. He will leave behind him no disturbing memories.

meal is one composed solely o[illegible]
He rarely eats meat. His favorite[illegible] all right, Sweetheart; try again."[illegible] never cries, but merely says: 'It's[illegible] bends that impresario & flop Woods[illegible] producer. Because whenever he[illegible]
Mencken, A. H. Woods is his favorite[illegible] about George Jean Nathan is H. L.[illegible] Claims the only thing he likes[illegible] intellectualized Theodore Kramer[illegible] for example, he believes is only an[illegible] theatrical notables. Eugene O'Neill[illegible]
Has only one superstition; that is[illegible] terrific."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

157

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK AMERICAN
APR 12

MILK FUND OPERA BRILLIANTLY SUNG AT METROPOLITAN

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

AN annual event at the Metropolitan which never fails to fill that house, both because of musical and sentimental appeal, is the representation for the Free Milk Fund For Babies, Inc.

Yesterday afternoon marked this season's operatic effort of Mrs. William Randolph Hearst, president of the Fund, and her helpful associates toward the kindly and touching charity which they have taken under their especial sponsorship.

The performance was "Mignon," and the artists whose services aided the cause constituted the brilliant cast which has given new life for several seasons to a work which had been generally regarded as hopelessly paled and out of date.

No doubt the nature of the occasion yesterday influenced the singers, for they voiced the light and gracious melodies of "Mignon" and acted its simple pathos, comedy and romance with a degree of tenderness and spirit which moved the auditors to the utmost display of enthusiasm which "Mignon" has won during its current revival at the Metropolitan.

Lucrezia Bori, love-tried maid, gave a polished and charming interpretation. Her voice was at its bright best. As for Beniamino Gigli, a humanitarian if ever there was one, his heart was in his every tone yesterday. He pealed out an unceasing flow of lovely lyricism. Cavalierly refinement and restraint mark his acting at Meister.

It has been my belief for quite a while that Marion Talley's top-notch of vocal and histrionic achievement is reached in the role of Philine. That conviction ripened even further at the matinee yesterday. The nature and atmosphere of "Mignon" bring out fully the youthful sweetness of much of Miss Talley's singing, and in the "Polonaise" she exhibits a measure of tonal abandon and brilliance that it seems difficult for her to express in "Lucia" and "Rigoletto."

Ovation for Miss Talley

She makes a fetching appearance as Philine and is thoroughly at home in the mischief and sly fun of the part.

Miss Talley earned an honest share of the ovations that were lavished upon the bowing artists after each act.

The Lothario of Clarence Whitehill is a recognized classic in dignity and style. Ellen Dalossy did a tellingly dashing bit as Frederic. Some excellent buffoonery was furnished by Messrs. Ananian, Bada and Cehanovsky. Louis Hasselmans and his orchestra, principals and chorus in finished and tasteful accord.

There were other interesting features of the afternoon which helped to make it a picturesque success, and the inquiring reader may find them related veraciously in the news pages of this issue.

* * *

Another matinee of music intensely enjoyed materialized at Carnegie Hall, where the Philharmonic Orchestra (only one day [illegible] from the close of its season gave a concert under the [illegible]ing and vivid [illegible] audi-

[illegible]ton Symphony Orchestra was thoroughly admirable at the Academy of Music last night. It was the orchestra's concluding concert of the current Brooklyn season. Had the programme been just a trifle more evenly balanced, it too might have been more thoroughly admirable, but after the rendition of Brahms' D major symphony there was difficulty in remembering Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice." Brahms came last. It was conducted with the usual Koussevitzky grace and elegance, plus a modicum of eloquence, not to mention an individual freedom of interpretation.

The audience was large and duly [illegible]ive.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
APR 12 192[illegible]

Hip Slide Key to Right Downswing

By SOL METZGER

Next time you see "Wild Bill" Mehlhorn drive from the tee, place yourself directly in front of him and watch his hips and knees as he starts his downswing.

The first move noticeable will be [illegible] have never heard the Ninth more persuasive of its merits than the one Mr. Koussevitzky gave us. The customary interpretation leaves the various movements so disjointed and of uneven development as to confirm the statement, said to have been made by Beethoven, that only his poverty compelled him to write it. Still, the various interpreters of the work have found plausible significance in it.

The Ninth is sometimes said to be, for instance, a poetic recollection of the melodic line of Beethoven's earlier symphonic works, a mellowed and understanding restatement of earlier themes of struggle, of fate, of frustrated love and of religious exaltation. It is my suspicion that an audience unfamiliar with the symphony and unaware of what it was hearing, would find at least half of the work monotonous, part of the famous Adagio oversentimentalized, and the contrast of choral and orchestral passages in the Finale extremely disruptive.

Mr. Koussevitzky, however, lent a homogeneity to the third movement which almost made one forget the sharp break in the score which makes that movement a strange marriage of two entirely unrelated themes. His deft embroidery of the three themes of the delightful Scherzo in the "dotted triplet" rhythm was good to hear, and his despotic direction of the vocal chorus seemed to impress unity and cohesion on the entire performance.

The Schola Cantorum of New York was the victim of Beethoven's unreasonable demands on the human throat this time, and rarely have the difficulties of the singing been so efficiently surmounted. Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van Der Veer, Paul Althouse and Fraser Gange negotiated the solo parts and the quartet passages with equal effectiveness.

To open the program the resonant strings of the Boston or[illegible] played Maximilian Steinb[illegible] ment for the or[illegible] Bach's Conc[illegible] which [illegible]13

MUSIC

By HAROLD A. STRICKLAND

FINAL BOSTON CONCERT

Brooklyn's symphony season was brought to a close last night when Serge Koussevitsky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra paid its final visit to the Academy and presented the fifth of its series of programs for local subscribers.

Mr. Koussevitsky reverted to previous practices in the matter of program making and offered but three numbers, none of which was a novelty. But then, his last concert here did include a new work and he gave Brooklyn an opportunity to hear it even before Manhattan.

Last night's numbers included Schubert's "Unfinished," in two movements, the conductor not concerning himself with any of the many arrangements of the final section which were handed about during the recent Schubertian observances. Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice" was the second number and the conductor closed his program with Brahms' second symphony.

But if the program was conservative and lacking in novelty, it cannot be said that the conductor or orchestra read it in sterotyped style. The Schubert was treated delicately with the Dukas read as a bit of froth.

In the Brahms, Mr. Koussevitsky gave us a lyric reading rather than a grave and philosophic presentation as some have taken this symphony to be. Grace and humanness stood out with the romantic flair predominating.

And the orchestra was in splendid form. After hearing so many sorts of orchestral tone this season, it was a genuine pleasure to listen to the Bostonians last night. Verily as an ensemble they stand out over any orchestra which this city has heard during a rather hectic period.

The dates were announced for next year. Five concerts will be given, all but one on Friday evenings.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE
APR 13 [illegible]

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

Mr. Koussewitsky Conducts Schubert and Brahms at the Academy of Music—Tschaikowsky's "Eugene Onegin."

UNDER the direction of Mr. Koussewitsky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its final concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening, and although the program was attractively arranged, including two symphonies, the B minor of Schubert and the D major of Brahms, and Dukas' orchestral scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," the audience was neither so large nor so enthusiastic as has been customary on these Friday evenings. Perhaps the word has gone about that Mr. Koussewitsky does not excel as a classicist, that by temperament and experience his sympathies extend more to the Russians and the moderns—Scriabin, Debussy, Strawinsky, Ravel, Prokofiew. For how-[illegible] in time, a public learns the bent of a musician, his prejudices and his preferences, and it intends no discourtesy when it discriminates between what he does well and what he does badly. Mr. Koussewitsky is certainly an admirable conductor, one of the most salient now before us, an illuminating expositor of much French and Russian music; but Bach and Beethoven and Brahms, Mozart, Schubert and Schumann, the great masters of German classic and romantic tradition, have in the past suffered often at his hands, in readings of their works curiously superficial in conception, eccentric and theatrical.

But as on Thursday night in Carnegie Hall Mr. Koussewitsky conducted, we understand, a splendid performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, so last evening he gave interpretations of Schubert and Brahms far more satisfying than those that we have known him to offer in the past. Formerly, indeed, these identical symphonies, the B minor of the first and the D major of the last great Romantic, afforded us what was at the time a convincing demonstration of Mr. Koussewitsky's inability to cope with the classics. Yet at the Academy of Music the Andante of the Schubert seemed to us poetically felt (we did not hear the first movement), not unpardonably exaggerated in its sentiment, and the Brahms, though certainly an inferior and rather dull performance, not so gross a misconception as memory recalled it.

Both Mr. Koussewitsky and the orchestra sketched the Allegro ma non troppo tentatively, disturbing the unity of its form and design with slight but uncalled-for alterations of tempo, with abrupt, unsubtle dynamic changes, and they made little indeed of its delicious coda, surely one of the most exquisite pages in all the Brahms symphonies The adagio Mr. Koussewitsky read liberally as an andante, thus robbing it of its gravity and profundity, but his treatment of the scherzo was admirable. He has a habit, this Russian conductor, when he faces the development of a climax, of making an almost imperceptible pause, drawing his energy and that of his orchestra together, and launching into a broad tempo, with marked rhythmic emphasis. It is a little trick not in the best of taste, seldom invited by the music to which he applies it, as in the finale of the Brahms, last evening, and toward the close of the Dukas scherzo. Perhaps Mr. Koussewitsky thinks it effective; it really isn't, and he should overcome the temptation to indulge in it.

Because Mr. Toscanini played the "Sorcerer's Apprentice" with such reviving delicacy and brilliance only a few weeks ago, Mr. Koussewitsky's version of this agreeable music seemed heavy and coarse—an odd circumstance, since it is the sort of music to which his talents are most often best devoted. Perhaps some of the fault may be laid at the door of the orchestra, which played throughout the evening with neither its fabled beauty of tone nor its customary virtuosity.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
APR 13 192[illegible]

[illegible]MONY FUND

[illegible]020 of [illegible]nowledged $1020 [illegible]e orchestra [illegible]mum winning [illegible]e the $3939 [illegible] four [illegible]ing to underwrite a concert group to correspond with that which has included the enormously successful appearances of Jascha Heifetz, Dusolina Giannini and Alexander Brailowsky this spring. The Cleveland Orchestra and Richard Bonelli are still to fill engagements under the Music Association's auspices.

Any surplus from the Symphony underwriting will be diverted to another popular series, and officers of the association are appealing for more subscriptions with that in mind.

Seven major guarantees are cited on the latest list, including one of $150 from Mr. and Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, and six of $100 each from Mr. and Mrs. T. I. Hare Powel, Wilson G. Wing, Mr. and Mrs. William S. Innis, Mr. and Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., James C. Collins, and Donald E. Jackson.

The complete roster of new guarantors follows:

Mary Carver Smith	5.00
Mr. and Mrs. J. D. E. Jones	50.00
Mr. and Mrs. T. I. Hare Powel	100.00
Annette M. Ham	25.00
Mrs. William B. M. Miller	10.00
Mrs. Walter Savage Ball	10.00
Evangeline Larry	5.00
A. P. S.	25.00
Mrs. Henry B. Gardner	10.00
Mrs. C. J. Steedman	25.00
W. H. P. Faunce	20.00
Monday Morning Musical Club	10.00
Wilson G. Wing	100.00
Mr. and Mrs. Carl B. Marshall	25.00
Mr. and Mrs. William S. Innis	100.00
Mr. and Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe	150.00
Mr. and Mrs. William Gammell, Jr.	100.00
James C. Collins	100.00
John O. Ames	100.00
Donald E. Jackson	50.00
	100.00
Total	$1020.00
Previously acknowledged	2919.00
Total to date	$3939.00

CLASSIFIED ADS spell opportunity for both readers and advertisers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

A BRILLIANT CONCERT.

Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony Close Engagement Here.

Sergei Koussevitzky's festival performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony for the second time in three days here brought to a brilliant close the season's visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. There was again an overflowing house, many persons standing throughout the performance, while the performers, including the chorus, numbered some 350 on the stage. The concert opened, as on Thursday night, with the much applauded three movements of Maximilian Steinberg's arrangement of the orchestral concerto in D major by Carl Philip Emanuel Bach.

The Boston season of the orchestra will end April 27, and Mr. Koussevitzky will return to New York to sail May 1 on the Mauretania for Paris. There he is to direct performances of "Boris Godunoff" later in the month at the Paris Opéra. Moussorgsky's work will be performed, as hitherto, in the version arranged by Rimsky-Korsakoff. Alfredo Casella for the third time is to conduct the Boston Symphony "pop" concerts, which will run from May 1 to July 2. The orchestra's next season will start in Boston on Oct. 11 and in New York on Nov. 21. A season after that, in the Winter of 1930-31, Koussevitzky and his men will celebrate the Boston Symphony's golden jubilee year.

THIS CLIPPI[illegible]
SAN FRANCIS[illegible]
EXAMINE[illegible]

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra faces a deficit this year of $134,000, of which $32,000 was for broadcast charges. This is the greatest deficit in its history.

was founded in 1885 and there are now seventy-one beneficiaries on its payroll, receiving a little more than $17,000 yearly. Each member of the orchestra contributes annual dues until he has paid in $750, but this, even with the proceeds of the benefit concerts, would be inadequate without the aid of gifts. As it is, the maximum pension paid is $500 per annum to pensioners, a sum which it is hoped may be increased. Only musicians who have served for ten years or more with the orchestra are entitled to assistance, which varies according to age, residence and earnings.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph
APR 13 192[illegible]

Bostonians' Last Visit

Koussevitzky Leads Symphony in Beethoven's Ninth at Carnegie.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra began the round of its last New York visit of the year when, on Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall, Serge Koussevitzky stood among the towering human heights of orchestra, chorus and soloists gathered to perform the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven.

Conductors are in the same position to the famous Ninth as most actors are to Hamlet. It is their dream of final achievement. But not all actors, nor even all tragedians, are fitted temperamentally to summon the Prince of Denmark. Nor are all conductors able to set free the strangely imprisoned qualities of the Ninth.

Serge Koussevitzky has not been given the mystic understanding, nor provided with the key which is as an "open sesame" to the mountain.

▼

THE Russian has his specialties. They are many. He is versatile. He is not one-sided. He is delightful in Mozart, convincing in Bach, arousing in modernistic enterprises and extraordinary where mighty climaxes must be achieved. He has a good ear for sound effects, for contrasts, for tonal beauties. At all times do the Bostonians make beautiful music. At all times is the ensemble of true musical worth.

Surely the second movement, Molto Vivace, with its bright scherzo effect, was charming, and the two-themed Adagio Molto sensuously appealing. The opening of the symphony, light, delicate, ethereal, had qualities of sound. What was missing was the philosophy of Beethoven, the solemnity, the majesty, the deeply melancholy passages, and the transition to the riotous abandon of the Finale and Chorus.

▼

THE Schola Cantorum provided the chorale background; they sang lustily and generally satisfactorily. The soloists were Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada van der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, basso. Nobody had any real opportunity to demonstrate his or her worth; the music allows little leeway and Mr. Koussevitzky reduced that considerably. Yet, out of it the rich, open voice of Althouse and the virility of Gange came through. Miss Vreeland, eager to make the opportunity for herself, shrieked until her notes were painful to hear.

The Symphony was preceded by Maximilian Steinberg's arrangement of Carl P. Bach's D Major Concerto for Orchestra. Originally written for the small string orchestra of the eighteenth century, Mr. Koussevitzky had heard it played in Paris by the Society of Ancient Instruments and commissioned Steinberg to make the new setting. A faithful and effective score did Steinberg create, and in the [illegible] of lso Concludes Its Series t Carnegie Hall.

Finishes Season

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Philharmonic-Symphony Society concluded its season with the concert of yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra finished its local series in the same auditorium on Saturday afternoon. At this concert, as at the Thursday evening one of the Bostonians, Serge Koussevitzky conducted Carl Philip Emanuel Bach's concerto in D major for orchestra and Beethoven's ninth symphony. About the music of the Hamburg Bach something has already been said here.

Let us hope that this composition will not be permitted to lapse into disuse again for so long a period. It is a work of excellent musicianship and bestows upon an audience the increasingly rare blessing of spontaneous and unaffected beauty. [illegible] is one composed solely o[illegible] He rarely eats meat. His favorite [illegible] all night, Sweetheart; try again." never cries, but merely says: "It's hands that impresario a flop Woods producer. Because whenever he Mencken A. H. Woods is his favorite about George Jean Nathan is H. L. Claims the only thing he likes intellectualized Theodore Kramer. for example, he believes is only an theatrical notables. Eugene O'Neill, Has only one superstition: that is, [illegible]

tant business in Milan. He has been observed with attention and the active methods of his conducting watched with the deep interest habitually accorded in this town to moving pictures. He will leave behind him no disturbing memories.

158

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE RECORD
Spencer, W. Va.
APR 11 1929

A New Yorker's Note Book

—By—
DOUGLAS WILLIAMS
Prepared especially for the Times-Record

New York's famous Musicians club, "The Bohemians" flourishes more prosperously than ever. Founded many years ago by Rubin Gold-

National Guardsmen Go To Drill Whether They Have To Or Not

When Friday evening comes members of the Spencer National Guard company just put on their uniforms from force of habit!

Last Friday [illegible] men and three officers turned out in uniform for drill when it had been announced the week previous that there would be no drill on April 12, on account of the double drill to be held at the inspection next week.

But they were there, just the same, and Capt. Springston and his men "played around" a little bit before going home to take off their uniforms which they put on so needlessly.

mark as a rallying point for amateur musicians, it has been developed into the representative institution of its kind in the country and at its functions today, in contemporary music entertains the most famous artists. At their recent dinner at the Commodore hotel for instance, Serge Koussevitzky the famous Russian orchestra leader who has done such wonders in reestablishing the reputation of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was the guest of honor. While the other guests who, to do honor to the Maestro, gave their artistic talents free, included such famous artists as Josef Lhevinne, the pianist, Lea Lobushutz, probably the world's best woman violinist, and Nina Koshetz, the wonderful Russian soprano whose command[illegible] ficult

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

Music Association Fund Goes Far Over the Top

Symphony Orchestra Concert for Next Season Assured; New Plan Formed

It is announced that $4981 has been received by the Music Association to guarantee the appearance in Providence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for another season. This is "over the top" and then some, since the amount asked for was $4000.

Now the association is turning attention to the raising of $3000 or $4000 guarantee to secure for this city a series of concerts next spring, comparable to the series this year, which ends with the appearance of the Cleveland Orchestra and Richard Bonelli, baritone in Infantry Hall, May 2. Mrs. Lillian Gammell, Jr., is the treasurer, to whom subscriptions should be mailed.

In this last generous support for the continuance of the symphony concerts, the Providence College of Music gave $10 and the Wheeler school gave $10. There were gifts of $100 each from Alice E. Taft, Mrs. George Hail, Hugh L. MacColl, Mr. and Mrs. Claude R. Branch, Mrs. Murray S. Danforth, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Matteson and Mr. and Mrs. Alfred L. Lustig.

There were $50 gifts from Mrs. Daniel Beckwith and Theodore Francis Green: [illegible] gifts from Mrs. Eugene S. Grave[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT
APR 20 1929

The closing Boston Symphony and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony concerts were more or less in the nature of a competition, and ended in favor of the visiting Bostonians. Beethoven's ninth symphony, performed by the Boston musicians, under Koussevitzky, was highly creditable . . . with the ungrateful solos sung by Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van der Veer, Paul Althouse and Fraser Gange.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
APR 19 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY RECITALS ASSURED

[illegible]ociation Reports To-[illegible]981 Guaranteed for [illegible]stra's Appearance.

Continuation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts in Providence was assured last night when the Music Association announced that a total of $4981 had been guaranteed for the series next winter. New subscriptions aggregating $1042 carried the fund beyond the $4000 minimum needed.

The underwriting of an additional concert series is the next goal of the association. It has sponsored Heifetz, Giannini and Brailowsky in appearances here this spring and will bring the Cleveland Orchestra and Richard Bonelli here later. Artists comparable to these are tentatively being considered for next season, but the engagements will be contingent upon the raising of a $3000 or $4000 guarantee.

The Music Association will devote to the project all subscriptions received from now on. They should be mailed to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer, Box 1536, Providence, or to the Providence Journal.

Two educational institutions were among the new guarantors made public, the Mary C. Wheeler School and the Providence College of Music. Eight subscriptions of $100 each are acknowledged in the following list of 20:

Providence College of Music	$10.00
Alice E. Taft	100.00
Mrs. Eugene S. Graves	25.00
William C. Fry	5.00
Mrs. Daniel Beckwith	50.00
Mrs. Endora C. Carpenter	10.00
Edward J. Grant	12.00
Mrs. George Hail	100.00
Arthur C. Freeman	10.00
Mrs. Herbert F. Hinckley	25.00
Hugh I. MacColl	100.00
Mary C. Wheeler School	100.00
Mrs. Harold J. Gross	10.00
Mr. and Mrs. Claude R. Branch	100.00
Mrs. Murray S. Danforth	100.00
Mr. and Mrs. Frank Matteson	100.00
Theodore Francis Green	50.00
Charles H. Mandeville	25.00
Mr. and Mrs. Alfred L. Lustig	100.00
Belle C. Russell	10.00
Total	$1042.00
Previously acknowledged	$3939.00
Total to date	$4981.00

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
APR 19 1929

Symphony Goal Reached.

PROVIDENCE, April 19—New subscriptions totaling $1042 received yesterday by the Musical Association insure the continuation of Boston Symphony orchestra concer[illegible] vidence. The fund now totals $4981.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

BOSTON SYMPHONY RECITALS ASSURED

Music Association Reports Total of $4981 Guaranteed for Orchestra's Appearance.

PLANS ADDITIONAL SERIES

Organization Now Seeks Subscriptions for Concerts Comparable with Those of This Year

Continuation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts in Providence was assured last night when the Music Association announced that a total of $4981 had been guaranteed for the series next winter. New subscriptions aggregating $1042 carried the fund beyond the $4000 minimum needed.

The underwriting of an additional concert series is the next goal of the association. It has sponsored Heifetz, Giannini and Brailowsky in appearances here this spring and will bring the Cleveland Orchestra and Richard Bonelli here later. Artists comparable to these are tentatively being considered for next season, but the engagements will be contingent upon the raising of a $3000 or $4000 guarantee.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. WORLD
APR 20 1929

MUSIC

Ups and Downs of Another Orchestral Season Result in Elimination of Some Conductors, With Toscanini Emerging Unscathed—Most Striking New Works Provided by Bloch, Villa-Lobos, Knipper and Toch—Boston Symphony Maintains Steadiest Level, and Philharmonic Reaches Loftiest Heights With Toscanini

By Richard L. Stokes

THE principal lineaments of the orchestral season closing this week were the absorption of the New York Symphony Orchestra by the Philharmonic Society; the collapse and bankruptcy of the latter's only surviving rival, the Beethoven Symphony Orchestra; the failure of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society to avail itself of the opportunities arising from its monopoly of the local field, save on occasion under Willem Mengelberg and during a brief term of unrivaled glory under Arturo Toscanini; the similar decline of the Philadelphia Orchestra in the hands of all its conductors save Leopold Stokowski; and the steady level of brilliance maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its one leader, Serge Koussevitzky.

The mortality among directors has been high, and New York has sustained its reputation as a graveyard for reputations of orchestral chieftains. After a career of forty-four years on the concert platforms, Walter Damrosch has announced his second retirement by declining to accept for next season any engagements as conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony. Fritz Reiner, director of the Cincinnati Orchestra, appears at last to have been eliminated from the Eastern field. Ossip Gabrilowitsch fell decisively in esteem through his appearances as guest conductor of the Philadelphia and Philharmonic Orchestras. Clemens Krauss of Frankfort, a newcomer, suffered disastrous reverses as guest conductor of the same two orchestras. Bernardino Molinari was snatched from a similar doom by an engagement to conduct the Philharmonic-Symphony five weeks during next season.

* * *

OF THE Bir Four—Messrs. Toscanini, Stokowski, Koussevitzky and Mengelberg—only the great Italian emerged unscathed. Mr. Mengelberg twice experienced the indignity of hissing during his programs, and Mr. Stokowski once. The three outbreaks were due to dislike of new compositions. Mr. Mengelberg's engagement for next season has been curtailed to eight weeks. Mr. Koussevitzky encountered severe criticism during his fourth and fifth visits to New York, particularly in connection with his reading of the orchestral sections of Beethoven's "Choral" symphony. Both he and Mr. Stokowski suddenly appeared heavy of hand when juxtaposed to the diabolical subtlety of Mr. Toscanini. Some of the Milanese maestro's dispensations, especially in the Wagnerian repertory, appeared to attain the highest mark as yet scored in the history of orchestral interpretation, such was their superhuman insight, jeweled craftmanship and incandescent temperament. Leo Schulz, veteran 'cellist, with a record of half a century under the most famous conductors, recently declared Mr. Toscanini to be first of them all.

That he has been engaged for sixteen out of the twenty-nine weeks promised next season by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra is evidence of its discontent with the subsidiary position it has occupied during much of this year in comparison with the Boston and Philadelphia Orchestras. Further testimony is its prompt release of Mr. Damrosch on his plea that radio commitments will occupy all of his future activities. Unless Mr. Toscanini falls ill, or ghostly counselors again meddle in his affairs, we shall have no more at the Philharmonic concerts of Messrs. Damrosch, Reiner and Gabrilowitsch. To make the jubilation complete, we should like to add the same of the blatant Mr. Molinari, but the favoritism which protects him is still opparently in operation.

* * *

THE Philharmonic-Symphony, during this season, fell into the hands of no less than ten conductors—Messrs. Toscanini, Mengelberg, Damrosch, Ernest Schelling, Gabrilowitsch, Arthur Honegger, Krauss, Molinari, Reiner and Hans Lange. Mr. Mengelberg led forty-seven concerts, Mr. Toscanini twenty-seven, Mr. Damrosch twenty-five, Mr. Schelling nine, Mr. Gabrilowitsch six, Mr. Honegger two, Mr. Krauss eight, Mr. Molinari two and Mr. Reiner eight. Mr. Lange shared six concerts with Messrs. Honegger and Gabrilowitsch.

Mr. Toscanini fell behind his colleagues in only one respect—the disclosure of new works. He undertook but two—Ottorino Respighi's "Feste Romane," the loudest composition ever written, and Pizzetti's "Concerto dell' Estate," both of which had their world premieres in this city. Neither was of particular importance. Mr. Mengelberg ran riot with novelties—Bernard Wagenaar's Symphony No. 1, Emerson Whitorne's "Fata Morgana," the first American performance of fragments from Handel's "Alcina," two tone poems, "Reflections in the Water" and "Drunk," together with a scene de ballet from an opera called "Sakhara," all by Bucharoff; Cassado's "Rapsodia Catalana," Kurt Atterberg's Symphony in C Major, No. 6; Berezowsky's "Hebrew Suite," Respighi's "Toccata," a suite from Alexander Tansman's opera, "Une Nuite Kurde," and Richard Strauss's "Tageszeiten."

Mr. Damrosch's new productions were Ernest Bloch's rhapsody, "America," and George Gershwin's "An American in Paris." Mr. Honegger conducted the first American performances of his "Rugby" and Concertino for Piano and Orchestra. Mr. Reiner accorded the first New York hearings to Daniel Gregory Mason's "Chanticleer" and Respighi's "The Birds."

* * *

IN Mr. Mengelberg's list, only one work, outside the Handel excerpts, created more than a fleeting impression. This was the Strauss "Tageszeiten." The Tansman suite was hissed, and the Atterberg symphony, winner of a $10,000 prize, created a scandal with its plagiarisms and mediocrity, and demolished the celebrations which were just getting under way in observance of the centennial of Schubert's death. Bloch's prize-winning "America" received so unworthy a performance under Mr. Damrosch that Mr. Koussevitzky was impelled soon afterward to show New York how this work, the most important new production of the season, really sounded. With the retirement of Mr. Damrosch, the effusions of Mr. Gershwin are likely to be relegated to their proper milieu, the cinema theatres. Mr. Honegger's "Rugby" was received with varying emotions.

On the novelties from abroad, the greatest success was won by Ernest Toch's Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, which was presented by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Jan. 3, with Jesus Maria Sanroma, Porto Rican pianist, as soloist. To many it was the most fascinating, lucid and dynamic composition in the modernist idiom that has yet appeared. Mr. Koussevitzky was also responsible for the first New York performance of Igor Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete," in which the string orchestra form was handled with masterly science and a singular richness, balance and transparency of tone, but the workmanship of which was initiated by prosiac melodic ideas.

* * *

FOR two interesting new works the city was indebted to Mr. Stokowski. The first was a ballet, "Legend of a Plaster God," by Lyoff Knipper, nephew of Mme. Olga Knipper-Tchekova of the Moscow Art Theatre. It was described as upright and formidable music, instinct with a chill and contemptuous scepticism and pungently colored with Oriental rhythms and pigments. The second was three "Danasa Carateristicas de Indios Africanos," by Hector Villa-Lobos, a native of Rio de Janeiro and the leading composer of South America. It was rhythmed with sensational power, including a ferocious use of the kettledrums, and ranged from the languors of the equator to the lunatic frenzy of the jungle.

Three new works by Americans which Mr. Stokowski presented on his fourth New York program were harshly received, and one, a "Study in Sonority" for forty violins, by Wallingford Riegger, was hissed. Mr. Gabrilowitsch, as guest conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, introduced an agreeable and melodious pastime in Franz Schreker's suite, "The Birthday of the Infanta," based on a tale by Oscar Wilde. Mr. Stokowski was accused of having composed another novelty, "Hercule et les Centaures," which figured on his program of Nov. 27, and of which it was written that "outside of a few veristic whinnies, the composition seemed to consist mostly of noise arranged in effective theatrical order." It was attributed to "Yves de Casiniere, a Russian refugee in Paris."

* * *

OUTSIDE the regular schedules of the Boston and Philadelphia organizations, the only other visiting orchestra of the season was the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, which, on Dec. 4, under the direction of Nikolai Sokoloff, presented the first New York performance of Schubert's E Major Symphony, No. 7—or rather the symphony for which Schubert left complete thematic sketches, which were orchestrated by John Francis Barnett. Mr. Sokoloff also proffered a first New York hearing to a pungent "March of the Orient," by Joseph Schillinger, a composer of Soviet Russia.

Wagner was the most conquering composer in the season's orchestral arena, with Beethoven and Brahms as runners-up. Beethoven's First Symphony was played four times by the Philharmonic-Symphony, his Second, six times; his Third, three times; his Fifth, twice, and his Seventh, four times. The orchestral soloists outstanding in memory are Vladimir Horowitz, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Yehudi Menuhin and Jesus Maria Sanroma.

Individual performanees stamping the deepest impression were Mr. Toscanini's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan und Isolde" and Prelude and Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal; Mr. Mengelberg's first performance of Beethoven's "Coriolan" overture, Mr. Stokowski's readings of the overture and bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser" and the Bach "Passacaglia," and Mr. Koussevitsky's interpretation of Scriabin's "Poeme de l'Extase."

158

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE RECORD
Spencer, W. Va.
APR 16 1929

A New Y

DO
Prepared es

New York's famous Musicians club, "The Bohemians" flourishes more prosperously than ever. Found-ed many years ago by Rubin Gold-

National Guardsmen Go To Drill Whether They Have To Or Not

When Friday evening comes members of the Spencer National Guard company just put on their uniforms from force of habit!

Last Friday [illegible] men and three officers turned out in uniform for drill when it had been announced the week previous that there would be no drill on April 12, on account of the double drill to be held for the inspection next week.

But they were there, just the same, and Capt. Springston and his men "played around" a little bit before going home to take off their uniforms which they put on so needlessly.

mark as a rallying point for amateur musicians, it has been developed into the representative institution of its kind in the country and at its functions today, in contemporary music entertains the most famous artists. At their recent dinner at the Commodore hotel for instance, Serge Koussevitzky the famous Russian orchestra leader who has done such wonders in reestablishing the reputation of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was the guest of honor. While the other guests who, to do honor to the Maestro, gave their artistic talents free, included such famous artists as Josef Lhevinne, the pianist, Lea Lobushutz, probably the world's best woman violinist, and Nina Koshetz, the wonderful Russian soprano, from whose commanding figure it is difficult to expect the liquid melodies that pour out of her throat when she begins to sing.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
APR 19 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY RECITALS ASSURED

Music Association Reports Total of $4981 Guaranteed for Orchestra's Appearance.

Continuation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts in Providence was assured last night when the Music Association announced that a total of $4981 had been guaranteed for the series next winter. New subscriptions aggregating $1042 carried the fund beyond the $4000 minimum needed.

The underwriting of an additional concert series is the next goal of the association. It has sponsored Heifetz, Giannini and Brailowsky in appearances here this spring and will bring the Cleveland Orchestra and Richard Bonelli here later. Artists comparable to these are tentatively being considered for next season, but the engagements will be contingent upon the raising of a $3000 or $4000 guarantee.

The Music Association will devote to the project all subscriptions received from now on. They should be mailed to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer, Box 1536, Providence, or to the Providence Journal.

Two educational institutions were among the new guarantors made public, the Mary C. Wheeler School and the Providence College of Music. Eight subscriptions of $100 each are acknowledged in the following list of 20:

Providence College of Music	$10.00
Alice E. Taft	100.00
Mrs. Eugene S. Graves	25.00
William C. Fry	5.00
Mrs. Daniel Beckwith	50.00
Mrs. Endora C. Carpenter	10.00
Edward J. Grant	12.00
Mrs. George Hail	100.00
Arthur C. Freeman	10.00
Mrs. Herbert F. Hinckley	25.00
Hugh I. MacColl	100.00
Mary C. Wheeler School	100.00
Mrs. Harold J. Gross	10.00
Mr. and Mrs. Claude R. Branch	100.00
Mrs. Murray S. Danforth	100.00
Mr. and Mrs. Frank Matteson	100.00
Theodore Francis Green	50.00
Charles H. Mandeville	25.00
Mr. and Mrs. Alfred L. Lustig	100.00
Belle C. Russell	10.00
Total	$1042.00
Previously acknowledged	$3939.00
Total to date	$4981.00

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
APR 19 1929

Symphony Goal Reached.

PROVIDENCE, April 19—New subscriptions totaling $1042 received yesterday by the Musical Association insure the continuation of Boston Symphony orchestra concerts in Providence. The fund now totals $4981.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

BOSTON SYMPHONY RECITALS ASSURED

Music Association Reports Total of $4981 Guaranteed for Orchestra's Appearance.

PLANS ADDITIONAL SERIES

Organization Now Seeks Subscriptions for Concerts Comparable with Those of This Year

Continuation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts in Providence was assured last night when the Music Association announced that a total of $4981 had been guaranteed for the series next winter. New subscriptions aggregating $1042 carried the fund beyond the $4000 minimum needed.

The underwriting of an additional concert series is the next goal of the association. It has sponsored Heifetz, Giannini and Brailowsky in appearances here this spring and will bring the Cleveland Orchestra and Richard Bonelli here [illegible] comparable to these are tentatively being considered for next season, but the engagements will be contingent upon the raising of a $3000 or $4000 guarantee.

Symphony Orchestra for Next Season Assured; New Plan Formed

It is announced that $4981 has been received by the Music Association to guarantee the appearance in Providence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for another season. This [illegible] the top" and then some, since the amount asked for was $4000.

Now the association is turning attention to the raising of $3000 or $4000 guarantee to secure for this city a series of concerts next spring, comparable to the series this year, which ends with the appearance of the Cleveland Orchestra and Richard Bonelli, baritone in Infantry Hall, May 2. Mrs. Lillian Gammell, Jr., is the treasurer, to whom subscriptions should be mailed.

In this last generous support for the continuance of the symphony concerts, the Providence College of Music gave $10 and the Wheeler school gave $10. There were gifts of $100 each from Alice E. Taft, Mrs. George Hail, Hugh L. MacColl, Mr. and Mrs. Claude R. Branch, Mrs. Murray S. Danforth, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Matteson and Mr. and Mrs. Alfred L. Lustig.

There were $50 gifts from Mrs. Daniel Beckwith and Theodore Francis Green; [illegible] gifts from Mrs. Eugene S. Graves, [illegible]rt F. Hinckley; and Charles [illegible] and other gifts from the [illegible] C. Fry, $5; Edward [illegible] F. C. Freeman [illegible]10 and Belle

APR 2 [illegible]

[illegible] will benefit [illegible] The closing Boston [illegible]ony and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony concerts were more or less in the nature of a competition, and ended in favor of the visiting Bostonians. Beethoven's ninth symphony, performed by the Boston musicians, under Koussevitzky, was highly creditable [illegible] with the ungrateful solos sung by Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van der Veer, Paul Althouse and Fraser Gange.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. WORLD
APR 20 1929

MUSIC

Ups and Downs of Another Orchestral Season Result in Elimination of Some Conductors, With Toscanini Emerging Unscathed—Most Striking New Works Provided by Bloch, Villa-Lobos, Knipper and Toch—Boston Symphony Maintains Steadiest Level, and Philharmonic Reaches Loftiest Heights With Toscanini

By Richard L. Stokes

THE principal lineaments of the orchestral season closing this week were the absorption of the New York Symphony Orchestra by the Philharmonic Society; the collapse and bankruptcy of the latter's only surviving rival, the Beethoven Symphony Orchestra; the failure of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society to avail itself of the opportunities arising from its monopoly of the local field, save on occasion under Willem Mengelberg and during a brief term of unrivaled glory under Arturo Toscanini; the similar decline of the Philadelphia Orchestra in the hands of all its conductors save Leopold Stokowski; and the steady level of brilliance maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its one leader, Serge Koussevitzky.

The mortality among directors has been high, and New York has sustained its reputation as a graveyard for reputations of orchestral chieftains. After a career of forty-four years on the concert platforms, Walter Damrosch has announced his second retirement by declining to accept for next season any engagements as conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony. Fritz Reiner, director of the Cincinnati Orchestra, appears at last to have been eliminated from the Eastern field. Ossip Gabrilowitsch fell decisively in esteem through his appearances as guest conductor of the Philadelphia and Philharmonic Orchestras. Clemens Krauss of Frankfort, a newcomer, suffered disastrous reverses as guest conductor of the same two orchestras. Bernardino Molinari was snatched from a similar doom by an engagement to conduct the Philharmonic-Symphony five weeks during next season.

• • •

OF THE Big Four—Messrs. Toscanini, Stokowski, Koussevitzky and Mengelberg—only the great Italian emerged unscathed. Mr. Mengelberg twice experienced the indignity of hissing during his programs, and Mr. Stokowski once. The three outbreaks were due to dislike of new compositions. Mr. Mengelberg's engagement for next season has been curtailed to eight weeks. Mr. Koussevitzky encountered severe criticism during his fourth and fifth visits to New York, particularly in connection with his reading of the orchestral sections of Beethoven's "Choral" symphony. Both he and Mr. Stokowski suddenly appeared heavy of hand when juxtaposed to the diabolical subtlety of Mr. Toscanini. Some of the Milanese maestro's dispensations, especially in the Wagnerian repertory, appeared to attain the highest mark as yet scored in the history of orchestral interpretation, such was their superhuman insight, jeweled craftmanship and incandescent temperament. Leo Schulz, veteran 'cellist, with a record of half a century under the most famous conductors, recently declared Mr. Toscanini to be first of them all.

That he has been engaged for sixteen out of the twenty-nine weeks promised next season by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra is evidence of its discontent with the subsidiary position it has occupied during much of this year in comparison with the Boston and Philadelphia Orchestras. Further testimony is its prompt release of Mr. Damrosch on his plea that radio commitments will occupy all of his future activities. Unless Mr. Toscanini falls ill, or ghostly counselors again meddle in his affairs, we shall have no more at the Philharmonic concerts of Messrs. Damrosch, Reiner and Gabrilowitsch. To make the jubilation complete, we should like to add the same of the blatant Mr. Molinari, but the favoritism which protects him is still apparently in operation.

• • •

THE Philharmonic-Symphony, during this season, fell into the hands of no less than ten conductors—Messrs. Toscanini, Mengelberg, Damrosch, Ernest Schelling, Gabrilowitsch, Arthur Honegger, Krauss, Molinari, Reiner and Hans Lange. Mr. Mengelberg led forty-seven concerts, Mr. Toscanini twenty-seven, Mr. Damrosch twenty-five, Mr. Schelling nine, Mr. Gabrilowitsch six, Mr. Honegger two, Mr. Krauss eight, Mr. Molinari two and Mr. Reiner eight. Mr. Lange shared six concerts with Messrs. Honegger and Gabrilowitsch.

Mr. Toscanini fell behind his colleagues in only one respect—the disclosure of new works. He undertook but two—Ottorino Respighi's "Feste Romane," the loudest composition ever written, and Pizzetti's "Concerto dell' Estate," both of which had their world premieres in this city. Neither was of particular importance. Mr. Mengelberg ran riot with novelties—Bernard Wagenaar's Symphony No. 1, Emerson Whitorne's "Fata Morgana," the first American performance of fragments from Handel's "Alcina," two tone poems, "Reflections in the Water" and "Drunk," together with a scene de ballet from an opera called "Sakhara," all by Bucharoff; Cassado's "Rapsodia Catalana," Kurt Atterberg's Symphony in C Major, No. 6; Berezowsky's "Hebrew Suite," Respighi's "Toccata," a suite from Alexander Tansman's opera, "Une Nuite Kurde," and Richard Strauss's "Tageszeiten."

Mr. Damrosch's new productions were Ernest Bloch's rhapsody, "America," and George Gershwin's "An American in Paris." Mr. Honegger conducted the first American performances of his "Rugby" and Concertino for Piano and Orchestra. Mr. Reiner accorded the first New York hearings to Daniel Gregory Mason's "Chanticleer" and Respighi's "The Birds."

• • •

IN Mr. Mengelberg's list, only one work, outside the Handel excerpts, created more than a fleeting impression. This was the Strauss "Tageszeiten." The Tansman suite was hissed, and the Atterberg symphony, winner of a $10,000 prize, created a scandal with its plagiarisms and mediocrity, and demolished the celebrations which were just getting under way in observance of the centennial of Schubert's death. Bloch's prize-winning "America" received so unworthy a performance under Mr. Damrosch that Mr. Koussevitzky was impelled soon afterward to show New York how this work, the most important new production of the season, really sounded. With the retirement of Mr. Damrosch, the effusions of Mr. Gershwin are likely to be relegated to their proper milieu, the cinema theatres. Mr. Honegger's "Rugby" was received with varying emotions.

On the novelties from abroad, the greatest success was won by Ernest Toch's Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, which was presented by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Jan. 3, with Jesus Maria Sanroma, Porto Rican pianist, as soloist. To many it was the most fascinating, lucid and dynamic composition in the modernist idiom that has yet appeared. Mr. Koussevitzky was also responsible for the first New York performance of Igor Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete," in which the string orchestra form was handled with masterly science and a singular richness, balance and transparency of tone, but the workmanship of which was vitiated by prosiac melodic ideas.

FOUR interesting new works the city was indebted to Mr. Stokowski. The first was a ballet, "Legend of a Plaster God," by Lyoff Knipper, nephew of Mme. Olga Knipper-Tchekova of the Moscow Art Theatre. It was described as upright and formidable music, instinct with a chill and contemptuous scepticism and pungently colored with Oriental rhythms and pigments. The second was three "Danasa Caracteristicas de Indios Africanos," by Hector Villa-Lobos, a native of Rio de Janeiro and the leading composer of South America. It was rhythmed with sensational power, including a ferocious use of the kettledrums, and ranged from the languors of the equator to the lunatic frenzy of the jungle.

Three new works by Americans which Mr. Stokowski presented on his fourth New York program were harshly received, and one, a "Study in Sonority" for forty violins, by Wallingford Riegger, was hissed. Mr. Gabrilowitsch, as guest conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, introduced an agreeable and melodious pastime in Franz Schreker's suite, "The Birthday of the Infanta," based on a tale by Oscar Wilde. Mr. Stokowski was accused of having composed another novelty, "Hercule et les Centaures," which figured on his program of Nov. 27, and of which it was written that "outside of a few veristic whinnies, the composition seemed to consist mostly of noise arranged in effective theatrical order." It was attributed to "Yves de Casiniere, a Russian refugee in Paris."

• • •

OUTSIDE the regular schedules of the Boston and Philadelphia organizations, the only other visiting orchestra of the season was the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, which, on Dec. 4, under the direction of Nikolai Sokoloff, presented the first New York performance of Schubert's E Major Symphony, No. 7—or rather the symphony for which Schubert left complete thematic sketches, which were orchestrated by John Francis Barnett. Mr. Sokoloff also proffered a first New York hearing to a pungent "March of the Orient," by Joseph Schillinger, a composer of Soviet Russia.

Wagner was the most conquering composer in the season's orchestral arena, with Beethoven and Brahms as runners-up. Beethoven's First Symphony was played four times by the Philharmonic-Symphony, his Second, six times; his Third, three times; his Fifth, twice, and his Seventh, four times. The orchestral soloists outstanding in memory are Vladimir Horowitz, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Yehudi Menuhin and Jesus Maria Sanroma.

Individual performances stamping the deepest impression were Mr. Toscanini's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan und Isolde" and Prelude and Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal; Mr. Mengelberg's first performance of Beethoven's "Coriolan" overture, Mr. Stokowski's readings of the overture and bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser" and the Bach "Passacaglia," and Mr. Koussevitsky's interpretation of Scriabin's "Poeme de l'Extase."

158

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE RECORD
Spencer, N. Va.
APR 16 1929

A New Y

DO
Prepared es

New York's famous Musicians club, "The Bohemians" flourishes more prosperously than ever. Founded many years ago by Rubin Gold-

National Guardsmen Go To Drill Whether They Have To Or Not

When Friday evening comes members of the Spencer National Guard company just put on their uniforms from force of habit!

Last Friday men and three officers turned out in uniform for drill when had been announced the week previous that there would be drill on April 12, on account of the double drill to be held the inspection next week.

But they were there, just the same, and Capt. Springston and his men "played around" a little bit before going home to take off their uniforms which they put on so needlessly.

mark as a rallying point for amateur musicians, it has been developed into the representative institution of its kind in the country and at its functions today, in contemporary music entertains the most famous artists. At their recent dinner at the Commodore hotel for instance, Serge Koussevitzky the famous Russian orchestra leader who has done such wonders in reestablishing the reputation of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was the guest of honor. While the other guests who, to do honor to the Maestro, gave their artistic talents free, included such famous artists as Josef Lhevinne, the pianist, Lea Lobushutz, probably the world's best woman violinist, and Nina Koshetz, the wonderful Russian soprano, from whose commanding figure it is difficult to expect the liquid melodies that pour out of her throat when she begins to sing.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
APR 19 192

BOSTON SYMPHONY RECITALS ASSURED

Music Association Reports Total of $4981 Guaranteed for Orchestra's Appearance.

Continuation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts in Providence was assured last night when the Music Association announced that a total of $4981 had been guaranteed for the series next winter. New subscriptions aggregating $1042 carried the fund beyond the $4000 minimum needed.

The underwriting of an additional concert series is the next goal of the association. It has sponsored Heifetz, Giannini and Brailowsky in appearances here this spring and will bring the Cleveland Orchestra and Richard Bonelli here later. Artists comparable to these are tentatively being considered for next season, but the engagements will be contingent upon the raising of a $3000 or $4000 guarantee.

The Music Association will devote to the project all subscriptions received from now on. They should be mailed to Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., treasurer, Box 1536, Providence, or to the Providence Journal.

Two educational institutions were among the new guarantors made public, the Mary C. Wheeler School and the Providence College of Music. Eight subscriptions of $100 each are acknowledged in the following list of 20:

Providence College of Music	$10.00
Alice E. Taft	100.00
Mrs. Eugene S. Graves	25.00
William C. Fry	5.00
Mrs. Daniel Beckwith	50.00
Mrs. Endora C. Carpenter	10.00
Edward J. Grant	12.00
Mrs. George Hail	100.00
Arthur C. Freeman	10.00
Mrs. Herbert F. Hinckley	25.00
Hugh I. MacColl	100.00
Mary C. Wheeler School	100.00
Mrs. Harold J. Gross	10.00
Mr. and Mrs. Claude R. Branch	100.00
Mrs. Murray S. Danforth	100.00
Mr. and Mrs. Frank Matteson	100.00
Theodore Francis Green	50.00
Charles H. Mandeville	25.00
Mr. and Mrs. Alfred L. Lustig	100.00
Belle C. Russell	10.00
Total	$1042.00
Previously acknowledged	$3939.00
Total to date	$4981.00

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
APR 19 1929

Symphony Goal Reached.

PROVIDENCE, April 19—New subscriptions totaling $1042 received yesterday by the Musical Association insure the continuation of Boston Symphony orchestra concerts in Providence. The fund now totals $4981.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

BOSTON SYMPHONY RECITALS ASSURED

Music Association Reports Total of $4981 Guaranteed for Orchestra's Appearance.

PLANS ADDITIONAL SERIES

Organization Now Seeks Subscriptions for Concerts Comparable with Those of This Year

Continuation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts in Providence was assured last night when the Music Association announced that a total of $4981 had been guaranteed for the series next winter. New subscriptions aggregating $1042 carried the fund beyond the $4000 minimum needed.

The underwriting of an additional concert series is the next goal of the association. It has sponsored Heifetz, Giannini and Brailowsky in appearances here this spring and will bring the Cleveland Orchestra and Richard Bonelli here later. Artists comparable to these are tentatively being considered for next season, but the engagements will be contingent upon the raising of a $3000 or $4000 guarantee.

Symphony Orchestra for Next Season Assured; New Plan Formed

It is announced that $4981 has been received by the Music Association to guarantee the appearance in Providence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for another season. This is "over the top" and then some, since the amount asked for was $4000.

Now the association is turning attention to the raising of $3000 or $4000 guarantee to secure for this city a series of concerts next spring, comparable to the series this year, which ends with the appearance of the Cleveland Orchestra and Richard Bonelli, baritone in Infantry Hall, May 2. Mrs. Lillian Gammell, Jr., is the treasurer, to whom subscriptions should be mailed.

In this last generous support for the continuance of the symphony concerts, the Providence College of Music gave $10 and the Wheeler school gave $10. There were gifts of $100 each from Alice E. Taft, Mrs. George Hail, Hugh L. MacColl, Mr. and Mrs. Claude R. Branch, Mrs. Murray S. Danforth, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Matteson and Mr. and Mrs. Alfred L. Lustig.

There were $50 gifts from Mrs. Daniel Beckwith and Theodore Francis Green; [illegible] gifts from Mrs. Eugene S. Graves, [illegible]rt F. Hinckley; and Charles W[illegible] and other gifts from the D[illegible] C. Fry, $5; Edward F. C. Freeman, $10 and Belle

APR 2

The closing Boston [illegible]ony and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony concerts were more or less in the nature of a competition, and ended in favor of the visiting Bostonians. Beethoven's ninth symphony, performed by the Boston musicians, under Koussevitzky, was highly creditable . . . with the ungrateful solos sung by Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van der Veer, Paul Althouse and Fraser Gange.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. WORLD
APR 20 1929

MUSIC

Ups and Downs of Another Orchestral Season Result in Elimination of Some Conductors, With Toscanini Emerging Unscathed—Most Striking New Works Provided by Bloch, Villa-Lobos, Knipper and Toch—Boston Symphony Maintains Steadiest Level, and Philharmonic Reaches Loftiest Heights With Toscanini

By Richard L. Stokes

THE principal lineaments of the orchestral season closing this week were the absorption of the New York Symphony Orchestra by the Philharmonic Society; the collapse and bankruptcy of the latter's only surviving rival, the Beethoven Symphony Orchestra; the failure of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society to avail itself of the opportunities arising from its monopoly of the local field, save on occasion under Willem Mengelberg and during a brief term of unrivaled glory under Arturo Toscanini; the similar decline of the Philadelphia Orchestra in the hands of all its conductors save Leopold Stokowski; and the steady level of brilliance maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its one leader, Serge Koussevitzky.

The mortality among directors has been high, and New York has sustained its reputation as a graveyard for reputations of orchestral chieftains. After a career of forty-four years on the concert platforms, Walter Damrosch has announced his second retirement by declining to accept for next season any engagements as conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony. Fritz Reiner, director of the Cincinnati Orchestra, appears at last to have been eliminated from the Eastern field. Ossip Gabrilowitsch fell decisively in esteem through his appearances as guest conductor of the Philadelphia and Philharmonic Orchestras. Clemens Krauss of Frankfort, a newcomer, suffered disastrous reverses as guest conductor of the same two orchestras. Bernardino Molinari was snatched from a similar doom by an engagement to conduct the Philharmonic-Symphony five weeks during next season.

* * *

OF THE Bir Four—Messrs. Toscanini, Stokowski, Koussevitzky and Mengelberg—only the great Italian emerged unscathed. Mr. Mengelberg twice experienced the indignity of hissing during his programs, and Mr. Stokowski once. The three outbreaks were due to dislike of new compositions. Mr. Mengelberg's engagement for next season has been curtailed to eight weeks. Mr. Koussevitzky encountered severe criticism during his fourth and fifth visits to New York, particularly in connection with his reading of the orchestral sections of Beethoven's "Choral" symphony. Both he and Mr. Stokowski suddenly appeared heavy of hand when juxtaposed to the diabolical subtlety of Mr. Toscanini. Some of the Milanese maestro's dispensations, especially in the Wagnerian repertory, appeared to attain the highest mark as yet scored in the history of orchestral interpretation, such was their superhuman insight, jeweled craftmanship and incandescent temperament. Leo Schulz, veteran 'cellist, with a record of half a century under the most famous conductors, recently declared Mr. Toscanini to be first of them all.

That he has been engaged for sixteen out of the twenty-nine weeks promised next season by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra is evidence of its discontent with the subsidiary position it has occupied during much of this year in comparison with the Boston and Philadelphia Orchestras. Further testimony is its prompt release of Mr. Damrosch on his plea that radio commitments will occupy all of his future activities. Unless Mr. Toscanini falls ill, or ghostly counselors again meddle in his affairs, we shall have no more at the Philharmonic concerts of Messrs. Damrosch, Reiner and Gabrilowitsch. To make the jubilation complete, we should like to add the same of the blatant Mr. Molinari, but the favoritism which protects him is still apparently in operation.

* * *

THE Philharmonic-Symphony, during this season, fell into the hands of no less than ten conductors—Messrs. Toscanini, Mengelberg, Damrosch, Ernest Schelling, Gabrilowitsch, Arthur Honegger, Krauss, Molinari, Reiner and Hans Lange. Mr. Mengelberg led forty-seven concerts, Mr. Toscanini twenty-seven, Mr. Damrosch twenty-five, Mr. Schelling nine, Mr. Gabrilowitsch six, Mr. Honegger two, Mr. Krauss eight, Mr. Molinari two and Mr. Reiner eight. Mr. Lange shared six concerts with Messrs. Honegger and Gabrilowitsch.

Mr. Toscanini fell behind his colleagues in only one respect—the disclosure of new works. He undertook but two—Ottorino Respighi's "Feste Romane," the loudest composition ever written, and Pizzetti's "Concerto dell' Estate," both of which had their world premieres in this city. Neither was of particular importance. Mr. Mengelberg ran riot with novelties—Bernard Wagenaar's Symphony No. 1, Emerson Whitorne's "Fata Morgana," the first American performance of fragments from Handel's "Alcina," two tone poems, "Reflections in the Water" and "Drunk," together with a scene de ballet from an opera called "Sakhara," all by Bucharoff; Cassado's "Rapsodia Catalana," Kurt Atterberg's Symphony in C Major, No. 6; Berezowsky's "Hebrew Suite," Respighi's "Toccata," a suite from Alexander Tansman's opera, "Une Nuite Kurde," and Richard Strauss's "Tageszeiten."

Mr. Damrosch's new productions were Ernest Bloch's rhapsody, "America," and George Gershwin's "An American in Paris." Mr. Honegger conducted the first American performances of his "Rugby" and Concertino for Piano and Orchestra. Mr. Reiner accorded the first New York hearings to Daniel Gregory Mason's "Chanticleer" and Respighi's "The Birds."

* * *

IN Mr. Mengelberg's list, only one work, outside the Handel excerpts, created more than a fleeting impression. This was the Strauss "Tageszeiten." The Tansman suite was hissed, and the Atterberg symphony, winner of a $10,000 prize, created a scandal with its plagiarisms and mediocrity, and demolished the celebrations which were just getting under way in observance of the centennial of Schubert's death. Bloch's prize-winning "America" received so unworthy a performance under Mr. Damrosch that Mr. Koussevitzky was impelled soon afterward to show New York how this work, the most important new production of the season, really sounded. With the retirement of Mr. Damrosch, the effusions of Mr. Gershwin are likely to be relegated to their proper milieu, the cinema theatres. Mr. Honegger's "Rugby" was received with varying emotions.

On the novelties from abroad, the greatest success was won by Ernest Toch's Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, which was presented by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Jan. 3, with Jesus Maria Sanroma, Porto Rican pianist, as soloist. To many it was the most fascinating, lucid and dynamic composition in the modernist idiom that has yet appeared. Mr. Koussevitzky was also responsible for the first New York performance of Igor Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete," in which the string orchestra form was handled with masterly science and a singular richness, balance and transparency of tone, but the workmanship of which was vitiated by prosiac melodic ideas.

FOR two interesting new works the city was indebted to Mr. Stokowski. The first was a ballet, "Legend of a Plaster God," by Lyoff Knipper, nephew of Mme. Olga Knipper-Tchekova of the Moscow Art Theatre. It was described as upright and formidable music, instinct with a chill and contemptuous scepticism and pungently colored with Oriental rhythms and pigments. The second was three "Danasa Caracteristicas de Indios Africanos," by Hector Villa-Lobos, a native of Rio de Janeiro and the leading composer of South America. It was rhythmed with sensational power, including a ferocious use of the kettledrums, and ranged from the languors of the equator to the lunatic frenzy of the jungle.

Three new works by Americans which Mr. Stokowski presented on his fourth New York program were harshly received, and one, a "Study in Sonority" for forty violins, by Wallingford Riegger, was hissed. Mr. Gabrilowitsch, as guest conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, introduced an agreeable and melodious pastime in Franz Schreker's suite, "The Birthday of the Infanta," based on a tale by Oscar Wilde. Mr. Stokowski was accused of having composed another novelty, "Hercule et les Centaures," which figured on his program of Nov. 27, and of which it was written that "outside of a few veristic whinnies, the composition seemed to consist mostly of noise arranged in effective theatrical order." It was attributed to "Yves de Casiniere, a Russian refugee in Paris."

* * *

OUTSIDE the regular schedules of the Boston and Philadelphia organizations, the only other visiting orchestra of the season was the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, which, on Dec. 4, under the direction of Nikolai Sokoloff, presented the first New York performance of Schubert's E Major Symphony, No. 7—or rather the symphony for which Schubert left complete thematic sketches, which were orchestrated by John Francis Barnett. Mr. Sokoloff also proffered a first New York hearing to a pungent "March of the Oriant," by Joseph Schillinger, a composer of Soviet Russia.

Wagner was the most conquering composer in the season's orchestral arena, with Beethoven and Brahms as runners-up. Beethoven's First Symphony was played four times by the Philharmonic-Symphony, his Second, six times; his Third, three times; his Fifth, twice, and his Seventh, four times. The orchestral soloists outstanding in memory are Vladimir Horowitz, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Yehudi Menuhin and Jesus Maria Sanroma.

Individual performances stamping the deepest impression were Mr. Toscanini's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan und Isolde" and Prelude and Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal; Mr. Mengelberg's first performance of Beethoven's "Coriolan" overture, Mr. Stokowski's readings of the overture and bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser" and the Bach "Passacaglia," and Mr. Koussevitsky's interpretation of Scriabin's "Poeme de l'Extase."

REDUCTION

RATIO

16x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

A5

A4

A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
APR 21 1929

A poll of Boston Symphony subscribers to select a program for the final concerts is highly significant in showing the attitude of Boston audiences to the more experimental modernist music. Criticisms of the conductor's frequent choice of contemporary productions in the new mode are substantiated by mathematical demonstration. In one class of compositions, where works of Wagner, Sibelius, Beethoven, Tschaikowsky and Moussorgsky receive 221, 157, 129, 129 and 103 votes respectively, a Stravegsky work receives only 82 votes. Honegger's "Locomotive" suite only 25, and the same composer's "Rugby" only 6. The poll discloses the familiar desire of audiences to hear the works they know best. Thus Ravel's "Waltz," a modern, but not ultra-modern work, stands at the head of the tone-poems, leading Strauss's "Zarathustra" and Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun." As the Transcript points out, there is some disposition to favor works of more "popular" character. But the results of the poll seem to bear out the opinion of those who hold that programs of the average symphony concert in New York, Boston and Philadelphia contain too few examples of the lesser works of standard composers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
News
Springfield, O.
APR 21 1929

The annual concert on March 24 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the benefit of its pension fund was sold out well in advance. The fund for pensioning former members of the orchestra and their dependents was founded in 1903 and there are now 71 beneficiaries on its payroll, receiving a little more than $17,000 yearly. Each member of the orchestra contributes annual dues until he has paid in $750, but this, even with the proceeds of the benefit concerts, would be inadequate without the aid of gifts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
JOURNAL
Gardiner Me
APR 25 1929

The deficit in the year's receipts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was $43,000.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION STAR
APR 25 1929

Honor Baggageman

Boston Symphony Players Give Veteran the Rare Trumpet Salute.

Precedent has just been established by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on how to honor a baggageman.

The Boston Symphony players, according [illegible] Science Monitor, honor their baggageman with nothing less than a trumpet salute (which is the musical equivalent of at least 20 guns), a round of applause, and autographed pictures of the conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, and the orchestra.

Neil J. Patterson, the man thus honored at a recent orchestra rehearsal of the symphony players in Symphony Hall, has been baggage and property man for the orchestra for 40 years, and so well has he discharged his duties of looking after the transportation of a carload of rare instruments that the members of the organization chose a typically musical way to express their appreciation.

He was called to the stage, expecting to be asked to move a piano or render some such service, and there received the trumpet salute—an honor reserved for few.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
CITIZEN
Lowell, Mass.
APR 24 1929

The Symphony Season's Close.

At the final pair of the season's regular concerts this week the Boston Symphony orchestra will give a request program, the pieces to be performed having been chosen by the conductor as a result of a poll of the subscribers. Thus the list includes the Prelude to Wagner's opera "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg;" "The Afternoon of a Fawn," Debussy; the Choreographic poem "The Waltz," Ravel, Symphony No. 5 in A minor, Tchaikowsky.

There has been in musical Boston more or less discussion about this musical referendum, and it has been pointed out that the Philadelphia Symphony orchestra long ago abandoned a similar idea. There has, also, however, been more or less controversy in Boston as to the proportion of modern works to old favorites on Mr. Koussevitsky's programs. Possibly he assented to the poll with the idea of discovering the tastes of the subscribers. Naturally what we call the classics got the most votes in the symphonic cluass. Tschaikowsky's Fifth headed the list. Following in order were Franck, Brahms No. 2, Schubert's "Unfinished," Sibelius No. 3, and then Beethoven's Pastoral and the Eroica. There were 52 votes for Prokofieff's "Classical."

Under the Tone Poem classification Ravel's "The Waltz" headed the list, scoring a point or two for the modernists. Strauss' "Zarathustra" stood second and Debussy's "Afternoon of a Fawn," third.

Under the classification of Music in Other Forms the Meistersinger prelude had a wide margin over all the rest, with the Sibelius Concerto for Violin in second place and Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture. There were 28 votes for the Honegger locomotive piece, but only 6 for his "Rugby." Stravinsky, Toch, De Falla, Hindemith and the American Copland had their faithful admirers.

The impression is that it will be wise not to argue too dogmatically from the results of the poll.

A Plea for the Moderns

Open disapproval by certain members of the audience of the work of a Brazilian composer played by the Philadelphia Symphony orchestra recently led Mr. Stokowski to say before the second performance that while the music was extremely modern, it was an interpretation of Brazilian life by a Brazilian who had carefully studied the subject and it was entitled to a respectful hearing. "Anyone in the audience not interested in modern music," he said "and I do not blame any one for being interested in what he is interested in, may leave. We will relax our rules and open the doors and every one who wishes may step into the hall and smoke a classical cigaret. I love old music as much as any of you, but we want to give modern writers a hearing. It would be a shame if we did not give some of the music of our day and of our everyday life."

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-EXAMINER
Apr 26 1929

* * *

Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, was asking a [illegible] Stock's if Stock actually led the symphonies without a score. Assured that he did, Koussevitsky further inquired, "Does Stock really know his stuff, or fake it like Stokowsky?" (It's all I can do not to quote Von Bulow's "two kinds of conductor": One with the score in his head, the other with his head in the score.)

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
APR 26 1929

AN ORCHESTRA SALUTES FAITHFUL PROPERTY MAN

BOSTON, April 26.—Honoring his 40 years of faithful service with a trumpet salute, the Boston Symphony Orchestra interrupted a recent concert in tribute to Neil J. Patterson, baggage and property man for the organization. He was called to the stage, expecting to be asked to move a piano, and there received the trumpet salute—an honor accorded few.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
CITIZEN
Lowell, Mass.
APR 24 1929

[illegible] Theodore Thomas.

In Cambrid[illegible] where as Rose Fay she spent he[illegible] girlhood, there died last Friday [illegible] Theodore Thomas, widow of the [illegible]ous orchestra conductor whose [illegible]y flowr rests in Mt. Auburn ceme[illegible]y. She was the founder and fir[illegible] president of the National Federa[illegible] of Music Clubs, which is to ho[illegible] its biennial convention in Boston [illegible] June, and interested in a wide vari[illegible] of activities. Her own special ta[illegible]t was for writing. Notable among [illegible]er works was her "Memoirs of T[illegible]odore Thomas," one of the most int[illegible]sting of the several biographies of [illegible] husband. She was equally success[illegible] in other literary forms and in[illegible]iably wrote with charming wit an[illegible] humor. A versatile, energetic and [illegible]markably brilliant woman.

Few teachers [illegible] voice in America

[illegible]ere more widel[illegible]known than Oscar Saenger of New [illegible]rk and Washington, who died in [illegible] hospital in the capital city last [illegible]eek. He studied voice under Jacqu[illegible]s Bouhy, a famous operatic baritone [illegible]f that day. The list of now prominent opera singers who studied with him is a long one.

The Music Association of Providence, R. I., has been successful in securing subscriptions well over the $4000 minimum required to guarantee the continuance next season of the customary series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra. It will also undertake the underwriting of an additional concert series in which noted artists will appear.

In Detroit last Thursday, Gounod's opera "Faust" was presented with a Detroit orchestra, local chorus, locally painted scenery and by a cast of principals in which all but three were residents of the city. According to the Detroit News, "No better Faust was ever given anywhere; not even the tremendous resources of the Metropolitan could exceed what was done here. It was a victory of brains, hard work, courage and faith; chiefly of brains."

The News feels that Detroit has all the elements for great civic opera. One is ready to believe that there was a commendably artistic performance, which speaks well for Detroit's interest in music. It is one thing, however, to carry a single performance to success and quite another to establish civic opera on a more permanent basis. Apart that, the progressive city in Michigan which already maintains a symphony orchestra, may be equal to it.

Miss Edith A. Blackadar is the newly appointed organist and choir director at St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal church. Miss Ruth Robinson has also been engaged at St. Paul's as soprano soloist. Both young women are studying here at the state Normal school for degrees in music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES PICAYUNE
APR 27 1929

WE HESITATE to take position as prophet of evil regarding that fine institution, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but we fear that organization is headed for the rocks when it adopts the policy of further increasing its prices. Our belief is that entertainments of all kind in the United States have reached the point of charging all the traffic will attract no added total at the box office! For one reason such advances may work, but beware later on! A writer in the Boston Transcript, favorable to the increase, after saying that increased costs have made it impossible for the orchestra to meet its expenses at past rates, concludes: "The Symphony Orchestra can be neither a philanthropic nor a popular institution—and survive." Has the writer forgotten that for more than forty years the organization was strictly philanthropic. That it or any other institution of the kind will survive unless given philanthropic support we gravely doubt.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORKER
APR 27 1929

159

MUSICAL EVENTS

Another Season Goes into Mothballs

WHEN Mr. Stokowski concluded the "Fire Bird" suite at the last concert of The Philadelphia Orchestra, the symphonic season came to an end. There may remain a few ambitious choral events, involving large orchestras, but knowing from experience the explosive nature of such concerts, it is safe to assert that it's all over but the shouting.

The time has come to derive some sort of helpful moral (and this is not redundant, because most morals really are superfluous) from the orchestral year. Has the amalgamation of the Philharmonic and Symphony Societies stifled local competition and turned the Philharmonic-Symphony sessions into routine drills? Has the succession of guest conductors improved the skill of the Philharmonic-Symphony and Philadelphia bands? Has the American Symphonic Ensemble, the much-publicized conductorless orchestra, taught us that directors are only a luxury?

Almost like a well-trained junior executive, I answer "No." The competition between the New York Symphony and the Philharmonic was, in recent years, largely imaginary. The unusually long list of novelties produced by the Philharmonic-Symphony is evidence of the industry of its leaders, if not necessarily of their discernment. The Philharmonic-Symphony under the Messrs. Mengelberg and Toscanini sounded much like the erstwhile Philharmonic under Messrs. Mengelberg and Toscanini, and, except for occasional lapses in the celebrated "luminosity" of the Philadelphia fiddles, Mr. Stokowski's men performed for him as they had in other years. The conductorless orchestra, which turned out to be not entirely without a leader in view of the activity of its concertmasters, proved that good instrumentalists are capable of doing nicely without the flourish of a baton. How much better it might be handled with a first-rate maestro is not difficult to estimate.

AS for the guest conductors, they came and went with startling rapidity, and under the circumstances none of them did themselves justice. Still, it is not essential that some conductors do justice to themselves. The best argument against the guest-conductor system was presented whenever the Boston Symphony, which is the exclusive property of Mr. Koussevitzky, came to town—in spite of at least one Boston concert which sounded as though Mr. Koussevitzky had been converted suddenly into a guest conductor. For general sustained excellence, the Boston Symphony must be awarded first place, although the most brilliant individual evenings were those of the Philharmonic-Symphony when Mr. Toscanini was in command.

There is sentiment and regret that at this time I am unable to remember a great deal about most of them. The regret refers to my mnemonic shortcomings rather than to any implied slur on the novelties. The Philharmonic-Symphony novelties included the Atterberg Symphony, which won a ten-thousand-dollar prize and was later declared by its composer a hoax; three vehement contributions by Simon Bucharoff, another suite by Tansman, a dreary Berceuse of Busoni, Cassado's ready-made Catalonian rhapsody, one of those Tommasini fabrications of which Mr. Toscanini unfortunately is fond, Honegger's synthetic "Rugby," as well as some rather more substantial offerings.

George Gershwin's "American in Paris" was a smart bit of foolery, which ought to be restored for its own good. Berezowsky's Hebrew Suite, Wagenaar's First Symphony, and Whithorne's "Fata Morgana" were not unqualified hits, but each had some reason for a hearing. Mason's "Chanticleer" was sound stuff and is worth keeping in the repertoire. Some unfamiliar Handel in excerpts, unveiled by Mr. Mengelberg, were excellent. Mr. Respighi had three novelties on the list. "Feste Romani" came off resoundingly under Mr. Toscanini's aegis, although it must be played under some less inspired director before it can be assayed accurately. (The same notation goes for Pizzetti's Concerto dell' Estate.) The other Respighi débutants were his Toccata for the piano, which is more interesting as an exercise than [illegible] and an amusing little suite, "The Birds" [illegible]. Toch's "America," introduced by Mr. Damrosch and later heard on a Boston Symphony program, seemed to me the best of the year's novelties, although the attempt at community singing in the closing pages was also the most ludicrous of the year's innovations. Separated from its pontifical literary accompaniment, "America" is a masterpiece of craftsmanship and devoid of dullness. Maybe you don't think that's praise.

NEITHER Mr. Koussevitzky nor Mr. Stokowski had too much luck with "first performances." A concerto by C. P. E. Bach and a symphony said to have been composed by Frederick the Great were better than any contemporary lucubrations. The Toch piano concerto, another importation via Boston, made a stir for a few hours, and the Philadelphia novelties—well, the symphonic season is over!

—R. A. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
APR 21 19

A poll of Boston Symphony subscribers to select a program for the final concerts is highly significant in showing the attitude of Boston audiences to the more experimental modernist music. Criticisms of the conductor's frequent choice of contemporary productions in the new mode are substantiated by mathematical demonstration. In one class of compositions, where works of Wagner, Sibelius, Beethoven, Tschaikowsky and Moussorgsky receive 321, 157, 129, 129 and 103 votes respectively, a Stravegsky work receives only 82 votes. Honegger's "Locomotive" suite only 25, and the same composer's "Rugby" only 6. The poll discloses the familiar desire of audiences to hear the works they know best. Thus Ravel's "Waltz," a modern, but not ultra-modern work, stands at the head of the tone-poems, leading Strauss's "Zarathustra" and Debussy's "After-'noon of a Faun." As the Transcript points out, there is some disposition to favor works of more "popular" character. But the results of the poll seem to bear out the opinion of those who hold that programs of the average symphony concert in New York, Boston and Philadelphia contain too few examples of the lesser works of standard composers. There is too much dependence

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
News
Springfield, O.
APR 21 1929

The annual concert on March 24 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the benefit of its pension fund was sold out well in advance. The fund for pensioning former members of the orchestra and their dependents was founded in 1903 and there are now 71 beneficiaries on its payroll, receiving a little more than $17,000 yearly. Each member of the orchestra contributes annual dues until he has paid in $750, but this, even with the proceeds of the benefit concerts, would be inadequate without the aid of gifts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
JOURNAL
Gardiner Me
APR 25 1929

ganization.

The deficit in the year's receipts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was $43,000.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION STAR
APR 25 1929

Honor Baggageman

Boston Symphony Players Give Veteran the Rare Trumpet Salute.

Precedent has just been established by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on how to honor a baggageman.

The Boston Symphony players, according to the Christian Science Monitor, honor their baggageman with nothing less than a trumpet salute (which is the musical equivalent of at least 20 guns), a round of applause, and autographed pictures of the conductor, Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra.

Neil J. Patterson, the man thus honored at a recent orchestra rehearsal of the symphony players in Symphony Hall, has been baggage and property man for the orchestra for 40 years, and so well has he discharged his duties of looking after the transportation of a carload of rare instruments that the members of the organization chose a typically musical way to express their appreciation.

He was called to the stage, expecting to be asked to move a piano or render some such service, and there received the trumpet salute—an honor reserved for few.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
CITIZEN
Laurell, Mass.
APR 24 1929

The Symphony Season's Close.

At the final pair of the season's regular concerts this week the Boston Symphony orchestra will give a request program, the pieces to be performed having been chosen by the conductor as a result of a poll of the subscribers. Thus the list includes the Prelude to Wagner's opera "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg;" "The Afternoon of a Fawn," Debussy; the Choreographic poem "The Waltz," Ravel, Symphony No. 5 in A minor, Tchaikowsky.

There has been in musical Boston more or less discussion about this musical referendum, and it has been pointed out that the Philadelphia Symphony orchestra long ago abandoned a similar idea. There has, also, however, been more or less controversy in Boston as to the proportion of modern works to old favorites on Mr. Koussevitsky's programs. Possibly he assented to the poll with the idea of discovering the tastes of the subscribers. Naturally what we call the classics got the most votes in the symphonic cluass. Tschaikowsky's Fifth headed the list. Following in order were Franck, Brahms No. 2, Schubert's "Unfinished," Sibelius No. 3, and then Beethoven's Pastoral and the Eroica. There were 52 votes for Prokofieff's "Classical."

Under the Tone Poem classification Ravel's "The Waltz" headed the list, scoring a point or two for the modernists. Strauss' "Zarathustra" stood second and Debussy's "Afternoon of a Fawn," third.

Under the classification of Music in Other Forms the Meistersinger prelude had a wide margin over all the rest, with the Sibelius Concerto for Violin in second place and Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture. There were 23 votes for the Honegger locomotive piece, but only 6 for his "Rugby." Stravinsky, Toch, De Falla, Hindemith and the American Copland had their faithful admirers.

The impression is that it will be wise not to argue too dogmatically from the results of the poll.

A Plea for the Moderns

Open disapproval by certain members of the audience of the work of a Brazilian composer played by the Philadelphia Symphony orchestra recently led Mr. Stokowski to say before the second performance that while the music was extremely modern, it was an interpretation of Brazilian life by a Brazilian who had carefully studied the subject and it was entitled to a respectful hearing. "Anyone in the audience not interested in modern music," he said "and I do not blame any one for being interested in what he is interested in, may leave. We will relax our rules and open the doors and every one who wishes may step into the hall and smoke a classical cigaret. I love old music as much as any of you, but we want to give modern writers a hearing. It would be a shame if we did not give some of the music of our day and of our everyday life."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-EXAMINER

* * *

Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, was asking a friend of Frederick Stock's if Stock actually led the symphonies without a score. Assured that he did, Koussevitsky further inquired, "Does Stock really know his stuff, or fake it like Stokowsky?" (It's all I can do not to quote Von Bulow's "two kinds of conductor": One with the score in his head, the other with his head in the score.)

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

AN ORCHESTRA SALUTES FAITHFUL PROPERTY MAN

BOSTON, April 26.—Honoring his 40 years of faithful service with a trumpet salute, the Boston Symphony Orchestra interrupted a recent concert in tribute to Neil J. Patterson, baggage and property man for the organization. He was called to the stage, expecting to be asked to move a piano, and there received the trumpet salute—an honor accorded few.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
CITIZEN
Laurell, Mass.
APR 24 1929

Mrs. Theodore Thomas.

In Cambridge, where as Rose Fay she spent her girlhood, there died last Friday Mrs. Theodore Thomas, widow of the famous orchestra conductor whose body now rests in Mt. Auburn cemetery. She was the founder and first president of the National Federation of Music Clubs, which is to hold its biennial convention in Boston in June, and interested in a wide variety of activities. Her own special talent was for writing. Notable among her works was her "Memoirs of Theodore Thomas," one of the most interesting of the several biographies of her husband. She was equally successful in other literary forms and invariably wrote with charming wit and humor. A versatile, energetic and remarkably brilliant woman.

Few teachers of voice in America were more widely known than Oscar Saenger of New York and Washington, who died in a hospital in the capital city last week. He studied voice under Jacques Bouhy, a famous operatic baritone of that day. The list of now prominent opera singers who studied with him is a long one.

The Music Association of Providence, R. I., has been successful in securing subscriptions well over the $4000 minimum required to guarantee the continuance next season of the customary series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra. It will also undertake the underwriting of an additional concert series in which noted artists will appear.

In Detroit last Thursday, Gounod's opera "Faust" was presented with a Detroit orchestra, local chorus, locally painted scenery and by a cast of principals in which all but three were residents of the city. According to the Detroit News, "No better Faust was ever given anywhere; not even the tremendous resources of the Metropolitan could exceed what was done here. It was a victory of brains, hard work, courage and faith; chiefly of brains."

The News feels that Detroit has all the elements for great civic opera. One is ready to believe that there was a commendably artistic performance, which speaks well for Detroit's interest in music. It is one thing, however, to carry a single performance to success and quite another to establish civic opera on a more permanent basis. At that, the progressive city in Michigan which already maintains a symphony orchestra, may be equal to it.

Miss Edith A. Blackadar is the newly appointed organist and choir director at St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal church. Miss Ruth Robinson has also been engaged at St. Paul's as soprano soloist. Both young women are studying here at the state Normal school for degrees in music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES PICAYUNE

WE HESITATE to take position as prophet of evil regarding that fine institution, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but we fear that organization is headed for the rocks when it adopts the policy of further increasing its prices. Our belief is that entertainments of all kind in the United States have reached the point of charging all the traffic will bear and that additions to the charge will attract no added total at the box office! For one reason such advances may work, but beware later on! A writer in the Boston Transcript, favorable to the increase, after saying that increased costs have made it impossible for the orchestra to meet its expenses at past rates, concludes: "The Symphony Orchestra can be neither a philanthropic nor a popular institution—and survive." Has the writer forgotten that for more than forty years the organization was strictly philanthropic. That it or any other institution of the kind will survive unless given philanthropic support we gravely doubt.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORKER
APR 27 1929
159

MUSICAL EVENTS

Another Season Goes into Mothballs

WHEN Mr. Stokowski concluded the "Fire Bird" suite at the last concert of The Philadelphia Orchestra, the symphonic season came to an end. There may remain a few ambitious choral events, involving large orchestras, but knowing from experience the explosive nature of such concerts, it is safe to assert that it's all over but the shouting.

The time has come to derive some sort of helpful moral (and this is not redundant, because most morals really are superfluous) from the orchestral year. Has the amalgamation of the Philharmonic and Symphony Societies stifled local competition and turned the Philharmonic-Symphony sessions into routine drills? Has the succession of guest conductors improved the skill of the Philharmonic-Symphony and Philadelphia bands? Has the American Symphonic Ensemble, the much-publicized conductorless orchestra, taught us that directors are only a luxury?

Almost like a well-trained junior executive, I answer "No." The competition between the New York Symphony and the Philharmonic was, in recent years, largely imaginary. The unusually long list of novelties produced by the Philharmonic-Symphony is evidence of the industry of its leaders, if not necessarily of their discernment. The Philharmonic-Symphony under the Messrs. Mengelberg and Toscanini sounded much like the erstwhile Philharmonic under Messrs. Mengelberg and Toscanini, and, except for occasional lapses in the celebrated "luminosity" of the Philadelphia fiddles, Mr. Stokowski's men performed for him as they had in other years. The conductorless orchestra, which turned out to be not entirely without a leader in view of the activity of its concertmasters, proved that good instrumentalists are capable of doing nicely without the flourish of a baton. How much better it was conducted with a first-rate maestro is not difficult to estimate.

AS for the guest conductors, they came and went with startling rapidity, and under the circumstances none of them did themselves justice. Still, it is not essential that some conductors do justice to themselves. The best argument against the guest-conductor system was presented whenever the Boston Symphony, which is the exclusive property of Mr. Koussevitzky, came to town—in spite of at least one Boston concert which sounded as though Mr. Koussevitzky had been converted suddenly into a guest conductor. For general sustained excellence, the Boston Symphony must be awarded first place, although the most brilliant individual evenings were those of the Philharmonic-Symphony when Mr. Toscanini was in command.

The [illegible] presented, and I regret that at this time I am unable to remember a great deal about most of them. The regret refers to my mnemonic shortcomings rather than to any implied slur on the novelties. The Philharmonic-Symphony novelties included the Atterberg Symphony, which won a ten-thousand-dollar prize and was later declared by its composer a hoax; three vehement contributions by Simon Bucharoff, another suite by Tansman, a dreary Berceuse of Busoni, Cassado's ready-made Catalonian rhapsody, one of those Tommasini spectacular orications of which Mr. Toscanini unfortunately is fond, Honegger's synthetic "Rugby," as well as some rather more substantial offerings.

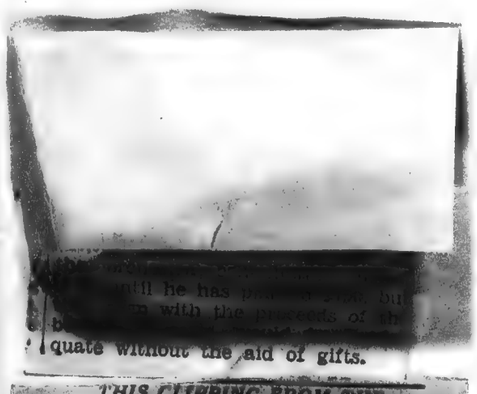
George Gershwin's "American in Paris" was a smart bit of foolery, which ought to be relegated for its own good. Berezowsky's Hebrew Suite, Wagenaar's First Symphony, and Whithorne's "Fata Morgana" were not unqualified hits, but each had some reason for a hearing. Mason's "Chanticleer" was sound stuff and is worth keeping in the repertoire. Some unfamiliar Handelian excerpts, unveiled by Mr. Mengelberg, were excellent. Mr. Respighi had three novelties on the list. "Feste Romani" came off resoundingly under Mr. Toscanini's aegis, although it must be played under some less inspired director before it can be assayed accurately. (The same notation goes for Pizzetti's Concerto dell' Estate.) The other Respighi débutants were his Toccata for the piano, which is more interesting as an exercise than as a listening experience, and an amusing little suite, "The Birds." Bloch's "America," introduced by Mr. Damrosch and later heard on a Boston Symphony program, seemed to me the best of the year's novelties, although the attempt at community singing in the closing pages was also the most ludicrous of the year's innovations. Separated from its pontifical literary accompaniment, "America" is a masterpiece of craftsmanship and devoid of dullness. Maybe you don't think that's praise.

NEITHER Mr. Koussevitzky nor Mr. Stokowski had too much luck with "first performances." A concerto by C. P. E. Bach and a symphony said to have been composed by Frederick the Great were better than any contemporary lucubrations. The Toch piano concerto, another importation via Boston, made a stir for a few hours, and the Philadelphia novelties—well, the symphonic season is over!

—R. A. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
APR 21 1929

A poll of Boston Symphony subscribers to select a program for the final concerts is highly significant in showing the attitude of Boston audiences to the more experimental modernist music. Criticisms of the conductor's frequent choice of contemporary productions in the new mode are substantiated by mathematical demonstration. In one class of compositions, where works of Wagner, Sibelius, Beethoven, Tschaikowsky and Moussorgsky receive 321, 157, 129, 129 and 103 votes respectively, a Stravegsky work receives only 82 votes. Honegger's "Locomotive" suite only 25, and the same composer's "Rugby" only 6. The poll discloses the familiar desire of audiences to hear the works they know best. Thus Ravel's "Waltz," a modern, but not ultra-modern work, stands at the head of the tone-poems, leading Strauss's "Zarathustra" and Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun." As the Transcript points out, there is some disposition to favor works of more "popular" character. But the results of the poll seem to bear out the opinion of those who hold that programs of the average symphony concert in New York, Boston and Philadelphia contain too few examples of the lesser works of standard composers. There is too much dependence on the "standbys," and inferior novelties are given the place that might be given to the less-familiar standard works.



...ll he has ... but ... with the proceeds of th... quate without the aid of gifts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
JOURNAL
Gardiner Me
APR 25 1929

...ganization.

The deficit in the year's receipts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was $43,000.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION STAR
APR 25 1929

Honor Baggageman

Boston Symphony Players Give Veteran the Rare Trumpet Salute.

Precedent has just been established by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on how to honor a baggageman.

The Boston Symphony players, according ... Science Monitor, honor their baggageman with nothing less than a trumpet salute (which is the musical equivalent of at least 20 guns), a round of applause, and autographed pictures of the conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, and the orchestra.

Neil J. Patterson, the man thus honored at a recent orchestra rehearsal of the symphony players in Symphony Hall, has been baggage and property man for the orchestra for 40 years, and so well has he discharged his duties of looking after the transportation of a carload of rare instruments that the members of the organization chose a typically musical way to express their appreciation.

He was called to the stage, expecting to be asked to move a piano or render some such service, and there received the trumpet salute—an honor reserved for few.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
CITIZEN
Lowell, Mass.
APR 24 1929

The Symphony Season's Close.

At the final pair of the season's regular concerts this week the Boston Symphony orchestra will give a request program, the pieces to be performed having been chosen by the conductor as a result of a poll of the subscribers. Thus the list includes the Prelude to Wagner's opera "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg;" "The Afternoon of a Fawn," Debussy; the Choreographic poem "The Waltz," Ravel, Symphony No. 5 in A minor, Tchaikowsky.

There has been in musical Boston more or less discussion about this musical referendum, and it has been pointed out that the Philadelphia Symphony orchestra long ago abandoned a similar idea. There has, also, however, been more or less controversy in Boston as to the proportion of modern works to old favorites on Mr. Koussevitsky's programs. Possibly he assented to the poll with the idea of discovering the tastes of the subscribers. Naturally what we call the classics got the most votes in the symphonic cluass. Tschaikowsky's Fifth headed the list. Following in order were Franck, Brahms No. 2, Schubert's "Unfinished," Sibelius No. 2, and then Beethoven's Pastoral and the Eroica. There were 52 votes for Prokofieff's "Classical."

Under the Tone Poem classification Ravel's "The Waltz" headed the list, scoring a point or two for the modernists. Strauss' "Zarathustra" stood second and Debussy's "Afternoon of a Fawn," third.

Under the classification of Music in Other Forms the Meistersinger prelude had a wide margin over all the rest, with the Sibelius Concerto for Violin in second place and Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture. There were 28 votes for the Honegger locomotive piece, but only 6 for his "Rugby." Stravinsky, Toch, De Falla, Hindemith and the American Copland had their faithful admirers.

The impression is that it will be wise not to argue too dogmatically from the results of the poll.

A Plea for the Moderns

Open disapproval by certain members of the audience of the work of a Brazilian composer played by the Philadelphia Symphony orchestra recently led Mr. Stokowski to say before the second performance that while the music was extremely modern, it was an interpretation of Brazilian life by a Brazilian who had carefully studied the subject and it was entitled to a respectful hearing. "Anyone in the audience not interested in modern music," he said "and I do not blame any one for being interested in what he is interested in, may leave. We will relax our rules and open the doors and every one who wishes may step into the hall and smoke a classical cigaret. I love old music as much as any of you, but we want to give modern writers a hearing. It would be a shame if we did not give some of the music of our day and of our everyday life."

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-EXAMINER
APR 26 1929

* * *

Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, was asking a friend of ... Stock's if Stock actually led the symphonies without a score. Assured that he did, Koussevitsky further inquired, "Does Stock really know his stuff, or fake it like Stokowsky?" (It's all I can do not to quote Von Bulow's "two kinds of conductor": One with the score in his head, the other with his head in the score.)

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
APR 29

AN ORCHESTRA SALUTES FAITHFUL PROPERTY MAN

BOSTON, April 26.—Honoring his 40 years of faithful service with a trumpet salute, the Boston Symphony Orchestra interrupted a recent concert in tribute to Neil J. Patterson, baggage and property man for the organization. He was called to the stage, expecting to be asked to move a piano, and there received the trumpet salute—an honor accorded few.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
CITIZEN
Lowell, Mass.
APR 24 1929

...s. Theodore Thomas.

In Cambrie... where as Rose Fay she spent h... girlhood, there died last Friday ... Theodore Thomas, widow of the ...mous orchestra conductor whose ...y now rests in Mt. Auburn ceme...y. She was the founder and fi... president of the National Federa... of Music Clubs, which is to ho... its biennial convention in Boston ...une, and interested in a wide vari... of activities. Her own special ta... it was for writing. Notable among ...er works was her "Memoirs of T...dore Thomas," one of the most int...sting of the several biographies of ... husband. She was equally success... in other literary forms and in... liably wrote with charming wit a... humor. A versatile, energetic and ...markably brilliant woman.

Few teachers ... voice in America

...ere more widely known than Oscar ...aenger of New ...rk and Washington, who died in ... hospital in the capital city last ...eek. He studied voice under Jacques Bouhy, a famous operatic baritone of that day. The list of now prominent opera singers who studied with him is a long one.

The Music Association of Providence, R. I., has been successful in securing subscriptions well over the $4000 minimum required to guarantee the continuance next season of the customary series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra. It will also undertake the underwriting of an additional concert series in which noted artists will appear.

In Detroit last Thursday, Gounod's opera "Faust" was presented with a Detroit orchestra, ... local chorus, locally painted scenery and by a cast of principals in which all but three were residents of the city. According to the Detroit News, "No better Faust was ever given anywhere; not even the tremendous resources of the Metropolitan could exceed what was done here. It was a victory of brains, hard work, courage and faith; chiefly of brains."

The News feels that Detroit has all the elements for great civic opera. One is ready to believe that there was a commendably artistic performance, which speaks well for Detroit's interest in music. It is one thing, however, to carry a single performance to success and quite another to establish civic opera on a more permanent basis. At that, the progressive city in Michigan which already maintains a symphony orchestra, may be equal to it.

Miss Edith ... Blackadar is the newly appointed organist and choir director at St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal church. Miss Ruth Robinson has also been engaged at St. Paul's as soprano soloist. Both young women are studying here at the state Normal school for degrees in music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES PICAYUNE
APR 27 1929

WE HESITATE to take position as prophet of evil regarding that fine institution, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but we fear that organization is headed for the rocks when it adopts the policy of further increasing its prices. Our belief is that entertainments of all kind in the United States have reached the point of charging all the traffic will bear and that additions to the charge will attract no added total at the box office! For one reason such advances may work, but beware later on! A writer in the Boston Transcript, favorable to the increase, after saying that increased costs have made it impossible for the orchestra to meet its expenses at past rates, concludes: "The Symphony Orchestra can be neither a philanthropic nor a popular institution—and survive." Has the writer forgotten that for more than forty years the organization was strictly philanthropic. That it or any other institution of the kind will survive unless given philanthropic support we gravely doubt.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE NEW YORKER
APR 27 1929

MUSICAL EVENTS

Another Season Goes into Mothballs

WHEN Mr. Stokowski concluded the "Fire Bird" suite at the last concert of The Philadelphia Orchestra, the symphonic season came to an end. There may remain a few ambitious choral events, involving large orchestras, but knowing from experience the explosive nature of such concerts, it is safe to assert that it's all over but the shouting.

The time has come to derive some sort of helpful moral (and this is not redundant, because most morals really are superfluous) from the orchestral year. Has the amalgamation of the Philharmonic and Symphony Societies stifled local competition and turned the Philharmonic-Symphony sessions into routine drills? Has the succession of guest conductors improved the skill of the Philharmonic-Symphony and Philadelphia bands? Has the American Symphonic Ensemble, the much-publicized conductorless orchestra, taught us that directors are only a luxury?

Almost like a well-trained junior executive, I answer "No." The competition between the New York Symphony and the Philharmonic was, in recent years, largely imaginary. The unusually long list of novelties produced by the Philharmonic-Symphony is evidence of the industry of its leaders, if not necessarily of their discernment. The Philharmonic-Symphony under the Messrs. Mengelberg and Toscanini sounded much like the erstwhile Philharmonic under Messrs. Mengelberg and Toscanini, and, except for occasional lapses in the celebrated "luminosity" of the Philadelphia fiddles, Mr. Stokowski's men performed for him as they had in other years. The conductorless orchestra, which turned out to be not entirely without a leader in view of the activity of its concertmasters, proved that good instrumentalists are capable of doing nicely without the flourish of a baton. How much better it would be ... with a first-rate maestro is not difficult to estimate.

AS for the guest conductors, they came and went with startling rapidity, and under the circumstances none of them did themselves justice. Still, it is not essential that some conductors do justice to themselves. The best argument against the guest-conductor system was presented whenever the Boston Symphony, which is the exclusive property of Mr. Koussevitzky, came to town—in spite of at least one Boston concert which sounded as though Mr. Koussevitzky had been converted suddenly into a guest conductor. For general sustained excellence, the Boston Symphony must be awarded first place, although the most brilliant individual evenings were those of the Philharmonic-Symphony when Mr. Toscanini was in command.

The ... sented, and I regret that at this time I am unable to remember a great deal about most of them. The regret refers to my mnemonic shortcomings rather than to any implied slur on the novelties. The Philharmonic-Symphony novelties included the Atterberg Symphony, which won a ten-thousand-dollar prize and was later declared by its composer a hoax; three vehement contributions by Simon Bucharoff, another suite by Tansman, a dreary Berceuse of Busoni, Cassado's ready-made Catalonian rhapsody, one of those Tommasini fabrications of which Mr. Toscanini unfortunately is fond, Honegger's synthetic "Rugby," as well as some rather more substantial offerings.

George Gershwin's "American in Paris" was a smart bit of foolery, which ought to be restored for its own good. Berezowsky's Hebrew Suite, Wagenaar's First Symphony, and Whithorne's "Fata Morgana" were not unqualified hits, but each had some reason for a hearing. Mason's "Chanticleer" was sound stuff and is worth keeping in the repertoire. Some unfamiliar Handelian excerpts, unveiled by Mr. Mengelberg, were excellent. Mr. Respighi had three novelties on the list. "Feste Romani" came off resoundingly under Mr. Toscanini's aegis, although it must be played under some less inspired director before it can be assayed accurately. (The same notation goes for Pizzetti's Concerto dell' Estate.) The other Respighi débutants were his Toccata for the piano, which is more interesting as an exercise than ... and an amusing little suite, "The Birds," Toch's "America," introduced by Mr. Damrosch and later heard on a Boston Symphony program, seemed to me the best of the year's novelties, although the attempt at community singing in the closing pages was also the most ludicrous of the year's innovations. Separated from its pontifical literary accompaniment, "America" is a masterpiece of craftsmanship and devoid of dullness. Maybe you don't think that's praise.

NEITHER Mr. Koussevitzky nor Mr. Stokowski had too much luck with "first performances." A concerto by C. P. E. Bach and a symphony said to have been composed by Frederick the Great were better than any contemporary lucubrations. The Toch piano concerto, another importation via Boston, made a stir for a few hours, and the Philadelphia novelties—well, the symphonic season is over!

—R. A. S.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
APR 21 1929

A poll of Boston Symphony subscribers to select a program for the final concerts is highly significant in showing the attitude of Boston audiences to the more experimental modernist music. Criticisms of the conductor's frequent choice of contemporary productions in the new mode are substantiated by mathematical demonstration. In one class of compositions, where works of Wagner, Sibelius, Beethoven, Tschaikowsky and Moussorgsky receive 121, 157, 129, 129 and 103 votes respectively, a Stravegsky work receives only 82 votes. Honegger's "Locomotive" suite only 25, and the same composer's "Rugby" only 6. The poll discloses the familiar desire of audiences to hear the works they know best. Thus Ravel's "Waltz," a modern, but not ultra-modern work, stands at the head of the tone-poems, leading Strauss's "Zarathustra" and Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun." As the Transcript points out, there is some disposition to favor works of more "popular" character. But the results of the poll seem to bear out the opinion of those who hold that programs of the average symphony concert in New York, Boston and Philadelphia contain too few examples of the lesser works of [illegible] composers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
News
Springfield, O.
APR 21 1929

The annual concert on March 24 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the benefit of its pension fund was sold out well in advance. The fund for pensioning former members of the orchestra and their dependents was founded in 1903 and there are now 71 beneficiaries on its payroll, receiving a little more than $17,000 yearly. Each member of the orchestra contributes annual dues until he has paid in $750, but this, even with the proceeds of the benefit concerts, would be inadequate without the aid of gifts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
JOURNAL
Gardiner Me
APR 25 1929

The deficit in the year's receipts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was $43,000.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION STAR
APR 25 1929

Honor Baggageman

Boston Symphony Players Give Veteran the Rare Trumpet Salute.

Precedent has just been established by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on how to honor a baggageman.

The Boston Symphony players, according [illegible] Science Monitor, honor their baggageman with nothing less than a trumpet salute (which is the musical equivalent of at least 20 guns), a round of applause, and autographed pictures of the conductor, Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra.

Neil J. Patterson, the man thus honored at a recent orchestra rehearsal of the symphony players in Symphony Hall, has been baggage and property man for the orchestra for 40 years, and so well has he discharged his duties of looking after the transportation of a carload of rare instruments that the members of the organization chose a typically musical way to express their appreciation.

He was called to the stage, expecting to be asked to move a piano or render some such service, and there received the trumpet salute—an honor reserved for few.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
CITIZEN
Lowell, Mass.
APR 24 1929

The Symphony Season's Close.

At the final pair of the season's regular concerts this week the Boston Symphony orchestra will give a request program, the pieces to be performed having been chosen by the conductor as a result of a poll of the subscribers. Thus the list includes the Prelude to Wagner's opera "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg;" "The Afternoon of a Fawn," Debussy; the Choreographic poem "The Waltz," Ravel, Symphony No. 5 in A minor, Tchaikowsky.

There has been in musical Boston more or less discussion about this musical referendum, and it has been pointed out that the Philadelphia Symphony orchestra long ago abandoned a similar idea. There has, also, however, been more or less controversy in Boston as to the proportion of modern works to old favorites on Mr. Koussevitsky's programs. Possibly he assented to the poll with the idea of discovering the tastes of the subscribers. Naturally what we call the classics got the most votes in the symphonic cluass. Tschaikowsky's Fifth headed the list. Following, in order were Franck, Brahms No. 2, Schubert's "Unfinished," Sibelius No. 3, and then Beethoven's Pastoral and the Eroica. There were 52 votes for Prokofieff's "Classical."

Under the Tone Poem classification Ravel's "The Waltz" headed the list, scoring a point or two for the modernists. Strauss' "Zarathustra" stood second and Debussy's "Afternoon of a Fawn," third.

Under the classification of Music in Other Forms the Meistersinger prelude had a wide margin over all the rest, with the Sibelius Concerto for Violin in second place and Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture. There were 28 votes for the Honegger locomotive piece, but only 6 for his "Rugby." Stravinsky, Toch, De Falla, Hindemith and the American Copland had their faithful admirers.

The impression is that it will be wise not to argue too dogmatically from the results of the poll.

A Plea for the Moderns

Open disapproval by certain members of the audience of the work of a Brazilian composer played by the Philadelphia Symphony orchestra recently led Mr. Stokowski to say before the second performance that while the music was extremely modern, it was an interpretation of Brazilian life by a Brazilian who had carefully studied the subject and it was entitled to a respectful hearing. "Anyone in the audience not interested in modern music," he said "and I do not blame any one for being interested in what he is interested in, may leave. We will relax our rules and open the doors and every one who wishes may step into the hall and smoke a classical cigaret. I love old music as much as any of you, but we want to give modern writers a hearing. It would be a shame if we did not give some of the music of our day and of our everyday life."

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-EXAMINER
APR 26 1929

* * *

Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, was asking a friend of Frederick Stock's if Stock actually led the symphonies without a score. Assured that he did, Koussevitsky further inquired, "Does Stock really know his stuff, or fake it like Stokowsky?" (It's all I can do not to quote Von Bulow's "two kinds of conductor": One with the score in his head, the other with his head in the score.)

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
APR 26 1929

AN ORCHESTRA SALUTES FAITHFUL PROPERTY MAN

BOSTON, April 26.—Honoring his 40 years of faithful service with a trumpet salute, the Boston Symphony Orchestra interrupted a recent concert in tribute to Neil J. Patterson, baggage and property man for the organization. He was called to the stage, expecting to be asked to move a piano, and there received the trumpet salute—an honor accorded few.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
CITIZEN
Lowell, Mass.
APR 24 1929

[illegible] Theodore Thomas.

In Cambrie[illegible] where as Rose Fay she spent h[illegible] girlhood, there died last Friday [illegible] Theodore Thomas, widow of the [illegible]mous orchestra conductor whose [illegible]y now rests in Mt. Auburn ceme[illegible]y. She was the founder and fi[illegible] president of the National Federa[illegible] of Music Clubs, which is to ho[illegible] its biennial convention in Boston [illegible] June, and interested in a wide vari[illegible] of activities. Her own special ta[illegible]t was for writing. Notable among [illegible]er works was her "Memoirs of T[illegible]odore Thomas," one of the most int[illegible]sting of the several biographies of [illegible] husband. She was equally success[illegible] in other literary forms and in[illegible]ably wrote with charming wit an[illegible] humor. A versatile, energetic and [illegible]markably brilliant woman.

Few teachers [illegible] voice in America were more widely known than Oscar Saenger of New [illegible]rk and Washington, who died in a hospital in the capital city last [illegible]eek. He studied voice under Jacques Bouhy, a famous operatic baritone of that day. The list of now prominent opera singers who studied with him is a long one.

The Music Association of Providence, R. I., has been successful in securing subscriptions well over the $4000 minimum required to guarantee the continuance next season of the customary series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra. It will also undertake the underwriting of an additional concert series in which noted artists will appear.

In Detroit last Thursday, Gounod's opera "Faust" was presented with a Detroit orchestra, a local chorus, locally painted scenery and by a cast of principals in which all but three were residents of the city. According to the Detroit News, "No better Faust was ever given anywhere; not even the tremendous resources of the Metropolitan could exceed what was done here. It was a victory of brains, hard work, courage and faith; chiefly of brains."

The News feels that Detroit has all the elements for great civic opera. One is ready to believe that there was a commendably artistic performance, which speaks well for Detroit's interest in music. It is one thing, however, to carry a single performance to success and quite another to establish civic opera on a more permanent basis. At that, the progressive city in Michigan which already maintains a symphony orchestra, may be equal to it.

Miss Edith A. Blackadar is the newly appointed organist and choir director at St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal church. Miss Ruth Robinson has also been engaged at St. Paul's as soprano soloist. Both young women are studying here at the state Normal school for degrees in music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES PICAYUNE
APR 27 1929

WE HESITATE to take position as prophet of evil regarding that fine institution, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but we fear that organization is headed for the rocks when it adopts the policy of further increasing its prices. Our belief is that entertainments of all kind in the United States have reached the point of charging all the traffic will bear and that additions to the charge will attract no added total at the box office! For one reason such advances may work, but beware later on! A writer in the Boston Transcript, favorable to the increase, after saying that increased costs have made it impossible for the orchestra to meet its expenses at past rates, concludes: "The Symphony Orchestra can be neither a philanthropic nor a popular institution—and survive." Has the writer forgotten that for more than forty years the organization was strictly philanthropic. That it or any other institution of the kind will survive unless given philanthropic support we gravely doubt.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORKER
APR 27 1929

MUSICAL EVENTS

Another Season Goes into Mothballs

WHEN Mr. Stokowski concluded the "Fire Bird" suite at the last concert of The Philadelphia Orchestra, the symphonic season came to an end. There may remain a few ambitious choral events, involving large orchestras, but knowing from experience the explosive nature of such concerts, it is safe to assert that it's all over but the shouting.

The time has come to derive some sort of helpful moral (and this is not redundant, because most morals really are superfluous) from the orchestral year. Has the amalgamation of the Philharmonic and Symphony Societies stifled local competition and turned the Philharmonic-Symphony sessions into routine drills? Has the succession of guest conductors improved the skill of the Philharmonic-Symphony and Philadelphia bands? Has the American Symphonic Ensemble, the much-publicized conductorless orchestra, taught us that directors are only a luxury?

Almost like a well-trained junior executive, I answer "No." The competition between the New York Symphony and the Philharmonic was, in recent years, largely imaginary. The unusually long list of novelties produced by the Philharmonic-Symphony is evidence of the industry of its leaders, if not necessarily of their discernment. The Philharmonic-Symphony under the Messrs. Mengelberg and Toscanini sounded much like the erstwhile Philharmonic under Messrs. Mengelberg and Toscanini, and, except for occasional lapses in the celebrated "luminosity" of the Philadelphia fiddles, Mr. Stokowski's men performed for him as they had in other years. The conductorless orchestra, which turned out to be not entirely without a leader in view of the activity of its concertmasters, proved that good instrumentalists are capable of doing nicely without the flourish of a baton. How much better it might be handled with a first-rate maestro is not difficult to estimate.

AS for the guest conductors, they came and went with startling rapidity, and under the circumstances none of them did themselves justice. Still, it is not essential that some conductors do justice to themselves. The best argument against the guest-conductor system was presented whenever the Boston Symphony, which is the exclusive property of Mr. Koussevitzky, came to town—in spite of at least one Boston concert which sounded as though Mr. Koussevitzky had been converted suddenly into a guest conductor. For general sustained excellence, the Boston Symphony must be awarded first place, although the most brilliant individual evenings were those of the Philharmonic-Symphony when Mr. Toscanini was in command.

[illegible]sented [illegible] and I regret that at this time I am unable to remember a great deal about most of them. The regret refers to my mnemonic shortcomings rather than to any implied slur on the novelties. The Philharmonic-Symphony novelties included the Atterberg Symphony, which won a ten-thousand-dollar prize and was later declared by its composer a hoax; three vehement contributions by Simon Bucharoff, another suite by Tansman, a dreary Berceuse of Busoni, Cassado's ready-made Catalonian rhapsody, one of those Tommasini fabrications of which Mr. Toscanini unfortunately is fond, Honegger's synthetic "Rugby," as well as some rather more substantial offerings.

George Gershwin's "American in Paris" was a smart bit of foolery, which ought to be restored for its own good. Berezowsky's Hebrew Suite, Wagenaar's First Symphony, and Whithorne's "Fata Morgana" were not unqualified hits, but each had some reason for a hearing. Mason's "Chanticleer" was sound stuff and is worth keeping in the repertoire. Some unfamiliar Handel, in excerpts, unveiled by Mr. Mengelberg, were excellent. Mr. Respighi had three novelties on the list. "Feste Romani" came off resoundingly under Mr. Toscanini's aegis, although it must be played under some less inspired director before it can be assayed accurately. (The same notation goes for Pizzetti's Concerto dell' Estate.) The other Respighi débutants were [illegible] Toccata for the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
APR 21 19

A poll of Boston Symphony subscribers to select a program for the final concerts is highly significant in showing the attitude of Boston audiences to the more experimental modernist music. Criticisms of the conductor's frequent choice of contemporary productions in the new mode are substantiated by mathematical demonstration. In one class of compositions, where works of Wagner, Sibelius, Beethoven, Tschaikowsky and Moussorgsky receive 321, 157, 129, 129 and 103 votes respectively, a Stravegsky work receives only 82 votes. Honegger's "Locomotive" suite only 25, and the same composer's "Rugby" only 6. The poll discloses the familiar desire of audiences to hear the works they know best. Thus Ravel's "Waltz," a modern, but not ultra-modern work, stands at the head of the tone-poems, leading Strauss's "Zarathustra" and Debussy's "After-noon of a Faun." As the Transcript points out, there is some disposition to favor works of more "popular" character. But the results of the poll seem to bear out the opinion of those who hold that programs of the average symphony concert in New York, Boston and Philadelphia contain too few examples of the lesser works of standard composers. There is too much dependence on the "standbys," and inferior novelties are given the place that might be given to the less-familiar standard works.

the orchestra contributes annual dues until he has paid in $750, but this, even with the proceeds of the benefit concerts, would be made quite [illegible] aid of gifts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
JOURNAL
Gardiner Me
APR 25 1929

ganization.

The deficit in the year's receipts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was $43,000.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION STAR
APR 25 1929

Honor Baggageman

Boston Symphony Players Give Veteran the Rare Trumpet Salute.

Precedent has just been established by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on how to honor a baggageman.

The Boston Symphony players, according to the Christian Science Monitor, honor their baggageman with nothing less than a trumpet salute (which is the musical equivalent of at least 20 guns), a round of applause, and autographed pictures of the conductor, Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra.

Neil J. Patterson, the man thus honored at a recent orchestra rehearsal of the symphony players in Symphony Hall, has been baggage and property man for the orchestra for 40 years, and so well has he discharged his duties of looking after the transportation of a carload of rare instruments that the members of the organization chose a typically musical way to express their appreciation.

He was called to the stage, expecting to be asked to move a piano or render some such service, and there received the trumpet salute—an honor reserved for few.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
CITIZEN
Lowell, Mass.
APR 24 1929

The Symphony Season's Close.

At the final pair of the season's regular concerts this week the Boston Symphony orchestra will give a request program, the pieces to be performed having been chosen by the conductor as a result of a poll of the subscribers. Thus the list includes the Prelude to Wagner's opera "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg;" "The Afternoon of a Fawn," Debussy; the Choreographic poem "The Waltz," Ravel, Symphony No. 5 in A minor, Tchaikowsky.

There has been in musical Boston more or less discussion about this musical referendum, and it has been pointed out that the Philadelphia Symphony orchestra long ago abandoned a similar idea. There has, also, however, been more or less controversy in Boston as to the proportion of modern works to old favorites on Mr. Koussevitsky's programs. Possibly he assented to the poll with the idea of discovering the tastes of the subscribers. Naturally what we call the classics got the most votes in the symphonic cluass. Tschaikowsky's Fifth headed the list. Following in order were Franck, Brahms No. 2, Schubert's "Unfinished," Sibelius No. 3, and then Beethoven's Pastoral and the Eroica. There were 52 votes for Prokofieff's "Classical."

Under the Tone Poem classification Ravel's "The Waltz" headed the list, scoring a point or two for the modernists. Strauss' "Zarathustra" stood second and Debussy's "Afternoon of a Fawn," third.

Under the classification of Music in Other Forms the Meistersinger prelude had a wide margin over all the rest, with the Sibelius Concerto for Violin in second place and Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture. There were 23 votes for the Honegger locomotive piece, but only 6 for his "Rugby." Stravinsky, Toch, De Falla, Hindemith and the American Copland had their faithful admirers.

The impression is that it will be wise not to argue too dogmatically from the results of the poll.

A Plea for the Moderns

Open disapproval by certain members of the audience of the work of a Brazilian composer played by the Philadelphia Symphony orchestra recently led Mr. Stokowski to say before the second performance that while the music was extremely modern, it was an interpretation of Brazilian life by a Brazilian who had carefully studied the subject and it was entitled to a respectful hearing. "Anyone in the audience not interested in modern music," he said "and I do not blame any one for being interested in what he is interested in, may leave. We will relax our rules and open the doors and every one who wishes may step into the hall and smoke a classical cigaret. I love old music as much as any of you, but we want to give modern writers a hearing. It would be a shame if we did not give some of the music of our day and of our everyday life."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-EXAMINER

* * *

Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, was asking a friend of Frederick Stock's if Stock actually led the symphonies without a score. Assured that he did, Koussevitsky further inquired, "Does Stock really know his stuff, or fake it like Stokowsky?" (It's all I can do not to quote Von Bulow's "two kinds of conductor": One with the score in his head, the other with his head in the score.)

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

AN ORCHESTRA SALUTES FAITHFUL PROPERTY MAN

BOSTON, April 26.—Honoring his 40 years of faithful service with a trumpet salute, the Boston Symphony Orchestra interrupted a recent concert in tribute to Neil J. Patterson, baggage and property man for the organization. He was called to the stage, expecting to be asked to move a piano, and there received the trumpet salute—an honor accorded few.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
CITIZEN
Lowell, Mass.
APR 24 1929

Mrs. Theodore Thomas.

In Cambridge, where as Rose Fay she spent her girlhood, there died last Friday Mrs. Theodore Thomas, widow of the famous orchestra conductor whose body now rests in Mt. Auburn cemetery. She was the founder and first president of the National Federation of Music Clubs, which is to hold its biennial convention in Boston in June, and interested in a wide variety of activities. Her own special talent was for writing. Notable among her works was her "Memoirs of Theodore Thomas," one of the most interesting of the several biographies of her husband. She was equally successful in other literary forms and invariably wrote with charming wit and humor. A versatile, energetic and remarkably brilliant woman.

Few teachers were more widely known than Oscar Saenger of New York and Washington, who died in a hospital in the capital city last week. He studied voice under Jacques Bouhy, a famous operatic baritone of that day. The list of now prominent opera singers who studied with him is a long one.

The Music Association of Providence, R. I., has been successful in securing subscriptions well over the $4000 minimum required to guarantee the continuance next season of the customary series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra. It will also undertake the underwriting of an additional concert series in which noted artists will appear.

In Detroit last Thursday, Gounod's opera "Faust" was presented with a Detroit orchestra, local chorus, locally painted scenery and by a cast of principals in which all but three were residents of the city. According to the Detroit News, "No better Faust was ever given anywhere; not even the tremendous resources of the Metropolitan could exceed what was done here. It was a victory of brains, hard work, courage and faith; chiefly of brains."

The News feels that Detroit has all the elements for great civic opera. One is ready to believe that there was a commendably artistic performance, which speaks well for Detroit's interest in music. It is one thing, however, to carry a single performance to success and quite another to establish civic opera on a more permanent basis. At that, the progressive city in Michigan which already maintains a symphony orchestra, may be equal to it.

Miss Edith A. Blackadar is the newly appointed organist and choir director at St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal church. Miss Ruth Robinson has also been engaged at St. Paul's as soprano soloist. Both young women are studying here at the state Normal school for degrees in music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES PICAYUNE

WE HESITATE to take position as prophet of evil regarding that fine institution, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but we fear that organization is headed for the rocks when it adopts the policy of further increasing its prices. Our belief is that entertainments of all kind in the United States have reached the point of charging all the traffic will bear and that additions to the charge will attract no added total at the box office! For one reason such advances may work, but beware later on! A writer in the Boston Transcript, favorable to the increase, after saying that increased costs have made it impossible for the orchestra to meet its expenses at past rates, concludes: "The Symphony Orchestra can be neither a philanthropic nor a popular institution—and survive." Has the writer forgotten that for more than forty years the organization was strictly philanthropic. That it or any other institution of the kind will survive unless given philanthropic support we gravely doubt.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORKER
159
APR 27 1929

MUSICAL EVENTS

Another Season Goes into Mothballs

WHEN Mr. Stokowski concluded the "Fire Bird" suite at the last concert of The Philadelphia Orchestra, the symphonic season came to an end. There may remain a few ambitious choral presents, involving large orchestras, but knowing from experience the explosive nature of such concerts, it is safe to assert that it's all over but the shouting.

The time has come to derive some sort of helpful moral (and this is not redundant, because most morals really are superfluous) from the orchestral year. Has the amalgamation of the Philharmonic and Symphony Societies stifled local competition and turned the Philharmonic-Symphony sessions into routine drills? Has the succession of guest conductors improved the skill of the Philharmonic-Symphony and Philadelphia bands? Has the American Symphonic Ensemble, the much-publicized conductorless orchestra, taught us that directors are only a luxury?

Almost like a well-trained junior executive, I answer "No." The competition between the New York Symphony and the Philharmonic was, in recent years, largely imaginary. The unusually long list of novelties produced by the Philharmonic-Symphony is evidence of the industry of its leaders, if not necessarily of their discernment. The Philharmonic-Symphony under the Messrs. Mengelberg and Toscanini sounded much like the erstwhile Philharmonic under Messrs. Mengelberg and Toscanini, and, except for occasional lapses in the celebrated "luminosity" of the Philadelphia fiddles, Mr. Stokowski's men performed for him as they had in other years. The conductorless orchestra, which turned out to be not entirely without a leader in view of the activity of its concertmasters, proved that good instrumentalists are capable of doing nicely without the flourish of a baton. How much better it would be [illegible] with a first-rate maestro is not difficult to estimate.

AS for the guest conductors, they came and went with startling rapidity, and under the circumstances none of them did themselves justice. Still, it is not essential that some conductors do justice to themselves. The best argument against the guest-conductor system was presented whenever the Boston Symphony, which is the exclusive property of Mr. Koussevitzky, came to town—in spite of at least one Boston concert which sounded as though Mr. Koussevitzky had been converted suddenly into a guest conductor. For general sustained excellence, the Boston Symphony must be awarded first place, although the most brilliant individual evenings were those of the Philharmonic-Symphony when Mr. Toscanini was in command.

The [illegible] presented and I regret that at this time I am unable to remember a great deal about most of them. The regret refers to my mnemonic shortcomings rather than to any implied slur on the novelties. The Philharmonic-Symphony novelties included the Atterberg Symphony, which won a ten-thousand-dollar prize and was later declared by its composer a hoax; three vehement contributions by Simon Bucharoff, another suite by Tansman, a dreary Berceuse of Busoni, Cassado's ready-made Catalonian rhapsody, one of those Tommasini fabrications of which Mr. Toscanini unfortunately is fond, Honegger's synthetic "Rugby," as well as some rather more substantial offerings.

George Gershwin's "American in Paris" was a smart bit of foolery, which ought to be restored for its own good. Berezowsky's Hebrew Suite, Wagenaar's First Symphony, and Whithorne's "Fata Morgana" were not unqualified hits, but each had some reason for a hearing. Mason's "Chanticleer" was sound stuff and is worth keeping in the repertoire. Some unfamiliar Handelian excerpts, unveiled by Mr. Mengelberg, were excellent. Mr. Respighi had three novelties on the list. "Feste Romani" came off resoundingly under Mr. Toscanini's aegis, although it must be played under some less inspired director before it can be assayed accurately. (The same notation goes for Pizzetti's Concerto dell' Estate.) The other Respighi débutants were his Toccata for the

...to bear out the opinion of those who hold that programs of the average symphony concert in New York, Boston and Philadelphia contain too few examples of the lesser works of standard composers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
Times
Springfield, O.
APR 21 1929

The annual concert on March 24 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the benefit of its pension fund was sold out well in advance. The fund for pensioning former members of the orchestra and their dependents was founded in 1903 and there are now 71 beneficiaries on its payroll, receiving a little more than $17,000 yearly. Each member of the orchestra contributes annual dues until he has paid in $750, but this, even with the proceeds of the benefit concerts, would be inadequate without the aid of gifts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
JOURNAL
Gardiner Me
APR 25 1929

...ganization.

The deficit in the year's receipts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was $43,000.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION STAR
APR 25 1929

Honor Baggageman

Boston Symphony Players Give Veteran the Rare Trumpet Salute.

Precedent has just been established by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on how to honor a baggageman.

The Boston Symphony players, according [redacted] Science Monitor, honor their baggageman with nothing less than a trumpet salute (which is the musical equivalent of at least 20 guns), a round of applause, and autographed pictures of the conductor, Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra.

Neil J. Patterson, the man thus honored at a recent orchestra rehearsal of the symphony players in Symphony Hall, has been baggage and property man for the orchestra for 40 years, and so well has he discharged his duties of looking after the transportation of a carload of rare instruments that the members of the organization chose a typically musical way to express their appreciation.

He was called to the stage, expecting to be asked to move a piano or render some such service, and there received the trumpet salute—an honor reserved for few.

52 votes for Prokofieff's "Classical."

Under the Tone Poem classification Ravel's "The Waltz" headed the list, scoring a point or two for the modernists. Strauss' "Zarathustra" stood second and Debussy's "Afternoon of a Fawn," third.

Under the classification of Music in Other Forms the Meistersinger prelude had a wide margin over all the rest, with the Sibelius Concerto for Violin in second place and Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture. There were 23 votes for the Honegger locomotive piece, but only 6 for his "Rugby." Stravinsky, Toch, De Falla, Hindemith and the American Copland had their faithful admirers.

The impression is that it will be wise not to argue too dogmatically from the results of the poll.

A Plea for the Moderns

Open disapproval by certain members of the audience of the work of a Brazilian composer played by the Philadelphia Symphony orchestra recently led Mr. Stokowski to say before the second performance that while the music was extremely modern, it was an interpretation of Brazilian life by a Brazilian who had carefully studied the subject and it was entitled to a respectful hearing. "Anyone in the audience not interested in modern music," he said "and I do not blame any one for being interested in what he is interested in, may leave. We will relax our rules and open the doors and every one who wishes may step into the hall and smoke a classical cigaret. I love old music as much as any of you, but we want to give modern writers a hearing. It would be a shame if we did not give some of the music of our day and of our everyday life."

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-EXAMINER
APR 26 1929

* * *

Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, was asking a friend of [redacted] Stock's if Stock actually led the symphonies without a score. Assured that he did, Koussevitsky further inquired, "Does Stock really know his stuff, or fake it like Stokowsky?" (It's all I can do not to quote Von Bulow's "two kinds of conductor": One with the score in his head, the other with his head in the score.)

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
APR 26 1929

AN ORCHESTRA SALUTES FAITHFUL PROPERTY MAN

BOSTON, April 26.—Honoring his 40 years of faithful service with a trumpet salute, the Boston Symphony Orchestra interrupted a recent concert in tribute to Neil J. Patterson, baggage and property man for the organization. He was called to the stage, expecting to be asked to move a piano, and there received the trumpet salute—an honor accorded few.

...lence, R. I., has been successful in securing subscriptions well over the $4000 minimum required to guarantee the continuance next season of the customary series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra. It will also undertake the underwriting of an additional concert series in which noted artists will appear.

In Detroit last Thursday, Gounod's opera "Faust" was presented with a Detroit orchestra, local chorus, locally painted scenery and by a cast of principals in which all but three were residents of the city. According to the Detroit News, "No better Faust was ever given anywhere; not even the tremendous resources of the Metropolitan could exceed what was done here. It was a victory of brains, hard work, courage and faith; chiefly of brains."

The News feels that Detroit has all the elements for great civic opera. One is ready to believe that there was a commendably artistic performance, which speaks well for Detroit's interest in music. It is one thing, however, to carry a single performance to success and quite another to establish civic opera on a more permanent basis. At that, the progressive city in Michigan which already maintains a symphony orchestra, may be equal to it.

Miss Edith A. Blackadar is the newly appointed organist and choir director at St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal church. Miss Ruth Robinson has also been engaged at St. Paul's as soprano soloist. Both young women are studying here at the state Normal school for degrees in music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES PICAYUNE
APR 27 1929

WE HESITATE to take position as prophet of evil regarding that fine institution, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but we fear that organization is headed for the rocks when it adopts the policy of further increasing its prices. Our belief is that entertainments of all kind in the United States have reached the point of charging all the traffic will bear and that additions to the charge will attract no added total at the box office! For one reason such advances may work, but beware later on! A writer in the Boston Transcript, favorable to the increase, after saying that increased costs have made it impossible for the orchestra to meet its expenses at past rates, concludes: "The Symphony Orchestra can be neither a philanthropic nor a popular institution—and survive." Has the writer forgotten that for more than forty years the organization was strictly philanthropic. That it or any other institution of the kind will survive unless given philanthropic support we gravely doubt.

...stified local competition and turned the Philharmonic-Symphony sessions into routine drills? Has the succession of guest conductors improved the skill of the Philharmonic-Symphony and Philadelphia bands? Has the American Symphonic Ensemble, the much-publicized conductorless orchestra, taught us that directors are only a luxury?

Almost like a well-trained junior executive, I answer "No." The competition between the New York Symphony and the Philharmonic was, in recent years, largely imaginary. The unusually long list of novelties produced by the Philharmonic-Symphony is evidence of the industry of its leaders, if not necessarily of their discernment. The Philharmonic-Symphony under the Messrs. Mengelberg and Toscanini sounded much like the erstwhile Philharmonic under Messrs. Mengelberg and Toscanini, and, except for occasional lapses in the celebrated "luminosity" of the Philadelphia fiddles, Mr. Stokowski's men performed for him as they had in other years. The conductorless orchestra, which turned out to be not entirely without a leader in view of the activity of its concertmasters, proved that good instrumentalists are capable of doing nicely without the flourish of a baton. How much better it might be handled with a first-rate maestro is not difficult to estimate.

AS for the guest conductors, they came and went with startling rapidity, and under the circumstances none of them did themselves justice. Still, it is not essential that some conductors do justice to themselves. The best argument against the guest-conductor system was presented whenever the Boston Symphony, which is the exclusive property of Mr. Koussevitzky, came to town—in spite of at least one Boston concert which sounded as though Mr. Koussevitzky had been converted suddenly into a guest conductor. For general sustained excellence, the Boston Symphony must be awarded first place, although the most brilliant individual evenings were those of the Philharmonic-Symphony when Mr. Toscanini was in command.

To sente... and I regret that at this time I am unable to remember a great deal about most of them. The regret refers to my mnemonic shortcomings rather than to any implied slur on the novelties. The Philharmonic-Symphony novelties included the Atterberg Symphony, which won a ten-thousand-dollar prize and was later declared by its composer a hoax; three vehement contributions by Simon Bucharoff, another suite by Tansman, a dreary Berceuse of Busoni, Cassado's ready-made Catalonian rhapsody, one of those Tommasini fabrications of which Mr. Toscanini unfortunately is fond, Honegger's synthetic "Rugby," as well as some rather more substantial offerings.

George Gershwin's "American in Paris" was a smart bit of foolery, which ought to be restored for its own good. Berezowsky's Hebrew Suite, Wagenaar's First Symphony, and Whithorne's "Fata Morgana" were not unqualified hits, but each had some reason for a hearing. Mason's "Chanticleer" was sound stuff and is worth keeping in the repertoire. Some unfamiliar Handel in excerpts, unveiled by Mr. Mengelberg, were excellent. Mr. Respighi had three novelties on the list. "Feste Romani" came off resoundingly under Mr. Toscanini's aegis, although it must be played under some less inspired director before it can be assayed accurately. (The same notation goes for Pizzetti's Concerto dell' Estate.) The other Respighi débutants were his Toccata for the piano, which is more interesting as an exercise than [redacted] and an amusing little suite, "The Birds." Bloch's "America," introduced by Mr. Damrosch and later heard on a Boston Symphony program, seemed to me the best of the year's novelties, although the attempt at community singing in the closing pages was also the most ludicrous of the year's innovations. Separated from its pontifical literary accompaniment, "America" is a masterpiece of craftsmanship and devoid of dullness. Maybe you don't think that's praise.

NEITHER Mr. Koussevitzky nor Mr. Stokowski had too much luck with "first performances." A concerto by C. P. E. Bach and a symphony said to have been composed by Frederick the Great were better than any contemporary lucubrations. The Toch piano concerto, another importation via Boston, made a stir for a few hours, and the Philadelphia novelties—well, the symphonic season is over!

—R. A. S.

160

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION
APR 27 1929

What Music Lovers Love

What do patrons of symphony concerts desire for a musical program? Conductors of such orchestras would like information on this point and a recent poll of Boston Symphony subscribers offers it. This poll shows that ultra-modern works do not have the appeal that conductors wish they had. For instance, Honegger's "Locomotive" suite, which is a last word in modern music, received only 25 votes, while Beethoven received 129. Stravegsky's novel compositions received only 82 votes, and compositions of Richard Wagner came out strong with 321 votes.

The poll shows that there is an inclination to favor standbys because of their familiarity, and sometimes because of a certain sentimental attraction. People may be disposed, even in music, to appreciate most the things which they know something about, instead of wishing to extend their knowledge, although they do not know thoroughly their own favorite composers and would benefit from hearing seldom played works by those composers.

There is this much to be said for the ultra-modern composers, who were given scant consideration in the poll. Their time may come, as Wagner's time has come, and as Moussorgsky's and Tschaikowsky's time has come. The absolute disgust and antagonism which Wagner's first musical offerings received is remembered even today, but now no symphony orchestra goes through a season without representing Wagner generously on the programs. Tschaikowsky was considered a little too feverish for the concert stage, but he, too, has come into his own on symphony programs. Moussorgsky had concert patrons doubting and suspicious, but today his work is listened to with interest. There are several other composers whose works were greeted coldly at first as too novel and strange, but which are appreciated today. So the ultra-modern in music is likely to become the modern in another period and in time rank as an "old standby."

Meanwhile symphony orchestra conductors have the task of educating their patrons to modern and ultra-modern music, while they are also heeding their demand for "standbys."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York American
APR 28 1929

Every notable band and orchestra, classified as symphony, concert and jazz, has now been heard on the loud speakers with the possible exception of the Boston Symphony, and our Boston operatives (how we love that word!) are looking up the record for the sake of accuracy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. JOSEPH, MO.
NEWS PRESS
APR 29 1929

SAYS MINNEAPOLIS SYMPHONY EXCELS BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Pittsburgs Critic Praises the Musical Organization Coming Here.

ACCLAIM VERBRUGGHEN ON THE PACIFIC COAST

Famous Conductor to Take Part in Local Spring Music Festival.

St. Joseph has heard the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra so often that the city almost feels a sense of possession in regard to the organization. For this very reason it may not realize how great an assemblage of musicians it represents, nor how lofty is its standing in the most critical Eastern musical circles. The orchestra will play here the last two days of the Spring Music Festival, this week. The festival will be Wednesday, Thursday and Friday.

In Pittsburgh, The Gazette-Times said that the standard of performance of this symphony was the highest attained in their musical season, not even excepting the Boston Orchestra. The New York [illegible] attributed to the orchestra "technical brilliancy, finish of style, rhythmic accurancy and finely adjusted tone and dynamics," also "freedom and fire, intensely exhiliarating in effect."

Honors for Verbrugghen

On the Pacific Coast [illegible] Verbrugghen, as

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
GAZETTE
Rockland, Me.
APR 30 1929

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is [illegible] Europe May 1 He will conduct performances of Musorgsky's "Boris" at the Paris Opera in May, at which the usual version edited by Rimsky-Korsakoff will be used, and not the newly published original score. The 49th season of the Boston Symphony concerts, with Mr. Koussevitzky as conductor, will begin Oct. 11. Plans for celebrating the 50th anniversary of the orchestra in 1930 are already being considered. It will [illegible]

TRANS. MAY 2

The Evergreen Pops Season Forty-Four

Old and New Pleasures from Conductor and Orchestra On Their Mettle

THERE WAS one change at least to note—new bulbs upon the electroliers that hang from the ceiling at Symphony Hall. The substituted glass tempers the glow to upturned eyes in the balconies; over the whole concert-room diffuses soft and even light. The vanished bulbs were a malignant fascination to more than one habitué of the galleries at The Pops. He fixed resolute eyes upon the orchestra, the program-sheet, the tables below; yet sooner or later back to those glaring electroliers they wandered. As for the floor, it was wont to discover that Jack, over there at the side-table, was ageing much faster than he should, while Jill, his wife, was obviously losing her skill with powder-puff and lipstick. The hard light was the source of these unamiable delusions. Now both are gone.

There were also favorable omens. On the floor not a table, in the balconies not a seat, was vacant. Downstairs, indeed, the first Pop of a new season was plainly regaining social cachet. There were figures to be pointed out; texts for gossip; plentiful dinner jackets; spring modes, not for street wear. Mr. Casella, looking as though an Atlantic voyage had freshened him, was warmly and familiarly welcomed. Twice the orchestra, on its feet, was target for friendly acclaim. Mr. Theodorowicz, concert-master again, made his bow after the solo-violin's measures in Handel's Largo. Every number on the program was honestly and heartily applauded. When the notice-board announced some favorite "extra," instant was the pleased response. The orchestra played on its mettle; while the conductor spared neither energy nor finesse. Throughout the hall, and to every piece, one listened, as the French say, and with reason. As for refreshments and such like, the young "scofflaws" from the university professed to be disappointed when they found no paragraph from the Jones Act at the head of the list. None the less, good Mother Willebrandt might have sat all evening in the hall and found no occasion for vigilance and authority. More: to hold the balance even, though one could reach for a cigarette, there were also sweets in plenty.

Mr. Casella does well when he tosses into a Pop program one or two Overtures to the elder Italian operas—last evening to Verdi's "Force of Destiny" and Rossini's "William Tell." An Italian conductor need not be a Toscanini to make rather more of them than his peers of other races. They run in his blood as they ran in the composer's. He can phrase and pace the "good tunes" when a single choir or a few instruments sing them, until they sound as warm and full as they do from voices across the theater, while he gives them unmistakably Italian and operatic accent.

Similarly with grand crescendi and other plunging tumults of sound. An Italian, like Mr. Casella, saves them from blatancy yet keeps them full-mouthed and upswelling. Adept musician as well, he opens up the happy details of which Verdi and Rossini, each as he grew older, was capable. The connoisseurs take note; the general ear is no less pleased. The conductor has, besides, a fortunate flare for rhythm and sonority. Set him [illegible]ling Pageant from "The [illegible]rel" or "The Ride of the [illegible] both beat high and sting[illegible]sical sound floods the hall. [illegible]rity and "good tunes" are [illegible]f The Pops, by which token [illegible] own "Italia" once more [illegible]undry. The "good tunes" [illegible]gh to carry Part One which is a music of aching moods; the rhythms and sonorities have their turn in Part Two, which is Naples sunlit, shouting and at play. Nobody, unless it is Strauss in his youthful "Out of Italy," has turned the trick better.

With the offsets Mr. Casella succeeded equally well. Out of a "Song Without Words," Chaikovsky emerged once more in his favorite part of sighing Slav; while for the Nth time, the state and swell of Handel's melody affirmed his Largo as deservedly popular classic. The conductor, however, does not stop there. Last evening he bade the audience to Sibelius's "Valse Triste"—melancholy flitter of dancing phantoms down the shadows of a haunted gallery—and it gave him attention and applause. He ventured also the orchestral version of Ravel's "Pavan for An Infanta Dead"—a conjuring music out of pale grave melody and low-beating rhythm. The vast palace-room is high-studded, tall-windowed, heavy-draped, bare here, over-laden there. It smells of splendor—in decay. Down it, the black-robed dames d'honneur weave the formal figures of their dance. Somewhere among the yellow candles a very little Princess is very dead. And on an "opening night" of The Pops, this Ravelian spell prevailed. . . . No, mon vieux monsieur, they are not as they once were. In these days they credit an audience with musical intelligence, imagination and a pardonable willingness to use both. H. T. P.

Dances at The Pops

Irma Duncan's Young Troupe to Be Seen There Next Week

BEING alive, The Pops find room for innovation. Occasionally singing voices diversify the orchestral programs. Next week, through all six evenings, it will be the turn of dancers to do as much. The troupe is the third generation, so to say, of Duncans. Isadora had her pupils and protegées. Not least of them was Irma. She succeeded to Isadora's school in Europe; there practised the youngsters whom she brought to New York last winter and will now bring to Symphony Hall. They dance—Irma often leading them—in the tradition of Isadora, but with the zest and glamour natural to their young years. They are eleven in all, with Irma for twelfth. On Monday, Wednesday and Friday, they will dance to music out of Schubert; on Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday to Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony."

At The Pops, the dancing will be managed in this fashion: After the first and the second part of a regular program, the stage will be cleared for Irma and her troupe. Below, in the space usually filled by two rows of tables, a small orchestra will be seated with Arthur Fiedler as conductor. These shifts made, half an hour of dancing will end the evening.

Revised for the Screen

One of the problems of the talkies is that of censorship. As it is impossible to cut out dialogue that is objected to without re-enacting the scene, the producers are not only careful, but sometimes super-cautious. A striking example of this was afforded recently in a presentation of some new "shorts" in Phototone's private theater. These were made in Berlin, and included the well-known negro "spiritual" with the refrain "Nobody knows what trouble I've seen; nobody knows but Jesus." Out of fear of the British censor, the last line nad been changed to "Nobody knows but father."
[London Morning Post

FOUNDED 1900 BY CHARLES F. FRENCH

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

MUSICAL LEADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

TELEPHONE { 4839 HARRISON 5408
CABLE ADDRESS: MUSICLEAD CHICAGO

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

SUBSCRIPTION: $3.00 FOR YEAR
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YEAR
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEAR

CHICAGO, 501 McCORMICK BUILDING
332 SO. MICHIGAN AVE.

APR 29 1929

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

Bostoning

Saturday afternoon, April 13, was a lucky day, inasmuch as we heard the Boston men deliver a C. P. E. Bach concerto for orchestra in D minor and the Ninth Symphony. Beethoven must have exalted the human race! For what musician could possibly think that human beings were so "instrumentated" as to be able to sing that frightful Hymn of Joy! However, it was sung as adequately as possible by Nevada Van de Veer, Paul Althouse, Fraser Gange and Miss Vreeland. They were crushed into so small a space, by the way, that they could hardly expand their chests! Mr. Koussevitsky has a most unique conception of the Ninth, beautifully wrought, but we have heard readings that pleased us more.

[illegible] sure [illegible] choice.

These are the fortunate days of Mr. Monteux as conductor. Five years ago he departed Boston and ever since has been doing odd jobs in Europe and America. Now he is to succeed Mengelberg, resigned, as permanent conductor of the Amsterdam Orchestra; while for two months each spring he will take over the Paris Symphony Orchestra. Not quite in vain did he win some reputation hereabouts.

There is no prospect of a visit to Boston next season from Mr. Toscanini and the New York Philharmonic Society. Though he is pledged to sixteen weeks with that orchestra, they will undertake scarcely any concerts in other cities. At sixty-two a conductor must spare himself.

At The Pops Tonight

Entrance of Guests into the Hall of Song from the Opera, "Tannhäuser." ..... Wagner
Minuet ..... Boccherini
Suite from the Opera, "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Overture, "Roman Carnival" ..... Berlioz
Tone-Poem, "Don Juan" ..... R. Strauss
Rhapsody, "Espana" ..... Chabrier
Hungarian Dance, No. 1 ..... Brahms
Intermezzo from the Opera, "Cavalleria Rusticana" ..... Mascagni
Slavic March ..... Chaikovsky

Conductor: A. Casella

160

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

APR 27

...over March, 1928.

What Music Lovers Love

What do patrons of symphony concerts desire for a musical program? Conductors of such orchestras would like information on this point and a recent poll of Boston Symphony subscribers offers it. This poll shows that ultra-modern works do not have the appeal that conductors wish they had. For instance, Honegger's "Locomotive" suite, which is a last word in modern music, received only 25 votes, while Beethoven received 129. Stravegsky's novel compositions received only 82 votes, and compositions of Richard Wagner came out strong with 321 votes.

The poll shows that there is an inclination to favor standbys because of their familiarity, and sometimes because of a certain sentimental attraction. People may be disposed, even in music, to appreciate most the things which they know something about, instead of wishing to extend their knowledge, although they do not know thoroughly their own favorite composers and would benefit from hearing seldom played works by those composers.

There is this much to be said for the ultra-modern composers, who were given scant consideration in the poll. Their time may come, as Wagner's time has come, and as Moussorgsky's and Tschaikowsky's time has come. The absolute disgust and antagonism which Wagner's first musical offerings received is remembered even today, but now no symphony orchestra goes through a season without representing Wagner generously on the programs. Tschaikowsky was considered a little too feverish for the concert stage, but he, too, has come into his own on symphony programs. Moussorgsky had concert patrons doubting and suspicious, but today his work is listened to with interest. There are several other composers whose works were greeted coldly at first as too novel and strange, but which are appreciated today. So the ultra-modern in music is likely to become the modern in another period and in time rank as an "old standby."

Meanwhile symphony orchestra conductors have the task of educating their patrons to modern and ultra-modern music, while they are also heeding their demand for "standbys."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York American

* * *

Every notable band and orchestra, classified as symphony, concert and jazz, has now been heard on the loud speakers with the possible exception of the Boston Symphony, and our Boston operatives (how we love that word!) are looking up the record for the sake of accuracy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. JOSEPH, MO.
NEWS PRESS

APR 29 1929

SAYS MINNEAPOLIS SYMPHONY EXCELS BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Pittsburgs Critic Praises the Musical Organization Coming Here.

ACCLAIM VERBRUGGHEN ON THE PACIFIC COAST

Famous Conductor to Take Part in Local Spring Music Festival.

St. Joseph has heard the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra so often that the city almost feels a sense of possession in regard to the organization. For this very reason it may not realize how great an assemblage of musicians it represents, nor how lofty is its standing in the most critical Eastern musical circles. The orchestra will play here the last two days of the Spring Music Festival, this week. The festival will be Wednesday, Thursday and Friday.

In Pittsburgh, The Gazette-Times said that the standard of performance of this symphony was the highest attained in their musical season, not even excepting the Boston Orchestra. The New York American attributed to the orchestra "technical brilliancy, finish of style, rhythmic accurancy and finely adjusted tone and dynamics," also "freedom and fire, intensel- exhiliarating in effect."

Honors for Verbrugghen

On the Pacific Coast Verbrugghen, as

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
GAZETTE
Portland, Me.

APR 3 1929

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is to sail for Europe May 1 He will conduct performances of Musorgsky's 'Boris" at the Paris Opera in May, at which the usual version edited by Rimsky-Korsakoff will be used, and not the newly published original score. The 49th season of the Boston Symphony concerts, with Mr. Koussevitzky as conductor, will begin Oct. 11. Plans for celebrating the 50th anniversary of the orchestra in 1930 are already being considered. It will perhaps be possible for the orchestra's first conductor, Sir George Henschel, still active in London, as teacher of singing, to lead one of the pieces from the first program.

* * * *

A new organization, called The All Star Grand Opera Company, has been incorporated and promises a season at the Manhattan Opera House in New York in November. Feodor Chaliapin and Tita Ruffo are announced as principals.

* * * *

KOUSSEVITSKY ON HIS WAY TO EUROPE

MAY

Serge Koussevitsky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mrs. Koussevitsky and his secretary left Boston yesterday for New York, where they will embark today aboard the Cunarder Mauretania, bound for a summer in France.

Each year the symphony leader spends his summer in continental Europe, where he has been successful in discovering scores that he has brought out before his Boston public. This year he will look over many scores, and it is believed will have a number worth while for presentation at Symphony Hall during the fall and winter concerts of this famous orchestra.

TRANS. MAY 2

The Evergreen Pops Season Forty-Four

Old and New Pleasures from Conductor and Orchestra On Their Mettle

THERE WAS one change at least to note—new bulbs upon the electroliers that hang from the ceiling at Symphony Hall. The substituted glass tempers the glow to upturned eyes in the balconies; over the whole concert-room diffuses soft and even light. The vanished bulbs were a malignant fascination to more than one habitué of the galleries at The Pops. He fixed resolute eyes upon the orchestra, the program-sheet, the tables below; yet sooner or later back to those glaring electroliers they wandered. As for the floor, it was wont to discover that Jack, over there at the side-table, was ageing much faster than he should, while Jill, his wife, was obviously losing her skill with powder-puff and lipstick. The hard light was the source of these unamiable delusions. Now both are gone.

There were also favorable omens. On the floor not a table, in the balconies not a seat, was vacant. Downstairs, indeed, the first Pop of a new season was plainly regaining social cachet. There were figures to be pointed out; texts for gossip; plentiful dinner jackets; spring modes, not for street wear. Mr. Casella, looking as though an Atlantic voyage had freshened him, was warmly and familiarly welcomed. Twice the orchestra, on its feet, was target for friendly acclaim. Mr. Theodorowicz, concert-master again, made his bow after the solo-violin's measures in Handel's Largo. Every number on the program was honestly and heartily applauded. When the notice-board announced some favorite "extra," instant was the pleased response. The orchestra played on its mettle; while the conductor spared neither energy nor finesse. Throughout the hall, and to every piece, one listened, as the French say, and with reason. As for refreshments and such like, the young "scofflaws" from the university professed to be disappointed when they found no paragraph from the Jones Act at the head of the list. None the less, good Mother Willebrandt might have sat all evening in the hall and found no occasion for vigilance and authority. More: to hold the balance even, though one could reach for a cigarette, there were also sweets in plenty.

Mr. Casella does well when he tosses into a Pop program one or two Overtures to the elder Italian operas—last evening to Verdi's "Force of Destiny" and Rossini's "William Tell." An Italian conductor need not be a Toscanini to make rather more of them than his peers of other races. They run in his blood as they ran in the composer's. He can phrase and pace the "good tunes" when a single choir or a few instruments sing them, until they sound as warm and full as they do from voices across the theater, while he gives them unmistakably Italian and operatic accent.

Similarly with grand crescendi and other plunging tumults of sound. An Italian, like Mr. Casella, saves them from blatancy yet keeps them full-mouthed and upswelling. Adept musician as well, he opens up the happy details of which Verdi and Rossini, each as he grew older, was capable. The connoisseurs take note; the general ear is no less pleased. The conductor has, besides, a fortunate flare for rhythm and sonority. Set him to the Wedding Pageant from "The Golden Cockerel" or "The Ride of the Valkyrs," and both beat high and sting-ing, while musical sound floods the hall. Rhythm, sonority and "good tunes" are the pleasure of The Pops, by which token Mr. Casella's own "Italia" once more won all and sundry. The "good tunes" are good enough to carry Part One which is a music of aching moods; the rhythms and sonorities have their turn in Part Two, which is Naples sunlit, shouting and at play. Nobody, unless it is Strauss in his youthful "Out of Italy," has turned the trick better.

With the offsets Mr. Casella succeeded equally well. Out of a "Song Without Words," Chaikovsky emerged once more in his favorite part of sighing Slav; while for the Nth time, the state and swell of Handel's melody affirmed his Largo as deservedly popular classic. The conductor, however, does not stop there. Last evening he bade the audience to Sibelius's "Valse Triste"—melancholy flitter of dancing phantoms down the shadows of a haunted gallery—and it gave him attention and applause. He ventured also the orchestral version of Ravel's "Pavan for An Infanta Dead"—a conjuring music out of pale grave melody and low-beating rhythm. The vast palace-room is high-studded, tall-windowed, heavy-draped, bare here, over-laden there. It smells of splendor—in decay. Down it, the black-robed dames d'honneur weave the formal figures of their dance. Somewhere among the yellow candles a very little Princess is very dead. And on an "opening night" of The Pops, this Ravelian spell prevailed. . . . No, mon vieux monsieur, they are not as they once were. In these days they credit an audience with musical intelligence, imagination and a pardonable willingness to use both. H. T. P.

Dances at The Pops

Irma Duncan's Young Troupe to Be Seen There Next Week

BEING alive, The Pops find room for innovation. Occasionally singing voices diversify the orchestral programs. Next week, through all six evenings, it will be the turn of dancers to do as much. The troupe is the third generation, so to say, of Duncans. Isadora had her pupils and protegées. Not least of them was Irma. She succeeded to Isadora's school in Europe; there practised the youngsters whom she brought to New York last winter and will now bring to Symphony Hall. They dance—Irma often leading them—in the tradition of Isadora, but with the zest and glamour natural to their young years. They are eleven in all, with Irma for twelfth. On Monday, Wednesday and Friday, they will dance to music out of Schubert; on Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday to Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony."

At The Pops, the dancing will be managed in this fashion: After the first and the second part of a regular program, the stage will be cleared for Irma and her troupe. Below, in the space usually filled by two rows of tables, a small orchestra will be seated with Arthur Fiedler as conductor. These shifts made, half an hour of dancing will end the evening.

Revised for the Screen

One of the problems of the talkies is that of censorship. As it is impossible to cut out dialogue that is objected to without re-enacting the scene, the producers are not only careful, but sometimes super-cautious. A striking example of this was afforded recently in a presentation of some new "shorts" in Phototone's private theater. These were made in Berlin, and included the well-known negro "spiritual" with the refrain "Nobody knows what trouble I've seen; nobody knows but Jesus." Out of fear of the British censor, the last line nad been changed to "Nobody knows but father."
[London Morning Post

Concert-Chronicle
TRANS MAY 2
Incidents and Prospects

THERE are more ways than one to sell the tickets. . . . Last evening those that entered Symphony Hall by the doors on Huntington Avenue came face to face with a threefold screen—the broad middle leaf like a diagram of the parquet, the side-leaves like diagrams of each balcony. All three leaves were racked, a division for every seat. Each of these little pockets contained a ticket-like piece of pasteboard numbered and lettered. Choose among them, sign and return to the box-office, with a promise to pay in October, and whoever would had chosen his own seats for the course of six Sunday concerts next season, as upon the leaves also announced. Mr. Simpson of the box-office invented this pretty device for a public that is never sure that it has a free field and an open choice.

These are the fortunate days of Mr. Monteux as conductor. Five years ago he departed Boston and ever since has been doing odd jobs in Europe and America. Now he is to succeed Mengelberg, resigned, as permanent conductor of the Amsterdam Orchestra; while for two months each spring he will take over the Paris Symphony Orchestra. Not quite in vain did he win some reputation hereabouts.

There is no prospect of a visit to Boston next season from Mr. Toscanini and the New York Philharmonic Society. Though he is pledged to sixteen weeks with that orchestra, they will undertake scarcely any concerts in other cities. At sixty-two a conductor must spare himself.

At The Pops Tonight

Entrance of Guests into the Hall of Song from the Opera, "Tannhäuser," Wagner
Minuet ..... Boccherini
Suite from the Opera, "Carmen" ..Bizet
Overture, "Roman Carnival" ....Berlioz
Tone-Poem, "Don Juan" .....R. Strauss
Rhapsody, "Espana" .....Chabrier
Hungarian Dance, No. 1.....Brahms
Intermezzo from the Opera, "Cavalleria Rusticana" .....Mascagni
Slavic March .....Chaikovsky

Conductor: A. Casella

POPS PLAYERS SCORE IN FIRST CONCERT

MER By MOSES SMITH MAY 2

If you would have a wintry blast succumb to a spring zephyr ask the management of Symphony Hall to announce the opening of "Pops." Here is the real harbinger of Boston's spring, as the coincidence of last night's weather and the "Pops" opening concert attested. For this reason alone we are grateful for the renewal of this, Boston's unique institution. But there are other benefits, to detail which would be retelling an old story—the combination of good music, well played, with an atmosphere of cordiality, with the possibility of discreet conversation, and the drinking of equally discreet beverages while munching harmless pretzels. And—crowning glory! You may smoke.

Alfredo Casella

The concert of last night was like the usual "Pops" opening. Alfredo Casella, noted Italian musician, was once more at the conductor's desk. The large audience greeted him cordially, and applauded him and its players continually throughout the evening.

The program was divided between light or short numbers and longer or weightier pieces, approximately in the ratio of two to one.

The performance of this music was eminently satisfactory, with Casella to lead the way and most of the Symphony Orchestra to follow. Only a music reviewer on duty might object to Casella's fondness for rapid tempi or forcing his instruments, especially the brass. For reasonable people it was a "good time" without reservations.

The daily programs in the future will tend to follow the pattern of the first one, the middle group being reserved for the most substantial music. Tonight's list, for example, has a second part consisting of Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" overture, Strauss' "Don Juan" and Chabrier's "Espana." Tomorrow night the big number will be Respighi's "Fountains of Rome." Thus an opportunity will be afforded music lovers of hearing pretentious scores which are not played often even during the regular musical season.

MR. CASELLA AND SOME OTHERS AT OPENING OF POPS

CASELLA SCORES AT POP CONCERT

Leads Pleasing Program At Symphony Hall—Is Loudly Applauded

HUGE AUDIENCE AT ANNUAL OPENING

Last night Mr. Casella led off the first of this year's Pops with this program: Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or," Rimsky-Korsakov; Song Without Words, Tchaikovsky; Valse Triste, Sibelius; Overture to "La Forza del Destino," Verdi; Les Preludes, Liszt; Pavane Pour Une Infante Defunte, Ravel; Italia, rhapsody, Casella; Overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Largo, Handel; Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner.

In all Boston is there not one soul who would like to secure the permanent services of Mr. Casella, that gifted creature of rhythm and tune, as a city missionary in music's cause? For this his third season, Mr. Casella is doing true missionary work, and that is a solemn fact.

Look at last night's program. There was Mr. Casella with a program to plan for the pleasure of quite plain people—musically speaking, be it of course understood. He pleased them mightily, with the help of many a trusty old standby from Handel, Wagner, Rossini. Shrewdly Mr. Casella gave the people what they knew they were going to like, but Mr. Casella, shrewdly again, gave them as well, music he himself knew they would like, whatever their preliminary doubts to the contrary.

So, if you please, he offered a popular audience Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante Defunte"—and the audience had the air of liking it. Why not? Mr. Casella let its melody be heard, a very agreeable melody indeed when not obscured in dull performance. In the case of his own "Italia"—not precisely, on the whole, "popular" music—Mr. Casella, by stressing its melody and its rhythmic verve, made its discordancy fall so neatly into its proper subordinate place that it bothered nobody one atom; the piece drew loud acclaim. He did as well with "Les Preludes," popular music enough, but not always held to be Pop-like.

Thank God for a pioneer who is neither bigot nor pedant. Mr. Casella, giving his hearers what they want, constantly extends the range of their wants. But he recognizes they must have what they, the hearers, want, not what he may fancy himself. By never repelling them, therefore, with music void of melody easily grasped and well-marked rhythm, Mr. Casella is leading his public to the plane where they applaud—Ravel! So much for ability combined with common sense.

The people must like his choice of music, for the privilege remains theirs to take it or leave it. They take it: not an empty seat could be seen last night, upstairs or down, and applause rang loud.

R. R. G.

GALA OPENING AT THE POPS

Program of Favorites Is Pleasing to Large Audience

Alfredo Casella, conductor, and an orchestra of 80 symphony players opened the 44th season of the Pop concerts at Symphony hall last evening. For his opening concert, Mr. Casella chose a program of universal favorites, diverging from familiar paths only long enough to play for us Ravel's "Pavane Pour Une Infante Defunte," his own rhapsody, "Italia," which was introduced by him last year, and as an extra Moussorgsky's "Hopak."

It seems quite like greeting old friends to hear these melodies from Tchaikovsky, Verdi, Wagner, Handel and Rossini that send you away whistling. As presented to us by this group of musicians, however, these much abused expressions of some of the most eminent composers, achive their finest and happiest expression. In fact their sometimes palling familiarity, raised to such perfection of ensemble playing, inspires rather than wearies us.

Sibelius' haunting "Valse Triste" and Rimsky-Korsakov's wedding march from "Le Coq d'Or" with its stirring climaxes shared honors with Verdi and Tchaikovsky in the first group. The Ravel valse, which has had its place on concert programs this past winter, was well received, and the audience clapped lustily after Mr. Casella's "Italia," reminiscent of Funiculi-Funicula and other folk tunes.

Despite the fact that the refreshments are light and the drinks soft, the idea of the "Pops" is still a never-failing attraction. There is present a delightful informality, a spirit of camaraderie, smoking is permitted, except on Sunday evenings when those who prefer their music straight and more substantial will be able to listen without distraction.

Mr. Casella's appearance occasioned prolonged applause from a full house, and throughout the entire evening the audience evidenced its approval in no uncertain fashion. The concerts will continue with varying programs, every evening for several weeks.

CASELLA SCORES AT POP CONCERT

TRAVELER May 2nd

POPS PLAYERS SCORE IN FIRST CONCERT

AMER By MOSES SMITH MAY 2

If you would have a wintry blast succumb to a spring zephyr ask the management of Symphony Hall to announce the opening of "Pops." Here is the real harbinger of Boston's spring, as the coincidence of last night's weather and the "Pops" opening concert attested. For this reason alone we are grateful for the renewal of this, Boston's unique institution. But there are other benefits, to detail which would be retelling an old story—the combination of good music, well played, with an atmosphere of cordiality, with the possibility of discreet conversation, and the drinking of equally discreet beverages while munching harmless pretzels. And—crowning glory! You may smoke.

Alfredo Casella

The concert of last night was like the usual "Pops" opening. Alfredo Casella, noted Italian musician, was once more at the conductor's desk. The large audience greeted him cordially, and applauded him and its players continually throughout the evening.

The program was divided between light or short numbers and longer or weightier pieces, approximately in the ratio of two to one.

The performance of this music was eminently satisfactory, with Casella to lead the way and most of the Symphony Orchestra to follow. Only a music reviewer on duty might object to Casella's fondness for rapid tempi or forcing his instruments, especially the brass. For reasonable people it was a "good time" without reservations.

The daily programs in the future will tend to follow the pattern of the first one, the middle group being reserved for the most substantial music. Tonight's list, for example, has a second part consisting of Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" overture,, Strauss' "Don Juan" and Chabrier's "Espana." Tomorrow night the big number will be Respighi's "Fountains of Rome." Thus an opportunity will be afforded music lovers of hearing pretentious scores which are not played often even during the regular musical season.

MR. CASELLA AND SOME OTHERS AT OPENING OF POPS

CASELLA SCORES AT POP CONCERT

Leads Pleasing Program At Symphony Hall—Is Loudly Applauded

HUGE AUDIENCE AT ANNUAL OPENING

Last night Mr. Casella led off the first of this year's Pops with this program: Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or," Rimsky-Korsakov; Song Without Words, Tchaikovsky; Valse Triste, Sibelius; Overture to "La Forza del Destino," Verdi; Les Preludes, Liszt; Pavane Pour Une Infante Defunte, Ravel; Italia, rhapsody, Casella; Overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Largo, Handel; Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner.

In all Boston is there not one soul who would like to secure the permanent services of Mr. Casella, that gifted creature of rhythm and tune, as a city missionary in music's cause? For this his third season, Mr. Casella is doing true missionary work, and that is a solemn fact.

Look at last night's program. There was Mr. Casella with a program to plan for the pleasure of quite plain people—musically speaking, be it of course understood. He pleased them mightily, with the help of many a trusty old standby from Handel, Wagner, Rossini. Shrewdly Mr. Casella gave the people what they knew they were going to like, but Mr. Casella, shrewdly again, gave them as well, music he himself knew they would like, whatever their preliminary doubts to the contrary.

So, if you please, he offered a popular audience Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante Defunte"—and the audience had the air of liking it. Why not? Mr. Casella let its melody be heard, a very agreeable melody indeed when not obscured in dull performance. In the case of his own "Italia"—not precisely, on the whole, "popular" music—Mr. Casella, by stressing its melody and its rhythmic verve, made its discordancy fall so neatly into its proper subordinate place that it bothered nobody one atom; the piece drew loud acclaim. He did as well with "Les Preludes," popular music enough, but not always held to be Pop-like.

Thank God for a pioneer who is neither bigot nor pedant. Mr. Casella, giving his hearers what they want, constantly extends the range of their wants. But he recognizes they must have what they, the hearers, want, not what he may fancy himself. By never repelling them, therefore, with music void of melody easily grasped and well-marked rhythm, Mr. Casella is leading his public to the plane where they applaud—Ravel! So much for ability combined with common sense.

The people must like his choice of music, for the privilege remains theirs to take it or leave it. They take it: not an empty seat could be seen last night, upstairs or down, and applause rang loud.

R. R. G.

GALA OPENING AT THE POPS

Program of Favorites Is Pleasing to Large Audience

Alfredo Casella, conductor, and an orchestra of 80 symphony players opened the 44th season of the Pop concerts at Symphony hall last evening. For his opening concert, Mr. Casella chose a program of universal favorites, diverging from familiar paths only long enough to play for us Ravel's "Pavane Pour Une Infante Defunte," his own rhapsody, "Italia," which was introduced by him last year, and as an extra Moussorgsky's "Hopak."

It seems quite like greeting old friends to hear these melodies from Tchaikovsky, Verdi, Wagner, Handel and Rossini that send you away whistling. As presented to us by this group of musicians, however, these much abused expressions of some of the most eminent composers, achive their finest and happiest expression. In fact their sometimes palling familiarity, raised to such perfection of ensemble playing, inspires rather than wearies us.

Sibelius' haunting "Valse Triste" and Rimsky-Korsakov's wedding march from "Le Coq d'Or" with its stirring climaxes shared honors with Verdi and Tchaikovsky in the first group. The Ravel valse, which has had its place on concert programs this past winter, was well received, and the audience clapped lustily after Mr. Casella's "Italia," reminiscent of Funiculi-Funicula and other folk tunes.

Despite the fact that the refreshments are light and the drinks soft, the idea of the "Pops" is still a never-failing attraction. There is present a delightful informality, a spirit of camaraderie, smoking is permitted, except on Sunday evenings when those who prefer their music straight and more substantial will be able to listen without distraction.

Mr. Casella's appearance occasioned prolonged applause from a full house, and throughout the entire evening the audience evidenced its approval in no uncertain fashion. The concerts will continue with varying programs, every evening for several weeks.

CASELLA SCORES AT POP CONCERT

TRAVELER May 2nd

POPS OPEN WITH HALL CROWDED

Audience Listens With Rapt Attention to Music

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Normally the Pops begin on the first Monday following the close of the symphony season, but normally that Monday falls in the month of May, and since Pop concerts in April are apparently unthinkable, the present and forty-fourth season of Pops had its inaugural concert at Symphony Hall last evening. As in the previous two seasons an orchestra of some 80 players performed under the direction of Alfredo Casella.

THERE TO LISTEN

For some time past the emphasis at the Pop concerts has been shifting from the "pop" to the concert. Mr. Jacchia began that change; Mr. Casella has now completed it. There was a large audience last evening; no available place was left unfilled whether in the balcony seats or at the tables on the floor where refreshments, liquid and solid, might be had by those who desired them. But—and here is the significant thing—these soft drinks and light edibles were virtually ignored while the music was in progress

Between numbers and in the two intermissions those at the tables drank, munched, smoked and chatted, but while the orchestra played almost to a man—and woman—this company listened with rapt attention. In the more hushed moments, and there were many of them, the proverbial pin might have been heard to fall. And when a solitary waitress dared to cross the hall to receive or deliver an order, it seemed an intrusion.

Appear to Like Change

It has been urged by some that the changes here described have robbed the Pops of what was to some their chief appeal, but by every evidence of last evening those who now attend the Pops like them as they are. The rapt listening above described was surely wholly voluntary and spontaneous; this company had come to hear the Symphony orchestra under a conductor and musician of world renown in a programme that combined judiciously the reasonably light and the reasonably serious. Last evening at least the extremes of frivolity and of gravity were alike ignored.

On this opening programme were these pieces that might have place in a Symphony Concert: The Wedding March from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Le Coq d 'Or," Sibelius' "Valse Triste," Liszt's "Les Preludes," Mr. Casella's own brilliant rhapsody "Italia" and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries." And since Mr. Toscanini lately conducted it in New York, Rossini's Overture to "William Tell" may be here included. For transcriptions of piano pieces, always staple fare at the Pops, there were Tchaikovsky's "Song without Words" and the more esoteric "Pavanne for a Dead Infanta" of Ravel. Handel's Largo, another transcription perennially favored, and Verdi's Overture to "The Force of Destiny," the latter played last evening with singular effectiveness, completed the list, exclusive of extras.

Rehearsals for the Pop concerts are of necessity limited. Mr. Casella may not work out in detail each piece to be played at the six or seven concerts of the week. The wonder is that under such conditions the standard of performance at the Pop concerts under his direction is as high as it is. For this standard is far nearer that of the Symphony concerts proper than of the Pops as these were formerly understood.

Last evening, save in a few moments so isolated and so negligible as to warrant no comment, the orchestra played as it has played all the year under Mr. Koussevitzky, as a band of virtuosi. In particular the performance of Mr. Casella's own Rhapsody, which brought the composer-conductor the customary ovation, was one of notable excellence. And in conclusion let it once more be suggested that those who lately have been exercised over the problem of bringing the Symphony Orchestra to a wider public may well take thought of the fact that now at Symphony Hall for several weeks to come the Symphony Orchestra may be heard every evening under a distinguished leader, and at prices that go as low as 50 cents.

MAY 2

THE BOSTON GLOB

FIRST POP CONCERT AT SYMPHONY HALL

Alfredo Casella Leads Orchestra of 80

Capacity Audience Applauds Program of Light Music

The first Pop concert of the 44th season attracted a large audience to Symphony Hall last night. Alfredo Casella, returning for his third season as conductor, was warmly welcomed. He shared the applause that greeted a well-played program of light music with his orchestra of 80 symphony players.

The floor of the hall, with the rows of seats replaced by tables at which one can sit and smoke and be served with things to eat and drink, presented a familiar and unique Bostonian spectacle. No other American city has a musical institution comparable to the Pops.

Cynics who said it was the beer and wines and not the music that drew the crowd to the Pops have been confuted by the continued and increased popularity of the concerts since prohibition forced the substitution of non-alcoholic drinks on the menu. The only a change is that the present-day audience pays much closer attention to the music, listening silently to every number and talking only in the intermissions.

The music is better worth listening to than it used to be. Mr Casella is a musician with a world-wide reputation as composer, conductor, and pianist. His programs include many of the old favorites, such as Handel's "Largo," Rossini's "William Tell" overture, and Sibelius' "Valse Triste" last night. But he has added to the repertory a number of attractive light and semiserious pieces, such as the march from Rimsky Korsakov's "Le coq d'or" and Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infants defunte" last night. The orchestra is larger and the standard of performance far higher than in the old days.

It is astonishing how well the Pops orchestra plays night after night, considering the very limited opportunities for rehearsal. The musicians, of course, are far more likely to give of their best to a noted conductor than to one of their own number as was customary in the days when the Pops were conducted by a member of the orchestra.

Mr Casella's musical sympathies are broad, including such very diverse things as Liszt's "Les Preludes," of which he gave a brilliant interpretation last night; the overture to Verdi's "Forza del Destino"; Musorgsky's "Hopak," played as an encore; as well as the modern composers among whom he must himself be numbered, as his "Italia," a feature of the program, again proved. This rhapsody on popular tunes was a favorite with Pops audiences long before its composer came to Boston. It is an early and perhaps not wholly characteristic, but brilliantly successful work.

The program contained several announcements about special nights to come, including the first of the Sunday night Pops, which will be given every other week during the season, beginning May 12; and Harvard Night, open, however, to the public, May 13, at which the Harvard Glee Club will appear.

Next week will bring an interesting innovation. The Isadora Duncan Dancers, directed by Irma Duncan, a pupil of the great dancer now dead, are to appear as an extra feature at each Pop concert from Monday, May 6, through Saturday, May 11. These dancers, trained in the school established by Isadora Duncan at Moscow in 1920, came to America this past Winter, and have made a great success in New York, winning warm praise from the reviewers, and drawing many large audiences. P. R.

TRANS MAY 4

At The Pops Tonight

Wedding March from the Incidental Music to Shakspeare's Comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ..... Mendelssohn

Invitation to The Dance..... Weber
(Scored for Orchestra by Berlioz)

Overture to The Opera, "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner

Overture, "Leonora," No. 3...Beethoven

Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished" ..... Schubert

Overture to The Opera, "Cinderella" ..... Rossini

Slavonic Dance..... Dvorák

Overture, "The Year 1812"..Chaikovsky

Conductor: A. Casella

Pops More Popular Than Ever; Same Varied Color Prevails

Carefree Atmosphere Pervades Symphony Hall Nightly

PRE-VOLSTEAD DAYS WERE NOT BRIGHTER

HERALD MAY 3

By MICHAEL SHEA

A tall professional looking man, dressed in black and sporting an artist's tie, is among the first arrivals at his table on the main floor. Prominent in the medical profession, he is one of Boston's many music lovers.

Now all eyes gaze on a stately gray-haired woman as she follows the usher to her table, where she is joined by her grown grandchildren, who pour over the program to ask her about the different selections.

A group of college boys saunter in. And here are the modern college girls. Crowds from every section of the city and the suburbs flow through the several doors as if swept on a flood tide. Ten minutes more and the galleries are crowded. Many familiar faces are seen. Many of the habitues seem younger, and every one is carefree.

The first floor is buzzing with conversation. Circles of smoke float into the air. Men borrow cigarettes from their fair companions, having forgotten their own in the last minute rush. Every seat is filled and the 2600 men, women and not a few children gathered in the immense hall present a picture of joyous abandon.

TRIBUTE TO CONDUCTOR

Now a deep hush; 85 musicians, selected from abroad and this country, are seated and then a tremendous outburst of applause sweeps above the audience. It is a tribute, an ovation, for Alfredo Casella, the conductor, who has emerged from the wings to the platform to direct another night's program of the Symphony Hall Pops now in the 44th season.

It seems that the Pops are more popular than ever. On the first night 2600 persons stormed the hall and all obtained seats through the efficient management of Manager William H. Brennan, Assistant-Manager George E. Judd, Treasurer Arthur W. Wiggin and not to overlook the efficient associates, Gordon B. Simpson, Charles A. McCarthy, John D. O'Leary and the personnel of the hall.

Again the second night of this season attracted another equally as large a gathering and the picturesque complex of humanity—always with new faces—will be on hand every night of the 58 concerts. Something like 125,000 persons will hear the Pops this season, which is expected to make a new record for attendance, judging from the enthusiasm of the crowds present the first few evenings.

ALFREDO CASELLA

What a contrast the 44th year makes with the days when prohibition was not a law?

Drinks were served in plenty in the old days to the happy throngs that gathered around the tables and the spirit of hilarity reigned supreme at some of the tables as pop after pop sounded in discord from sparkling bottles. No matter how marvelous were the rhythm and melody, many were oblivious to the Pope until the glasses were raised to the toast, "until we meet again."

Then the prohibition amendment was passed. Mighty fears for the future of the Pops were raised. "Will the Pops survive?" "What will music be without cocktail, wine and beer and all the rest?"

SERVED AT TABLES

Dire predictions were made for the fate of the Pops until they appeared in their first prohibition debut season. The tables were there just like the other days. The crowds came and many were on hand the first night of the prohibition debut expecting it to be the death knell of the famed musical institution. That was a memorable night just 10 years ago. Though wines and beer were missing the audiences were soon won to the music.

Soft drinks and refreshments are now served at the same tables. An informal atmosphere permeates the audience and should anyone overlook going to The Pops during a season at least once or more, music circles raise their eyebrows in astonishment.

DANCERS FOR AMER. POPS BILL

MAY 4

The Isadora Duncan Dancers of Moscow are to come to Boston where the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall will break all precedents by receiving them each night of the coming week. They will appear in the third section of each Pop program the orchestra accompanying them, under Arthur Fielder's direction.

Isadora Duncan founded this school in Moscow in 1920, leaving it to the direction of Irma Duncan, her adopted daughter. On Monday, Wednesday and Friday, they will present an all-Schubert program. On Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday, they will give their famous interpretation of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

Features of the week will be Casella's "Italia" on Thursday; Respighi's "Pines of Rome" on Friday; and an all Wagner program at the first Sunday night Pop concert, on May 12.

Alfredo Casella will complete the first week of the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall tonight with the following program of special musical interest and popular appeal:

Wedding March, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ..... Mendelssohn
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz
Overture to "Tannhauser" .....Wagner
Overture to "Leonore" No. 3....Beethoven
Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished" ..... Schubert
Overture to "Cinderella".....Rossini
Slavonic Dance .....Dvorak
Overture Solennelle, "1912" ..Tchaikovsky

MAY 4

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDA

The Listener

THE Symphony Orchestra's forty-fourth annual series of concerts went out a week ago tonight to the triumphant strains of the Tchaikowski No. 5's finale. The concluding concert of the season was indeed all a triumph, and in particular one for Mr. Koussevitzky. When did a Boston Symphony audience ever shout so lustily as it did last Saturday night? Mr. Koussevitzky was kept at his stiff bowing until one almost feared that his back would break. But he never smiled. Does he ever smile? He is a severe conductor. Members of the orchestra, to their intimates—and even a member of the Symphony Orchestra has his intimates—sometimes tell of terrible denunciations at rehearsals carried on in explosions of simultaneous French, German and English; but last Saturday night the acclaim which Mr. Koussevitzky received from his players was unanimous and hearty. Which shows that all such denunciations and severities are attributable purely to artistic zeal and integrity. The present conductor of the Symphony Orchestra is a rather queer man. Of stern, grave and absolutely "set" public habit—he walks upon the stage always in the same manner, bows solemnly with that exact stiff bend, never relaxes his Jovian aspect,—but for all that he is the most distinctly sentimental producer of music that we have ever had. With an open mind as regards composers, his exclusions are nevertheless adamantine. And he looks cold, but his music is warm!

MAY 4, BOSTON TRAVELER.

To Dance at the Pops

Two of the Isadora Duncan dancers who are to hold special performances in conjunction with the Pop concerts are shown above. The skill of these dancers who come to Symphony hall through a special arrangement is well known to music lovers.

Duncan Dancers to MON. Appear at the Pops

For the first time in the history of the Symphony Hall Pop concerts, dancers will occupy a place on the programs next week, when the Isadora Duncan Dancers of Moscow will appear each evening. The Pops orchestra, directed by Arthur Fiedler, will accompany them. On Monday, Wednesday and Friday evenings, they will present an all-Schubert program, consisting of the "Ave Maria," Andante from the Seventh Symphony, five waltzes, "Moment Musicale" and Marche Militaire. On Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday they will give their interpretation of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony. Alfredo Casella will conduct the purely orchestral part of each program, with the exception of Tuesday night, when Arthur Fiedler will conduct. On this night the Pops conductor will go to Philadelphia to direct his own $3000 prize-winning score. Features of the second week will be Casella's "Italia" on Thursday; Respighi's "Pines of Rome" on Friday, and an all Wagner program at the first Sunday night Pop concert on May 12.

16 162

POPS OPEN WITH HALL CROWDED

Audience Listens With Rapt Attention to Music

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Normally the Pops begin on the first Monday following the close of the symphony season, but normally that Monday falls in the month of May, and since Pop concerts in April are apparently unthinkable, the present and forty-fourth season of Pops had its inaugural concert at Symphony Hall last evening. As in the previous two seasons an orchestra of some 80 players performed under the direction of Alfredo Casella.

THERE TO LISTEN

For some time past the emphasis at the Pop concerts has been shifting from the "pop" to the concert. Mr. Jacchia began that change; Mr. Casella has now completed it. There was a large audience last evening; no available place was left unfilled whether in the balcony seats or at the tables on the floor where refreshments, liquid and solid, might be had by those who desired them. But—and here is the significant thing—these soft drinks and light edibles were virtually ignored while the music was in progress

Between numbers and in the two intermissions those at the tables drank, munched, smoked and chatted, but while the orchestra played almost to a man—and woman—this company listened with rapt attention. In the more hushed moments, and there were many of them, the proverbial pin might have been heard to fall. And when a solitary waitress dared to cross the hall to receive or deliver an order, it seemed an intrusion.

Appear to Like Change

It has been urged by some that the changes here described have robbed the Pops of what was to some their chief appeal, but by every evidence of last evening those who now attend the Pops like them as they are. The rapt listening above described was surely wholly voluntary and spontaneous; this company had come to hear the Symphony orchestra under a conductor and musician of world renown in a programme that combined judiciously the reasonably light and the reasonably serious. Last evening at least the extremes of frivolity and of gravity were alike ignored.

On this opening programme were these pieces that might have place in a Symphony Concert: The Wedding March from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Le Coq d 'Or," Sibelius' "Valse Triste," Liszt's "Les Preludes," Mr. Casella's own brilliant rhapsody "Italia" and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries." And since Mr. Toscanini lately conducted it in New York, Rossini's Overture to "William Tell" may be here included. For transcriptions of piano pieces, always staple fare at the Pops, there were Tchaikovsky's "Song without Words" and the more esoteric "Pavanne for a Dead Infanta" of Ravel. Handel's Largo, another transcription perennially favored, and Verdi's Overture to "The Force of Destiny," the latter played last evening with singular effectiveness, completed the list, exclusive of extras.

Rehearsals for the Pop concerts are of necessity limited. Mr. Casella may not work out in detail each piece to be played at the six or seven concerts of the week. The wonder is that under such conditions the standard of performance at the Pop concerts under his direction is as high as it is. For this standard is far nearer that of the Symphony concerts proper than of the Pops as these were formerly understood.

Last evening, save in a few moments so isolated and so negligible as to warrant no comment, the orchestra played as it has played all the year under Mr. Koussevitzky, as a band of virtuosi. In particular the performance of Mr. Casella's own Rhapsody, which brought the composer-conductor the customary ovation, was one of notable excellence. And in conclusion let it once more be suggested that those who lately have been exercised over the problem of bringing the Symphony Orchestra to a wider public may well take thought of the fact that now at Symphony Hall for several weeks to come the Symphony Orchestra may be heard every evening under a distinguished leader, and at prices that go as low as 50 cents.

MAY 2

THE BOSTON GLOB

FIRST POP CONCERT AT SYMPHONY HALL

Alfredo Casella Leads Orchestra of 80

Capacity Audience Applauds Program of Light Music

The first Pop concert of the 44th season attracted a large audience to Symphony Hall last night. Alfredo Casella, returning for his third season as conductor, was warmly welcomed. He shared the applause that greeted a well-played program of light music with his orchestra of 80 symphony players.

The floor of the hall, with the rows of seats replaced by tables at which one can sit and smoke and be served with things to eat and drink, presented a familiar and unique Bostonian spectacle. No other American city has a musical institution comparable to the Pops.

Cynics who said it was the beer and wines and not the music that drew the crowd to the Pops have been confuted by the continued and increased popularity of the concerts since prohibition forced the substitution of non-alcoholic drinks on the menu. The only a change is that the present-day audience pays much closer attention to the music, listening silently to every number and talking only in the intermissions.

The music is better worth listening to than it used to be. Mr Casella is a musician with a world-wide reputation as composer, conductor, and pianist. His programs include many of the old favorites, such as Handel's "Largo," Rossini's "William Tell" overture, and Sibelius' "Valse Triste" last night. But he has added to the repertory a number of attractive light and semiserious pieces, such as the march from Rimsky Korsakov's "Le coq d'or" and Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infants defunte" last night. The orchestra is larger and the standard of performance far higher than in the old days.

It is astonishing how well the Pops orchestra plays night after night, considering the very limited opportunities for rehearsal. The musicians, of course, are far more likely to give of their best to a noted conductor than to one of their own number as was customary in the days when the Pops were conducted by a member of the orchestra.

Mr Casella's musical sympathies are broad, including such very diverse things as Liszt's "Les Preludes," of which he gave a brilliant interpretation last night; the overture to Verdi's "Forza del Destino"; Musorgsky's "Hopak," played as an encore; as well as the modern composers among whom he must himself be numbered, as his "Italia," a feature of the program, again proved. This rhapsody on popular tunes was a favorite with Pops audiences long before its composer came to Boston. It is an early and perhaps not wholly characteristic, but brilliantly successful work.

The program contained several announcements about special nights to come, including the first of the Sunday night Pops, which will be given every other week during the season, beginning May 12; and Harvard Night, open, however, to the public, May 13, at which the Harvard Glee Club will appear.

Next week will bring an interesting innovation. The Isadora Duncan Dancers, directed by Irma Duncan, a pupil of the great dancer now dead, are to appear as an extra feature at each Pop concert from Monday, May 6, through Saturday, May 11. These dancers, trained in the school established by Isadora Duncan at Moscow in 1920, came to America this past Winter, and have made a great success in New York, winning warm praise from the reviewers, and drawing many large audiences. P. R.

TRANS MAY 4

At The Pops Tonight

Wedding March from the Incidental Music to Shakspeare's Comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream ..... Mendelssohn

Invitation to The Dance..... Weber
(Scored for Orchestra by Berlioz)

Overture to The Opera, "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner

Overture, "Leonora," No. 3...Beethoven

Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished" ..... Schubert

Overture to The Opera, "Cinderella" ..... Rossini

Slavonic Dance..... Dvorák

Overture, "The Year 1812"..Chaikovsky

Conductor: A. Casella

Pops More Popular Than Ever; Same Varied Color Prevails

Carefree Atmosphere Pervades Symphony Hall Nightly

PRE-VOLSTEAD DAYS WERE NOT BRIGHTER

HERALD MAY 3

By MICHAEL SHEA

A tall professional looking man, dressed in black and sporting an artist's tie, is among the first arrivals at his table on the main floor. Prominent in the medical profession, he is one of Boston's many music lovers.

Now all eyes gaze on a stately gray-haired woman as she follows the usher to her table, where she is joined by her grown grandchildren, who pour over the program to ask her about the different selections.

A group of college boys saunter in. And here are the modern college girls. Crowds from every section of the city and the suburbs flow through the several doors as if swept on a flood tide. Ten minutes more and the galleries are crowded. Many familiar faces are seen. Many of the habitues seem younger, and every one is carefree.

The first floor is buzzing with conversation. Circles of smoke float into the air. Men borrow cigarettes from their fair companions, having forgotten their own in the last minute rush. Every seat is filled and the 2600 men, women and not a few children gathered in the immense hall present a picture of joyous abandon.

TRIBUTE TO CONDUCTOR

Now a deep hush; 85 musicians, selected from abroad and this country, are seated and then a tremendous outburst of applause sweeps above the audience. It is a tribute, an ovation, for Alfredo Casella, the conductor, who has emerged from the wings to the platform to direct another night's program of the Symphony Hall Pops now in the 44th season.

It seems that the Pops are more popular than ever. On the first night 2600 persons stormed the hall and all obtained seats through the efficient management of Manager William H. Brennan, Assistant-Manager George E. Judd, Treasurer Arthur W. Wiggin and not to overlook the efficient associates, Gordon B. Simpson, Charles A. McCarthy, John D. O'Leary and the personnel of the hall.

Again the second night of this season attracted another equally as large a gathering and the picturesque complex of humanity—always with new faces—will be on hand every night of the 58 concerts. Something like 125,000 persons will hear the Pops this season, which is expected to make a new record for attendance, judging from the enthusiasm of the crowds present the first few evenings.

ALFREDO CASELLA

What a contrast the 44th year makes with the days when prohibition was not a law?

Drinks were served in plenty in the old days to the happy throngs that gathered around the tables and the spirit of hilarity reigned supreme at some of the tables as pop after pop sounded in discord from sparkling bottles. No matter how marvelous were the rhythm and melody, many were oblivious to the Pope until the glasses were raised to the toast, "until we meet again."

Then the prohibition amendment was passed. Mighty fears for the future of the Pops were raised. "Will the Pops survive?" "What will music be without cocktail, wine and beer and all the rest?"

SERVED AT TABLES

Dire predictions were made for the fate of the Pops until they appeared in their first prohibition debut season. The tables were there just like the other days. The crowds came and many were on hand the first night of the prohibition debut expecting it to be the death knell of the famed musical institution. That was a memorable night just 10 years ago. Though wines and beer were missing the audiences were soon won to the music.

Soft drinks and refreshments are now served at the same tables. An informal atmosphere permeates the audience and should anyone overlook going to The Pops during a season at least once or more, music circles raise their eyebrows in astonishment.

MAY 4, BOSTON TRAVELER.

To Dance at the Pops

Two of the Isadora Duncan dancers who are to hold special performances in conjunction with the Pop concerts are shown above. The skill of these dancers who come to Symphony hall through a special arrangement is well known to music lovers.

DANCERS FOR POPS BILL

AMER. MAY 4

The Isadora Duncan Dancers of Moscow are to come to Boston where the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall will break all precedents by receiving them each night of the coming week. They will appear in the third section of each Pop program the orchestra accompanying them, under Arthur Fielder's direction.

Isadora Duncan founded this school in Moscow in 1920, leaving it to the direction of Irma Duncan, her adopted daughter. On Monday, Wednesday and Friday, they will present an all-Schubert program. On Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday, they will give their famous interpretation of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

Features of the week will be Casella's "Italia" on Thursday; Respighi's "Pines of Rome" on Friday; and an all Wagner program at the first Sunday night Pop concert, on May 12.

Alfredo Casella will complete the first week of the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall tonight with the following program of special musical interest and popular appeal:

Wedding March, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ..... Mendelssohn
Invitation to the Dance..... Weber-Berlioz
Overture to "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Overture to "Leonore" No. 3....Beethoven
Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished" ..... Schubert
Overture to "Cinderella"..... Rossini
Slavonic Dance ..... Dvorak
Overture Solennelle, "1912" ..Tchaikovsky

MAY 4

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDA

The Listener

THE Symphony Orchestra's forty-fourth annual series of concerts went out a week ago tonight to the triumphant strains of the Tchaikowski No. 5's finale. The concluding concert of the season was indeed all a triumph, and in particular one for Mr. Koussevitzky. When did a Boston Symphony audience ever shout so lustily as it did last Saturday night? Mr. Koussevitzky was kept at his stiff bowing until one almost feared that his back would break. But he never smiled. Does he ever smile? He is a severe conductor. Members of the orchestra, to their intimates—and even a member of the Symphony Orchestra has his intimates—sometimes tell of terrible denunciations at rehearsals carried on in explosions of simultaneous French, German and English; but last Saturday night the acclaim which Mr. Koussevitzky received from his players was unanimous and hearty. Which shows that all such denunciations and severities are attributable purely to artistic zeal and integrity. The present conductor of the Symphony Orchestra is a rather queer man. Of stern, grave and absolutely "set" public habit—he walks upon the stage always in the same manner, bows solemnly with that exact stiff bend, never relaxes his Jovian aspect,—but for all that he is the most distinctly sentimental producer of music that we have ever had. With an open mind as regards composers, his exclusions are nevertheless adamantine. And he looks cold, but his music is warm!

Duncan Dancers to Appear at the Pops

MON.

For the first time in the history of the Symphony Hall Pop concerts, dancers will occupy a place on the programs next week, when the Isadora Duncan Dancers of Moscow will appear each evening. The Pops orchestra, directed by Arthur Fiedler, will accompany them. On Monday, Wednesday and Friday evenings, they will present an all-Schubert program, consisting of the "Ave Maria," Andante from the Seventh Symphony, five waltzes, "Moment Musicale" and Marche Militaire. On Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday they will give their interpretation of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony. Alfredo Casella will conduct the purely orchestral part of each program, with the exception of Tuesday night, when Arthur Fiedler will conduct. On this night the Pops conductor will go to Philadelphia to direct his own $3000 prize-winning score. Features of the second week will be Casella's "Italia" on Thursday; Respighi's "Pines of Rome" on Friday, and an all Wagner program at the first Sunday night Pop concert on May 12.

CONCERTS AND

HERALD MAY 5

DUNCAN DANCERS AT POPS

There will be a real innovation at the Pop concerts in their second week, which opens tomorrow with the appearance of the Isadora Duncan dancers each night of the week. This will be the first visit to Boston of the remarkable group of dancers who came over from Russia last winter and made in New York a sensation in a season rich with visiting dancers. Isadora Duncan established this school in Moscow in 1920, and left it in the care of Irma Duncan, one of her adopted daughters and herself a dancer of note. Irma Duncan brought her dancers to New York in December, and gave a festival of 12 performances in memory of Isadora, whose art they are perpetuating. From then until now Broadway has been crowding to the performances of Irma Duncan and her Russian group.

The Isadora Duncan dancers will appear each night after the second intermission, when the stage will be cleared and an orchestra in front of it, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, will accompany them. On Monday, Wednesday and Friday they will present an all-Schubert program, consisting of the Ave Maria, andante from the Seventh Symphony, five waltzes, moment musicale and marche militaire. On Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday they will give their famous interpretation of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony.

Alfredo Casella will conduct the purely orchestral part of each program, with the exception of Tuesday night, when Arthur Fiedler will conduct. On this night Mr. Casella will go to Philadelphia to conduct, by special invitation, his own $3000 prize winning score.

Next Sunday, May 12, will bring the first Sunday night Pop concert, with an all-Wagner program.

The programs of the week follow:

MONDAY, MAY 6.
Overture to "Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai
Minuet ..... Bolzoni
Rumanian Rhapsody ..... Enesco
Overture to "Gwendoline" ..... Chabrier
Danse Macabre, symphonic poem..Saint-Saens
Overture to "Rienzi" ..... Wagner
The Isadora Duncan Dancers
(All Schubert program)

TUESDAY, MAY 7.
Marche Slave ..... Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Sakuntala" ..... Goldmark
Fantasia, "Aida" ..... Verdi
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
Waltz, "Voices of Spring" ..... Strauss
First Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Listz
The Isadora Duncan Dancers
(Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony)

WEDNESDAY, MAY 8.
French Military March ..... Salt-Saens
Suite from "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Overture to "La Forza del Destino" ..... Verdi
Overture, "The Roman Carnival" ..... Berlioz
Largo from the "New World" spmphony. Dvorak
Polovtsian dances from "Prince Igor," Dorodin
The Isadora Duncan Dancers
(All Shubert program)

TUESDAY, MAY 9
March from "Aida" ..... Verdi
Prelude to act III, "Traviata" ..... Verdi
Overture to "La Forza del Destino" ..... Verdi
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg" ..... Wagner
Air for string orchestra ..... Bach
"Italia," rhapsody ..... Casella
The Isadora Duncan Dancers
(Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony)

FRIDAY, MAY 10.
Coronation march from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer
Suite from "L'Arlesienne" No. 1 ..... Bizet
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Introduction to act III "Lohengrin" ..Wagner
Pavane pour une Infante Defunte .... Raval
"Pines of Rome," symphonic poem ..Respighi
The Isadora Duncan Dancers
(All Shubert program)

SATURDAY, MAY 11.
Pomp and Circumstance ..... Elgar
Ave Maria ..... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Ballet suite, "Nutcracker" ..... Tchaikovsky
Dance of the Hours, "La Gioconda." Ponchielli
Overture to "Nebuchadnezzar" ..... Verdi
Bacchanale, "Tannhaeuser" ..... Wagner
Capriccio Italian ..... Tchaikovsky
The Isadora Duncan Dancers
(Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony)

SUNDAY, MAY 12.
(All Wagner Program)
Tannhaeuser, entrance of the guests into the Wartsburg.
A Siegfried Idyll.
Tristan and Isolde, prelude and love-death.
Tannahaeuser, overture.
The Mastersingers of Nuremburg, prelude.
Lohengrin, prelude and introduction to act III.
Parsifal, Good Friday spell.
The Valkyrie, ride of the Valkyries.

Duncan Girls At the Pops-- Music Notes

POST MAY 5

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The presence of the Isadora Duncan Dancers on the stage of Symphony Hall at each of next week's Pop Concerts will be both innovation and the chief interest of the programmes of the week, although there will also be undanced musical fare in good measure. These dancers were trained by Irma Duncan, adopted daughter, as the announcement states, of the famous Isadora herself, and as a troupe they have met with favor in New York and elsewhere.

* * * *

Last October Alfredo Casella, now beginning his third season as conductor of the Pops, was awarded by the Musical Fund Society of Philadelphia a prize of $3000 for his Serenata for clarinet, bassoon, trumpet, violin and 'cello. Next Tuesday evening Mr. Casella is to be dined and feted in the Quaker City and incidentally will direct a performance of this composition. On this same Tuesday evening, therefore, the Pop Concert here in Symphony Hall will be conducted, not by Mr. Casella, but by Arthur Fiedler.

* * * *

Cleveland is justly proud of the endowment fund for her orchestra, recently completed [illegible] drive that went far "over the top." Not only has the Cleveland Orchestra, now a million-

DUNCAN TROUPE AT POP CONCERTS

AS an inovation for the Pop Concerts in their second week which opens tomorrow will be the appearance of the Isadora Duncan Dancers, each night of the week. This will be the first visit to Boston of the remarkable group of dancers who came over from Russia last winter and made a sensation.

Isadora Duncan established this school in Moscow in 1920, and left it in the care of Irma Duncan, one of her adopted daughters, also a dancer of note.

Irma Duncan brought her dancers to New York in December, and gave a festival of 12 performances in memory of Isadora Duncan whose art they are perpetuating.

* * *

THE Isadora Duncan Dancers will appear each night at the Pops, after the second intermission, when the stage will be cleared and an orchestra in front of it, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, will accompany them.

On Monday, Wednesday and Friday, they will present an all-Schubert program, consisting of the Ave aria, Andante from the Seventh Symphony, five waltzes, Moment Musicale and Marche Militaire. On Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday they will give their famous interpretation of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

Alfredo Casella will conduct the orchestral part of each program, with the exception of Tuesday night when Arthur Fiedler will will conduct. On that night, the noted Pops conductor will go to Philadelphia to conduct, by special invitation, his own $3000 prize-winning score.

Next Sunday, May 12, will bring the first Sunday night Pop concert, with an all-Wagner program.

SUN ADV. MAY 5

MUSIC

DUNCAN DANCERS AT THE POPS

There will be a real innovation at the Pop Concerts in their second week, which opens tomorrow with the appearance of the Isadora Duncan Dancers, each night of the week. This will be the first visit to Boston of the remarkable group of dancers who came over from Russia last Winter and made the largest sensation in a season rich with visiting dancers.

Isadora Duncan established this school in Moscow in 1920, and left it in the care of Irma Duncan, one of her adopted daughters, and herself a dancer of note. Irma Duncan brought her dancers to New York in December, and gave a festival of 12 performances in memory of Isadora Duncan, whose art they are perpetuating. From then until now, Broadway has been crowding to the performances of Irma Duncan and her Russian group.

The Isadora Duncan Dancers will appear each night at the Pops, after the second intermission, when the stage will be cleared and an orchestra in front of it, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, will accompany them. On Monday, Wednesday and Friday they will present an all-Schubert program, consisting of the Ave Maria, Andante from the Seventh Symphony, five waltzes, moment musicale and Marche Militaire. On Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday they will give their famous interpretation of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony.

Alfredo Casella will conduct the purely orchestral part of each program, with the exception of Tuesday night, when Arthur Fiedler will conduct. On this night the noted Pops conductor will go to Philadelphia to conduct, by special invitation, his own $3000 prize-winning score.

Next Sunday, May 12, will bring the first Sunday night Pop concert, with an all-Wagner program.

The programs of the week follow:

MONDAY, MAY 6

Overture to "Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai; minuet, Bolzoni, Rumanian rhapsody, Enesco; overture to "Gwendoline," Chabrier; Danse Macabre, Symphonic poem, Saint-Saens; overture to "Rienzi," Wagner; the Isadora Duncan Dancers (all Schubert program).

TUESDAY, MAY 7

(Conducted by Arthur Fiedler)

Marche Slave, Tchaikovsky; overture to "Sakuntala," Goldmark; fantasia, "Aida," Verdi; suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; waltz, "Voices of Spring," Strauss; first Hungarian rhapsody, Liszt; the Isadora Duncan Dancers, Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

Wednesday, May 8—French Military March, Saint-Saens; Suite from "Carmen," Bizet; Overture to "La Forza del Destino," Verdi; Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Berlioz; Largo from the "New World" Symphony, Dvorak; Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin. The Isadora Duncan Dancers (all Schubert program).

Thursday, May 9—March from "Aida," Verdi; Prelude to Act [illegible] "Traviata," Verdi; Overture to "La Forza del Destino," Verdi; Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," Wagner; Air for String Orchestra," Bach; "Italia," Rhapsody, Casella. The Isadora Duncan Dancers (Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony).

Friday, May 10—Coronation March from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer; Suite from "L'Arlesienne" No. 1, Bizet; Overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin," Wagner; Pavane pour une Infante Defunte, Ravel; "Pines of Rome," Symphonic Poem, Respighi. The Isadora Duncan Dancers (all Schubert program).

Saturday, May 11—"Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar; "Ave Maria," Schubert-Wilhelm; ballet suite, "Nutcracker," Tchaikovsky; Dance of the Hours, "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; overture to "Nebuchadnezzar," Verdi; Bacchanale, "Tannhauser," Wagner; Capriccio Italien, Tchaikovsky. The Isadora Duncan Dancers (Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony).

Sunday, May 12 (All Wagner Program—"Tannhauser," entrance of the guests into the Wartburg; "A Siegfried Idyll," "Tristan and Isolde," prelude and Love-Death: "Tannhauser," overture; "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," prelude; "Lohengrin," prelude and introduction to Act III; "Parsifal," Good Friday spell; "The Valkyrie," ride of the Valkyries.

[illegible] which give full play to the rich harmonies and subtle shadings of voices in a man's chorus.

The program is as follows:

"Let Us Now Praise Famous Men," R. Vaughan Williams; "How Sweet! How Fresh!", Stephen Paxton; "In Dulci Iubilo," ancient German carol; "Adoramus Te"; "Shoot, False Love"; "Jesu, Joy of Man's Desiring"; "The Galway Piper," Irish folk song; "Let All Mortal Flesh Keep Silence," old French melody arranged by Gustav Holst (1874—); soloist, Philip Donham. "To All You Ladies Now on Hand," Callcott; "City of Chow," Granville Bantock; three Italian folk songs, "Dimmi O Bella (soloist, Dean E. Terrill); "Tu Mi Vuoi Tanto Bene"; "Cantu Di Caccia"; "Plorate, Filii Israel," from "Jephthah's Daughter"; chorus from "The Gondoliers," Sir Arthur Sullivan.

Music Notes and Comment

Aside from the Pops, musical events these days in Boston are few. The Harvard Glee Club's free concert at the Art Museum Thursday, for which no tickets are required; the two introductory performances of "Carmen" by Leginska's Opera Company at Jordan Hall Saturday, and the concert by the Boston Civic Symphony at Jordan Hall [illegible] Sunday complete [illegible] Reviewer's schedule.

GLOBE MAY 5

Six of the Sunday afternoon concerts at Symphony Hall next season have been grouped in a subscription series for which seats are on sale at a rate that reduces the price below the level asked for single concerts in the annual Sunday series. The artists to be heard in this special course are Louise Homer and her daughters, Horwoitz, Hayes, Albert Spalding, Sanroma and Cyrena van Gordon. Miss van Gordon is a newcomer at Symphony Hall but familiar here as a leading mezzo soprano with the Chicago Civic Opera. The other artists have appeared in the Sunday series before. Intending purchasers may pick out their own seats from a diagram on view in the Huntington-av lobby of Symphony Hall at the intermission in the current Pop concerts. The prices range from $12 down to $5 for the six concerts.

The Monday and Tuesday series [illegible] Boston Symphony concerts have been increased to six instead of five concerts each for next season. Season tickets for these and for the 24 Friday and Saturday concerts should be applied for at Symphony Hall at once by persons wishing to secure tickets without fail. It is doubtful if any Friday tickets will remain after persons now on the waiting list have been supplied. Payment need not be made until next Fall. Mr Koussevitzky is to return as conductor, as already announced.

KOUSSEVITZKY IN N. Y.

(W. J. Henderson in the Sun)

He has restored to the Boston Symphony Orchestra the fullness of its prestige. He has brought back the luminosity of its tone, the vitality of its style and the finish of its technic. In his selections and his interpretations he has shown himself to be a progressive who preserves his sanity and a respecter of the past, whose treasures he treats not merely as a priceless historical heritage, but as a living power to be felt by the living. He will return to us next winter at the head of a truly great orchestra which has splendidly added to its influence under his guidance.

CAMPFIRE GIRLS REAL HEROINES

Three Prevent Panic by Putting Out Fire in Crowded Hall

GRAB BLANKETS, SMOTHER FLAMES

Blaze Accidentally Starts in Imitation Campfire

[illegible] TIMES

Three young girls from Greater Boston distinguished themselves in Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon, by putting out a fire that had accidentally started in a make-believe campfire on the floor of the hall, which was crowded at the time with 1500 Campfire Girls from all over New England, who were celebrating the 17th anniversary of their organization.

[illegible]y their coolness and presence of mind in grabbing up blankets and smothering the flames, they prevented what might have been a serious panic.

The fire started in a fictitious campfire of white birch logs which covered an arrangement of red paper streamers and electric light bulbs that made the whole thing look like a real campfire. In some way the electric bulbs, it is believed, set fire to the paper streamers, but one of the girls said she saw a lighted candle topple over before the flames leaped up.

The girls were seated in a circle on the floor about the campfire, singing "Across the Silver Lake," when Eleanor Moulton, 15, of 102 Winsor avenue, Watertown, happened to look at the symbolic fire, and saw flames leaping up among the paper streamers. She looked twice to make sure the flames were real, then shouted to Miss Doris Foster, who was leading the singing, "It's afire," and pointed to the campfire with one hand while she grabbed her blanket with the other.

Saw Lighted Candle Topple

Just before Miss Houlton shouted, Miss Marion Wooley, 12, of 159 Middlesex avenue, Medford, also noticed the fire. She was looking into the campfire with three lighted candles on top of the logs when she saw a paper streamer whirl up dangerously near the candle in front of her. The next moment it was ablaze. She heard someone shout, "Get your blankets," as she grabbed hers and made for the fire.

As she reached the fire, Miss Moulton and Miss Dorothy Soderberg, 13, of 84 North Bayfield road, Atlantic, who said she saw a lighted candle topple over into the fire, approached from the opposite side and threw their blankets over the blazing paper, smothering the flames almost instantly. Miss Soderberg was slightly burned on her right hand. Miss Foster, who assisted in putting out the fire, was severely burned about the left hand, requiring several dressings.

In the excitement, the 1500 girls on the floor sprang to their feet while there was an ominous pause in the song. But it was all done so quietly and quickly, that it was all over before the audience realized what had happened.

After it was over, Miss Foster said she never saw anything done so quickly and so effectively in an emergency.

"Miss Moulton was seated on her blanket in the front row of the circle," she said, "when I saw her point to the campfire and say, 'Miss Foster, it's afire.' One glance convinced me of the fact and I ordered the girls to get their blankets. That is the order for a fire emergency, but before the other girls could get on their feet, Miss Moulton was smothering the flames with her blanket, assisted by Miss Wooley and Miss Soderberg. There was no excitement, no panic. The girls showed the value of their training in a wonderful manner. I feel proud of them."

Miss Edith M. Kempthorne, the national field secretary of the campfire girls, was equally frank in her praise.

Governor Allen arrived shortly afterward and brought the greetings of the Commonwealth. He was accompanied by Mrs. Allen, who is honorary president of the organization. As a memento of the occasion, Mrs. Allen was presented with a silver pendant and the Governor was given a gift for his infant son.

Besides the exhibition of campfire craft, there were numerous songs and pledges of faith to the campfire circle as well as the reception of new members and the award of honors.

Casella, Versatile Leader of Pops Concerts, Mixes His Music in Chemical Test Tube

Got Through "Pathetic" Symphony 10 Minutes Ahead of Time-Table--- Looks Like a Canadian Mountie --- Calm Under Fire and Likes Snappy Work

By R. L. Humphrey

Alfredo Casella, conductor of the Pops concerts at Boston's Symphony Hall, is unique in the world of music in a number of respects.

Who but Casella, for instance, could compose seriously, in serious musical form, for the pianola—and still be esteemed one of the great minds of modern music?

Casella has not only done one and both—he has done so five times.

To his mind—and his mind is the main part of him—the inanimate aspect of the mechanical piano is completely lost in the fact that with it one may achieve complications of execution and effect beyond the power of human hands to attempt.

What About the Pathos?

Casella is a man of such eminence in so many fields that it is rather baffling to attempt an introductory impression of him in a phrase.

But he himself has just provided the means. When Casella conducted Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony at the Pops last week, he got through it 10 minutes ahead of the ordinary running time.

This is illuminating. It is eloquent in its implications.

But perhaps not everyone is sure what to imply. Suppose we state it this way: When Stokowsky conducts the "Pathetic," it is as if he had said to himself, "How much pathos is there in this?" With Koussevitzky, it is as if he said, "How much more pathos can I get out of this?" With Casella, it seems as if he said, "Well, what about this pathos?" Whereupon he substituted neatness and despatch for lugubrious lingerings.

Alfredo Casella, composer-pianist-musicologist, leader of "Pops."

(C) Bachrach

Casella, in common phrase, knows the science of music inside out. As to the frenzies of music, he leaves them outside, because there are none in him. Music to him consists of tone, rhythm, pattern and structure, creating various impressions—which are said to throw various persons into an emotional whirl. And Casella's constitution does not adapt itself to whirls of emotion.

You cannot always pick out a musician by his appearance, but in the attempt you would indicate almost anyone among a thousand individuals in Boston, except Casella. He has the height and physique of a captain of Royal Canadian Mounted Police in civies, and, in fact, crossed the stage with military stride. In his gaze you read alertness, directness, penetration, decision. These are attributes of the adventurer, and Casella is the bright particular star among adventuring musicians. He roams restlessly from country to country, from piano to conductor's stand, from there to author's, editor's or composer's desk, and thence from one school of modern musical theory to another—from "cubism" to classicism and "way stations."

Casella's conductorship of the Pops at Boston Symphony Hall is an adventure, entered upon in that spirit on an instant without previous thought or subsequent dubitation.

During Koussevitzky's mid-season vacation, three years ago, Casella was guest conductor. He had previously filled the position capably for some few other orchestras in France, Holland, Italy and Austria. On the occasion in question, he had dazzled a capacity audience, and the orchestra, too, with the rare charm of his conducting of a Mozart concerto, with Walter Gieseking at the piano. It was the sensation of the promenade conversation during the mid-concert intermission. By chance the question had not been settled as to who would lead the Pops a few months later, since Jacchia had resigned.

An official of the orchestra entered into a chat with Casella. By way of news, he mentioned the fact that the Pops were yet without a leader. By way of pleasantry, he asked, "How'd the job strike you?"

"Offer it to me, and I'll take it," Casella said.

The official's speaking apparatus was temporarily paralyzed. Here was one of the most notable figures in modern music — outstanding modernist composer, learned essayist on musicology, distinguished pianist, internationally known conductor—offering to lead the Pops, a series of concerts at which players and public enjoyed a vacation from music of passion, tension and intricacy. As soon as the trustees could be gathered, a contract was rushed to Casella.

Calm Under Fire

Just as swiftly and decisively as Casella cleared his way to the helm of the Pops, he completely altered their course. That would seem a contradiction. But Casella in personality and in history is full of contradictions. Although he abolished the adored trifling, or not quite great, music that made these concerts so popular, he popularized programmes almost the counterpart of regular Symphony programmes. If former patrons withdrew in protest, others replaced them by way of approval. These "classical Pops" draw heavily.

Here again you have the man of adventure, armed with alertness and decision, calm and resourceful under fire. With concerts every night, neither he nor his orchestra can give very long hours to rehearsals, however ambitious the music. Yet in performance, Casella presents the numbers with unfailing clearness of thought and unwavering grip on his orchestra. Where human limitation intervenes, he shows himself as admirable an opportunist as his compatriot Caesar, and marches on to victory.

Among the contradictions attaching to him are his personal relations with his orchestra. The fact that Casella is responsible for robbing them of the former vacation-like charm of playing in the Pops puts them fleetingly in a general mood of driven-slave outcry. But on the whole they look on him as a great fellow, without a doubt, whom it is a rare pleasure to know—especially among conductors.

Perhaps the greatest contradiction about Casella is in the matter of temperament.

It is generally and pretty correctly—supposed that all musicians of account have temperament. (Has not the most mournful criticism of Marion Talley been that she had no temperament?)

Reduce all of Casella's superb musical endowments and attainments to percentages and to compute his temperament one must shift from mathematical to chemical procedure. A chemist will give the percentages of various elements of a compound, and then in lieu of a percentage of one element, he will resort to the word "trace." Casella's temperament amounts to just about a trace.

Yet he can put an audience into highest enthusiasm whether he approaches it as pianist, composer or conductor. Another contradiction here. He excels in playing and conducting classical music of the "lavender and old lace" type—Mozart, Haydn, Scarlatti. Yet as a composer he was long rated an extreme modern, writing "cubist" music. And at all times he is able to thrill an audience with the dash of movement and audacity or ingenuity of tonal color in his compositions or the diabolical complication of instrumental technique demanded.

A Chemist With a Baton

For temperament Casella has substituted a scientific attitude of mind. He was once ambitious to become a great chemist. Without straining a point to capitalize the fact, it may be stated that in Casella the personality of a chemist is enclosed in the body of a musician. His compositions, his essays on musical theory, his conducting, seem to resolve themselves into terms of chemical formulae. As a musical commentator he analyzes difficult subjects with startling clarity.

As a conductor, his presentation of an orchestral work is as if his baton would at any moment be raised to a blackboard, and you would hear him state:

"Now, with one molecule of sulphuric acid, consisting of two atoms of hydrogen and two of sulphur dioxide, united with one molecule of sodium chlorate, consisting of one atom each of sodium and chlorine, and three atoms of oxygen, we have the explosion which is about to take place."

There is satisfaction in this mental balance, and no danger of one's becoming neurotic by the resulting musical reactions.

Concerts Next Week

TRANS MAY 4

Progress of The Pops

THE second week of The Pops brings innovation. Each evening the first two parts of the program will consist, as usual, of orchestral numbers. In the following intermission the stage will be cleared, while a small orchestra, led by Arthur Fiedler, will take seats on the floor in the space ordinarily occupied by the frontward tables. To the stage will come Irma Duncan's troupe of youthful dancers; from the improvised pit Mr. Fiedler's orchestra will play for them. On Monday, Wednesday and Friday, the music will be drawn miscellaneously from Schubert. On Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday, it will be confined to Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony."

Irma's little company is the third generation, so to say, of Duncans. Isadora had her pupils and protegées. Not least of them was Irma. She succeeded to Isadora's school in Europe; there practised the youngsters whom she brought to New York last winter and will now bring to Symphony Hall. They dance—Irma often leading them—in the tradition of Isadora, but with the zest and glamour natural to their younger years. They are eleven in all, with Irma for twelfth. In particular they excel in swift and sharp-rhythmed motion.

For his share of the programs, Mr. Casella assembles, for the most part, pieces already established in the repertory of The Pops. Monday brings Enesco's first Roumanian Rhapsody and Chabrier's overture to his opera, "Gwendoline." On Wednesday, the slow movement of Dvorák's Symphony, "From the New World," and the Tartar dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor" are added to the list. Three orchestral numbers from Verdi's operas begin the program on Thursday. On Friday, it includes Respighi's tone-poem, "Pines of Rome." On Saturday, there is room for dances from Chaikovsky's ballet, "Nutcracker" and for the Venusberg Music in "Tannhäuser." On Tuesday evening, Mr. Fiedler will be conductor through the whole concert and a more miscellaneous program than usual. The first Sunday concert on the evening of May 12, assembles a "Wagner Program." Included is "A Siegfried Idyll," long unheard in Boston.

DUNCAN DANCERS AT POPS

Arthur Fiedler Conducts Innovation at Concerts

Post—MAY 7

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Last evening, for the first time in the history of the Pop Concerts, the musical programme, or rather a portion of it, was visualized by dancers. To be specific, the Isadora Duncan Dancers of Moscow, 10 in number, under the direction of Irma Duncan, an adopted daughter of Isadora, exhibited their art last evening during the third and final division of the programme.

FIEDLER CONDUCTS

For the first two-thirds of the evening the orchestra played under Mr. Casella's direction and in its accustomed place upon the stage, although against a back-ground of blue-green curtains.

During the second intermission the stage was cleared of chairs and stands, a green carpet was laid, and when the players reappeared they took their places in the front section of the auditorium which, needless to say, had been freed of the customary tables.

Arthur Fiedler now replaced Mr. Casella, as conductor, and to the music of Schubert the Duncan Dancers proceded to disport themselves upon the stage.

The chosen numbers were the Ave Maria, the Andante from the C major Symphony, five Waltzes, a Moment Musical and the familiar Marche Militaire. In all these dances Irma Duncan was the principal figure; often she held the stage alone; at times two, three or more of the others danced with her, at other times the entire company, if such it may be called.

Following the lead of Isadora, the Duncan Dancers are not concerned with dancing in the conventional sense, but with the interpretation of music by bodily pose, gesture and motion. There were pleasing effects of line and rhythm in last evening's dancing, although it may hardly be said that any of the dancers, including Irma Duncan herself, seemed technically expert as that term is commonly applied to the terpsichorean art, or even of conspicuous grace. On occasion this posing, this graceful scampering and violent running seemed to fit, even to enhance the music. Again it seemed superfluous, even malapropos; Schubert unembellished would better have conveyed his message. The audience, it should be added, received the Duncan Dancers with marked enthusiasm and at the end, when Mr. Fiedler was brought to the stage to share with the dancers the plaudits of the audience, cheers were added to the hand-clappings.

Through the remainder of this week the Duncan Dancers will appear at the Pop Concerts, the Schubert programme of last evening alternating with a danced version of three movements of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

PHOTO SHOWS DAM

Globe—May 7

ISADORA DUNCAN DANCERS AT POPS

Innovation for Boston's Famous Concerts

Group in "All-Shubert Program" With Arthur Fiedler Conducting

A charming innovation at Boston's famous Pop Concerts was introduced at Symphony Hall last night by the appearance on the program of several numbers by the Isadora Duncan Dancers. This interesting group will appear throughout this week.

The purely orchestral part of the program occupied something more than two-thirds of the evening, the dancers coming on after the second intermission, during which the stage was cleared and part of the orchestra, which had been seated as usual on the stage, moved down onto the floor. Alfredo Casella, who had conducted the first part of the program, was replaced by Arthur Fiedler, who conducted for the dancers.

The little group which dances for the Pops' audiences this week is a product of the school which Isadora Duncan established in Moscow in 1920 and left in charge of her adopted daughter, Irma Duncan. Last December Irma brought her dancers to New York, where a festival of 12 performances was given in honor of the memory of the school's founder. This is their first appearance in Boston.

The dances were an "all-Shubert program," beginning with "Ave Maria." It opened with Irma Duncan in flowing robes, posed against the dull blue curtain which served as a backdrop. Around her gathered the other dancers and moved through a solemnly graceful series of postures, a rhythmic interpretation of the music.

"Andante Con Moto" from the Symphony No. 7 in C Major followed. This with a single exception, was perhaps the best of the program. Miss Duncan was especially effective in the stately, graceful movements. Some waltzes came next; "Under the scarf," by Miss Duncan; Tamara, Marie, Alexandra, Manya, Vela and Vera; "Game with Ball," by Miss Duncan, alone; "Three Graces," by Miss Duncan, Tamara and Alexandra; and "Ecossaise" and "Around the Linden Tree," by Miss Duncan and the ensemble. The latter was a delicate, graceful thing, delightfully conceived and executed.

Miss Duncan next danced "Moment Musicale" which so pleased the audience that it demanded and got an encore. The dancing ended with a stirring rendition of the "Marche Militaire" in which Miss Duncan appeared with the whole company in brilliant red costumes and danced a stirring interpretation of the music.

Miss Duncan, a highly talented dancer, has in the young women she has trained a more than adequate supporting company. Graceful, light and easy in every movement, they carry out the best traditions of this particular type of dancing. At least two of them, Tamara and Alexandra, should have a rather notable future.

The purely orchestral part of the program was as follows: Overture to "Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai; "Minuet," Bolzoni, "Rumanian Rhapsody," Enesco; overture to "Gwendoline," Chabrier; "Danse Macabre," Symphonic poem, Saint-Saens; overture to "Rienzi," Wagner.

To-nights program will be as follows: "Marche Slave," Tchaikovsky; overture to "Sakuntala," Goldmark; fantasia, "Aida," Verdi; suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; waltz, "Voices of Spring," Strauss; "First Hungarian Rhapsody," Liszt; the Isadora Duncan Dancers, Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

For The Pops, New Pleasures of Dance

TRANS—MAY 7

VITAL flesh at one with rhythmic spirit, disciplined abandon, fluent gesture, light, quick harmony of motion, choregraphic pattern, and unaffected symbolism—these the Isadora Duncan Dancers of Moscow gave and were at their first Boston appearance at the end of the Pop concert in Symphony Hall last night. Led by Irma Duncan, adopted daughter of Isadora and director of her Russian school, the Muscovite maidens presented an all Schubert program as much to their own joy, apparently, as to that of the audience large for the occasion.

The curtains parted for the "Ave Maria," revealing Irma with arms crossed on her breast and head bowed. Slowly she raised her face to heaven as her pupils appeared on either side. Sheer robes floating behind them, and hands supplicating, they circled about her. As the music swelled, Irma, eloquent in expression and pose, raised her arms on high. Faster and more freely the suppliants wove their pattern. The music died away, and the Madonna was left again alone, head bowed, arms crossed.

Particularly pleasing sympathy of dance with music was in the second number, Andante Con Moto, from Symphony No. 7 in C Major. First one by one the girls ran on the stage; then, crescendo, by twos they leaped gloriously forth; then all together. Suddenly they left Irma alone. Then all again, then two by two, and finally Ilma alone once more as the curtain fell.

The first of five waltzes, "Under the Scarf," was very prettily done and, possibly also because of the personal element, appealed highly to the audience. As the filmy scarf was tossed up by two of the girls, each of the others in turn danced under and forward to the very edge of the platform, teeth gleaming as each paused before darting around to the rear again. In the second waltz Irma counterfeited playing a game with a ball. Then she and the two most lovely pupils, Tamara and Alexandra, impersonated the graces. In lyric pose the three advanced, as on a cloud, goddess in three persons; the tempo changed and, holding hands, with heads thrown back, about they whirled; only to repeat the first movement and then the second, again and again. The full vigor and freshness of the ensemble were seen in the Ecossaise; and in "Around the Linden Tree" again its patterned symbolism, as first the girls in circle moved slowly, one step this way, one that, and then with uplifted arms and flashing legs they interpreted a swifter passage.

In Moment Musicale Irma's trembling index finger came perilously near to pointing a disharmony. Great were the demands she put upon herself, and not wholly did she meet them. Yet her performance was so spirited, her personality for the first time in the evening so marked, that at the conclusion of the number the audience called her back before the curtains three times.

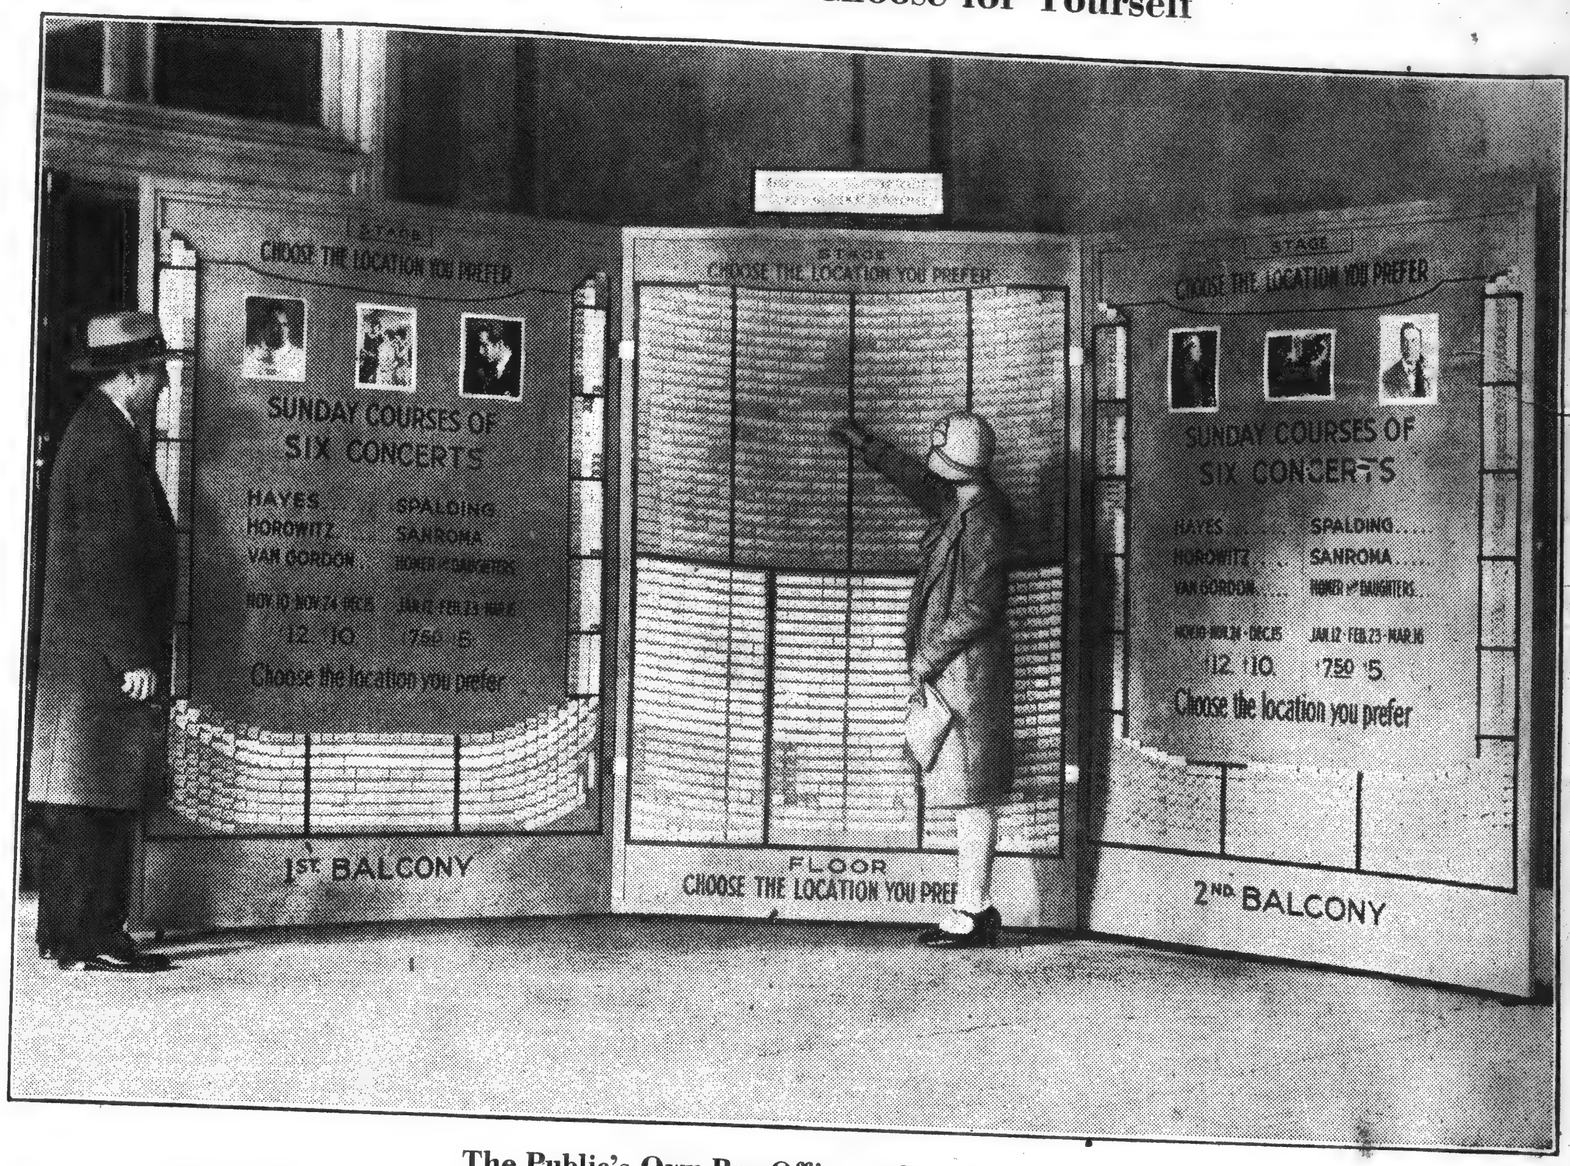
Peak of the evening was the concluding Marche Militaire. Here the dancers abandoned themselves to more powerful rhythms and displayed even more striking dance patterns than before. Tossing her black locks, Irma flashed across the stage. Her red scarf cut the line of girls flashing contrarywise with hands linked and knees prancing. Again and yet again. Then off they all leaped and Irma after, her scarf flaming behind her, seeming to pursue her into the shadows.

One thought of another scarf, another flame, and other shadows. One thought also, in recollection, that Isadora dancing never disclosed Isadora the teacher, that her ready flesh never lagged behind her quick spirit. But the girls of the ensemble were Irma's justification. Their bodies, her guiding mind, and the soul of Isadora, all three were essential to this alchemy from which was magicked forth a rare precipitate, pure dance.

N. F.

...ys and Players --- Music and Musicians

Look for Yourself: Choose for Yourself



The Public's Own Box-Office at Symphony Hall

(Colby—Transcript)

The Ticket-Rack in the Huntington-Avenue Corridor for the Course of Six Sunday Concerts Next Season. For Every Seat There Is A Ticket-Stub. The Buyer Sees the Whole Hall; Makes His Choice; Signs His Name—and Departs Content

Herald May 7

MUSIC

POPS: ISADORA DUNCAN DANCERS The Pops last night followed an unwonted course. The evening, to be sure, began, normally enough, according to the present type, with Mr. Casella on hand to furnish excellent music in exactly two hours.

But at 10 o'clock Mr. Casella, after a rousing reading of the "Rienzi" overture, went home. The players, instead of following his lead, stepped from the stage to the floor of the hall—some making the descent by way of an agile vaulting—there to seat themselves again to work. Mr. Arthur Fiedler presently appeared, out of the darkness, to lead them. The curtains were pulled aside.

For it should have been stated that the stage curtains had been drawn to. When they were parted, they revealed on the stage a very figure of woe, Irma Duncan, the director of the Isadora Duncan Dancers of Moscow.

Miss Duncan, in coiffure modern, in garb medieval— a statue on the facade of some Gothic cathedral she might hate made her model—proceeded to express by the droop of her head and the wave of her arms, black despair, this to the strains of Schubert's "Ave Maria." Six young women, robust of build, soon joined her in motions of despondency. So ladies must have disported themselves in the aesthetic period in the 80s, when Gilbert's Lady Saphir—or was it the Lady Angela?—besought her friends: "At least be early English, before it is too late."

In cheerier mood, the ladies danced next to the andante from Schubert's C major symphony. In greenish tunics that floated about and behind them, they ran and bounded, by ones and twos, and finally in a body of six with the directress to lead, all under a pale light of green-blue. This was a very pretty dance indeed, with real spirit to lend it life.

Short dances followed, to a succession of Schubert waltzes. In one the performers made play with a great sheet of gauze. They played a game of ball, the program had it, and also the program made mention of "Around the Linden Tree."

Miss Irma Duncan herself, employing much the same steps she had taught her ensemble, obliged with a solo, to Schubert's Moment Musical, which pleased so thoroughly that the audience wanted it again. Although she preferred not to repeat the dance, she broke into another, to the stirring measures of Schubert's military march, quite similar as to step, though in character something more defiant. The ensemble assisted her, and in this dance they reached their highest point of rhythmic precision, of animation. Throughout the performance the large audience showed every sign of pleasure.

R. R. G.

16 5

166

MUSIC

THE ISADORA DUNCAN DANCERS AT THE POPS

Three dance compositions, carefully and beautifully worked out, stirring and expressive in performance, were presented at the Pops last night by the Isadora Duncan Dancers of Moscow. The dances were set to movements of Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony, and though they were doubtless meant to be parts of one whole, as dance compositions they had very distinct separate individualities. This program, both orchestral and choreographic, will be repeated on Thursday and on Saturday. An audience that filled the hall almost to overflowing testified to the fact that the innovation of having dance programs with the usual orchestral program is in keeping with the spirit and taste of Pops habitues, and is highly approved.

The dances were preceded by six pieces played by the Pops Symphony orchestra, with Arthur Fiedler conducting. Mr. Fiedler lavished care and intelligence on the music, and made it much more than merely entertaining. His conducting of the Pathetic Symphony, the interpretation tempered to suit the natural demands of the dance, was praiseworthy too.

As to the dancing, be it said that if Irma Duncan is not a great dancer, she is certainly a great dance composer. Also, she has trained her pupils to a high degree of grace, and has infused into them a sincerity and intensity that promise much for their futures. The Allegro con grazia, as they danced it, was fleet and rhythmic, of a most unaffected grace and loveliness, though it did not offer much, either of freshness or subtlety, in the way of what might be called "dance thought." But the Allegro molto vivace, which was danced next, was a gem of choreography . . . the ideas and motifs were original without being unnatural, Russian in spirit without losing the universal appeal of the "natural" dancing taught by Isadora, stirring, intense, and dramatic without ever sacrificing the rhythmic flow of movement. In this dance, too, the weaving of the ideas, the threads of thought, into a dance pattern, was marvelously accomplished. Here, too, the dancing itself was most lovely-free, abandoned, ecstatic. It really ennobled the music that inspired it. The Finale; Adagio Lamentoso, was interpreted in movements of grace and meaning, by Irma Duncan, sola.

Much applause from the enthusiastic audience told the dancers and musicians how much the evening was enjoyed.

E. B.

Herald

May 8

and weight the more remarkable seem their lightness and plasticity of motion.

Time and again, too, this or that movement recalls Isadora in her prime. Evidently Miss Irma first mastered, then preserved, her teaching. There is the bounding step, knee high-upraised, which was one of Isadora's best possessions; the long flowing line, more graphic for a scarf outflung; the slow and rapt approach, the quick change into a crescendo of pace and rhythm; the diminuendo of departure or the happy troupe streaming away through the parted curtains. Isadora liked to theorize about all the freedoms and to practice most. Consequently she railed at technique, though within obvious limitations, her own was distinctive. In turn these youngsters have absorbed it—for their more characteristic steps, for the play of hands, arms and heads. In the flow or flare or droop of their dancing dress—the rhythm of scarfs and veils and folds as Isadora used to say—it runs as clear. Within her narrow field they stay; within it excel—simple moods, flowing or bounding motion. For those who would have the heavy-handed, heavy-footed, posturing Isadora of the declining years, there is Miss Irma herself. Hers is not a vibrant temperament. In one and another of her solo-numbers too faithfully she recalls her ageing, mannered mistress.

Only the middle-aged may recall the lustrous, marvellous Isadora of a brief prime, little spent upon American stages. For a younger generation, if they know her at all, she is the soiled and sponging creature, posturing for poseurs, of the decadence and of books that might better have gone unwritten, so completely do they efface the lovely image of the glowing years. For nearly all who watch in Symphony Hall her grandchildren in the dance, Isadora is no more than a name, or at most a legend. What pleasures them is this warm youth schooled to the semblance of her prime; its light energy, its fine fluidity, of motion; its sense of undulating line, as in a melody of Schubert, held, varied, intensified; its zest of rhythm touched in or firmly marked; its moments of still, rapt grace; its leaps into exuberance; its fine scorn of all that prettifies and is "precious" in the mean sense of that word. Schubert sings out of this dancing; in it, after the Duncanesque fashion, Chaikovsky runs the gamut of his moods, not always to be patterned, phrased and conveyed in another medium, now too vague, again too intensive. Yet always there is sufficient residue. By instinct and by practice these dancing girls have achieved freedom of bodily motion, rhythmed and attuned; then by quick imagination and spontaneous impulse into beauty woven it. For it was Isadora, even to the third generation, who restored a vernal freshness to the dancing stage.

H. T. P.

TRAV MAY 11

Dancing Daughters Of Isadora Born

In Plain and True Descent Goes the Young Troupe At Symphony Hall

TRANS MAY 9

THE Duncanettes, nightly dancing as third part of The Pops, have won the town. Above stairs and below, at Symphony Hall last evening, there was not a vacant chair or empty table; while for today, tomorrow and Saturday, there are few places left. Miss Irma and her young dancers have a considerable repertory; the two programs of the current week by no means exhaust it; through another six evenings, were the management so disposed, they could give fresh pleasure in new numbers. As it is, the public seems content with either program. If the nine brief pieces from Schubert exhibit the little troupe more variously, the three movements from Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony" show it more intensively. Schubert's Waltzes, the Military March, the slow movement from the Symphony in C major, are for the most part ensemble numbers. To herself, out of the nine, Miss Irma reserves only two; whereas she mimes alone the dolorous Finale of Chaikovsky's Symphony and is the pervasive figure through the middle Allegros. The Schubert-program is the gayer; the Chaikovsky-program, the more ambitious. In both the dancers are accompanied by a larger and better orchestra than they have hitherto known at home or abroad. Symphony Hall has, indeed, been generous with them; while the adaptable Arthur Fiedler is alert and skillful as conductor to a ballet. He gives it line and rhythm. Being sure of its steps, it asks for no more.

Miss Irma was one of the six pupils of Isadora who danced together or in groups, here in America, after their mistress had virtually quit the stage. Irma, of German blood and pains and patience, succeeded to the school in Moscow when Isadora tired of it; fostered and established it. Out of it come the eleven girls, from the teens into the twenties, of the present troupe. To a remembering eye they not only perpetuate the tradition but renew the semblance of Isadora. She had no liking for the taut, slender, fine muscled figures to which Americans are accustomed in the dance. She preferred in her pupils her own full body. Miss Irma is like-minded, and these Russian girls are a strapping youth—tall, large-framed, well-muscled, by no means fleshless. From such shape

Continued on Following Page

At The Pops Tonight

Assisting: The Duncan Dancers

March from The Opera, "Aida"—Introduction to Act III of The Opera, "La Traviata"—Overture to The Opera, "The Force of Destiny"..Verdi
Prelude to The Opera, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg".....Wagner
Air for String Orchestra.....Bach
Rhapsody, "Italia".....Casella

Conductor: A. Casella.

Dances

Allegro con Grazia, Allegro Molto Vivace, Adagio Lamentoso from the "Pathetic Symphony".....Chaikovsky

Conductor: A. Fiedler

Third Week of Pop Concerts

Tomorrow, the Pops at Symphony Hall will enter upon their third week with the first Sunday evening concert of the season and a Wagner program.

Monday night will be the annual Harvard night, at which the Harvard Glee Club, led by Dr. Archibald T. Davison, will add two groups of songs to the orchestral programme. Other features of the week will be the Capriccio Espagnole, and Tannhauser Overture, on Tuesday; Liszt's "Les Preludes," Ravel's "La Valse," and three Tchaikovsky numbers on Wednesday; "Peer Gynt" Suite, "Espana," "Pacific 2-3-1," etc., on Thursday; "William Tell" Overture, Largo, Ave Maria, and other favorites on Friday; and Beethoven's First Symphony on Saturday, together with three Wagnerian excerpts and other popular numbers.

The programs for tonight and tomorrow night follow:

SATURDAY, MAY 11
Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Ave Maria.....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Ballet suite, "Nutcracker".. Tchaikovsky
Dance of the Hours, "La Gioconda" Ponchielli
Overture to "Nebuchadnezzar".....Verdi
Bacchanale, "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Cappriccio Italien.....Tchaikovsky
The Isadora Duncan dancers
Tchaikovsky program
Symphony No. 6, "Pathetique"
SUNDAY, MAY 12
All-Wagner program
Tannhauser (entrance of the guests into the Wartburg).
A Siegfried Idyll.
Lohengrin (prelude and introduction to act III).
Tannhauser (overture).
The Mastersingers of Nuremburg (prelude).
Tristan and Isolde (prelude and love-death).
Parsifal (Good Friday spell).
The Valkyrie (ride of the Valkyries).

Tchaikovsky Symphony at Pops Tonight

Tomorrow, the Pops at Symphony Hall will enter upon their third week with the first Sunday evening concert of the season and a Wagner program. Monday night will be the annual Harvard Night, at which the Harvard Glee Club, led by Dr. Archibald T. Davison, will add two groups of songs to the orchestral program.

The programs for tonight and tomorrow night follow:

TONIGHT
Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Ave Maria.....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker" .. Tchaikovsky
Dance of the Hours, "La Gioconda" Ponchielli
Overture to "Nebuchadnezzar".....Verdi
Bacchanale, "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Cappriccio Italien.....Tchaikovsky
The Isadora Duncan Dancers
Tchaikovsky Program
Symphony No. 6 "Pathetique"
TOMORROW NIGHT
All-Wagner Program
Tannhauser, Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg
A Siegfried Idyll
Lohengrin, Prelude and Introduction to Act III
Tannhauser, Overture
The Mastersingers of Nuremburg, Prelude
Tristan and Isolde, Prelude and Love-Death
Parsifal, Good Friday Spell
The Valkyrie, Ride of the Valkyries

APR MAY 11

until then.

CAMBRIDGE MASS. SENTINEL

AS TO THE POPS! MAY 11

It may suggest a paradox to quote the famous Symphony Hall Pop Concerts as an argument in vindication of the wisdom of the 18th Amendment. What has beautiful music masterfully played to do with the gulping of alcohol?

In the old days the Pop concerts were intimately associated with the drinking of spirits. Wiseacres claimed that the abbreviation Pop came from the pungent sound when the stopper parted with the bottle, hence the greater importance of the liquor over the music.

When the amendment came, the popular theme ran as follows: "The Pop Concerts are done. Music cannot interest without an alcoholic stimulant." The amazing success of those annual concerts in the past decade has refuted the shallow reasoners and vindicated the courage of Symphony Hall in continuing the series, with ice cream and tonics as rational substitutes for beer and spirits.

How may the demoralizing influence of a jazzified music be better combatted than by these delightful nightly concerts, where Symphony players, led by a musician of world fame, create "a concourse of sweet sounds," as Shakespeare puts it.

Cambridge puts a high value on the "Pops."

JOYOUS MUSIC—RHYTHMIC INTERLUDES

The Isadora Duncan dancers ... in Symphony hall each night this

MAY 12

SUNDAY ADVERTISER—Boston's Greatest Ci

ANNUAL HARVARD NIGHT AT THE POPS TOMORROW EVENING

THE Pop concerts in Symphony Hall will enter upon their third week today, when Alfredo Casella will conduct the first Sunday night concert of the season.

Conductor Casella announces the following programs for the third week:

TONIGHT
ALL-WAGNER PROGRAM
Tannhauser, Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg
A Siegfried Idyll
Tristan and Isolde, Prelude and Love-Death
Tannhauser, Overture
The Mastersingers of Nuremburg, Prelude
Lohengrin, Prelude and Introduction to Act III
Parsifal, Good Friday Spell
The Valkyrie, Ride of the Valkyries
MONDAY
Overture to "Nina, O La Pazza Per Amore".....Paisiello
Set of Act Tunes and Dances Purcell-Bliss
Overture to "Leonore" No. 3.Beethoven
Songs by Harvard Glee Club
Overture to "The Siege of Corinth" Rossini
Forest Murmurs.....Wagner
Rhapsody, "Italia".....Casella
Songs by Harvard Glee Club
Ballet of the Hours, "La Gioconda" Ponchielli
Waltz, "Artist's Life".....Strauss
Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Fair Harvard
TUESDAY
Marche Militaire.....Schubert
Minuet.....Boccherini
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Overture to "La Gazza Ladra".. Rossini
Invitation to the Dance...Weber-Berlioz
Capriccio Espagnole..Rimsky-Korsakov
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Russian Lullaby.....Berlin-Casella
Stars and Stripes Forever.....Sousa
WEDNESDAY
Overture to "The Secret Marriage" Cimarosa
Masque Suite for String Orchestra Handel
Overture to "Semiramide".....Rossini
"Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem. Liszt
Contra Dances.....Mozart
"La Valse," Choregraphic Poem Ravel
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker".Tchaikovsky
Song Without Words.....Tchaikovsky
Marche Slave.....Tchaikovsky
THURSDAY
Military March.....Schubert-Casella
Suite, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Overture to "Rienzi".....Wagner
Pavane pour une Infante Defunte. Ravel
"Pacific 2-3-1," Symphonic Movement.....Honegger
"Espana," Rhapsody.....Chabrier
Irish Rhapsody.....Herbert
Intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz"..Mascagni
Hungarian March, "Rakoczy"...Berlioz
FRIDAY
March from "Aida".....Verdi
Ave Maria.....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Capriccio Italien.....Tchaikovsky
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia".....Delibes
Largo.....Handel
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Ballet of the Hours, "La Gioconda" Ponchielli
Liebesfreud.....Kreisler
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
SATURDAY
Overture to "Cinderella".....Rossini
Three Dances from "Cephalus and Procris".....Gretry-Motti
Overture to "La Forza del Destino" Verdi
Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 21 Beethoven
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg".....Wagner
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser".Wagner
Ride of the Valkyries".....Wagner

Right at Home in Role of Dancer

"THE greatest aid to the actress is the dance—and if she knows the dances of the different nations she can play their nationalities on stage or screen. Especially is this true of the screen—for the dance is a universal language that all can understand."

So says Lily Damita, dancer from France, who makes her second bow to American pictures in the role of Camile in "The Bridge of San Luis Rey," coming Monday to Loew's State.

"In this particular picture," says Miss Damita, "I play a dancer and so, naturally, the dance is of extreme importance. But that just happened. Even if I had not had to dance I would have studied the dances of Peru, for from them I would have obtained the salient points in the characterization of a Peruvian woman.

"So I looked up the old Peruvian dances. These, of course, were taken from the Moors, and they were also tinged with the dances of the ancient Incas in Peru. Hence there is a barbaric abandon to them on both sides of the family, so to speak.

"I had never seen a Peruvian woman, but by using her dances and taking the word of the research experts as to her costumes, I got a characterization that people are good enough to say is genuine."

* * *

AMERICAN pictures are decidedly new to this little dancer, though she has appeared in many in Europe.

"At first," she says, "the make-up puzzled me—and the infinite care with which it is put on. I'd never seen panchromatic make-up and had always used something like a stage makeup in Europe. I thought at first all this experiment and care over make-up was what you call in America, 'phony,' until Charles Brabin, who directed the picture, explained it all to me—that the make-up must look the same, exactly every day.

166

MUSIC

THE ISADORA DUNCAN DANCERS AT THE POPS

Three dance compositions, carefully and beautifully worked out, stirring and expressive in performance, were presented at the Pops last night by the Isadora Duncan Dancers of Moscow. The dances were set to movements of Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony, and though they were doubtless meant to be parts of one whole, as dance compositions they had very distinct separate individualities. This program, both orchestral and choreographic, will be repeated on Thursday and on Saturday. An audience that filled the hall almost to overflowing testified to the fact that the innovation of having dance programs with the usual orchestral program is in keeping with the spirit and taste of Pops habitues, and is highly approved.

The dances were preceded by six pieces played by the Pops Symphony orchestra, with Arthur Fiedler conducting. Mr. Fiedler lavished care and intelligence on the music, and made it much more than merely entertaining. His conducting of the Pathetic Symphony, the interpretation tempered to suit the natural demands of the dance, was praiseworthy too.

As to the dancing, be it said that if Irma Duncan is not a great dancer, she is certainly a great dance composer. Also, she has trained her pupils to a high degree of grace, and has infused into them a sincerity and intensity that promise much for their futures. The Allegro con grazia, as they danced it, was fleet and rhythmic, of a most unaffected grace and loveliness, though it did not offer much, either of freshness or subtlety, in the way of what might be called "dance thought." But the Allegro molto vivace, which was danced next, was a gem of choreography . . . the ideas and motifs were original without being unnatural, Russian in spirit without losing the universal appeal of the "natural" dancing taught by Isadora, stirring, intense, and dramatic without ever sacrificing the rhythmic flow of movement. In this dance, too, the weaving of the ideas, the threads of thought, into a dance pattern, was marvelously accomplished. Here, too, the dancing itself was most lovely-free, abandoned, ecstatic. It really ennobled the music that inspired it. The Finale; Adagio Lamentoso, was interpreted in movements of grace and meaning, by Irma Duncan, sola.

Much applause from the enthusiastic audience told the dancers and musicians how much the evening was enjoyed.

E. B.

Herald

May 8

and weight the more remarkable seem their lightness and plasticity of motion.

Time and again, too, this or that movement recalls Isadora in her prime. Evidently Miss Irma first mastered, then preserved, her teaching. There is the bounding step, knee high-upraised, which was one of Isadora's best possessions; the long flowing line, more graphic for a scarf outflung; the slow and rapt approach, the quick change into a crescendo of pace and rhythm; the diminuendo of departure or the happy troupe streaming away through the parted curtains. Isadora liked to theorize about all the freedoms and to practice most. Consequently she railed at technique, though within obvious limitations, her own was distinctive. In turn these youngsters have absorbed it—for their more characteristic steps, for the play of hands, arms and heads. In the flow or flare or droop of their dancing dress—the rhythm of scarfs and veils and folds as Isadora used to say—it runs as clear. Within her narrow field they stay; within it excel—simple moods, flowing or bounding motion. For those who would have the heavy-handed, heavy-footed, posturing Isadora of the declining years, there is Miss Irma herself. Hers is not a vibrant temperament. In one and another of her solo-numbers too faithfully she recalls her ageing, mannered mistress.

Only the middle-aged may recall the lustrous, marvellous Isadora of a brief prime, little spent upon American stages. For a younger generation, if they know her at all, she is the soiled and sponging creature, posturing for poseurs, of the decadence and of books that might better have gone unwritten, so completely do they efface the lovely image of the glowing years. For nearly all who watch in Symphony Hall her grandchildren in the dance, Isadora is no more than a name, or at most a legend. What pleasures them is this warm youth schooled to the semblance of her prime; its light energy, its fine fluidity, of motion; its sense of undulating line, as in a melody of Schubert, held, varied, intensified; its zest of rhythm touched in or firmly marked; its moments of still, rapt grace; its leaps into exuberance; its fine scorn of all that prettifies and is "precious" in the mean sense of that word. Schubert sings out of this dancing; in it, after the Duncanesque fashion, Chaikovsky runs the gamut of his moods, not always to be patterned, phrased and conveyed in another medium, now too vague, again too intensive. Yet always there is sufficient residue. By instinct and by practice these dancing girls have achieved freedom of bodily motion, rhythmed and attuned; then by quick imagination and spontaneous impulse into beauty woven it. For it was Isadora, even to the third generation, who restored a vernal freshness to the dancing stage.

H. T. P.

TRAV MAY 11

Dancing Daughters Of Isadora Born

In Plain and True Descent Goes the Young Troupe At Symphony Hall

TRANS MAY 1

THE Duncanettes, nightly dancing as third part of The Pops, have won the town. Above stairs and below, at Symphony Hall last evening, there was not a vacant chair or empty table; while for today, tomorrow and Saturday, there are few places left. Miss Irma and her young dancers have a considerable repertory; the two programs of the current week by no means exhaust it; through another six evenings, were the management so disposed, they could give fresh pleasure in new numbers. As it is, the public seems content with either program. If the nine brief pieces from Schubert exhibit the little troupe more variously, the three movements from Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony" show it more intensively. Schubert's Waltzes, the Military March, the slow movement from the Symphony in C major, are for the most part ensemble numbers. To herself, out of the nine, Miss Irma reserves only two; whereas she mimes alone the dolorous Finale of Chaikovsky's Symphony and is the pervasive figure through the middle Allegros. The Schubert-program is the gayer; the Chaikovsky-program, the more ambitious. In both the dancers are accompanied by a larger and better orchestra than they have hitherto known at home or abroad. Symphony Hall has, indeed, been generous with them; while the adaptable Arthur Fiedler is alert and skillful as conductor to a ballet. He gives it line and rhythm. Being sure of its steps, it asks for no more.

Miss Irma was one of the six pupils of Isadora who danced together or in groups, here in America, after their mistress had virtually quit the stage. Irma, of German blood and pains and patience, succeeded to the school in Moscow when Isadora tired of it; fostered and established it. Out of it come the eleven girls, from the teens into the twenties, of the present troupe. To a remembering eye they not only perpetuate the tradition but renew the semblance of Isadora. She had no liking for the taut, slender, fine muscled figures to which Americans are accustomed in the dance. She preferred in her pupils her own full body. Miss Irma is like-minded, and these Russian girls are a strapping youth—tall, large-framed, well-muscled, by no means fleshless. From such shape

Continued on Following Page

At The Pops Tonight

Assisting: The Duncan Dancers

March from The Opera, "Aida"—Introduction to Act III of The Opera, "La Traviata"—Overture to The Opera, "The Force of Destiny"..Verdi
Prelude to The Opera, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg".....Wagner
Air for String Orchestra.....Bach
Rhapsody, "Italia".....Casella

Conductor: A. Casella.

Dances

Allegro con Grazia, Allegro Molto Vivace, Adagio Lamentoso from the "Pathetic Symphony".....Chaikovsky

Conductor: A. Fiedler

Third Week of Pop Concerts

Tomorrow, the Pops at Symphony Hall will enter upon their third week with the first Sunday evening concert of the season and a Wagner program.

Monday night will be the annual Harvard night, at which the Harvard Glee Club, led by Dr. Archibald T. Davison, will add two groups of songs to the orchestral programme. Other features of the week will be the Capriccio Espagnole, and Tannhauser Overture, on Tuesday; Liszt's "Les Preludes," Ravel's "La Valse," and three Tchaikovsky numbers on Wednesday; "Peer Gynt" Suite, "Espana," "Pacific 2-3-1," etc., on Thursday; "William Tell" Overture, Largo, Ave Maria, and other favorites on Friday; and Beethoven's First Symphony on Saturday, together with three Wagnerian excerpts and other popular numbers.

The programs for tonight and tomorrow night follow:

SATURDAY, MAY 11
Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Ave Maria.....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Ballet suite, "Nutcracker".....Tchaikovsky
Dance of the Hours, "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli
Overture to "Nebuchadnezzar".....Verdi
Bacchanale, "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Cappriccio Italien.....Tchaikovsky
The Isadora Duncan dancers
Tchaikovsky program
Symphony No. 6, "Pathetique"
SUNDAY, MAY 12
All-Wagner program
Tannhauser (entrance of the guests into the Wartburg).
A Siegfried Idyll.
Lohengrin (prelude and introduction to act III).
Tannhauser (overture).
The Mastersingers of Nuremburg (prelude).
Tristan and Isolde (prelude and love-death).
Parsifal (Good Friday spell).
The Valkyrie (ride of the Valkyries).

Tchaikovsky Symphony at Pops Tonight

Tomorrow, the Pops at Symphony Hall will enter upon their third week with the first Sunday evening concert of the season and a Wagner program. Monday night will be the annual Harvard Night, at which the Harvard Glee Club, led by Dr. Archibald T. Davison, will add two groups of songs to the orchestral program.

The programs for tonight and tomorrow night follow:

TONIGHT
Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Ave Maria.....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker"..Tchaikovsky
Dance of the Hours, "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli
Overture to "Nebuchadnezzar".....Verdi
Bacchanale, "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Cappriccio Italien.....Tchaikovsky
The Isadora Duncan Dancers
Tchaikovsky Program
Symphony No. 6 "Pathetique"
TOMORROW NIGHT
All-Wagner Program
Tannhauser, Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg
A Siegfried Idyll
Lohengrin, Prelude and Introduction to Act III
Tannhauser, Overture
The Mastersingers of Nuremburg, Prelude
Tristan and Isolde, Prelude and Love-Death
Parsifal, Good Friday Spell
The Valkyrie, Ride of the Valkyries

APR MAY 11

until then.

CAMBRIDGE. MASS. SENTINEL MAY 11

AS TO THE POPS!

It may suggest a paradox to quote the famous Symphony Hall Pop Concerts as an argument in vindication of the wisdom of the 18th Amendment. What has beautiful music masterfully played to do with the gulping of alcohol?

In the old days the Pop concerts were intimately associated with the drinking of spirits. Wiseacres claimed that the abbreviation Pop came from the pungent sound when the stopper parted with the bottle, hence the greater importance of the liquor over the music.

When the amendment came, the popular theme ran as follows: "The Pop Concerts are done. Music cannot interest without an alcoholic stimulant." The amazing success of those annual concerts in the past decade has refuted the shallow reasoners and vindicated the courage of Symphony Hall in continuing the series, with ice cream and tonics as rational substitutes for beer and spirits.

How may the demoralizing influence of a jazzified music be better combatted than by these delightful nightly concerts, where Symphony players, led by a musician of world fame, create "a concourse of sweet sounds," as Shakespeare puts it.

Cambridge puts a high value on the "Pops."

JOYOUS MUSIC—RHYTHMIC INTERLUDES

The Isadora Duncan dancers ... in Symphony hall each night this

TRAV MAY 12

SUNDAY ADVERTISER—Boston's Greatest Ci...

ANNUAL HARVARD NIGHT AT THE POPS TOMORROW EVENING

THE Pop concerts in Symphony Hall will enter upon their third week today, when Alfredo Casella will conduct the first Sunday night concert of the season.

Conductor Casella announces the following programs for the third week:

TONIGHT
ALL-WAGNER PROGRAM
Tannhauser, Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg
A Siegfried Idyll
Tristan and Isolde, Prelude and Love-Death
Tannhauser, Overture
The Mastersingers of Nuremburg, Prelude
Lohengrin, Prelude and Introduction to Act III
Parsifal, Good Friday Spell
The Valkyrie, Ride of the Valkyries

MONDAY
Overture to "Nina, O La Pazza Per Amore".....Paisiello
Set of Act Tunes and Dances.....Purcell-Bliss
Overture to "Leonore" No. 3.Beethoven
Songs by Harvard Glee Club
Overture to "The Siege of Corinth".....Rossini
Forest Murmurs.....Wagner
Rhapsody, "Italia".....Casella
Songs by Harvard Glee Club
Ballet of the Hours, "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli
Waltz, "Artist's Life".....Strauss
Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Fair Harvard

TUESDAY
Marche Militaire.....Schubert
Minuet.....Boccherini
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Overture to "La Gazza Ladra".. Rossini
Invitation to the Dance...Weber-Berlioz
Capriccio Espagnole..Rimsky-Korsakov
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Russian Lullaby.....Berlin-Casella
Stars and Stripes Forever.....Sousa

WEDNESDAY
Overture to "The Secret Marriage".....Cimarosa
Masque Suite for String Orchestra.....Handel
Overture to "Semiramide".....Rossini
"Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem.Liszt
Contra Dances.....Mozart
"La Valse," Choregraphic Poem Ravel
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker".Tchaikovsky
Song Without Words.....Tchaikovsky
Marche Slave.....Tchaikovsky

THURSDAY
Military March.....Schubert-Casella
Suite, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Overture to "Rienzi".....Wagner
Pavane pour une Infante Defunte.Ravel
"Pacific 2-3-1," Symphonic Movement.....Honegger
"Espana," Rhapsody.....Chabrier
Irish Rhapsody.....Herbert
Intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz"..Mascagni
Hungarian March, "Rakoczy"...Berlioz

FRIDAY
March from "Aida".....Verdi
Ave Maria.....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Capriccio Italien.....Tchaikovsky
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia".....Delibes
Largo.....Handel
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Ballet of the Hours, "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli
Liebesfreud.....Kreisler
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt

SATURDAY
Overture to "Cinderella".....Rossini
Three Dances from "Cephalus and Procris".....Gretry-Mottl
Overture to "La Forza del Destino".....Verdi
Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 21.....Beethoven
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg".....Wagner
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser".Wagner
Ride of the Valkyries".....Wagner

Right at Home in Role of Dancer

"THE greatest aid to the actress is the dance—and if she knows the dances of the different nations she can play their nationalities on stage or screen. Especially is this true of the screen—for the dance is a universal language that all can understand."

So says Lily Damita, dancer from France, who makes her second bow to American pictures in the role of Camile in "The Bridge of San Luis Rey," coming Monday to Loew's State.

"In this particular picture," says Miss Damita, "I play a dancer and so, naturally, the dance is of extreme importance. But that just happened. Even if I had not had to dance I would have studied the dances of Peru, for from them I would have obtained the salient points in the characterization of a Peruvian woman.

"So I looked up the old Peruvian dances. These, of course, were taken from the Moors, and they were also tinged with the dances of the ancient Incas in Peru. Hence there is a barbaric abandon to them on both sides of the family, so to speak.

"I had never seen a Peruvian woman, but by using her dances and taking the word of the research experts as to her costumes, I got a characterization that people are good enough to say is genuine."

* * *

AMERICAN pictures are decidedly new to this little dancer, though she has appeared in many in Europe.

"At first," she says, "the make-up puzzled me—and the infinite care with which it is put on. I'd never seen panchromatic make-up and had always used something like a stage makeup in Europe. I thought at first all this experiment and care over make-up was what you call in America, 'bunk,' until Charles Brabin, who directed the picture, explained it all to me—that the make-up must look the same, exactly every day.

CONCERTS

HERALD MAY 12

THIRD WEEK OF POPS

The Pop concerts in Symphony Hall will enter upon their third week today, when Alfredo Casella will then conduct the first Sunday night concert of the season. The noted leader will devote the program to the music of Wagner.

Another program of special interest is listed for tomorrow, which will be the annual Harvard night of the season. The Harvard Glee Club will fill two numbers on the program, with groups of songs.

As usual, refreshments, smoking and light social intercourse at the tables which cover the floor of Symphony Hall will make the Pops program the more enjoyable, for it is these attributes of the Pops which give them their distinctiveness.

Conductor Casella announces the following program for the third week:

SUNDAY

ALL-WAGNER PROGRAM

Tannhaeuser—Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg.
A Siegfried Idyll.
Tristan and Isolde—Prelude and Love-Death.
Tannhaeuser—Overture.
The Mastersingers of Nuremburg—Prelude.
Lohengrin—Prelude and Introduction to Act III.
Parsifal—Good Friday Spell.
The Valkyrie—Ride of the Valkyries.

MONDAY

Overture to "Nina".....Paisiello
Set of Act Tunes and Dances...Purcell-Bliss
Overture to "Leonore" No. 3.....Beethoven
Songs by Harvard Glee Club.
Overture to "The Siege of Corinth"..Rossini
Forest Murmurs.....Wagner
Rhapsody, "Italia".....Casella
Songs by Harvard Glee Club.
Ballet of the Hours, "La Gioconda"..Ponchielli
Waltz, "Artist's Life".....Strauss
Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Fair Harvard.

TUESDAY

Marche Militaire.....Schubert
Minuet.....Boccherini
Overture to "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner
Overture to "La Gazza Ladra".....Rossini
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz
Capriccio Espagnole.....Rimsky-Korsakov
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Russian Lullaby.....Berlin-Casella
Stars and Stripes Forever.....Sousa

WEDNESDAY

Overture to "The Secret Marriage".Cimarosa
Masque Suite for String Orchestra....Handel
Overture to "Semiramide".....Rossini
"Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem.....Liszt
Contra Dances.....Mozart
"La Valse," Choregraphic Poem.....Ravel
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker".....Tchaikovsky
Song Without Words.....Tchaikovsky
Marche Slave.....Tchaikovsky

THURSDAY

Military March.....Schubert-Casella
Suite, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Overture to "Rienzi".....Wagner
Pavane pour une Infante Defunte.....Ravel
"Pacific 2-3-1," Symphonic Movement.....Honegger
"Espana," Rhapsody.....Chabrier
Irish Rhapsody.....Herbert
Intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz".....Mascagni
Hungarian March, "Rakoczy".....Berlioz

FRIDAY

March from "Aida".....Verdi
Ave Maria.....Schubert-Wilhelmi
Capriccio Italien.....Tchaikovsky
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia".....Delibes
Largo.....Handel
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Ballet of the Hours, "La Gioconda"..Ponchielli
Liebesfreud.....Kreisler
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt

SATURDAY

Overture to "Cinderella".....Rossini
Three Dances from "Cephalus and Procris".....Gretry-Mottl
Overture to "La Forza del Destino"....Verdi
Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 21.....Beethoven
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg".....Wagner
Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner
Ride of the "Valkyries".....Wagner

Programs of the Week

GLOBE MAY 12

SYMPHONY HALL—Evenings at 8:15. The Pops, Alfredo Casella, conductor.

Sunday, May 12—All-Wagner Program—"Tannhouser," entrance of the guests into the Wartburg; "A Siegfried Idyll," "Tristan and Isolde," prelude and love-death; "Tannhauser" overture; "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," prelude; "Lohengrin," prelude and introduction to Act III; "Persifal," Good Friday spell; "The Valkyrie," ride of the Valkyries.

Monday, May 13—Overture to "Nina, O La Pazza Per Amore," Paisiello; set of act tunes and dances, Purcell-Bliss; overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven; songs by Harvard Glee Club; overture to "The Siege of Corinth," "Rossini; "Forest Murmurs," Wagner; Rhapsody, "Italia," Casella; songs by Harvard Glee Club; Ballet of the Hours, "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; waltz, "Artist's Life," Strauss; "Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar; "Fair Harvard."

Tuesday, May 14—"Marche Militaire," Schubert; Minuet, Boccherini; Overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; Overture to "La Gazza Ladra," Rossini; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Berlioz; "Capriccio Espagnole," Rimsky-Korsakov; Suite from "Carmen," Bizet; "Russian Lullaby," Berlin-Casella; "Stars and Stripes Forever," Sousa.

Wednesday, May 15—Overture to "The Secret Marriage," Cimarosa; "Masque Suite," for string orchestra, Handel; Overture to "Semiramide," Rossini; "Les Preludes," Liszt; Contra Dances, Mozart; "La Valse," Ravel; Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker," "Song Without Words," "Marche Slave," Tchaikovsky.

Thursday, May 16—"Military March," Schubert-Casella; suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; overture to "Oberon," Weber; overture to "Rienzi," Wagner; "Pavane pour une Infante Defunte," Ravel; "Pacific 2-3-1," Honegger; "Espana," Chabrier; "Irish Rhapsody," Herbert; intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz," Mascagni; Hungarian march, "Rakoczy," Berlioz.

Friday, May 17—March from "Aida," Verdi; "Ave Maria," Schubert-Wilhelmj; "Capriccio Italian," Tchaikovsky; ballet suite, "Sylvia," Delibes; Largo, Handel; overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Ballet of the Hours, "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; "Liebesfreud," Kreisler; Second Hungarian Rhapsody, Lisst.

BOSTON BEGINS THE 'POPS'

N.Y. TIMES - MAY 12 -

Summer Music Plans in Other Centres—Local Band to Start in June

MELODY flowed at the May Day opening of the Boston "Pops," concerning which The Boston Herald remarked that 2,600 persons were present to hear eighty-five of Mr. Koussevitzky's players, led for another supplemental term by Alfredo Casella. This event began a forty-fourth season. The fifty-eight nightly concerts to come were estimated to produce a total attendance of 125,000 persons. The Puritan newspaper did not fail to mention "liquid refreshments" at tables set about Symphony Hall.

"Dire predictions," The Herald recalled, "were made for the fate of the 'Pops' until they appeared in their first prohibition début season. The tables were there just like the other days. The crowds came, and many were on hand the first night of the prohibition début, expecting it to be the death knell of the famed musical institution. That was a memorable night just ten years ago. Though wines and beer were missing, the audiences were soon won to the music.

"Soft drinks and refreshments are now served at the same tables. An informal atmosphere permeates the audience, and should any one overlook going to the 'Pops' during a season at least once or more, music circles raise their eyebrows in astonishment."

Concert-Chronicle

Wagnerian Pops

FOLLOWING a concert season well stocked in all-Wagner programs and part-Wagner programs came last evening Mr. Casella's first Sunday concert of the current Pops series as another contribution to the total score. Yet the demand is insatiable. Save for a sprinkling of empty seats at the tables on the floor, the hall was filled; probably every seat would have been taken had it not been for the threat of a storm. And the audience listened and applauded with pleasure. For more times this season than it is convenient to count, the Prelude to "The Mastersingers" has sounded from the Boston Symphony's strings, wood-winds and brass. Last evening Mr. Casella vigorously opened the second division of his program with this Prelude. All-Wagner programs may come and go, but the Prelude to "The Mastersingers" marches on. Otherwise, the excerpts, preludes and overtures of the program were familiar ones from Tannhäuser, Lohengrin, Tristan and Isolde, Parsifal and The Valkyr. "A Siegfried Idylle," less frequently heard, was an exception. Perhaps the older generation of Boston concert-goers can remember when the music of Wagner was not so generally acecpted; when an all-Wagner concert divided the town into two rival camps? Who is the present-day Wagner, now dividing the town, to whom whole concerts will be devoted thirty years hence?

To distinguish Mr. Casella's interpretation of Wagnerian music is to say that the conductor lets the composer speak for himself. For the processional music of the Entrance of the Guests into Wartburg, Mr. Casella gives full reign to the brittle brightness, the biting attacks and crystal tones of which virtuosi instrumentalists are capable; yet holds steady and inelastic the tempo; sharply outlines the rhythmic patterns and sinuous voices. In the Prelude to Tannhäuser," he begins deliberately, moves with solemn majesty, abruptly inserts the Venusburg measures, piles sonority upon sonority as overwhelming conviction. This Tannhäuser music, indeed, finds Mr. Casella in his most authoritative and impressive manner. For the resounding surges of "The Mastersingers" and the Ride of Valkyrs he once more opens up the full stops of trumpets, tubas and trombones, to carry everything by weight and magnificence of tone. Again, in such processional music as the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin" he is crisp and rhythmically rigid. To speak its true meaning, Wagner's music must indeed rise starkly from the music pages through superb instrumental performance; Mr. Casella will not stop to color it with his own personality, unless that is one of pure and unemotional classicism or ,on the other hand, unyielding modernism. With the music of "A Siegfried Idylle," the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal," the conductor is even more objective. The translucent glow, the gentle warmth of weaving voices, the fluttering leafage of forest murmurs sound directly and purely from the score. N. M. J.

ALL-WAGNER PROGRAM AT POPS

Bos. AMER MAY 13

By MOSES SMITH

Alfredo Casella presented an all-Wagner program for the first Sunday evening of the "Pops." The list included the Overture and March from "Tannhauser," the "Siegfried Idyll," the Prelude and Introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin," the Prelude to the "Mastersingers," Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan," "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," and the inevitable "Ride of the Valkyries."

This excellent and representative program was performed with far greater sympathy for the composer's intention than Casella has usually displayed. Though the tempi were still too fast, it seemed that the conductor was approaching Wagner without the animosity that is his wont. The "Idyll" was especially grateful to hear.

Earlier in the day Joseph F. Wagner led his Boston Civic Symphony Orchestra in a concert before a goodly audience at Jordan Hall. Hazel Hallett was soloist in the Chopin F minor piano concerto. The purely orchestral numbers included Rossini's Overture, "Barber of Seville," the Intermezzo from Henry Hadley's "Cleopatra's Night" and, for the first time in America, Boellmann's Symphony in F major.

This symphony, while displaying no great originality in ideas and treatment, was dramatic, often melodious, and contained much honest music-making.

The other item of importance of the week-end in music was a production, in English, of "Carmen" by company directed by the dynamic Ethel Leginska. Inasmuch as, at the time of performance, I was on the road to Northampton, where Werner Josten was putting on the first American performances of Monteverdi's "Orfeo" and Handel's "Apollo e Daphne," I can simply retell the report of an assistant that Leginska's presentation, featuring local singers and her Women's Symphony Orchestra, was experimental, as she had intended.

It was worth, incidentally, travelling 200 miles to see the Smith College presentation. The performances, which were semi-amateur, were finely conceived and, for the most part, well executed.

Last night brought the first Sunday evening concert of the season's Symphony Hall Pops. For this occasion Mr. Casella submitted a Wagner program which included the Entrance into the Wartburg from "Tannhäuser," the "Siegfried Idyll," the Prelude and Introduction to Act III from Lohengrin," the "Tannhäuser" Overture, the "Meistersinger" Prelude, the "Tristan" Prelude and Love-Death, the Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal" and the Ride of the Valkyries. It must be admitted that for a musician whose artistic ideals are at the opposite pole from Wagner's, Mr. Casella gives excellent performances of the master's work. He also did a good service to the composer and to his own audience by including in his program, in addition to some of the usual items of a Wagner list, the "Siegfried Idyll" and the Good Friday Spell, which are not often heard. He evidently had devoted care to the preparation of these numbers, too; the performance of the "Idyll" was the finest of the evening. A large audience was enthusiastic. The next Sunday evening concert will be given May 26. MON. MAY 13

Third Week of Pop Concerts

The Pop concerts in Symphony Hall are now in the third week of this, their 44th season. Alfredo Casella has compiled programs of special popular appeal for this week.

Tomorrow, there will be a section of Tchaikovsky's music, and on Saturday a section of Wagner. Thursday will bring such favorites as the "Peer Gynt" Suite, Oberon and Rienzi Overtures, "Espana" and Irish Rhapsodies. etc, and Friday, Schubert's "Ave Maria"; Handel's "Largo"; "William Tell Overture," "Sylvia" Ballet, etc.

MAY 14-GLOBE

TRANS MAY 13

At The Pops Tonight

"Harvard Night"

Overture to The Opera, "Nina Puddled with Love".....Paisiello
Suite from the Stage Music of..Purcell (Edited by Arthur Bliss)
Overture to "Leonora," No. 3..Beethoven
Songs
Overture to The Opera, "The Siege of Corinth".....Rossini
Forest Scene from The Opera, "Siegfried".....Wagner
Rhapsody, "Italia".....Casella
Songs
Dance of The Hours from The Opera, "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli
Waltz, "Artist's Life".....J. Strauss
March, "Pomp and Circumstance".Elgar
"Fair Harvard"

Conductors:
A. Casella A. T. Davison

Assisting: The Harvard Glee Club

GLOBE MAY 19

Fourth Week of the Pops

Tomorrow will usher in the fourth week of the Pop concerts, which are now having their 44th season at Symphony Hall. Alfredo Casella has made programs of special interest and popular appeal for each night of this week to be presented by the orchestra of Symphony players, which is surely the finest to be found anywhere at this time of year.

Members of Simmons College, the Y. W. C. A. and Roxbury Latin School will celebrate on Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, respectively, but these, like all other nights, are open to the public. Conductor Casella will present a Tschaikowsky-Wagner program on Saturday, and a symphonic program for the second Sunday night Pop concert, next Sunday, May 26th, at which he will present his own Concerto Romano for organ and orchestra, for the first time in Boston; likewise Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony and other numbers to be announced.

The other programs of the week follow:

Monday, May 20—Wedding March, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; Gavotte from "Les Petits Riens," Mozart; Turkish March from "The Ruins of Athens," Beethoven; Overture to "The Siege of Corinth," Rossini; Introduction and March from "Le Coq d'Or," Rimsky-Korsakov; "Night on Bald Mountain," Moussorgsky; Suite from the Ballet, "La Giara," Casella; Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; Suite from "Carmen," Bizet; Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers," Verdi.

Tuesday, May 21—"Marche Militaire," Schubert; Largo, Handel; Overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Songs by Simmons Glee Club; Overture to "The Bartered Bride," Smetana; Excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust," Berlioz; "Capriccio Italien," Tschaikowsky; Overture to "Rienzi," Prelude to "Lohengrin," Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner.

Wednesday, May 22—Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, "Tannhauser," Wagner; Invitation to the Dance, Weber-Berlioz; Roumanian Rhapsody, Enesco; Overture to "La Forza del Destino," Verdi; Largo from the "New World" Symphony, Dvorak; Overture Solennelle, "1812," Tschaikowsky; Prelude to "Carmen," Bizet; Molly on the Shore, Grainger; Liebestraum, Liszt; Second Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt.

Thursday, May 23—March from "Aida," Verdi; Suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; Overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; "Espana," Rhapsody, Chabrier; "Pacific 2-3-1," Honegger; "Italia," Casella; Ballet of the Hours from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni; Marche Slave, Tschaikowsky.

Friday, May 24—Coronation march from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer; minuet, Boccherini; gypsy dance from "Carmen," Bizet; ballet suite, "Sylvia," Delibes; "Finlandia," Symphonic poem, Sibelius; air for string orchestra from the suite in D major, No. 3, Bach; "Capriccio Espagnole," Rimsky-Korsakov; "French Military March," Saint-Saens; "Ave Maria," Schubert-Wilhelmj; "Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner.

Saturday, May 25—Tchaikovsky-Wagner program: "Marche Slave," "Capriccio Italien," Tchaikovsky; "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," excerpts from act 3, "A Siegfried Idyll," overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner; ballet suite, "Nutcracker," "Song Without Words," overture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky.

FOURTH WEEK MAY 19

HERALD

OF THE POPS

Tomorrow will usher in the fourth week of the Pop concerts which are now having their 44th season at Symphony hall. Alfredo Casella has made programs of special interest and popular appeal for each night of this week to be presented by the orchestra of Symphony players, the finest to be found anywhere at this time of year.

Members of Simmons College, the Y. W. C. A., and Roxbury Latin school will celebrate on Tuesday, Thursday and Friday respectively, but these like all other nights are open to the public. Conductor Casella will present a Tchaikovsky-Wagner programme on Saturday, and a symphonic program for the second Sunday night Pop concert, next Sunday, May 26, at which he will present his own Concerto Romano for organ and orchestra, for the first time in Boston; likewise Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony and other numbers to be announced.

The other programs of the week follow:

MONDAY, MAY 20

Wedding March, "A Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
Gavotte from "Les Petits Riens".....Mozart
Turkish March from "The Ruins of Athens".....Beethoven
Overture to "The Siege of Corinth".....Rossini
Introduction and March from "Le Coq d'Or".....Rimsky-Korsakov
"Night on Bald Mountain".....Moussorgsky
Suite from the Ballet, "La Giara".....Casella
Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah".....Saint-Saens
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers".....Verdi

TUESDAY

Marche Militaire.....Schubert
Largo.....Handel
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Songs by Simmons Glee Club
Overture to "The Bartered Bride".....Smetana
Excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust".....Berlioz
Capriccio Italien.....Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Rienzi".....Wagner
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner

WEDNESDAY

Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz
Roumanian Rhapsody.....Enesco
Overture to "La Forza del Destino".....Verdi
Largo from the "New World" Symphony.....Dvorak
Ouverture Solemnelle, "1812"...Tchaikovsky
Prelude to "Carmen".....Bizet
Molly on the Shore.....Grainger
Liebestraum.....Liszt
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt

THURSDAY

March from "Aida".....Verdi
Suite, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Overture to "Tannhaluser".....Wagner
"Espana," Rhapsody.....Chabrier
"Pacific 2-3-1," Smyphonic Movement.....Honegger
"Italia," Rhapsody.....Casella
Ballet of the Hours from "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana".....Mascagni
Marche Slave.....Tchaikovsky

FRIDAY

Coronation March from "The Prophet".....Meyerbeer
Minuet.....Boccherini
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen".....Bizet
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia".....Delibes
"Finlandia," Symphonic Poem.....Sibelius
Air for String Orchestra from the Suite in D major, No. 3.....Bach
Capriccio Espagnole.....Rimsky-Korsakov
French Military March.....Saint-Saens
Ave Maria.....Schubert-Wilhelmi
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner

SATURDAY

Tchaikovsky—Wagner Program
Marche Slave
Capriccio Italien.....Tchaikovsky
The Mastersingers of Nuremburg.
Excerpts from Act III
A Siegfried Idyll
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman".....Wagner
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker"
Song Without Words
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812".....Tchaikovsky

Saturday, May 18: Overture to "Cinderella," Rossini; three dances from "Cephalus and Procris," Gretry-Mottl; overture to "La Forza del Destino," Verdi; symphony No. 1 in C major, op. 21, Beethoven; prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," bacchanale from "Tannhauser," "Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner.

program only. The opening ... will be "The Leatherneck."

TRAV. MAY 18 -

FOURTH WEEK OF POPS

Monday will usher in the fourth week of the Pop concerts which are now having their 44 season at Symphony hall. Alfredo Casella has made programs of special interest and popular appeal for each night of next week to be presented by the orchestra of Symphony players which is surely the finest to be found anywhere at this time of year.

Members of Simmons College, the Y. W. C. A., and Roxbury Latin School will celebrate on Tuesday, Thursday and Friday respectively, but these like all other nights are open to the public.

Conductor Casella will present a Tchaikovsky-Wagner program on Saturday, and a symphony program for the second Sunday night Pop concert, Sunday, May 26, at which he will present his own Concerto Romano for organ and orchestra, for the first time in Boston; likely Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony and other numbers to be announced.

The program for tonight follows:

Overture to "Cinderella".....Rossini
Three Dances from "Cephalus and Procris".....Gretry-Mottl
Overture to "La Forza del Destino" Verdi
Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 21 Beethoven
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg".....Wagner
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser".Wagner
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner

TRANS

Concert-Chronicle

Leavening The Pops MAY 21

MORE and more the music of the winter Symphony Concerts encroaches upon the Pops. If one may believe one's ears in hearing applause, the public is grateful. Last evening, for example, between a first group consisting of Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," a gavotte from Mozart's "Les Petits Riens," the Turkish March out of Beethoven's "The Ruins of Athens," the Overture to Rossini's "The Siege of Corinth," and a last group made up of the Bacchanale from Saint-Saëns's "Samson and Delilah," a suite of three pieces out of "Carmen" and the Overture to Verdi's "The Sicilian Vespers" (music of the theater, by the way, all of it) played in Mr. Casella's straighforward and masterful manner, there stood three pieces which might have found place on any Symphony program—the introduction to and a march from Rimsky-Korsakov's "The Golden Cockerel," Musorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain" and the suite drawn from Mr. Casella's ballet, or "choreographic comedy," as he calls it, "The Jar."

Fanciful music for a fanciful plot is Rimsky-Korsakov's score for "The Golden Cockerel." Hearing it, one were dull-witted indeed, if he could anticipate in degree some such announcement as the astrologer makes at the astonishing end of the play when he says that after all the whole is no more than fairy tale. Into the very texture of harmonies and melodies, of rhythms and orchestral timbres is this element blended. Delicacy, lightness, charm, a degree of mystery, by these is it known. The piquant solo at the beginning announces it. The march of last evening does not pound, does not grow insistent. The feet which it is intended to accompany are not those of Roman legions, nor those of inflated modern conquerors; to the steps of the mock army of Pushkin's fairy tale it

CON. NEXT PAGE

Mr Casella has again put a symphony on a Pops program, Beethoven's First is to be played next Saturday night. The Wagner program for the first of the fortnightly Sunday Pops tonight is likely to draw a very large audience.

GLOBE MAY 21

Fourth Week of Pops

The Pop concerts in Symphony Hall are now in the fourth week of their 44th season.

Special nights of interest this week are Simmons night, tonight, and Roxbury Latin night Friday. These, like all other nights, are open to the public. Saturday there will be a Tchaikovsky-Wagner program, and next Sunday, a symphonic program, including Beethoven's "Pastorale" Symphony, Casella's Organ Concerto and Ravel's Second Suite from "Daphnis and Chloe."

CONCERTS

HERALD MAY 12

THIRD WEEK OF POPS

The Pop concerts in Symphony Hall will enter upon their third week today, when Alfredo Casella will then conduct the first Sunday night concert of the season. The noted leader will devote the program to the music of Wagner.

Another program of special interest is listed for tomorrow, which will be the annual Harvard night of the season. The Harvard Glee Club will fill two numbers on the program, with groups of songs.

As usual, refreshments, smoking and light social intercourse at the tables which cover the floor of Symphony Hall will make the Pops program the more enjoyable, for it is these attributes of the Pops which give them their distinctiveness.

Conductor Casella announces the following program for the third week:

SUNDAY

ALL-WAGNER PROGRAM

Tannhaeuser—Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg.
A Siegfried Idyll.
Tristan and Isolde—Prelude and Love-Death.
Tannhaeuser—Overture.
The Mastersingers of Nuremburg—Prelude.
Lohengrin—Prelude and Introduction to Act III.
Parsifal—Good Friday Spell.
The Valkyrie—Ride of the Valkyries.

MONDAY

Overture to "Nina" ..... Paisiello
Set of Act Tunes and Dances ... Purcell-Bliss
Overture to "Leonore" No. 3 ..... Beethoven
Songs by Harvard Glee Club.
Overture to "The Siege of Corinth" .. Rossini
Forest Murmurs ..... Wagner
Rhapsody, "Italia" ..... Casella
Songs by Harvard Glee Club.
Ballet of the Hours, "La Gioconda" ..... Ponchielli
Waltz, "Artist's Life" ..... Strauss
Pomp and Circumstance ..... Elgar
Fair Harvard.

TUESDAY

Marche Militaire ..... Schubert
Minuet ..... Boccherini
Overture to "Tannhaeuser" ..... Wagner
Overture to "La Gazza Ladra" ..... Rossini
Invitation to the Dance ... Weber-Berlioz
Capriccio Espagnole ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Suite from "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Russian Lullaby ..... Berlin-Casella
Stars and Stripes Forever ..... Sousa

WEDNESDAY

Overture to "The Secret Marriage" .. Cimarosa
Masque Suite for String Orchestra .... Handel
Overture to "Semiramide" ..... Rossini
"Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem ..... Liszt
Contra Dances ..... Mozart
"La Valse," Choregraphic Poem ..... Ravel
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker" ..... Tchaikovsky
Song Without Words ..... Tchaikovsky
Marche Slave ..... Tchaikovsky

THURSDAY

Military March ..... Schubert-Casella
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
Overture to "Oberon" ..... Weber
Overture to "Rienzi" ..... Wagner
Pavane pour une Infante Defunte ..... Ravel
"Pacific 2-3-1," Symphonic Movement ..... Honegger
"Espana," Rhapsody ..... Chabrier
Irish Rhapsody ..... Herbert
Intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz" ..... Mascagni
Hungarian March, "Rakoczy" ..... Berlioz

FRIDAY

March from "Aida" ..... Verdi
Ave Maria ..... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Capriccio Italien ..... Tchaikovsky
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia" ..... Delibes
Largo ..... Handel
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Ballet of the Hours, "La Gioconda" ..... Ponchielli
Liebesfreud ..... Kreisler
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt

SATURDAY

Overture to "Cinderella" ..... Rossini
Three Dances from "Cephalus and Procris" ..... Gretry-Mottl
Overture to "La Forza del Destino" .... Verdi
Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 21 ..... Beethoven
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg" ..... Wagner
Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser" ..... Wagner
Ride of the "Valkyries" ..... Wagner

Programs of the Week

GLOBE MAY 12

SYMPHONY HALL—Evenings at 8:15. The Pops, Alfredo Casella, conductor.

Sunday, May 12—All-Wagner Program—"Tannhouser." entrance of the guests into the Wartburg; "A Siegfried Idyll," "Tristan and Isolde," prelude and love-death; "Tannhauser," overture; "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," prelude; "Lohengrin," prelude and introduction to Act III; "Persifal," Good Friday spell; "The Valkyrie," ride of the Valkyries.

Monday, May 13—Overture to "Nina, O La Pazza Per Amore," Paisiello; set of act tunes and dances, Purcell-Bliss; overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven; songs by Harvard Glee Club; overture to "The Siege of Corinth," "Rossini; "Forest Murmurs," Wagner; Rhapsody, "Italia," Casella; songs by Harvard Glee Club; Ballet of the Hours, "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; waltz, "Artist's Life," Strauss; "Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar; "Fair Harvard."

Tuesday, May 14—"Marche Militaire," Schubert; Minuet, Boccherini; Overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; Overture to "La Gazza Ladra," Rossini; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Berlioz; "Capriccio Espagnole," Rimsky-Korsakov; Suite from "Carmen," Bizet; "Russian Lullaby," Berlin-Casella; "Stars and Stripes Forever," Sousa.

Wednesday, May 15—Overture to "The Secret Marriage," Cimarosa; "Masque Suite," for string orchestra, Handel; Overture to "Semiramide," Rossini; "Les Preludes," Liszt; Contra Dances, Mozart; "La Valse," Ravel; Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker," "Song Without Words," "Marche Slave," Tchaikovsky.

Thursday, May 16—"Military March," Schubert-Casella; suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; overture to "Oberon," Weber; overture to "Rienzi," Wagner; "Pavane pour une Infante Defunte," Ravel; "Pacific 2-3-1," Honegger; "Espana," Chabrier; "Irish Rhapsody," Herbert; intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz," Mascagni; Hungarian march, "Rakoczy," Berlioz.

Friday, May 17—March from "Aida," Verdi; "Ave Maria," Schubert-Wilhelmj; "Capriccio Italian," Tchaikovsky; ballet suite, "Sylvia," Delibes; Largo, Handel; overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Ballet of the Hours, "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; "Liebesfreud," Kreisler; Second Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt.

BOSTON BEGINS THE 'POPS'

N.Y. TIMES - MAY 12 -

Summer Music Plans in Other Centres—Local Band to Start in June

MELODY flowed at the May Day opening of the Boston "Pops," concerning which The Boston Herald remarked that 2,600 persons were present to hear eighty-five of Mr. Koussevitzky's players, led for another supplemental term by Alfredo Casella. This event began a forty-fourth season. The fifty-eight nightly concerts to come were estimated to produce a total attendance of 125,000 persons. The Puritan newspaper did not fail to mention "liquid refreshments" at tables set about Symphony Hall.

"Dire predictions," The Herald recalled, "were made for the fate of the 'Pops' until they appeared in their first prohibition début season. The tables were there just like the other days. The crowds came, and many were on hand the first night of the prohibition début, expecting it to be the death knell of the famed musical institution. That was a memorable night just ten years ago. Though wines and beer were missing, the audiences were soon won to the music.

"Soft drinks and refreshments are now served at the same tables. An informal atmosphere permeates the audience, and should any one overlook going to the 'Pops' during a season at least once or more, music circles raise their eyebrows in astonishment."

pianist will be in America three months, December to February, inclusive. As already announced, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have Prokofieff as soloist for seven performances, in both Boston and New York.

ALL-WAGNER PROGRAM AT POPS

Bos. AMER MAY 13

By MOSES SMITH

Alfredo Casella presented an all-Wagner program for the first Sunday evening of the "Pops." The list included the Overture and March from "Tannhauser," the "Siegfried Idyll," the Prelude and Introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin," the Prelude to the "Mastersingers," Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan," "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," and the inevitable "Ride of the Valkyries."

This excellent and representative program was performed with far greater sympathy for the composer's intention than Casella has usually displayed. Though the tempi were still too fast, it seemed that the conductor was approaching Wagner without the animosity that is his wont. The "Idyll" was especially grateful to hear.

Earlier in the day Joseph F. Wagner led his Boston Civic Symphony Orchestra in a concert before a goodly audience at Jordan Hall. Hazel Hallett was soloist in the Chopin F minor piano concerto. The purely orchestral numbers included Rossini's Overture, "Barber of Seville," the Intermezzo from Henry Hadley's "Cleopatra's Night" and, for the first time in America, Boellmann's Symphony in F major

This symphony, while displaying no great originality in ideas and treatment, was dramatic, often melodious, and contained much honest music-making.

The other item of importance of the week-end in music was a production, in English, of "Carmen" by company directed by the dynamic Ethel Leginska. Inasmuch as, at the time of performance, I was on the road to Northampton, where Werner Josten was putting on the first American performances of Monteverdi's "Orfeo" and Handel's "Apollo e Daphne," I can simply retell the report of an assistant that Leginska's presentation, featuring local singers and her Women's Symphony Orchestra, was experimental, as she had intended.

It was worth, incidentally, travelling 200 miles to see the Smith College presentation. The performances, which were semi-amateur, were finely conceived and, for the most part, well executed.

Concert-Chronicle

Wagnerian Pops

FOLLOWING a concert season well stocked in all-Wagner programs and part-Wagner programs came last evening Mr. Casella's first Sunday concert of the current Pops series as another contribution to the total score. Yet the demand is insatiable. Save for a sprinkling of empty seats at the tables on the floor, the hall was filled; probably every seat would have been taken had it not been for the threat of a storm. And the audience listened and applauded with pleasure. For more times this season than it is convenient to count, the Prelude to "The Mastersingers" has sounded from the Boston Symphony's strings, wood-winds and brass. Last evening Mr. Casella vigorously opened the second division of his program with this Prelude. All-Wagner programs may come and go, but the Prelude to "The Mastersingers" marches on. Otherwise, the excerpts, preludes and overtures of the program were familiar ones from Tannhäuser, Lohengrin, Tristan and Isolde, Parsifal and The Valkyr. "A Siegfried Idylle," less frequently heard, was an exception. Perhaps the older generation of Boston concert-goers can remember when the music of Wagner was not so generally acecpted; when an all-Wagner concert divided the town into two rival camps? Who is the present-day Wagner, now dividing the town, to whom whole concerts will be devoted thirty years hence?

To distinguish Mr. Casella's interpretation of Wagnerian music is to say that the conductor lets the composer speak for himself. For the processional music of the Entrance of the Guests into Wartburg, Mr. Casella gives full reign to the brittle brightness, the biting attacks and crystal tones of which virtuosi instrumentalists are capable; yet holds steady and inelastic the tempo; sharply outlines the rhythmic patterns and sinuous voices. In the Prelude to Tannhäuser," he begins deliberately, moves with solemn majesty, abruptly inserts the Venusburg measures, piles sonority upon sonority as overwhelming conviction. This Tannhäuser music, indeed, finds Mr. Casella in his most authoritative and impressive manner. For the resounding surges of "The Mastersingers" and the Ride of Valkyrs he once more opens up the full stops of trumpets, tubas and trombones, to carry everything by weight and magnificence of tone. Again, in such processional music as the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin" he is crisp and rhythmically rigid. To speak its true meaning, Wagner's music must indeed rise starkly from the music pages through superb instrumental performance; Mr. Casella will not stop to color it with his own personality, unless that is one of pure and unemotional classicism or ,on the other hand, unyielding modernism. With the music of "A Siegfried Idylle," the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal," the conductor is even more objective. The translucent glow, the gentle warmth of weaving voices, the fluttering leafage of forest murmurs sound directly and purely from the score.

N. M. J.

TRANS MAY 12

At The Pops Tonight

"Harvard Night"

Overture to The Opera, "Nina Fuddled with Love" ..... Paisiello
Suite from the Stage-Music of..Purcell (Edited by Arthur Bliss)
Overture, "Leonora," No. 3..Beethoven
Songs
Overture to The Opera, "The Siege of Corinth" ..... Rossini
Forest Scene from The Opera, "Siegfried" ..... Wagner
Rhapsody, "Italia" ..... Casella
Songs
Dance of The Hours from The Opera, "La Gioconda" ..... Ponchielli
Waltz, "Artist's Life" ..... J. Strauss
March, "Pomp and Circumstance" .. Elgar
"Fair Harvard"

Conductors:
A. Casella, A. T. Davison

Assisting: The Harvard Glee Club

MAY 14-GLOBE

Mr Casella has again put a symphony on a Pops program, Beethoven's First is to be played next Saturday night. The Wagner program for the first of the fortnightly Sunday Pops tonight is likely to draw a very large audience.

GLOBE MAY 19

Fourth Week of the Pops

Tomorrow will usher in the fourth week of the Pop concerts, which are now having their 44th season at Symphony Hall. Alfredo Casella has made programs of special interest and popular appeal for each night of this week to be presented by the orchestra of Symphony players, which is surely the finest to be found anywhere at this time of year.

Members of Simmons College, the Y. W. C. A. and Roxbury Latin School will celebrate on Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, respectively, but these, like all other nights, are open to the public. Conductor Casella will present a Tschalkowsky-Wagner program on Saturday, and a symphonic program for the second Sunday night Pop concert, next Sunday, May 26th, at which he will present his own Concerto Romano for organ and orchestra, for the first time in Boston; likewise Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony and other numbers to be announced.

The other programs of the week follow:

Monday, May 20—Wedding March, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; Gavotte from "Les Petits Riens," Mozart; Turkish March from "The Ruins of Athens," Beethoven; Overture to "The Siege of Corinth," Rossini; Introduction and March from "Le Coq d'Or," Rimsky-Korsakov; "Night on Bald Mountain," Moussorgsky; Suite from the Ballet, "La Giara," Casella; Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; Suite from "Carmen," Bizet; Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers," Verdi.

Tuesday, May 21—"Marche Militaire," Schubert; Largo, Handel; Overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Songs by Simmons Glee Club; Overture to "The Bartered Bride," Smetana; Excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust," Berlioz; "Capriccio Italien," Tschaikowsky; Overture to "Rienzi," Prelude to "Lohengrin," Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner.

Wednesday, May 22—Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, "Tannhauser," Wagner; Invitation to the Dance, Weber-Berlioz; Roumanian Rhapsody, Enesco; Overture to "La Forza del Destino," Verdi; Largo from the "New World" Symphony, Dvorak; Overture Solennelle, "1812," Tschaikowsky; Prelude to "Carmen," Bizet; Molly on the Shore, Grainger; Liebestraum, Liszt; Second Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt.

Thursday, May 23—March from "Aida," Verdi; Suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; Overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; "Espana," Rhapsody, Chabrier; "Pacific 2-3-1," Honegger; "Italia," Casella; Ballet of the Hours from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni; Marche Slave, Tschaikowsky.

Friday, May 24—Coronation march from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer; minuet, Boccherini; gypsy dance from "Carmen," Bizet; ballet suite, "Sylvia," Delibes; "Finlandia," Symphonic poem, Sibelius; air for string orchestra from the suite in D major, No. 3, Bach; "Capriccio Espagnole," Rimsky-Korsakov; "French Military March," Saint-Saens; "Ave Maria," Schubert-Wilhelmj; "Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner.

Saturday, May 25—Tchaikovsky-Wagner program: "Marche Slave," "Capriccio Italien," Tchaikovsky; "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," excerpts from act 3, "A Siegfried Idyll," overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner; ballet suite, "Nutcracker," "Song Without Words," overture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky.

Program only: The opening ... will be "The Leatherneck."

TRAV. MAY 19

FOURTH WEEK OF POPS

Monday will usher in the fourth week of the Pop concerts which are now having their 44 season at Symphony hall. Alfredo Casella has made programs of special interest and popular appeal for each night of next week to be presented by the orchestra of Symphony players which is surely the finest to be found anywhere at this time of year.

Members of Simmons College, the Y. W. C. A., and Roxbury Latin School will celebrate on Tuesday, Thursday and Friday respectively, but these like all other nights are open to the public.

Conductor Casella will present a Tchaikovsky-Wagner program on Saturday, and a symphony program for the second Sunday night Pop concert, Sunday, May 26, at which he will present his own Concerto Romano for organ and orchestra, for the first time in Boston; likely Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony and other numbers to be announced.

The program for tonight follows:

Overture to "Cinderella" ..... Rossini
Three Dances from "Cephalus and Procris" ..... Gretry-Mottl
Overture to "La Forza del Destino" ..... Verdi
Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 21 ..... Beethoven
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg" ..... Wagner
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner

Third Week of Pop Concerts

The Pop concerts in Symphony Hall are now in the third week of this, their 44th season. Alfredo Casella has compiled programs of special popular appeal for this week.

Tomorrow, there will be a section of Tchaikovsky's music, and on Saturday a section of Wagner. Thursday will bring such favorites as the "Peer Gynt" Suite, Oberon and Rienzi Overtures, "Espana" and Irish Rhapsodies. etc, and Friday, Schubert's "Ave Maria"; Handel's "Largo"; "William Tell Overture," "Sylvia" Ballet, etc.

MAY 14-GLOBE

GLOBE MAY 21

Fourth Week of Pops

The Pop concerts in Symphony Hall are now in the fourth week of their 44th season.

Special nights of interest this week are Simmons night, tonight, and Roxbury Latin night Friday. These, like all other nights, are open to the public. Saturday there will be a Tchaikovsky-Wagner program, and next Sunday, a symphonic program, including Beethoven's "Pastorale" Symphony, Casella's Organ Concerto and Ravel's Second Suite from "Daphnis and Chloe."

FOURTH WEEK MAY 19 OF THE POPS

HERALD

Tomorrow will usher in the fourth week of the Pop concerts which are now having their 44th season at Symphony hall. Alfredo Casella has made programs of special interest and popular appeal for each night of this week to be presented by the orchestra of Symphony players, the finest to be found anywhere at this time of year.

Members of Simmons College, the Y. W. C. A., and Roxbury Latin school will celebrate on Tuesday, Thursday and Friday respectively, but these like all other nights are open to the public. Conductor Casella will present a Tchaikovsky-Wagner programme on Saturday, and a symphonic program for the second Sunday night Pop concert, next Sunday, May 26, at which he will present his own Concerto Romano for organ and orchestra, for the first time in Boston; likewise Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony and other numbers to be announced.

The other programs of the week follow:

MONDAY, MAY 20

Wedding March, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ..... Mendelssohn
Gavotte from "Les Petits Riens" .... Mozart
Turkish March from "The Ruins of Athens" ..... Beethoven
Overture to "The Siege of Corinth" .. Rossini
Introduction and March from "Le Coq d'Or" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
"Night on Bald Mountain" .... Moussorgsky
Suite from the Ballet, "La Giara" .. Casella
Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint-Saens
Suite from "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers" ... Verdi

TUESDAY

Marche Militaire ..... Schubert
Largo ..... Handel
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Songs by Simmons Glee Club
Overture to "The Bartered Bride" .. Smetana
Excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust" ..... Berlioz
Capriccio Italien ..... Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Rienzi" ..... Wagner
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner

WEDNESDAY

Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Invitation to the Dance ..... Weber-Berlioz
Roumanian Rhapsody ..... Enesco
Overture to "La Forza del Destino" ... Verdi
Largo from the "New World" Symphony ..... Dvorak
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" ... Tchaikovsky
Prelude to "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Molly on the Shore ..... Grainger
Liebestraum ..... Liszt
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt

THURSDAY

March from "Aida" ..... Verdi
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
Overture to "Tannhaluser" ..... Wagner
"Espana," Rhapsody ..... Chabrier
"Pacific 2-3-1," Smyphonic Movement ..... Honegger
"Italia," Rhapsody ..... Casella
Ballet of the Hours from "La Gioconda" ..... Ponchielli
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana" ..... Mascagni
Marche Slave ..... Tchaikovsky

FRIDAY

Coronation March from "The Prophet" ..... Meyerbeer
Minuet ..... Boccherini
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia" ..... Delibes
"Finlandia," Symphonic Poem ..... Sibelius
Air for String Orchestra from the Suite in D major, No. 3 ..... Bach
Capriccio Espagnole ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
French Military March ..... Saint-Saens
Ave Maria ..... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner

SATURDAY

Tchaikovsky—Wagner Program
Marche Slave
Capriccio Italien ..... Tchaikovsky
The Mastersingers of Nuremburg, Excerpts from Act III
A Siegfried Idyll
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" ..... Wagner
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker"
Song Without Words
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" ..... Tchaikovsky

Saturday, May 18: Overture ... derella," Rossini; three dances from "Cephalus and Procris," Gretry-Mottl; overture to "La Forza del Destino," Verdi; symphony No. 1 in C major, op. 21, Beethoven; prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," bacchanale from "Tannhauser," "Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner.

TRANS

Concert-Chronicle

Leavening The Pops

MAY 21

MORE and more the music of the winter Symphony Concerts encroaches upon the Pops. If one may believe one's ears in hearing applause, the public is grateful. Last evening, for example, between a first group consisting of Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," a gavotte from Mozart's "Les Petits Riens," the Turkish March out of Beethoven's "The Ruins of Athens," the Overture to Rossini's "The Siege of Corinth," and a last group made up of the Bacchanale from Saint-Saëns's "Samson and Delilah," a suite of three pieces out of "Carmen" and the Overture to Verdi's "The Sicilian Vespers" (music of the theater, by the way, all of it) played in Mr. Casella's straighforward and masterful manner, there stood three pieces which might have found place on any Symphony program—the introduction to and a march from Rimsky-Korsakov's "The Golden Cockerel," Musorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain" and the suite drawn from Mr. Casella's ballet, or "choreographic comedy," as he calls it, "The Jar."

Fanciful music for a fanciful plot is Rimsky-Korsakov's score for "The Golden Cockerel." Hearing it, one were dull-witted indeed, if he could anticipate in degree some such announcement as the astrologer makes at the astonishing end of the play when he says that after all the whole is no more than fairy tale. Into the very texture of harmonies and melodies, of rhythms and orchestral timbres is this element blended. Delicacy, lightness, charm, a degree of mystery, by these is it known. The piquant solo at the beginning announces it. The march of last evening does not pound, does not grow insistent. The feet which it is intended to accompany are not those of Roman legions, nor those of inflated modern conquerors; to the steps of the mock army of Pushkin's fairy tale it must be attuned. And for such an end Mr. Casella and eighty picked musicians no less than the bearded Rimsky last evening furnished accomplishment.

CON. NEXT PAGE

168

Musorgsky in the music of last evening gave Russian treatment to a subject that has attracted composers of most nationalities. His "Night on Bald Mountain" summons noises out of the bowels of the earth, adds to them the voices of beings which we mortals like to call supernatural. To top it, sonorous brass gives sound picture of the black god Chernobog. With his attendants of the black arts this worthy indulges in measures of celebration. Witches enter, and the orgiastic music grows to the saturnalia of the "Witches' Sabbath." But all things must end. The sound of a bell from a far-off church is heard. In its presence the revels cannot continue. The spirits vanish, the gloom and the shadows are dispelled. Night gives way to day. And a music sweet and tender replaces that of the demons of the night.

Mr. Casella for his "choreographic comedy" goes to a novel of Pirandello. The beautiful large vase of Don Lollo has been broken. The hunch-backed artisan, Dima Licasi, offers to repair it. To complete his work he climbs into the jar. But when his work is done, he finds that the hump on his back prevents him from making an exit. Don Lollo is more furious than at the first break. He insists that Licasi must pay for the vessel before it may be broken to afford him his liberty. But the philosophical workman nonchalantly smokes his pipe to await developments. Evening falls. The moon rises. In the distance a peasant is singing a nocturne-like Sicilian folk-song. The peasants reassemble for their dances about the jar and the imprisoned man and friend. And not being in prohibition country, the dance assumes the proportions of a riot. Don Lollo rushes out of the house and in a frenzy kicks at the jar so that it topples over and rolls with a crash into the trunk of a tree. Licasi is free; Lollo shamefacedly returns to his house, while the peasants dance off their excitement. One can believe that the suite which Mr. Casella draws out of this ballet preserves the significant moments of the music which clothes this plot. One hears the dances of peasants of Sicily in the beginning; no less the voice of the peasant with his folk-song-nocturne (agreeably sung by Mr. Rulon Robison in performance hereabouts); one can all but see the dancing Nela, daughter of Don Lollo; and one feels pulse heightened and nerves grow taut with the excitements of the various stages of the peasants' dances in conclusion. A vivid music Mr. Casella has provided. A vivid performance he gave to it last evening. A. H. M.

MAY 21

At The Pops Tonight

"Simmons Night"

Military March .....Schubert
(Scored for Orchestra by A. Casella)
Largo .....Handel
Overture to The Opera, "William Tell" Rossini
Songs
Overture to The Opera, "The Bartered Bride" .....Smetana
Excerpts from the Dramatic Legend, "The Damnation of Faust"....Berlioz
Italian Caprice .....Chaikovsky
Overture to The Opera, "Rienzi"—
Prelude to The Opera, "Lohengrin"
—Ride of The Valkyrs.....Wagner

Conductor: A. Casella

Assisting: Simmons Glee Club

New Music for May

TRANS. MAY 21

Casella's Concerto

LIKE Mr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Casella knows how to value the spice of novelty. Upon his symphonic program for next Sunday evening he places one of his latest works, the Concerto Romano, on organ and orchestra. Thus, to the zest of a 'First time in Boston" is added the zest of being able to see the composer in person, to hear his own reading of his new piece. The Concerto Romano, dedicated to Felice Casorati, bears in the score the date MCMXXVI. Mr. Casella gives information that the Concerto was written in direct response to an invitation from Alexander Russel, musical director for the Wanamaker interests. It was played, March 11, 1927, upon the organ in the Wanamaker store in New York. Mr. Charles Courboin was organist; Mr. Casella conducted. It has been heard in Chicago, Dec. 14, 1928, Mr. Stock's forces.

Mr. Casella would guard against possible misapprehension of the adjective Romano, in the title. It is not his intention, he says, to epitomize Roman life or Roman customs or Rome itself within the bounds of this one concerto. Such an endeavor would be far too comprehensive to be practicable; the subject-matter too many sided. Rather, he sought to give musical semblance to the baroque style in art and architecture. Mr. Casella further says that for some time previous to the composition of the Concerto he had wished to write something in which he would be able to incorporate effects once heard in Germany—the playing of German chorals upon an organ with trombone accompaniment and trombone antiphonal effects. The invitation to write an Organ Concerto proved to be the occasion. This circumstance accounts for the orchestration: Organ and brass (three trumpets and three trombones) together with kettle-drums, against a background of strings.

Glancing over the score, one would say that Mr. Casella has well carried out his aim of writing in the baroque style. Its tendency toward the colossal, the grandiose, the picturesque; toward broken lines and fanciful ornamentation that sometimes approaches the grotesque, its large-scale exuberance—all find in degree their counterpart in the music. To cite only one specific example, Mr. Casella must have had his scheme very closely in mind in writing the first theme of his first movement.

The Concerto Romano runs in three movements: (1) Sinfonia; (2) Largo, grave; (3) Cadenza e toccata. The Sinfonia opens with an introduction, Lento, grave. Low strings begin with a slow, melodic figure. Then ensue contrasts between string figures played pizzicato, and short, fast staccato chords in the brass—the effects sometimes spoken of as brass pizzicato. The body of the movement bears the indication, "Allegro vivace, ma però un poso maestoso." The organ here makes its first entrance with passage-work and similar "pizzicato" chords against a rugged, far-flung theme in the br tioned. Bass—the theme above menharmonies little farther on, in minor complemer it finds a somewhat gloomily organ soot, also staccato, which the velopment takes up. After some deters in th a melodic second theme enagainst a li strings, "senza espressivo," organ. Soght kind of embroidery in the itself. Thon the organ has the theme full, teemi development section is very first theming with resourcefulness. The again ene with its rhythmic complement theme is ters, but the lyrical second impressiv no more than suggested. An the movea coda on the main theme ends sonata-foment. The Sinfonia is thus free the comp second movement, Largo, grave, definitely oser has the style of Frescobaldi exactly s in mind. Frescobaldi lived pleting h century before Bach; after comwent to his studies in his native Ferrara, to round the then famous Netherlands which, t out his musical education. After he was rom 1608 until his death in 1644, It is said organist in St. Peter's at Rome. thirty th that his fame was so great that perform ousand persons attended his first thought ance. It is probably a happy body a that Mr. Casella sought to emarchaic modern version of his somewhat concerto style within a baroque Roman three-pa. The movement is a simple coda of rt form, with introduction and episodic similar material, and with an close-cl al middle section. The idea of out in pped staccati is further carried

In the rm.

In th this movement.
cata, the third movement, Cadenza e toccimpetu he "cadenza" (Allegro agitato ed the wh oso) makes a considerable part of provis ole. It is exceedingly free and imof the ational, again after the fashion enteer great Italian organist of the sevsolo-p th century. Often the organ, in gain arts, is written without bar-lines, to chara to the utmost this fantasia-like of mo cter. There are many suggestions The tivs from the previous movements. of st toccata carries still further the use free accati and repeated notes. It is a a bri rondo which centers chiefly around orga lliant piece of passage-work for the max n. There are huge and brilliant cies for both organ and orchestra.

A the somber tone would seem to pervade erab whole—this partly because of considof f le use of low registers, partly because nies requent suggestion of minor harmogive ; yet again from the prominent place moo n to the trombones. This grave max d tinges even the brilliance of the cli-

The es when they are most brilliant. . . .
nist organist is to be Ruth Muzzy Consity on, Bachelor in Music of Yale Univerdire , organist in New York city variously, at ctor of the summer school of music Middlebury, Vermont. A. H. M.

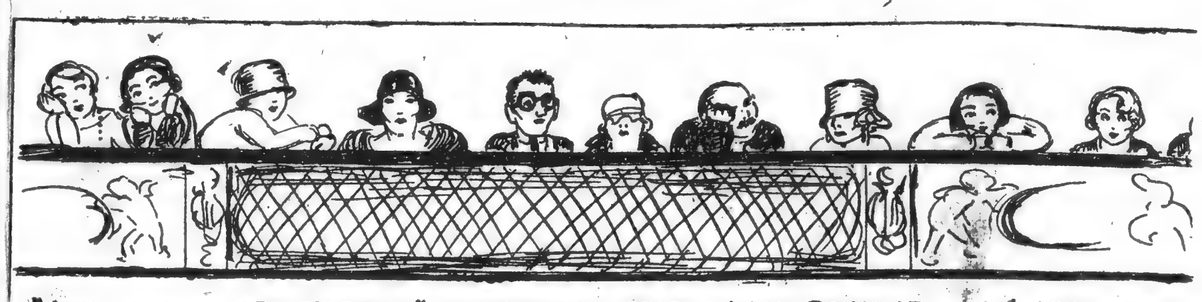
TRANS. MAY 23

At The Pops Tonight

March from The Opera, "Aida"...Verdi
Suite from the Incidental Music to Ibsen's Play, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Overture to The Opera, "Tannhäuser" Wagner
Rhapsody, "España" .....Chabrier
Symphonic Movement, "Pacific 2-3-1" Honegger
Rhapsody, "Italia" .....Casella
Ballet of The Hours from The Opera, "La Gioconda" .....Ponchielli
Intermezzo from The Opera, "Cavalleria Rusticana" .....Mascagni
Slavic March .....Chaikovsky

Conductor: A. Casella

POPS



"AND WAY UP THERE" WHISPERS THE LADY BEHIND US," ARE THE REAL MUSIC LOVERS." G'WAN- WE AREN'T ALL BOHUNKS AT THE TABLES EITHER!

THE ORCHESTRA OUGHT TO STRIKE UP A SNAPPY BOOM-BOOM MARCH FOR ALL LATE COMERS

SOME OF THE INTERMISSION STROLLERS HAVE BEEN BITTEN BY NONCHALANCE

FROM "SOUP-TO-NUTS" TO SPORTS

AT PACIFIC 2-3-1 SOME OF THE BOSTONESE REFUSE TO APPLAUD. TCH TCH! BOILER FACTORY!! SOME APPLAUDED. BUT THEN— SOMEONE HISSED "HUMORESKE" — EVERYONE TO HIS OWN TASTE—

Edith Stevens

"Hit 'Em Again"

On The Conductor's Stand

168

must be attuned. And for such an end Mr. Casella and eighty picked musicians no less than the bearded Rimsky last evening furnished accomplishment.

Musorgsky in the music of last evening gave Russian treatment to a subject that has attracted composers of most nationalities. His "Night on Bald Mountain" summons noises out of the bowels of the earth, adds to them the voices of beings which we mortals like to call supernatural. To top it, sonorous brass gives sound picture of the black god Chernobog. With his attendants of the black arts this worthy indulges in measures of celebration. Witches enter, and the orgiastic music grows to the saturnalia of the "Witches' Sabbath." But all things must end. The sound of a bell from a far-off church is heard. In its presence the revels cannot continue. The spirits vanish,—the gloom and the shadows are dispelled. Night gives way to day. And a music sweet and tender replaces that of the demons of the night.

Mr. Casella for his "choreographic comedy" goes to a novel of Pirandello. The beautiful large vase of Don Lollo has been broken. The hunch-backed artisan, Dima Licasi, offers to repair it. To complete his work he climbs into the jar. But when his work is done, he finds that the hump on his back prevents him from making an exit. Don Lollo is more furious than at the first break. He insists that Licasi must pay for the vessel before it may be broken to afford him his liberty. But the philosophical workman nonchalantly smokes his pipe to await developments. Evening falls. The moon rises. In the distance a peasant is singing a nocturne-like Sicilian folk-song. The peasants reassemble for their dances about the jar and the imprisoned man and friend. And not being in prohibition country, the dance assumes the proportions of a riot. Don Lollo rushes out of the house and in a frenzy kicks at the jar so that it topples over and rolls with a crash into the trunk of a tree. Licasi is free; Lollo shamefacedly returns to his house, while the peasants dance off their excitement. One can believe that the suite which Mr. Casella draws out of this ballet preserves the significant moments of the music which clothes this plot. One hears the dances of peasants of Sicily in the beginning; no less the voice of the peasant with his folk-song-nocturne (agreeably sung by Mr. Rulon Robison in performance hereabouts); one can all but see the dancing Nela, daughter of Don Lollo; and one feels pulse heightened and nerves grow taut with the excitements of the various stages of the peasants' dances in conclusion. A vivid music Mr. Casella has provided. A vivid performance he gave to it last evening. A. H. M.

MAY 21

At The Pops Tonight

"Simmons Night"

Military March .....Schubert
(Scored for Orchestra by A. Casella)
Largo .....Handel
Overture to The Opera, "William Tell" Rossini
Songs
Overture to The Opera, "The Bartered Bride" .....Smetana
Excerpts from the Dramatic Legend, "The Damnation of Faust"....Berlioz
Italian Caprice .....Chaikovsky
Overture to The Opera, "Rienzi"—
Prelude to The Opera, "Lohengrin"
—Ride of The Valkyrs.....Wagner

Conductor: A. Casella

Assisting: Simmons Glee Club

New Music for May

TRANS. MAY 21

Casella's Concerto

LIKE Mr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Casella knows how to value the spice of novelty. Upon his symphonic program for next Sunday evening he places one of his latest works, the Concerto Romano, on organ and orchestra. Thus, to the zest of a 'First time in Boston" is added the zest of being able to see the composer in person, to hear his own reading of his new piece. The Concerto Romano, dedicated to Felice Casorati, bears in the score the date MCMXXVI. Mr. Casella gives information that the Concerto was written in direct response to an invitation from Alexander Russel, musical director for the Wanamaker interests. It was first played, March 11, 1927, upon the large organ in the Wanamaker store at New York. Mr. Charles Courboin was organist; Mr. Casella conducted. It has also been heard in Chicago, Dec. 14, 1928, from Mr. Stock's forces.

Mr. Casella would guard against a possible misapprehension of the adjective, Romano, in the title. It is not his intention, he says, to epitomize Roman life or Roman customs or Rome itself within the bounds of this one concerto. Such an endeavor would be far too comprehensive to be practicable; the subject-matter too many sided. Rather, he sought to give musical semblance to the baroque style in art and architecture. Mr. Casella further says that for some time previous to the composition of the Concerto he had wished to write something in which he would be able to incorporate effects once heard in Germany—the playing of German chorals upon an organ with trombone accompaniment and trombone antiphonal effects. The invitation to write an Organ Concerto proved to be the occasion. This circumstance accounts for the orchestration: Organ and brass (three trumpets and three trom bone:) together with kettle-drums, against a background of strings.

Glancing over the score, one would say that Mr. Casella has well carried out his aim of writing in the baroque style. Its tendency toward the colossal, the grandiose, the picturesque; toward broken lines and fanciful ornamentation that sometimes approaches the grotesque, its large-scale exuberance—all find in degree their counterpart in the music. To cite only one specific example, Mr. Casella must have had his scheme very closely in mind in writing the first theme of his first movement.

The Concerto Romano runs in three movements: (1) Sinfonia; (2) Largo, grave; (3) Cadenza e toccata. The Sinfonia opens with an introduction, Lento, grave. Low strings begin with a slow, melodic figure. Then ensue contrasts between string figures played pizzicato, and short, fast staccato chords in the brass—the effects sometimes spoken of as brass pizzicato. The body of the movement bears the indication, "Allegro vivace, ma però un poso maestoso." The organ here makes its first entrance with passage-work and similar "pizzicato" chords against a rugged, far-flung theme in the br
Bass—the theme above mentioned. Bass in the harmonies little farther on, in minor complemer it finds a somewhat gloomily organ soot, also staccato, which the velopment, takes up. After some deters in the a melodic second theme enagainst all strings, "senza espressivo," organ. Soght kind of embroidery in the itself. Thon the organ has the theme full, teemi development section is very first theming with resourcefulness. The again ens with its rhythmic complement theme is ters, but the lyrical second impressiv no more than suggested. An the movee coda on the main theme ends sonata-fonent. The Sinfonia is thus free the compsecond movement, Largo, grave, definitelyoser has the style of Frescobaldi exactly a in mind. Frescobaldi lived pleting h century before Bach; after comwent tois studies in his native Ferrara, to round the then famous Netherlands which, t out his musical education. After he was rom 1608 until his death in 1644, It is saiorganist in St. Peter's at Rome. thirty th that his fame was so great that performousand persons attended his first thought ance. It is probably a happy body a that Mr. Casella sought to emarchaic modern version of his somewhat concerto style within a baroque Roman three-pa. The movement is a simple coda of rt form, with introduction and episodic similar material, and with an close-cl al middle section. The idea of out in pped staccati is further carried

In the rm.

In th this movement.
cata, the third movement, Cadenza e toccimpetu he "cadenza" (Allegro agitato ed the wh oso) makes a considerable part of provis ole. It is exceedingly free and imof the ational, again after the fashion enteer great Italian organist of the sevsolo-path century. Often the organ, in gain arts, is written without bar-lines, to chara to the utmost this fantasia-like of mo ter. There are many suggestions The tivs from the previous movements. of st toccata carries still further the use free accati and repeated notes. It is a a bri rondo which centers chiefly around orga lliant piece of passage-work for the max n. There are huge and brilliant cles for both organ and orchestra.

A
the somber tone would seem to pervade erab whole—this partly because of considof f le use of low registers, partly because nies requent suggestion of minor harmogive ; yet again from the prominent place moo n to the trombones. This grave max d tinges even the brilliance of the cli-
The es when they are most brilliant. . . .
nist organist is to be Ruth Muzzy Consity on, Bachelor in Music of Yale Univerdire , organist in New York city variously, at ctor of the summer school of music Middlebury, Vermont. A. H. M.

TRANS. MAY 23

At The Pops Tonight

March from The Opera, "Aida"...Verdi
Suite from the Incidental Music to Ibsen's Play, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Overture to The Opera, "Tannhäuser" Wagner
Rhapsody, "España" .....Chabrier
Symphonic Movement, "Pacific 2-3-1" Honegger
Rhapsody, "Italia" .....Casella
Ballet of The Hours from The Opera, "La Gioconda" .....Ponchielli
Intermezzo from The Opera, "Cavalleria Rusticana" .....Mascagni
Slavic March .....Chaikovsky

Conductor: A. Casella

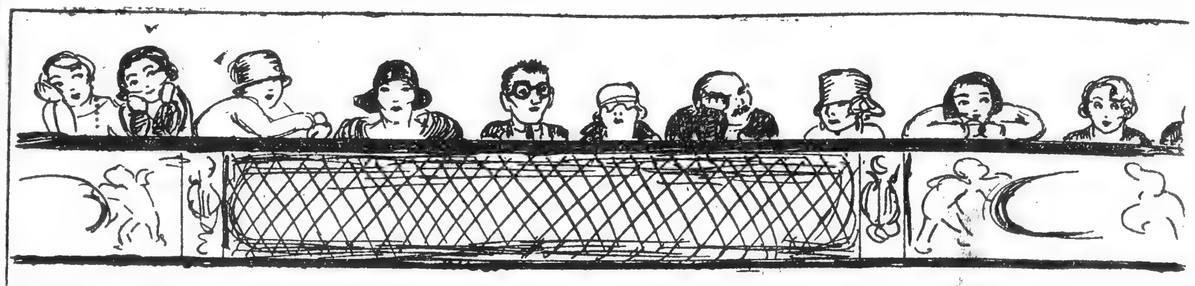
At The Pops Tonight

Coronation March from The Opera, "The Prophet" .....Meyerbeer
Minuet .....Boccherini
Dance from Act II. of "Carmen"..Bizet
Suite from The Ballet, "Sylvia"..Delibes
Symphonic Poem, "Finlandia"..Sibelius
Air for Strings from the Suite in D major .....Bach
Spanish Caprice .....Rimsky-Korsakov
French Military March.....Saint-Saëns
Ave Maria .....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Ride of the Valkyrs.....Wagner

Conductor: A. Casella

1929 ST, SATURDAY, MAY 25, 1929

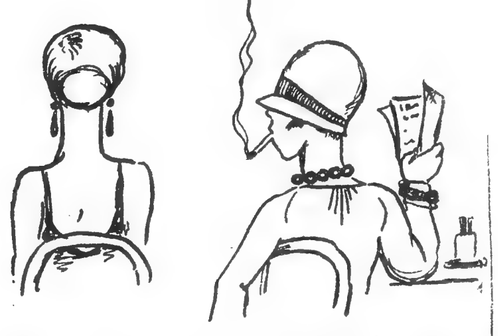
POPS



"AND WAY UP THERE" WHISPERS THE LADY BEHIND US," ARE THE REAL MUSIC LOVERS." G'WAN- WE AREN'T ALL BOHUNKS AT THE TABLES EITHER!

THE ORCHESTRA OUGHT TO STRIKE UP A SNAPPY BOOM-BOOM MARCH FOR ALL LATE COMERS

SOME OF THE INTERMISSION STROLLERS HAVE BEEN BITTEN BY NONCHALANCE



FROM "SOUP-TO-NUTS" TO SPORTS

AT PACIFIC 2-3-1 SOME OF THE BOSTONESE REFUSED TO APPLAUD. TCH TCH! BOILER FACTORY!! SOME APPLAUDED. BUT THEN— SOMEONE HISSED "HUMORESKE" — EVERYONE TO HIS OWN TASTE—

Edith Stevens

"Hit 'Em Again"

On The Conductor's Stand

Penciled Pastimes of The Prevalent Pops

Marginal Notes—Second Balcony

(Sketches Here and Hereunder Made by Virginia Burton)

Pleasures

On The Floor

Pains

On The Stage

TRANS MAY 25

Concerts Next Week

Progress of The Pops

FIRST of all in the fifth week of The Pops, beginning tomorrow, there are two exceptions to be noted. On Friday evening, May 31, Radcliffe College has taken Symphony Hall for a serious, semi-private concert in celebration of its jubilee. Consequently, no Pop. On Thursday evening, May 30—the holiday—Mr. Fiedler, and not Mr. Casella, will conduct. The occasion is the annual "Tech Night," with an easy-going program on which Gershwin and Kern have place and in which even marimba solos are included. The conductor, moreover, will have his joke with the youngsters. "In memoriam" he announces Milhaud's "The Cow on The Roof"—otherwise "Le Bœuf sur le Toit," modernist pantomime devised by Jean Cocteau, once in Parisian vogue and abounding in the composer's comic spirit. But "in memory" of what? Of nothing less than the cow—sexes do not count in these matters—discovered on the roof of a Tech dormitory on or about May 27, 1928.

To these exceptions add an event—the first performance in Boston, tomorrow evening, of Mr. Casella's Concerto Romano for Organ, Trumpets, Trombones and Strings, with the composer conducting and Miss Ruth Muzzy as organist. The music, described yesterday in these columns, returns sometimes to the slightly modernized style of Frescobaldi, the seventeenth-century Italian organist; again cultivates a baroque floridity and richness of eighteenth-century Rome. The Concerto is one number in the fortnightly symphony concert. The others are Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony" and the Second Suite from Ravel's bejewelled ballet, "Daphnis and Chloë."

Otherwise the week runs tranquil course. On Monday Mr. Casella adds two well-liked pieces to the current repertory—the Prelude to Musorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina" and Mr. Skilton's "Indian War Dance." On Tuesday, Smetana's tone-poem, "The Moldau," celebrating his beloved Bohemian river, returns. Wednesday brings back the overture to Auber's opera, "Masaniello." Saturday's program assembles nine favorite pieces.

By and For Casella

Wednesday afternoon in Brown Hall of the New England Conservatory at the unusual hour of 5.15, concert of chamber-pieces written by Mr. Casella; played or sung by various assisting artists in compliment to him. From the Symphony Orchestra come Messrs. Theodorowicz, Langendoen, Allegra, Allard and Mager; from the town at large Miss Ehrhart the singer and Miss Ruth Webb, pianist. The program:

Sonata for Piano and Violoncello (1927)
Messrs. Casella and Langendoen
Three Thirteenth-Century Songs (1923):
Giovane bella, luce del mio core
Fuor della bella gaiba
Amante sono, vaghiccia, di voi
Miss Ehrhart
Siciliana and Burletta for Piano, Violin and Violoncello (1916)
Messrs. Casella, Theodorowicz and Langendoen
Pupazzetti (Piano-Pieces, 1916)
Miss Ruth Webb and Mr. Casella
Serenade for Clarinet, Bassoon, Trumpet, Violin and Violoncello (1927)
Messrs. Allegra, Allard, Mager, Theodorowicz, Langendoen—The Composer Conducting
(Prize-Piece, 1928, in the Competition Arranged by the Musical Fund Society of Philadelphia)

To and By Radcliffe

Though Symphony Hall will be closed to the public next Friday evening, here follows, for its musical interest, the program of the Radcliffe Anniversary Concert. There are good hopes that the novel numbers by Holst and Vaughan Williams may be repeated publicly next winter.

Exultate Deo .....Mabel W. Daniels (19 0)
Composed for the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Founding of Radcliffe College
Sing to the Lord a New Song.....Schütz
For Double Chorus, a capella
Academic Festival Overture.....Brahms
The Shepherds of the Delectable Mountains.....Vaughan Williams
A Pastoral Episode founded upon Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," for Soloists, Women's Chorus and Orchestra
(First time in Boston)
The Hymn of Jesus.....Holst
For Double Chorus and Orchestra
(First time in Boston)
The Harvard Glee Club—Dr. Archibald T. Davison, Conductor
The Radcliffe Choral Society—G. Wallace Woodworth, Conductor
Eighty-five Members of The Boston Symphony Orchestra
Soloists in "The Shepherds of the Delectable Mountains"
The Voice of a Bird—Esther Wood (1920)
The Pilgrim—David Blair McCloskey
The Celestial Messenger—Joseph Lautner
First Shepherd—Dr. James H. Townsend
Second Shepherd—Joseph Lautner
Third Shepherd—James Houghton

Fifth Week of the Pops

Tonight with the second Sunday evening concert of the season, the Pop concerts will enter their fifth week at Symphony Hall. Alfredo Casella will conduct each program except that of Thursday, which is to be the annual Tech Night, when Arthur Fiedler will take over the Pops Orchestra of Symphony players for a single evening. On Friday there will be no Pop concert, since Radcliffe College will then have a concert of their own, but all other nights are open to the public.

In the symphonic program to be presented tonight, an interesting feature will be the first Boston performance of Casella's "Concerto Romano" for organ and orchestra, in which the organ solo will be taken by Ruth M. Conniston. Casella will also conduct Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony No. 6, and the second suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe."

The remaining programs of the week follow:

Monday, May 27—Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; Masque Suite, for String Orchestra, Handel; Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven; "Semiramide" Overture, Rossini; Prelude to "Khovantchina," Mussorgsky; "Hopak," Musorgsky; Suite from the Ballet, "La Giara," Casella; "Indian War Dance," Skilton; "Russian Lullaby," Berlin-Casella; Gypsy Dance from "Carmen," Bizet; "Espana," Rhapsody, Chabrier.

Tuesday, May 28—Coronation March from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer; Suite, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; "Polovtsian Dances" from "Prince Igor," Borodin; "Espana," Rhapsody, Chabrier; "The Moldau," Smetana; "Italia," Casella; Suite from "Carmen," Bizet; Largo, Handel; Overture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky.

Wednesday, May 29—"Tannhauser," "Entrance of the Guests Into the Wartburg," Wagner; "Peer Gynt," Suite, Grieg; Roumanian Rhapsody, Enesco; "Finlandia," Sibelius; Danse Macabre, Saint-Saens; Capriccio Espagnol, Rimsky-Korsakov; Overture to "Masaniello," Auber; Waltz, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss; second Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt.

Thursday, May 30—March, "Radetzky," Strauss; Overture to "Poet and Peasant," Suppe; "Deep River," Burleigh-Jacchia; Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly," Puccini; "The Cow on the Roof," Milhaud; (In Memoriam, May 27, 1928), Marimba Solos, "The Old Refrain," "Tambourin Chinois," Kreisler, soloist Lawrence White; "Rhapsody in Blue," Gershwin; selection, "Show Boat," Kern; waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song," Strauss; "Stars and Stripes Forever," Sousa; "Stein Song," Bullard.

Saturday, June 1—March from "Aida," Verdi; suite from "Carmen," Bizet; overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; overture, "The Roman Carnival," Berlioz; adagio from the "Indian Suite," MacDowell; "Italia," Casella; overture to "The Bartered Bride," Smetana; intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz," Mascagi; marche slave, Tchaikovsky.

GLOBE

Music Notes and Comment

MAY 26

There is to be an anniversary concert at Symphony Hall next Friday evening as part of the celebration of the 50th anniversary of the founding of Radcliffe College. Besides an address on behalf of the governing board of Radcliffe by Judge Cabot, an orchester of Boston Symphony players will play Brahms' "Academic Festival" Overture, and a chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society will sing a new piece by Mabel Daniels; Schuetz' "Sing to the Lord a New Song;" Vaughan Williams' "The Delectable Mountains;" and Holst's "Hymn of Jesus." Invitations have been sent out by the governing board of Radcliffe College. There will, of course, be no Pop Concert Friday evening.

Friday there will be no Pop concert, since Radcliffe College will then have a concert of their own, but all other nights are open to the public.

In the symphonic program to be presented tonight, an interesting feature will be the first Boston performance of Casella's "Concerto Romano" for organ and orchestra, in which the organ solo will be played by Ruth M. Conniston. Mr. Casella will also conduct Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony No. 6, and the second suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe."

The remaining programs of the week follow:

MONDAY
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" Mozart
Masque Suite, for string orchestra....Handel
Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, op. 72 Beethoven
"Semiramide," overture.....Rossini
Prelude to "Khovantchina"....Moussorgsky
Hopak .....Moussorgsky
Suite from the ballet, "La Giara"....Casella
Indian War Dance.....Skilton
Russian Lullaby.....Berlin-Casella
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen".....Bizet
"Espana," rhapsody.....Chabrier

TUESDAY
Coronation March from "The Prophet" Meyerbeer
Suite, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" Mendelssohn
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" Borodin
"Espana," rhapsody.....Chabrier
"The Moldau," symphonic poem....Smetana
"Italia," rhapsody.....Casella
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Largo.....Handel
Overture Solennelle, "1812"....Tchaikovsky

WEDNESDAY
"Tannhaeuser," Entrance of the guests into the Wartburg.....Wagner
"Peer Gynt" Suite.....Wagner
Rumanian Rhapsody.....Grieg
"Finlandia," symphonic poem.....Enesco
Danse Macabre.....Sibelius
Capriccio Espagnol.....Saint-Saens
Overture to "Masaniello".....Rimsky-Korsakov
Waltz, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube"..... Auber
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Strauss
THURSDAY
March, "Radetzky".....Liszt
Overture to "Poet and Peasant".....Strauss
Deep River.....Suppe
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly".....Burleigh-Jacchia
"The Cow on the Roof".....Puccini
(In Memoriam—May 27, 1928) Milhaud
Marimba solos:
The Old Refrain.....Kreisler
Tambourin Chinois.....Kreisler
Soloist, Lawrence White
Rhapsody in Blue.....Gershwin
Selection, "Show Boat".....Kern
Waltz, "Wine, Woman Song".....Strauss
"Stars and Stripes Forever".....Sousa
Stein Song
FRIDAY
(No Pop concert)
SATURDAY
March from "Aida".....Verdi
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Overture, "The Roman Carnival".....Berlioz
Adagio from the "Indian Suite"..MacDowell
"Italia," rhapsody.....Casella
Overture to "The Bartered Bride"....Smetana
Intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz".....Mascagni
Marche Slave.....Tchaikovsky

HERALD MAY 26

MAY 26 —

SUNDAY ADVERTISER—Boston's Greatest Circu

ANNUAL TECH NIGHT AT POPS ON N

TONIGHT, with the second Sunday the Pop concerts will enter their Alfredo Casella will conduct each prog which is to be the annual Tech night, over the orchestra.

On Friday there will be no Pop concert, since Radcliffe College will then have a concert of their own. All other nights are open to the public.

In the symphonic program to be presented tonight, an interesting feature will be the first Boston performance of Casella's "Concerto Romano" for organ and orchestra, in which the organ solo will be taken by Ruth M. Conniston. Casella will also conduct Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony No. 6, and the second suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe."

MONDAY
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart
Masque Suite, for string orchestra, Handel
Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72, Beethoven
"Semiramide" Overture .....Rossini
Prelude to "Khovantchina"..Moussorgsky
Hopak .....Moussorgsky
Suite from the Ballet, "La Giara," Casella
Indian War Dance.....Skilton
Russian Lullaby .....Berlin-Casella
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen".....Bizet
"Espana," Rhapsody .....Chabrier

TUESDAY
Coronation March from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer
Suite, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin
"Espana," Rhapsody .....Chabrier
"The Moldau," Symphonic Poem, Smetana
"Italia," Rhapsody .....Casella
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Largo .....Handel
Overture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky

WEDNESDAY
"Tannhauser": Entrance of the guests into the Wartburg .....Wagner
"Peer Gynt" Suite.....Grieg
Roumanian Rhapsody .....Enesco
"Finlandia," Symphonic Poem...Sibelius
Danse Macabre .....Saint-Saens
Capriccio Espagnol ....Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to "Masaniello" ..... Auber
Waltz, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
THURSDAY
March, "Radetsky" .....Strauss
Overture to "Poet and Peasant"..Suppe
Deep River .....Burleigh-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly"..Puccini
"The Cow on the Roof".....Milhaud
(In memoriam, May 27, 1928)
Marimba Solos—
The Old Refrain.....Kreisler
Tambourin Chinois .....Kreisler
Soloist, Lawrence White
Rhapsody in Blue.....Gershwin
Selection, "Show Boat".....Kern
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song," Strauss
"Stars and Stripes Forever".....Sousa
Stein Song
SATURDAY
March from "Aida".....Verdi
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Overture, "The Roman Carnival"..Berlioz
Adagio from the "Indian Suite," MacDowell
"Italia," Rhapsody .....Casella
Overture to "The Bartered Bride," Smetana
Intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz"..Mascagni
Marche Slave .....Tchaikovsky

SYMPHONIC PROGRAM AT THE POP CONCERT

Casella's Concerto for Organ Performed

Mr Casella arranged a "Symphonic program" for the second of the fortnightly Sunday Pops last night which included Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony," his own Concerto Romano for organ, and the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe." An audience of good size enjoyed the concert not a little, if the applause, especially for the concerto and for Ravel's suite is a test.

If the musical public realized that these special Sunday Pops offer the equivalent of a Boston Symphony concert at popular prices there would have been no vacant places in the hall. But too many of the people who ought to be attracted by such a concert as last night's fail to distinguish between these Sunday Pops and the routine weekly programs featuring Handel's Largo and Tchaikovsky's "1812."

The first movement of Beethoven's Sixth Symphony has seldom sounded so well of late years in Boston as it did last night. The strings, in particular, played with finely restrained euphony. Mr Casella's reading of the whole symphony was clear, intelligent, straightforward, with no attempt to secure new and original effects at the expense of Beethoven. The only fault to be found with it was a certain lack of rhythmic flexibility in the slow movement.

Mr Casella's organ concerto, played for the first time in Boston, is scored for trumpets, trombones, kettle drums and strings. He has solved the difficult problem of blending organ and orchestra by reverting to the manner of the early 18th century. One thought of the accompaniment for orchestra and organ in works by Bach and Handel in which a chorus is also employed. In the concerto, the organ part, of exceptional brilliance and difficulty, is so managed as to give something of the effect of great choral bodies.

There are three movements, a "sinfonia," or overture, consciously archaic in style as well as in name; a largo, and a "cadenza and toccata"; all of which betray the now fashionable tendency among modern composers to ignore everything in music between 1750 and 1920 and go on from where Bach and Handel left off.

The music is well written; and not without emotional quality, yet one felt its ingenuity and good taste more strongly than its dramatic power. The solo organist, Ruth M. Conniston, from New York, proved herself an exceptionally capable and intelligent performer. Both she and Mr Casella were repeatedly recalled at the end.

Mr Casella stresses, as Ravel himself does, the brilliance, sonority and intensity of the suite from "Daphnis and Chloe." The music lacks melodic originality; there is at least one glaring reminiscence of Rimsky Korsakoff's "Scheherezade"; but it is superlatively well written.

The orchestra, now seated according to the conventional plan, sounded better than it usually does when placed according to Mr Koussevitzky's new ideas. It was astonishing how few defects there were in last night's performance, considering the limited rehearsal time. As a whole, this concert would have lent distinction to any series of Symphony concerts.

The program contained slips announcing a special concert of Mr Casella's compositions to be given Wednesday afternoon, May 29, at 5:15, in Brown Hall, New England Conservatory, at which members of the Boston Symphony, Gertrude Ehrhart, soprano, and Ruth Webb, pianist, will be heard in his chamber pieces. P. R.

GLOBE MAY 27

168 must

Mr. Ca
no les evening Musorg gave Rus has attra alities.
summons earth, an which w natural sound pi bog. W arts this celebrati giastic m
the "Wi must en far-off cl the revel vanish, dispelled a music of the de
Mr. Ca
comedy"
The beau has been tisan, D
To comp
jar. Bu finds tha vents hi Lollo is break. H for the v to afford h
sophical w his pipe t ing falls.
tance a p like Sicilia assemble and the im not being dance ass
Don Lollo
in a frenz ples over trunk of shameface the peasa
One can Casella serves th music wh the dance beginning ant with ably sung formance the dancin and one f grow tau various s in conclus has provi gave to

TRANS
MAY 25

Concerts Next Week

Progress of The Pops

FIRST of all in the fifth week of The Pops, beginning tomorrow, there are two exceptions to be noted. On Friday evening, May 31, Radcliffe College has taken Symphony Hall for a serious, semi-private concert in celebration of its jubilee. Consequently, no Pop. On Thursday evening, May 30—the holiday—Mr. Fiedler, and not Mr. Casella, will conduct. The occasion is the annual "Tech Night," with an easy-going program on which Gershwin and Kern have place and in which even marimba solos are included. The conductor, moreover, will have his joke with the youngsters. "In memoriam" he announces Milhaud's "The Cow on The Roof,"—otherwise "Le Bœuf sur le Toit," modernist pantomime devised by Jean Cocteau, once in Parisian vogue and abounding in the composer's comic spirit. But "in memory" of what? Of nothing less than the cow—sexes do not count in these matters—discovered on the roof of a Tech dormitory on or about May 27, 1928.

To these exceptions add an event—the first performance in Boston, tomorrow evening, of Mr. Casella's Concerto Romano for Organ, Trumpets, Trombones and Strings, with the composer conducting and Miss Ruth Muzzy as organist. The music, described yesterday in these columns, returns sometimes to the slightly modernized style of Frescobaldi, the seventeenth-century Italian organist; again cultivates a baroque floridity and richness of eighteenth-century Rome. The Concerto is one number in the fortnightly symphony concert. The others are Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony" and the Second Suite from Ravel's bejewelled ballet, "Daphnis and Chloë."

Otherwise the week runs tranquil course. On Monday Mr. Casella adds two well-liked pieces to the current repertory—the Prelude to Musorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina" and Mr. Skilton's "Indian War Dance." On Tuesday, Smetana's tone-poem, "The Moldau," celebrating his beloved Bohemian river, returns. Wednesday brings back the overture to Auber's opera, "Masaniello." Saturday's program assembles nine favorite pieces.

By and For Casella

Wednesday afternoon in Brown Hall of the New England Conservatory at the unusual hour of 5.15, concert of chamber-pieces written by Mr. Casella; played or sung by various assisting artists in compliment to him. From the Symphony Orchestra come Messrs. Theodorowicz, Langendoen, Allegra, Allard and Mager; from the town at large Miss Ehrhart the singer and Miss Ruth Webb, pianist. The program:

Sonata for Piano and Violoncello (1927)
Messrs. Casella and Langendoen
Three Thirteenth-Century Songs (1923):
Giovane bella, luce del mio core
Fuor della bella gaiba
Amante sono, vaghiccia, di voi
Miss Ehrhart
Siciliana and Burletta for Piano, Violin and Violoncello (1916)
Messrs. Casella, Theodorowicz and Langendoen
Pupazzetti (Piano-Pieces, 1916)
Miss Ruth Webb and Mr. Casella
Serenade for Clarinet, Bassoon, Trumpet, Violin and Violoncello (1927)
Messrs. Allegra, Allard, Mager, Theodorowicz, Langendoen—The Composer Conducting
(Prize-Piece, 1928, in the Competition Arranged by the Musical Fund Society of Philadelphia)

To and By Radcliffe

Though Symphony Hall will be closed to the public next Friday evening, here follows, for its musical interest, the program of the Radcliffe Anniversary Concert. There are good hopes that the novel numbers by Holst and Vaughan Williams may be repeated publicly next winter.

Exultate Deo .....Mabel W. Daniels (19 0)
Composed for the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Founding of Radcliffe College
Sing to the Lord a New Song.....Schütz
For Double Chorus, a capella
Academic Festival Overture.....Brahms
The Shepherds of the Delectable Mountains .....Vaughan Williams
A Pastoral Episode founded upon Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," for Soloists, Women's Chorus and Orchestra
(First time in Boston)
The Hymn of Jesus.....Holst
For Double Chorus and Orchestra
(First time in Boston)
The Harvard Glee Club—Dr. Archibald T. Davison, Conductor
The Radcliffe Choral Society—G. Wallace Woodworth, Conductor
Eighty-five Members of The Boston Symphony Orchestra
Soloists in "The Shepherds of the Delectable Mountains"
The Voice of a Bird—Esther Wood (1920)
The Pilgrim—David Blair McCloskey
The Celestial Messenger—Joseph Lautner
First Shepherd—Dr. James H. Townsend
Second Shepherd—Joseph Lautner
Third Shepherd—James Houghton

Fifth Week of the Pops

Tonight with the second Sunday evening concert of the season, the Pop concerts will enter their fifth week at Symphony Hall. Alfredo Casella will conduct each program except that of Thursday, which is to be the annual Tech Night, when Arthur Fiedler will take over the Pops Orchestra of Symphony players for a single evening. On Friday there will be no Pop concert, since Radcliffe College will then have a concert of their own, but all other nights are open to the public.

In the symphonic program to be presented tonight, an interesting feature will be the first Boston performance of Casella's "Concerto Romano" for organ and orchestra, in which the organ solo will be taken by Ruth M. Conniston. Casella will also conduct Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony No. 6, and the Second Suite from Ravel's Ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe."

The remaining programs of the week follow:

Monday, May 27—Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; Masque Suite, for string orchestra, Handel; Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven; "Semiramide" Overture, Rossini; Prelude to "Khovantchina," Musorgsky; "Hopak," Musorgsky; Suite from the Ballet, "La Giara," Casella; "Indian War Dance," Skilton; "Russian Lullaby," Berlin-Casella; Gypsy Dance from "Carmen," Bizet; "Espana," Rhapsody, Chabrier.

Tuesday, May 28—Coronation March from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer; Suite, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; "Polovtsian Dances" from "Prince Igor," Borodin; "Espana," Rhapsody, Chabrier; "The Moldau," Smetana; "Italia," Casella; Suite from "Carmen," Bizet; Largo, Handel; Overture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky.

Wednesday, May 29—"Tannhauser," "Entrance of the Guests Into the Wartburg," Wagner; "Peer Gynt," Suite, Grieg; Roumanian Rhapsody, Enesco; "Finlandia," Sibelius; Danse Macabre, Saint-Saens; Capriccio Espagnol, Rimsky-Korsakov; Overture to "Masaniello," Auber; Waltz, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss; second Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt.

Thursday, May 30—March, "Radetzky," Strauss; Overture to "Poet and Peasant," Suppe; "Deep River," Burleigh-Jacchia; Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly," Puccini; "The Cow on the Roof," Milhaud; (In Memoriam, May 27, 1928), Marimba Solos, "The Old Refrain," "Tambourin Chinois," Kreisler, soloist Lawrence White; "Rhapsody in Blue," Gershwin; selection, "Show Boat," Kern; waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song," Strauss; "Stars and Stripes Forever," Sousa; "Stein Song," Bullard.

Saturday, June 1—March from "Aida," Verdi; suite from "Carmen," Bizet; overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; overture, "The Roman Carnival," Berlioz; adagio from the "Indian Suite," MacDowell; "Italia," Casella; overture to "The Bartered Bride," Smetana; intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz," Mascagi; marche slave, Tchaikovsky.

Music Notes and Comment

There is to be an anniversary concert at Symphony Hall next Friday evening as part of the celebration of the 50th anniversary of the founding of Radcliffe College. Besides an address on behalf of the governing board of Radcliffe by Judge Cabot, an orchester of Boston Symphony players will play Brahms' "Academic Festival" Overture, and a chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society will sing a new piece by Mabel Daniels; Schuetz' "Sing to the Lord a New Song;" Vaughan Williams' "The Delectable Mountains;" and Holst's "Hymn of Jesus." Invitations have been sent out by the governing board of Radcliffe College. There will, of course, be no Pop Concert Friday evening.

Friday there will be no Pop concert, since Radcliffe College will then have a concert of their own, but all other nights are open to the public.

In the symphonic program to be presented tonight, an interesting feature will be the first Boston performance of Casella's "Concerto Romano" for organ and orchestra, in which the organ solo will be played by Ruth M. Conniston. Mr. Casella will also conduct Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony No. 6, and the second suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe."

The remaining programs of the week follow:

MONDAY
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" Mozart
Masque Suite, for string orchestra....Handel
Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, op. 72 Beethoven
"Semiramide," overture .....Rossini
Prelude to "Khovantchina"....Moussorgsky
Hopak .....Moussorgsky
Suite from the ballet, "La Giara"....Casella
Indian War Dance.....Skilton
Russian Lullaby.....Berlin-Casella
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen".....Bizet
"Espana," rhapsody.....Chabrier

TUESDAY
Coronation March from "The Prophet" Meyerbeer
Suite, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" Mendelssohn
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" Borodin
"Espana," rhapsody.....Chabrier
"The Moldau," symphonic poem....Smetana
"Italia," rhapsody.....Casella
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Largo .....Handel
Overture Solennelle, "1812".....Tchaikovsky

WEDNESDAY
"Tannhaeuser," Entrance of the guests into the Wartburg.....Wagner
"Peer Gynt" Suite.....Grieg
Rumanian Rhapsody.....Enesco
"Finlandia," symphonic poem.....Sibelius
Danse Macabre.....Saint-Saens
Capriccio Espagnol.....Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to "Masaniello".....Auber
Waltz, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube" Strauss
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt

THURSDAY
March, "Radetzky".....Strauss
Overture to "Poet and Peasant".....Suppe
Deep River.....Burleigh-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly".....Puccini
"The Cow on the Roof".....Milhaud
(In Memoriam—May 27, 1928)
Marimba solos:
The Old Refrain.....Kreisler
Tambourin Chinois.....Kreisler
Soloist, Lawrence White
Rhapsody in Blue.....Gershwin
Selection, "Show Boat".....Kern
Waltz, "Wine, Woman Song".....Strauss
"Stars and Stripes Forever".....Sousa
Stein Song

FRIDAY
(No Pop concert)

SATURDAY
March from "Aida".....Verdi
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Overture to "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner
Overture, "The Roman Carnival".....Berlioz
Adagio from the "Indian Suite"..MacDowell
"Italia," rhapsody.....Casella
Overture to "The Bartered Bride"...Smetana
Intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz".....Mascagni
Marche Slave.....Tchaikovsky

HERALD MAY 26

MAY 26 —
SUNDAY ADVERTISER—Boston's Greatest Circu

ANNUAL TECH NIGHT AT POPS ON NEXT THURSDAY

TONIGHT, with the second Sunday evening concert of the season, the Pop concerts will enter their fifth week at Symphony Hall. Alfredo Casella will conduct each program except that of Thursday, which is to be the annual Tech night, when Arthur Fiedler will take over the orchestra.

On Friday there will be no Pop concert, since Radcliffe College will then have a concert of their own. All other nights are open to the public.

In the symphonic program to be presented tonight, an interesting feature will be the first Boston performance of Casella's "Concerto Romano" for organ and orchestra, in which the organ solo will be taken by Ruth M. Conniston. Casella will also conduct Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony No. 6, and the second suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe."

MONDAY
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart
Masque Suite, for string orchestra, Handel
Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72, Beethoven
"Semiramide" Overture .....Rossini
Prelude to "Khovantchina"..Moussorgsky
Hopak .....Moussorgsky
Suite from the Ballet, "La Giara," Casella
Indian War Dance.....Skilton
Russian Lullaby .....Berlin-Casella
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen".....Bizet
"Espana," Rhapsody .....Chabrier

TUESDAY
Coronation March from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer
Suite, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin
"Espana," Rhapsody .....Chabrier
"The Moldau," Symphonic Poem, Smetana
"Italia," Rhapsody .....Casella
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Largo .....Handel
Overture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky

WEDNESDAY
"Tannhauser": Entrance of the guests into the Wartburg .....Wagner
"Peer Gynt" Suite.....Grieg
Roumanian Rhapsody .....Enesco
"Finlandia," Symphonic Poem...Sibelius
Danse Macabre .....Saint-Saens
Capriccio Espagnol ....Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to "Masaniello" ..... Auber
Waltz, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt

THURSDAY
March, "Radetsky" .....Strauss
Overture to "Poet and Peasant"..Suppe
Deep River .....Burleigh-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly"..Puccini
"The Cow on the Roof".....Milhaud
(In memoriam, May 27, 1928)
Marimba Solos—
The Old Refrain.....Kreisler
Tambourin Chinois .....Kreisler
Soloist, Lawrence White
Rhapsody in Blue.....Gershwin
Selection, "Show Boat".....Kern
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song," Strauss
"Stars and Stripes Forever".....Sousa
Stein Song

SATURDAY
March from "Aida".....Verdi
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Overture, "The Roman Carnival"..Berlioz
Adagio from the "Indian Suite."
MacDowell
"Italia," Rhapsody .....Casella
Overture to "The Bartered Bride."
Smetana
Intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz"..Mascagni
Marche Slave .....Tchaikovsky

London police, numbering 12,000, marched past the Prince of Wales in honor of the 100th anniversary of the founding of the force by Sir Robert Peel in 1827. Probably the police believe, with Mayor Walker of New York, in the old saying about better

...his own Concerto Romano for organ, and the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe." An audience of good size enjoyed the concert not a little, if the applause, especially for the concerto and for Ravel's suite is a test.

If the musical public realized that these special Sunday Pops offer the equivalent of a Boston Symphony concert at popular prices there would have been no vacant places in the hall. But too many of the people who ought to be attracted by such a concert as last night's fail to distinguish between these Sunday Pops and the routine weekly programs featuring Handel's Largo and Tchaikovsky's "1812."

The first movement of Beethoven's Sixth Symphony has seldom sounded so well of late years in Boston as it did last night. The strings, in particular, played with finely restrained euphony. Mr Casella's reading of the whole symphony was clear, intelligent, straightforward, with no attempt to secure new and original effects at the expense of Beethoven. The only fault to be found with it was a certain lack of rhythmic flexibility in the slow movement.

Mr Casella's organ concerto, played for the first time in Boston, is scored for trumpets, trombones, kettle drums and strings. He has solved the difficult problem of blending organ and orchestra by reverting to the manner of the early 18th century. One thought of the accompaniment for orchestra and organ in works by Bach and Handel in which a chorus is also employed. In the concerto, the organ part, of exceptional brilliance and difficulty, is so managed as to give something of the effect of great choral bodies.

There are three movements, a "sinfonia," or overture, consciously archaic in style as well as in name; a largo, and a "cadenza and toccata"; all of which betray the now fashionable tendency among modern composers to ignore everything in music between 1750 and 1920 and go on from where Bach and Handel left off.

The music is well written; and not without emotional quality, yet one felt its ingenuity and good taste more strongly than its dramatic power. The solo organist, Ruth M. Conniston, from New York, proved herself an exceptionally capable and intelligent performer. Both she and Mr Casella were repeatedly recalled at the end.

Mr Casella stresses, as Ravel himself does, the brilliance, sonority and intensity of the suite from "Daphnis and Chloe." The music lacks melodic originality; there is at least one glaring reminiscence of Rimsky Korsakoff's "Scheherezade"; but it is superlatively well written.

The orchestra, now seated according to the conventional plan, sounded better than it usually does when placed according to Mr Koussevitzky's new ideas. It was astonishing how few defects there were in last night's performance, considering the limited rehearsal time. As a whole, this concert would have lent distinction to any series of Symphony concerts.

The program contained slips announcing a special concert of Mr Casella's compositions to be given Wednesday afternoon, May 29, at 5:15, in Brown Hall, New England Conservatory, at which members of the Boston Symphony, Gertrude Ehrhart, soprano, and Ruth Webb, pianist, will be heard in his chamber pieces. P. R.

GLOBE MAY 27

INFORMATION OBSCURED

The Doer

(Bachrach)

Composers of The Week—Casella

Whose Organ-Concerto Was Played on Sunday, Whose Chamber-Pieces Will Be Played on Wednesday determined to be bright and spontaneous and to prove to the world that plays can be written without taking thought. Mr. Noel Coward, a master of improvisation, will have much to answer for on the Last Day when he is asked to explain why he persuaded his immediate contemporaries to believe that an author must be an amateur, putting down in careless rapture all that comes into his head the moment that it comes into his head.

"Miss Dane shares with Mr. Eugene O'Neill a passion for trying new ways of saying old things when her business as an artist should be to settle once and for all what kind of machinery she will use for her purpose and then, having made it as smooth in its working as is possible, get on with her job as an author. It is not 'great fun' to make experiments. Who, in heaven's name, wishes to make experiments merely for the sake of making them? . . . Some of our authors are making experiments because it is 'such fun' to make experiments. Mr. O'Neill, the most incorrigible experimenter now practising the craft of drama, has nearly laid his reputation as an author in ruins in New York by [illegible] experiment 'Dynamo.'"

Concert-Chronicle

Casella, Conductor

THERE WAS to be seen last evening in Symphony Hall a spectacle peculiar to the City of Boston and the State of Massachusetts. The floor of that concert-room was filled with tables and chairs. The purpose of those tables is to hold food and drink for those sitting around them. Twenty-four hours earlier they served that end; twenty-four later they will again serve it; but between 8.15 and 10.15 on Sunday they must stand empty, because it is unlawful on that day "to offer for sale refreshments of any kind in a theater or hall during an entertainment"—even as it is unlawful throughout the week to commit murder, robbery or other felony. As yet there is no statute, rule or regulation forbidding in such circumstance the consumption of candy by those that bring it of, for and by themselves. A few rebellious spirits brought and ate it last evening—overtly. Doubtless a new decree will speedily repair this oversight.

Nor may there be smoking on Sunday in a theater or a concert-hall during an entertainment. Yet a few feet away, in the corridors, where there is no entertainment, whoever will may smoke his fill. What if a wayward hand, lapsing for the instant from pure legality, should wander to cigar or cigarette case? Symphony Hall is at pains to remove even the temptation. Not so much as a match-box is left on those stripped tables. God save the Commonwealth of Massachusetts! Already the President's renowned commission has at least a footnote for the pages on which it may discuss the declining respect for law and authority.

Fortunately, the listeners in the balconies redressed the balance and resembled a normal audience; while Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony," which began the concert, raised the spirits of the forlorn company on the floor. Mr. Casella took the music simply and cheerfully. The flute, the oboe and the clarinet did their bird-like offices as though Strauss had ordained them. The ingenuous humors of the rustic band and the country merry-making were neither overlooked nor obtruded. The storm was as tempestuous as an orchestra of 1809 in a pastel-colored piece had reason to be. The final pious canticle sounded round and full. What was more to the point—since by this time the "Pastoral Symphony" survives—was the gentle babbling flow in which from variation to variation the conductor kept the brookside song; the freshness and sweetness he lent to the preceding movement. It was idyllic, fragrant, jocund and peaceful, all in brief space, introduction and—to make a paradox—epitome, of the whole. Mr. Casella's light hand and melodic ear did Beethoven good service; while upon both waited the singing strings of the orchestra. A sunny "Pastoral Symphony" as becomes a Latin conductor. A miniature, personal music withal.

As good to hear was the final number—the dawn, the miming of the loves of Pan and Syrinx, the final dance that make the Second Suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloë." Here, par excellence, is the virtuoso-music of our time. Two-score of details from the several instruments—and the stir of nature the swarming, flooding light of sunrise, all without a single commonplace. The simple miming of the old fable, as by a gentle ritual—that employs a most sophisticated orchestra. The wave-like tumult of the general rejoicing, the crest of every wave bejeweled with harmonic or instrumental spray. Through it all Ravel bolder and freer than ever before or ever after, yet not once losing his fine control. Possibly we are a minor age in music, but in that music we have made and played our little master works. Repertory piece, here in Boston, is this Second Suite but from the orchestra at Symphony Hall it has yet to come routined.

Casella, Composer

In the middle piece, though he led, Mr. Casella was composer rather than conductor: as such, at the close, the audience twice recalled him. For the first time in Boston it heard his Concerto for Organ and Orchestra, since there must be no musical form by this Admirable Crichton overlooked. It is characteristic Casella, moreover, in the sense that is evolved from a wide and deep background of musical knowledge; that it is a fusion of styles in the crucible of the composer's mind and imagination; that it depends more upon the play of sonorities than upon intrinsic substance or coloring mood. Mr. Casella knew thoroughly the organ-pieces of the seventeenth-century Frescobaldi at St. Peter's; had even edited them for present usage. He had heard trombones sounding in chorale-like voices as partners or in antiphony to the organ. He was no stranger to staccato-figures in trumpets and trombones—a distinctly modern usage. He had a notion to write a Concerto for organ, trumpets, trombones and strings—a Concerto Romano—in baroque-like weight of design and luxuriance of texture. He remembered that organ and orchestra go better mated than at audibly contentious odds.

Mr. Casella accomplishes these purposes, gratifies these desires in a Concerto that—the experts say—is adept writing for the organ; that sounds orchestrally; that is homogenous and close-woven, motiv into motiv; that within stately forms is free, bold and ornate; that from beginning to end impresses the ear with sonority upon sonority; that escapes, as though they were not, the usual blemishes upon such music. When at some distant day, the final catalogue of Mr. Casella's pieces is assembled, this Concerto Romano may rank among the minor rather than the major items. Yet there will be few that better epitomize his salient qualities as composer or as many-sided figure, above any other, in this musical day of ours. And if he taxed his organist, Miss Ruth Conniston, he also rewarded her.

Monteux Comes Into His Own

When Mr. Monteux returned from New York and Boston to Paris five years ago, he made no secret of his disappointment over the small impression that his work at the Metropolitan Opera House and at Symphony Hall had seemingly made in his own city. Overlooked there, he soon departed to Brussels; with that city as headquarters, took whatever jobs came his way in the European capitals of music. Wisely he was willing to let clear accomplishment gradually re-adjust his fortunes. Now the readjustment has come to pass. He is installed at Amsterdam as successor to Mengelberg with the Gebouw Orchestra. He has been summoned to Paris to save the new Symphony Orchestra from imminent and dire failure. The young men who compose it were, it appears, in sore need of his fine ear and hand as musician; of his patience and encouragement as drill-master. Seemingly he has saved the day, as witnesses this paragraph sent by Monsieur Prunières to the New York Times:

One of the great events of the season was the reappearance of Pierre Monteux, long absent from Paris. It is known that the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris, organized with

At The Pops Tonight

Russian Program

Overture to The Opera, "Russian and Ludmilla" ..... Glinka
Prelude to The Opera, "Khovantchina" —Hopak ..... Musorgsky
Oriental Fantasia, "Islamey" ..... Balakirev
(Scored for Orchestra by Casella)
Symphony, No. 6, in B minor ("The Pathetic") ..... Chaikovsky
Kikimora ..... Liadov
Lullaby from The Ballet, "The Fire-Bird" ..... Stravinsky
Polovtsian Dances from The Opera, "Prince Igor" ..... Borodin

Conductor: A. Casella

At The Pops Tonight

Russian Program

Overture to The Opera, "Russian and Ludmilla" ..... Glinka
Prelude to The Opera, "Khovantchina" —Hopak ..... Musorgsky
Oriental Fantasia, "Islamey" ..... Balakirev
(Scored for Orchestra by Casella)
Symphony, No. 6, in B minor ("The Pathetic") ..... Chaikovsky
Kikimora ..... Liadov
Lullaby from The Ballet, "The Fire-Bird" ..... Stravinsky
Polovtsian Dances from The Opera, "Prince Igor" ..... Borodin

Conductor: A. Casella

Tonight at the Pops

Entrance of the Gladiators.... Fucik
Overture to "Oberon" ..... Weber
Ave Maria ..... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Irish Rhapsody ..... Herbert
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
Marimba Solos
Lawrence White
Overture to "Tannhäuser" ... Wagner
Selection, "Showboat" ..... Kern
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
Marche Slave ..... Tchaikovsky

Arthur Fiedler, Conductor

FIFTH WEEK OF POPS

Tonight, with the second Sunday evening concert of the season, the Pop concerts will enter their fifth week at Symphony hall. Alfredo Casella will conduct each program except that of Thursday, which is to be the annual "Tech" night, when Arthur Fiedler will take over the Pops orchestra of Symphony players for a single evening. On Rhine-country—he had previously dwelt in Central Germany—he believed he had found new promptings to music-making; but when he passed from intention to execution, mind and hand faltered. The orchestral instinct, which distributes the thought or the mood through the instrumental voices as though they were natural and expressive complement, came and went in Schumann. It is conspicuously and pathetically absent in the first movement of the "Rhenish Symphony," though curiously enough it is a burst of creative fire and imagination when the trombones sound across the so-called "Cathedral Scene." (Then also the trombonists of the orchestra gathered laurels.) The second movement keeps life and being only in Schumann's elaboration and glorification of a Rhineland drinking song. The slow movement hints at a drying imagination in spite of the romantic beauty of the final pages—flash-back into the Schumann of prime. In the last two divisions, first stateliness, then animation, fed by a new life freshly visioned, overcome, for the most part, creative inertia and groping.

In spite of these shortcomings in the music itself, Mr. Koussevitzky almost made it prevail. Most other conductors, in these days, condescend to Schumann. "We really ought to have one of his Symphonies, you know." Reading the score, they perceive first its faults of execution and take thought how they shall "touch it up." Mr. Koussevitzky plays Schumann because he feels him and believes in him. He is as well aware as the best of us of Schumann's limitations in the symphonic form. Yet behind them he sees the romantic vision; through them distills the romantic mood; in spite of them releases Schumann's song though the composer himself sang it clumsily. By that song the conductor conquers and by clear title Schumann's Symphonies endure. H. T. P.

Symphony Finances

Eight Hundred Guarantors but Still a Deficit of $43,000.

THE program-books at the Symphony Concert yesterday contained a final list of subscribers to the Guarantee Fund for the current orchestral year. They are far more numerous than ever before — approximately eight hundred. Yet the total sum pledged, $91,952, falls appreciably short of the estimated deficit, say $135,000. As it is, the Trustees still lack $43,000 to pay the working costs of the current season, in which salaries materially rose, while there was no income from broadcasting. The difference between the subscriptions and the estimated deficit practically represents this increase in operating expenses. Perhaps the public of the concerts is too willing to take for granted the ability of the Trustees to find the lacking sum.

At The Pops Tonight

Wagner-Chaikovsky Program

Slavic March—Italian Caprice ..... Chaikovsky
Introduction to Act III.—Apprentices' Dance—Procession of Mastersingers—Homage to Sachs, from The Opera, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ..... Wagner
A Siegfried Idyll—Overture to The Opera "The Flying Dutchman" ..... Wagner
Suite from The Ballet, "Nutcracker" —Song without Words—Overture, "The Year 1812" ..... Chaikovsky

Conductor: A. Casella

178

Matched Masters

Dr. Muck and Mr. Kreisler

Character-Sketch After Their Recent Concert in Berlin from The Newspaper, "Berlin-am-Mittag"

(By Courtesy of Arthur Fiedler)

GLOBE MAY 28

Symphony Hall Pops

At this week's Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, Thursday will be the annual Tech night, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, with a special marimba solo by Lawrence White. There will be no Pop concert Friday night, since Radcliffe College will then have a program of its own. All other nights are open to the public.

TRAV. MAY 29

PAGE FOUR

Will Give Solo on the Marimba

LAWRENCE WHITE

WHITE TO BE POPS SOLOIST

First of Symphony Members Chosen for This Honor

Lawrence White, youngest member of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will have the distinction of being the first soloist of the season from the orchestra personnel at the Pops. Lawrence White will appear tomorrow night with his special and favorite instrument, the marimba.

This young musician was born in Salmon, Idaho. He came here to study at the New England Conservatory, from which he was the first graduate to take the major honors in timpani. He joined the percussion section in the Boston Symphony orchestra last winter.

Lawrence White has made the marimba his hobby. The marimba, a south Mexican and Central American instrument, outwardly resembles the xylophone, but White maintains that it is a lyric rather than a percussive instrument. This is due to the full mellow tone quality derived from a series of cedar box resonators beneath the strips of rosewood of seven years' seasoning, which are actually struck.

TRANS. MAY 31

Portrait of Casella Drawn by Himself

Chamber-Concert Epitomizing His Traits and Works As Composer

MUSICIANS are an indomitable breed. Orpheus set them example; to this day they follow it. . . . For the while Mr. Casella dwells in Boston rounding a final year as conductor at The Pops. Upon some of his younger friends dawned the idea of a concert of his chamber-pieces. What composer—and Mr. Casella is prolific—was ever inert to such an invitation? Time, however, was necessary. The scores of the chosen numbers must be gathered; the "assisting artists" assembled and practised; the public informed. Not until last Wednesday could the concert be made ready, and by that afternoon, as ill luck would have it, the town was sopped in the New-England summer. None the less a valiant little audience sat about Brown Hall at the Conservatory, rejoicing because into that high, airy, isolated and sharp-tuned concert-room soggy heat had not penetrated. Mr. Casella himself took the piano in four out of the five pieces; in the fifth was batonless conductor of a miniature ensemble. From the orchestra of The Pops Mr. Theodorowicz obliged with the violin; Mr. Langendoen with the violoncello; Mr. Allegra with the clarinet; Mr. Allard with the bassoon; Mr. Mager with the trumpet. Miss Ehrhart was singer in three songs; Miss Ruth Webb joined the composer for his "Pupazzetti" in version for two pianos. Finally, the chosen pieces ranged from the Siciliana and Burletta of 1914 to the prize-winning Serenata of 1927. By chance or design, they blended into an interesting epitome of Mr. Casella's traits as composer in the smaller and, for that matter, in the larger forms.

First stood the Sonata for Piano and Violoncello, commissioned by Mrs. Coolidge and played at the Festival of Chamber Music in the Library of Congress a year ago last month. The scholar in Mr. Casella sends him back to ancient forms. The temperate modernist that he also is bids him liberalize them. Into two larger divisions he shaped the Sonata—a Largo and a Bourrée, a Largo and a Rondo. Mr. Casella is no composer by what is called inspiration. His mind works through whatever he writes; in that mind the architectural sense is keen. Observe, then, the symmetry between the divisions of the Sonata, and also the contrasts between the slow movements, full-voiced, square-cut and darkling, and the quick divisions, light, shrill and bright. Mr. Casella's mind is also remarkably assimilative. He has absorbed and can practise the ancient manner. Were an eighteenth-century name, outside a few illustrious and catalogued masters, signed to this Sonata, particularly to the stately Largos, who would question it? Note also the felicity and fertility of the workmanship: the readiness and the quality of invention with the musical substance. If it is no flowering of high and deep imagination, no more is it merely appropriate and workaday. It flows from a composer of talent and temperament for whom music-making is not only self-expression but also the practice of a learned profession.

Next the ever-obliging Miss Ehrhart sang diligently three of Mr. Casella's thirteenth-century songs. They are settings of what-seem, in two instances, to be folk-verses; in the third, the stanzas of a more courtly poet. In a tender and figurative rapture he apostrophizes the maiden of his love. One folk-ditty plays with a touch of fantasy about a nightingale escaped from its cage to the dismay of the child to whom it was gift. The other teems with rustic humor. The amorous swain does not forget acorns for his sweetheart's pig or hay for her heifer. The scholarly, assimilative, many-sided Casella sets all three in modernistic treatment of ancient styles; keeps the singing soprano in her highest range; makes bold with difficult intervals; twines voice and piano-part into a quasi-Wolfian whole. To the non-Italian ear there is not a suggestion of folk-music in Mr. Casella's pages. Only the verse exhales the folk-flavors. Nor from the music of the poet's rapture does his gayety or his ruefulness flow. It is as though Mr. Casella had conned the verses as a lawyer cons his brief; chosen the modernistic vein; presented the best case for them of which he was capable. In such process native Italian lyricism, mating verse and music, is squeezed away.

Then Mr. Casella adept and amusing artificer of trifles. (No Latin composer is ashamed in these days to be "amusant," as the French have it.) The Siciliana and Burletta are written as Trio for Piano, Violin and Violoncello. There are modernistic devices and tangs; but more the music suggests a composer of exhaustless resources and instant skill. Back, almost, to the familiar "Italia" at Symphony Hall harks the heavy-footed Siciliana, moaning as it marches. The Burletta seems attached to it merely as contrasting piece. In it the composer and the three instruments disport themselves nimbly and alertly over motivs and scraps of motivs—possibly the other face of the Janus-like Italian temperament. Mr. Casella's sports and pastimes, however, are cerebral. Everybody knows that our august "executives" now and then wake on a fine morning; glance out of the window and exclaim "What a day! I must play a round of golf." Similarly Mr. Casella. He also wakes and pushes aside the curtain: "It's a fine day! I must make some music."

Ne —From Handel

At We sley College His Oratorio of "Saul"

WHERE the established choral societies hesitate, the college choirs enture. . . . On Sunday evening, June 16, in the chapel of Wellesley College, the musically curious and the ardent Handelians of this icinige may hear his oratorio, "Saul." Written in 1738, admired in its day, only the "Dead March" has perpetuated it. Probbly, it will now be sun for the irst time in A merica. Certainly, he longest memory can recall no erformance within reach of Bosn.

The singers will be the Welles- and the Harvard choirs, with isting sololists. A harpsichord d an orchestra, approximating ndel's, will play the accompaniits. Randall Thompson of the artment of Music in the col-, who has been moving spirit he whole enterprise, will also conductor. . . . How great a tte ra little fire kindleth! Did Davison think as much when he set the spark to the bold spirit amo ties?

His mind responds, and as soon as they can be put to music-paper a Siciliana and Burletta, originaly accompanied by other movements, are on the way to the publisher.

The "Pupapazzetti," written, indeed, as though marionettes were to play them, might adorn any toy-shelf of music. A flick of rhythm and a Marcietta or a Polka is in being. A flick of graceful melody slightly sentimentalized and a Lullaby or a Notturnino is born. Through the Serenata the puppets might be twanging their lutes. The shortest of pieces were a fashion in the days in which "Pupazzetti" were written—fancies caught on the wing; "bloc-notes," as the French called them, made on music-paper. In two strokes Mr. Casella can write them aptly. If in him intellect and science check a spontaneous songfulness, they have not weighted a light hand with fleeting fancies.

Finally the Serenata for Clarinet, Bassoon, Trumpet, Violin and Violoncello that lately won a distinguished prize from the Musical Fund Society in Philadelphia. The six divisions teem with finger-prints of the composer. The first moves to one more of his favorite march-rhythms. The second intellectualizes a minuet until it is nearly undiscoverable so persistent and intricate is the manipulative craft. The third is a Nocturne stylized to a Neapolitan pattern—at beginning a song striving for release and utterance; then escape into ardant melody; underneath the thrumming guitars. What a scholar can Mr. Casella be, though no more than a folk-model stands on his work-table?

Number Four, for the three wind instruments, is a Gavotte at beginning and end with a Musette between—little feat of quick feeling (as the musicians say) for the contributing instruments, and of ways and means to give them voice. With the Gavotte, besides, human and high spirits come creeping into the Serenata, hitherto deferential to eighteenth-century prescription. They lend a touch of quasi-operatic parody to Number Five, a Cavatina for Violin and Violoncello. Then into Number Six they burst—"vivacissimo all a Napoletana"—as though the composer were writing the finale, for miniature orchestra, to the overture of an opera buffé, likewise miniature. The five instruments cavort and chortle, nose to nose; riot away into a tomfoolery that, since Mr. Casella wrote it, is also logical. He has discovered, he believes, the missing link, the continuing bond, between ancient and present Italian composer, between their time and his. It is the art of the opera buffé, in gay spirits adapted and new-plied. Therewith, to the last day of May, 1929, the portrait—or the epitome—is complete.

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Casella has laid hands upon Mr. Gershwin's amusing tone-poem, "An American in Paris," produced last winter at the Philharmonic Concerts in New York. Next month it will also be heard at Symphony Hall. On the other hand, he has put by Piernés "Music-Hall Impressions," an equally amusing piece of jest and fantasy, because it seems too difficult to prepare in the routine of The Pops.

The next Sunday concert at Symphony Hall falls on June 9. In it Mr. Casella will include his recent Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, played by Mr. Szigeti in a few American cities last winter, as yet unheard in Boston. The violinist will be a newcomer—Louis Krasner, lately heard and praised in Paris and London, now eager to gain a footing in America.

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Opéra in Paris finally came to terms about rehearsals and he is now conducting in a few performances of "Boris." Mr. Marcoux sings and acts the Tsar. H. T. P.

This, Friday evening Radcliffe College has taken Symphony Hall for a concert that is part of the current celebration of its jubilee and that is open only to its guests. Consequently there will be no Pop Concert tonight.

Matched Masters

Dr. Muck and Mr. Kreisler

Character-Sketch After Their Recent Concert in Berlin from The Newspaper, "Berlin-am-Mittag"

(By Courtesy of Arthur Fiedler)

GLOBE MAY 28

Symphony Hall Pops

At this week's Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, Thursday will be the annual Tech night, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, with a special marimba solo by Lawrence White. There will be no Pop concert Friday night, since Radcliffe College will then have a program of its own. All other nights are open to the public.

TRAV. MAY 29

PAGE FOUR

Will Give Solo on the Marimba

LAWRENCE WHITE

WHITE TO BE POPS SOLOIST

First of Symphony Members Chosen for This Honor

Lawrence White, youngest member of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will have the distinction of being the first soloist of the season from the orchestra personnel at the Pops. Lawrence White will appear tomorrow night with his special and favorite instrument, the marimba.

This young musician was born in Salmon, Idaho. He came here to study at the New England Conservatory, from which he was the first graduate to take the major honors in timpani. He joined the percussion section in the Boston Symphony orchestra last winter.

Lawrence White has made the marimba his hobby. The marimba, a south Mexican and Central American instrument, outwardly resembles the xylophone, but White maintains that it is a lyric rather than a percussive instrument. This is due to the full mellow tone quality derived from a series of cedar box resonators beneath the strips of rosewood of seven years' seasoning, which are actually struck.

TRANS. MAY 31

Portrait of Casella Drawn by Himself

Chamber-Concert Epitomizing His Traits and Works As Composer

MUSICIANS are an indomitable breed. Orpheus set them example; to this day they follow it. . . . For the while Mr. Casella dwells in Boston rounding a final year as conductor at The Pops. Upon some of his younger friends dawned the idea of a concert of his chamber-pieces. What composer—and Mr. Casella is prolific—was ever inert to such an invitation? Time, however, was necessary. The scores of the chosen numbers must be gathered; the "assisting artists" assembled and practised; the public informed. Not until last Wednesday could the concert be made ready, and by that afternoon, as ill luck would have it, the town was sopped in the New-England summer. None the less a valiant little audience sat about Brown Hall at the Conservatory, rejoicing because into that high, airy, isolated and sharp-tuned concert-room soggy heat had not penetrated. Mr. Casella himself took the piano in four out of the five pieces; in the fifth was batonless conductor of a miniature ensemble. From the orchestra of The Pops Mr. Theodorowicz obliged with the violin; Mr. Langendoen with the violoncello; Mr. Allegra with the clarinet; Mr. Allard with the bassoon; Mr. Mager with the trumpet. Miss Ehrhart was singer in three songs; Miss Ruth Webb joined the composer for his "Pupazzetti" in version for two pianos. Finally, the chosen pieces ranged from the Siciliana and Burletta of 1914 to the prize-winning Serenata of 1927. By chance or design, they blended into an interesting epitome of Mr. Casella's traits as composer in the smaller and, for that matter, in the larger forms.

First stood the Sonata for Piano and Violoncello, commissioned by Mrs. Coolidge and played at the Festival of Chamber Music in the Library of Congress a year ago last month. The scholar in Mr. Casella sends him back to ancient forms. The temperate modernist that he also is bids him liberalize them. Into two larger divisions he shaped the Sonata—a Largo and a Bourrée, a Largo and a Rondo. Mr. Casella is no composer by what is called inspiration. His mind works through whatever he writes; in that mind the architectural sense is keen. Observe, then, the symmetry between the divisions of the Sonata, and also the contrasts between the slow movements, full-voiced, square-cut and darkling, and the quick divisions, light, shrill and bright. Mr. Casella's mind is also remarkably assimilative. He has absorbed and can practise the ancient manner. Were an eighteenth-century name, outside a few illustrious and catalogued masters, signed to this Sonata, particularly to the stately Largos, who would question it? Note also the felicity and fertility of the workmanship: the readiness and the quality of invention with the musical substance. If it is no flowering of high and deep imagination, no more is it merely appropriate and workaday. It flows from a composer of talent and temperament for whom music-making is not only self-expression but also the practice of a learned profession.

Next the ever-obliging Miss Ehrhart sang diligently three of Mr. Casella's thirteenth-century songs. They are settings of what-seem, in two instances, to be folk-verses; in the third, the stanzas of a more courtly poet. In a tender and figurative rapture he apostrophizes the maiden of his love. One folk-ditty plays with a touch of fantasy about a nightingale escaped from its cage to the dismay of the child to whom it was gift. The other teems with rustic humor. The amorous swain does not forget acorns for his sweetheart's pig or hay for her heifer. The scholarly, assimilative, many-sided Casella sets all three in modernistic treatment of ancient styles; keeps the singing soprano in her highest range; makes bold with difficult intervals; twines voice and piano-part into a quasi-Wolfian whole. To the non-Italian ear there is not a suggestion of folk-music in Mr. Casella's pages. Only the verse exhales the folk-flavors. Nor from the music of the poet's rapture does his gayety or his ruefulness flow. It is as though Mr. Casella had conned the verses as a lawyer cons his brief; chosen the modernistic vein; presented the best case for them of which he was capable. In such process native Italian lyricism, mating verse and music, is squeezed away.

Then Mr. Casella adept and amusing artificer of trifles. (No Latin composer is ashamed in these days to be "amusant," as the French have it.) The Siciliana and Burletta are written as Trio for Piano, Violin and Violoncello. There are modernistic devices and tangs; but more the music suggests a composer of exhaustless resources and instant skill. Back, almost, to the familiar "Italia" at Symphony Hall harks the heavy-footed Siciliana, moaning as it marches. The Burletta seems attached to it merely as contrasting piece. In it the composer and the three instruments disport themselves nimbly and alertly over motivs and scraps of motivs—possibly the other face of the Janus-like Italian temperament. Mr. Casella's sports and pastimes, however, are cerebral. Everybody knows that our august "executives" now and then wake on a fine morning; glance out of the window and exclaim "What a day! I must play a round of golf." Similarly Mr. Casella. He also wakes and pushes aside the curtain: "It's a fine day! I must make some music."

New—From Handel

At Wellesley College His Oratorio of "Saul"

WHERE the established choral societies hesitate, the college choirs enture. . . . On Sunday evening, June 16, in the chapel of Wellesley College, the musically curious and the ardent Handelians of this icinige may hear his oratorio, "Saul." Written in 1738, admired in its day, only the "Dead March" has perpetuated it. Probably, it will now be sun for the irst time in A merica. Certainly, he longest memory can recall no erformance within reach of Bosn.

The singers will be the Welles- and the Harvard choirs, with isting sololists. A harpsichord d an orchestra, approximating ndel's, will play the accompaniits. Randall Thompson of the artment of Music in the col-, who has been moving spirit the whole enterprise, will also conductor. . . . How great a atte ra little fire kindleth! Did Davison think as much when he set the spark to the bold spirit among ties?

His mind responds, and as soon as they can be put to music-paper a Siciliana and Burletta, originaly accompanied by other movements, are on the way to the publisher.

The "Pupapazzetti," written, indeed, as though marionettes were to play them, might adorn any toy-shelf of music. A flick of rhythm and a Marcietta or a Polka is in being. A flick of graceful melody slightly sentimentalized and a Lullaby or a Notturnino is born. Through the Serenata the puppets might be twanging their lutes. The shortest of pieces were a fashion in the days in which "Pupazzetti" were written—fancies caught on the wing; "bloc-notes," as the French called them, made on music-paper. In two strokes Mr. Casella can write them aptly. If in him intellect and science check a spontaneous songfulness, they have not weighted a light hand with fleeting fancies.

Finally the Serenata for Clarinet, Bassoon, Trumpet, Violin and Violoncello that lately won a distinguished prize from the Musical Fund Society in Philadelphia. The six divisions teem with finger-prints of the composer. The first moves to one more of his favorite march-rhythms. The second intellectualizes a minuet until it is nearly undiscoverable so persistent and intricate is the manipulative craft. The third is a Nocturne stylized to a Neapolitan pattern—at beginning a song striving for release and utterance; then escape into ardant melody; underneath the thrumming guitars. What a scholar can Mr. Casella be, though no more than a folk-model stands on his work-table?

Number Four, for the three wind instruments, is a Gavotte at beginning and end with a Musette between—little feat of quick feeling (as the musicians say) for the contributing instruments, and of ways and means to give them voice. With the Gavotte, besides, human and high spirits come creeping into the Serenata, hitherto deferential to eighteenth-century prescription. They lend a touch of quasi-operatic parody to Number Five, a Cavatina for Violin and Violoncello. Then into Number Six they burst—"vivacissimo all a Napoletana"—as though the composer were writing the finale, for miniature orchestra, to the overture of an opera buffé, likewise miniature. The five instruments cavort and chortle, nose to nose; riot away into a tomfoolery that, since Mr. Casella wrote it, is also logical. He has discovered, he believes, the missing link, the continuing bond, between ancient and present Italian composer, between their time and his. It is the art of the opera buffé, in gay spirits adapted and new-plied. Therewith, to the last day of May, 1929, the portrait—or the epitome—is complete.

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Casella has laid hands upon Mr. Gershwin's amusing tone-poem, "An American in Paris," produced last winter at the Philharmonic Concerts in New York. Next month it will also be heard at Symphony Hall. On the other hand, he has put by Piernés "Music-Hall Impressions," an equally amusing piece of jest and fantasy, because it seems too difficult to prepare in the routine of The Pops.

The next Sunday concert at Symphony Hall falls on June 9. In it Mr. Casella will include his recent Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, played by Mr. Szigeti in a few American cities last winter, as yet unheard in Boston. The violinist will be a newcomer—Louis Krasner, lately heard and praised in Paris and London, now eager to gain a footing in America.

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Opéra in Paris finally came to terms about rehearsals and he is now conducting in a few performances of "Boris." Mr. Marcoux sings and acts the Tsar. H. T. P.

This, Friday evening Radcliffe College has taken Symphony Hall for a concert that is part of the current celebration of its jubilee and that is open only to its guests. Consequently there will be no Pop Concert tonight.

THE PERSONNEL OF THE GREAT POP CONCERT ORCHESTRA, IN ITS FORTY-THIRD SEASON

THE ORCHESTRA AT THE POP CONCERTS in Symphony hall each night is familiar to Pop goers by the association of years, but never before has the orchestra been so pictured as to give an introduction and a close-up of each individual musician. The players are here grouped as they sit upon the stage at the Pops. In double rows at Conductor Alfredo Casella's left and right, respectively, are the first violin and the second violin sections. Behind the first violins are the 'cellos; behind the second violins, the violas. Grouped in the centre are the wood-wind players; to the left and right of these are the brass. The basses are ranged in the back row left, and the percussion in the back row right, just as they appear in the orchestra.

(Purdy)

THE PERSONNEL OF THE GREAT POP CONCERT ORCHESTRA, IN ITS FORTY-THIRD SEASON

THE ORCHESTRA AT THE POP CONCERTS in Symphony hall each night is familiar to Pop goers by the association of years, but never before has the orchestra been so pictured as to give an introduction and a close-up of each individual musician. The players are here grouped as they sit upon the stage at the Pops. In double rows at Conductor Alfredo Casella's left and right, respectively, are the first violin and the second violin sections. Behind the first violins are the 'cellos; behind the second violins, the violas. Grouped in the centre are the wood-wind players; to the left and right of these are the brass. The basses are ranged in the back row left, and the percussion in the back row right, just as they appear in the orchestra.

(Purdy)

173

174

Form E106—3M—11-26

San Francisco Chronicle

Prints more Book Advertising than any other Paper on the Coast, and its Book Reviews are recognized as the most valuable.

The following item of interest to you appeared in The San Francisco Chronicle of.....19....

Music Dept. Alexander Fried, Editor

6/2/24

Boston is hearing its annual season of spring "Pop" orchestral concerts. Alfredo Casella is conductor. In the old days liquor used to be served to the audience, many of whom were seated at tables. Now soda pop serves the purpose.

* * * * *

Federation of Music Clubs

Sixth Week of the Pops

The pop concerts in Symphony Hall will enter upon the sixth week of their 44th season tomorrow night, under the direction of Alfred Casella, their distinguished Italian conductor. All nights this week are open to the public and of general public interest.

Coming special programs are a Russian program, next Saturday; a Symphonic program on Sunday, June 9, in which Louis Krasner, the famous violinist, will first be heard in Boston, in the first Boston performance of Casella's violin concerto. On the following day, June 10, there will be an all-Wagner program.

The programs of the week follow:

Monday, June 3—Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai; suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; "Roumanian Rhapsody," Enesco; overture to "The Barber of Seville," Rossini; Largo, Handel; "Capriccio Espagnol," Rimsky-Korsakov; ballet of the hours, "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; "Dance of the Waves," Catalani; overture to "Nebuchadnezzar," Verdi.

Tuesday, June 4—Overture to "Cinderella," Rossini; intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz," Mascagni; overture to "Sicilian Vespers,' Verdi; overture, "The Roman Carnival," Berlioz; Ave Maria," Schubert-Wilhelm; "Italia," Casella; "Indian War Dance," Skilton; "To a Wild Rose," MacDowell; "Molly on the Shore," Grainger; "Stars and Stripes Forever," Sousa.

Wednesday, June 5—Overture to "Sakuntala," Goldmark; Suite from "Carmen," Bizet; Overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," "Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner; Songs by University Glee Club.

Thursday, June 6—Triumphal March from "Aida," Verdi; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Berlioz; "Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner; Symphony in B Minor, Schubert; Overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Ballet of the Hours, "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; Waltz, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss; Overture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky.

FRIDAY, JUNE 7

Coronation March from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer; Minuet, Boccherini; Turkish March from "The Ruins of Athens," Beethoven; overture to "Semiramide," Rossini; overture to "La Forza del Destino," Verdi; Largo from the "New World Symphony," Dvorak; Gypsy Dance from "Carmen," Bizet; Hungarian march, "Rakoczy," Berlioz; ballet suite, "Nutcracker," Song Without Words and ouverture solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky.

SATURDAY, JUNE 8

Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," Glinka; prelude to "Khovantchina," Hopak, Moussorgsky; Islamey, Balakirev; Symphony No. 6, Tchaikovsky; Kikimora, Liadov; Lullaby from "The Fire Bird," Stravinsky; Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Izor," Borodin.

SUNDAY, JUNE 9

Symphonic Program.

Beethoven, Casella, Rimsky-Korsakov—Cymphony No. 1 in C major, op 21; Concerto for violin in A minor, (soloist, Louis Krasner); Scheherazade.

GLOBE JUNE 2

Music Notes and Comment

Aside from the Pops and the biennial convention of the National Federation of Music Clubs, to be held in Boston June 9 to 17, the local musical season is at an end. There are the usual pupils' recitals, but little else will occur in our concert halls until Fall.

TRANS JUNE 8

Gershwin as His Friends See Him

With Amusing Foreword and After-Thoughts to His "American in Paris"

REQUESTS have come to this department for the ingenious and humorsome program-note drafted by Deems Taylor for George Gershwin's new orchestral piece, "An American in Paris," which was played last winter in New York by the Philharmonic Society, and which will be done by Mr. Casella on Friday evening at the Pops. The note, which was printed in these columns at the time of the New York performance, is herewith repeated.

"By the composer's own confession," Mr. Taylor begins, "'An American in Paris' is an attempted reconciliation between two opposing schools of musical thought—a Pax Romana, as it were, imposed upon two customarily warring camps. It is program music in that it engages to tell an emotional narrative; to convey, in terms of sound, the successive emotional reactions experienced by a Yankee tourist adrift in the 'City of Light.' It is absolute music as well, in that its structure is determined by considerations musical rather than literary or dramatic. The piece, while not in strict sonata form, resembles an extended symphonic movement in that it announces, develops, combines and recapitulates definite themes. Only, whereas the ordinary symphonic movement is based upon two principal themes, 'An American in Paris' manipulates five.

"While Mr. Gershwin has been heard to hope—and probably not in vain—that his new work can be absorbed and enjoyed purely as a piece of orchestral music, he admits that 'An American in Paris' (which, oddly enough, was largely written in Paris) follows a fairly explicit story. What follows is based upon Mr. Gershwin's own version of the succession of events augmented by a few details supplied by the helpful commentator and—as yet—unrepudiated by the composer.

"You are to imagine, then, an American visiting Paris, swinging down the Champs-Elysées on a mild, sunny morning in May or June. Being what he is, he starts without preliminaries and is off at full speed at once, to the tune of the First Walking Theme, a straightforward, diatonic air, designed to convey an impression of Gallic freedom and gayety.

"Our American's ears being open, as well as his eyes, he notes with pleasure the sounds of the city. French taxi-cabs seem to amuse him particularly, a fact that the orchestra points out in a brief episode introducing four real Paris taxi horns (imported at great expense for the occasion). These have a special theme allotted to them (the driver, possibly?) which is announced by the strings whenever they appear in the score.

"Having safely eluded the taxis, our American apparently passes the open door of a café, where, if one is to believe the trombones, La Maxixe is still popular. Exhilarated by this reminder of the gay nineteen hundreds, he resumes his stroll through the medium of the Second Walking Theme, which is announced by the clarinet, in French with a strong American accent.

"Both themes are now discussed at some length by the instruments until our tourist happens to pass—something. The composer thought it might be a church, while the commentator held out for the Grand Palais—where the Salon holds forth. At all events, our hero does not go in. Instead, as revealed by the English horn, he respectfully slackens his pace until he is safely past.

"At this point the American's itinerary becomes somewhat obscured. It may be that he continues along the Champs-Elysées; it may be that he has turned off—the composer retains an open mind on the subject. However, since what immediately ensues is technically known as a bridge-passage, one is reasonably justified in assuming that Gershwin's pen, guided by an unseen hand, has perpetrated a musical pun, and that when the Third Walking Theme makes its eventual appearance our American has crossed the Seine and is somewhere on the left bank. Certainly it is less Gallic than its predecessors, speaking American with a French intonation, as befits that region of the city where so many Americans foregather. 'Walking' may be a misnomer, for despite its vitality the theme is slightly sedentary in character and becomes progressively more so Indeed, the end of this section is couched in terms so unmistakably, albeit pleasantly, blurred, as to suggest that the American is on the terrasse of a café, exploring the mysteries of an Anise de Lozo.

"And now the orchestra introduces an unhallowed episode. Suffice it to say that a solo violin approaches our hero in the soprano register and addresses him in charming broken English; and, his response being inaudible—or, at least, unintelligible—repeats the remark. This one-sided conversation continues for some little time. . . .

"Of course, one hastens to add, it is possible that a grave injustice is being done to both author and protagonist and that the whole episode is simply a musical transition. The latter interpretation may well be true, for otherwise it is difficult to believe what ensues; our hero becomes homesick. He has the blues, and if the behavior of the orchestra be any criterion, he has them very thoroughly. He realizes suddenly, overwhelmingly, that he does not belong to this place, that he is that most wretched creature, in all the world, a foreigner. The cool, blue Parisian sky, the distant upward sweep of the Eiffel Tower, the bookstalls on the quay, the pattern of horse-chestnut leaves on the white, sun-flecked street—what avails all this alien beauty? He is no Baudelaire, longing to be 'anywhere out of the world.' The world is just what he longs for, the world that he knows best; a world less lovely—sentimental and a little vulgar, perhaps—but for all that, home.

"However, nostalgia is not a fatal disease—nor, in this instance, of over-long duration. Just in the nick of time the compassionate orchestra rushes another theme to the rescue, two trumpets performing the ceremony of introduction. It is apparent that our hero must have met a compatriot; for the last theme is a noisy, cheerful, self-confident Charleston, without a drop of Gallic blood in its veins.

"For the moment, Paris is no more; and a voluble, gusty wise-cracking orchestra proceeds to demonstrate at some length that it's always fair weather when two Americans get together, no matter where. Walking Theme No. 2 enters, soon thereafter enthusiastically abetted by No. 3. Paris isn't such a bad place, after all; as a matter of fact it's a grand place! Nice weather, nothing to do till tomorrow, nice girls—and, by the way, whatever became of that lad Volstead? The blues return, but mitigated by the second Walking Theme—a happy reminiscence rather than a homesick yearning—and the orchestra, in a riotous finale, decides to make a night of it. It will be great to get home, but, meanwhile this is Paris."

Mr. Gilman heard the piece played, and hastened to set down his impressions of it in the Herald Tribune.

"On a certain spring day [he wrote] when the horse chestnuts were in bloom in the Avenue des Champe-Elysées and Frenchmen were scarce in the Ritz café Mr. George Gershwin arrived with well-bred quiet in the loveliest city in the world. Probably the boat train, in accordance with custom, was late, and doubtless Mr. Gershwin, wearied by his journey, retired early, and was soon lulled to sleep by the taxi horns that enliven the Place Vendôme—for surely Mr. Gershwin took rooms as near as possible to those occupied at the end of his life by Frédéric Chopin, who like Mr. Gershwin, contributed to the literature of the piano concerto.

It was probably not much later than the next morning that Mr. Gershwin set forth to gather those "impressions of an American visitor in Paris" which, as he has told us, form the subject matter of his new orchestral work. You may, therefore, imagine Mr. Gershwin sallying forth about noon, a copy of Miss Laughlin's "So You're Going to Paris!" under his arm, and in his brief case one or two volumes of the works of that friend of all Parisian explorers, Georges Cain—perhaps the useful "Promenades dans Paris" and the "Coins de Paris" (which you may get in English, if you prefer, as "Nooks and Corners of Old Paris")'. He would have had, certainly, not less than a hundred francs in his wallet against the day's expenses—for Baedeker, even in the latest edition, warns us that "it is easy to spend that sum per day in Paris without being guilty of extravagance."

Miss Launghlin advises the American explorer in Paris to start from the Place de la Concorde and stop at the Café de la Paix for a cup of chocolate and a brioche; but apparently Mr. Gershwin went in the other direction; for Mr. Deems Taylor, in the circumstantial account of the composer's promenades which he contributed to the program notes, tells us that the American visitor swung down the Champs Elysées as far as the Grand Palais, where the spring Salon held forth. What the truth is, Mr. Gershwin's music does not betray. It contents itself at this point with giving us a "First Walking Theme" (so-called), which we hear from the strings in F major, allegretto grazioso—cheery tune, if not one of great price.

The composer has said that the opening part of "An American in Paris" is "developed in the typical French style, in the manner of Debussy and 'The Six,' though the themes are all original"—a slightly puzzling assertion; as if one should speak of "the typical German style, in the manner of Wagner and Hindemith." But doubtless Mr. Gershwin meant merely that he had striven to tell us in musical language that his American was in Paris, and not in Atlantic City.

According to Mr. Taylor's glossary, Mr. Gershwin was impressed by the Paris taxis, as well as he might be—Mr. Taylor says they "amused" the composer, which implies a godlike and most enviable detachment on the part of Mr. Gershwin. He has imported his memories of them into his score through the means of four real Paris taxi-horns, and also by way of a special taxi-theme—which, to tell the truth, disappointed us by its incongruous gentility.

And our American friend—"perhaps," says Mr. Gershwin in his own account of the work, "after strolling into a café and having a few drinks—suddenly succumbs to a spasm of homesickness." This, says Mr. Taylor's more detailed account, was somewhere on the Left Bank, which our promenading American had reached to the accompaniment of two more "Walking" Themes." At all events, he is seated before a café, exploring the mysteries of an Anise de Lozo, when he is accosted.

This Paphian incident survives in Mr. Gershwin's musical travelogue in the shape of a seductive violin-solo, delivered last night, with poetic injustice, by the blameless Mr. Guidi, concertmaster of the orchestra. Miss Laughlin in her book gives no warning of this peril to the American in Paris (though she does allude darkly to "those whose idea of Paris is bounded on the south by dear-knows-what"), and it is just possible that our Promenader derived small benefit from this encounter; for both the composer and his commentator tell us that melancholy now seized him.

Mr. Gershwin tactfully refers to this as "a spasm of homesickness"—and he makes no mention of the Circe of the violin-solo. Mr. Taylor says that the stroller "has the blues." And, symbolically, so has Mr. Gershwin's orchestra. It is a good "blues," though not so good a one as we might have expected from Mr. Gershwin. But we accept it cheerfully, and are ready for the Charleston that follows it, an indefeasibly American subject that banishes with its lusty trumpet voice the melancholy sown in the Promenader's breast by Circe, or whoever or whatever it was that lowered his vibrations.

Concerts Next Week

Progress of The Pops

INCIDENTS are plentiful in the programs for The Pops next week. To begin at the beginning, the middle piece on Sunday evening will be Mr. Casella's new Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, first heard at Moscow last autumn, repeated in Chicago last February, now passing to Boston. In the other two cities the violinist was Mr. Szigeti; here he will be Louis Krasner, a young Russian of Providence, schooled in Boston at the New England Conservatory, applauded of late at concerts in Berlin, Paris and London, on Sunday making his American début. The Concerto runs in three divisions: Mosso, Adagio, Rondo. Beethoven's Haydn-like First Symphony, will precede the Concerto, and Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite drawn from The Arabian Nights, "Scheherazade," will follow it. If ever there was showpiece for composer, conductor and the virtuosi of the orchestra, here it is.

For Monday, Mr. Casella sets a program of numbers from Wagner's operas—"The Flying Dutchman," "Lohengrin," "Tannhäuser," "Die Meistersinger," "Die Walküre," "Götterdämmerung," with "A Siegfried Idyll" to freshen the list and fill the measure. On Tuesday, Mendelssohn's overture, "Fingal's Cave" and Rimsky-Korsakov's tone-poem, "Sadko" diversify a program of familiar numbers. The list for Wednesday assembles four pieces from American composers: "The Lake" from Mr. Carpenter's Suite, "Adventures in A Perambulator"; the

Continued on Following Page

Ready and Waiting

Louis W. Krasner (Fayer, Vienna)

ays the gallant cavalier, Gaylord Ravenal in "Showboat," about to depart from

HERALD JUNE 9

POPS PROGRAM

Tonight in Symphony hall the Pop concerts will enter on the seventh week of their 44th season with the first Boston performance of Alfredo Casella's violin concerto, in which Louis Krasner will be the soloist. Mr. Casella will also present at tonight's concert the First Symphony of Beethoven and Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade."

Other evenings of the week will be an all-Wagner program tomorrow; a program featuring American composers on Wednesday to include Carpenter, Hill, Hanson and Chadwick. Tufts night on Thursday and the program of Saturday will both be conducted by Arthur Fiedler. These, like all other nights, will be open to the public; on Friday the first Boston performance of George Gershwin's latest symphonic score, "An American in Paris." This piece had its first performance by the New York Philharmonic orchestra in New York on Dec. 12 last.

The programs this week follow:

MONDAY, JUNE 10

Tannhaeuser, Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg
A Siegfried Idyll.
The Flying Dutchman, overture.
The Mastersingers of Nuremberg.
Dusk of the Gods, Siegfried's Death Music.
The Valkyrie, Magic Fire Music.
Tannhaeuser, Bacchanale.
Lohengrin, Introduction to Act III.
The Valkyrie, Ride of the Valkyries.

TUESDAY

Overture to "The Secret Marriage"..Cimaroso
Set of Act Tunes and Dances..Purcell-Bliss
Overture to "Semiramide" ..... Rossini
Overture to "Fingal's Cave" ..Mendelssohn
"Sadka," Tone Poem.....Rimsky-Korsakov
"La Valse," Choregraphic Poem ... Ravel
"Molly on the Shore" ..... Grainger
Largo ..... Handel
Pomp and Circumstance ..... Elgar

WEDNESDAY

Overture to "Cindarella".....Rossini
Set of Act Tunes and Dances..Purcell-Bliss
Overture to "Leonore," No. 3....Beethoven
"The Lake," from "Adventures in a Perambulator" ..... Carpenter
March from "Stevensoniana" ..... Hill
Adagio from the Nordic Symphony—Hanson
Hobgoblin from Symphonic Sketches ..... Chadwick
Suite from the Ballet "La Ciara".....Casella
Hungarian March, "Rakocky" ..... Berlioz
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers"...Verdi

THURSDAY

March, "Under the Double Eagle" ..... J. F. Wagner
Overture to "Mignon"..... Thomas
"Finlandia," Symphonic Poem.....Sibelius
Tufts Songs:
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana"..Mascagni
Andante Cantabile.....Tchaikowsky
Overture to "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner
Tufts Songs:
Selection, "New Moon".....Romberg
American Patrol ..... Meacham

FRIDAY

Military Mafch.....Schubert-Casella
Suite, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ..... Mendelssohn
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Brandenburg Concerto No. 1 .....Bach
"An American in Paris," Suite....Gershwin
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Magic Fire Music from "The Valkyrie" ..... Wagner

SATURDAY

Entrance of the Gladiators.....Fucik
Overture to "Oberon" ..... Weber
Ave Maria.....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Irish Rhapsody ..... Herbert
Suite, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Marimba Solos:
The Rosary .....Nevin
Sweet and Low ..... Barnby
Scherzo ..... van Goens
Lawrence White
Overture to "Tannhaeuser"..... Wagner
Selection, "Showboat" ..... Kern
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
Marche Slave ..... Tchaikovsky

Special interest attaches to the first performance in Boston of Casella's Violin Concerto at the Pop concert tonight. One of the composer's latest scores, having been written in 1928, it had both European and American performances in the season past. The concerto was played by Joseph Szigeti with the orchestras of Chicago and Cincinnati. Its first performance, however, was at Moscow, where Mr. Szigeti played with the conductorless orchestra. He also played it in London, Paris, Rome, Frankfort, Vienna and other European cities, more than 20 times in all. As chance has it, Mr. Casella will on Tuesday night hear his concerto for the first time.

Louis Krasner, the solo violinist at this concert, was born near Kiev, Russia, and was brought to America (and Providence) by his parents at the age of 5. He graduated from the New England Conservatory with the highest honors. He began his public career in Europe last season, giving recitals and playing with orchestras in Vienna, Berlin, Paris, London, and lesser capitals. His appearance at the Pops is his first in this country since his European tour. He has played Casella's concerts at the recent Siena festival and at Rome with piano accompaniment.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

GLOBE JUNE

About Pops Programs

The programs for the seventh week of Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, printed today in this department, prove that anyone hereabouts who likes the kind of music that furnishes the lighter portion of the Boston Symphony concert programs can hear some of it almost any night at the Pops, and smoke, eat sandwiches or cakes, and drink what used to be called "temperance drinks" while listening if he chooses.

These concerts are not "educational" or "uplifting" in purpose. Mr Casella, the notable Italian musician whom Boston is very lucky to have here each spring as Pops conductor, chooses the programs with the one idea of letting the audiences listen to a wide variety of music easy to enjoy. Yet anyone wanting to learn to appreciate Symphony concerts could hardly do better than to go often to the Pops before investing in a season ticket for one of the subscription series of Boston Symphony concerts.

Tonight the third of the special Sunday programs, offered fortnightly is actually, though not in name, a Symphony concert, at Pops prices. The laws of this State do not, as interpreted by the constituted authorities, permit the serving of refreshments or smoking at concerts on Sundays, so that the happy informality of the weekday atmosphere will be lacking tonight.

The audience tonight will hear Beethoven's First Symphony, a light and tuneful piece with little of the complexities of his later masterpieces in that form; Mr Casella's new violin concerto, and Rimsky Korsakof's "Scheherezade" suite, which phonograph recordings, radio performances and arrangements and selections of all sorts have made widely and generally popular. It is full of pretty tunes, all more or less Oriental in character, and carry out the Arabian nights atmosphere suggested by the title. The separate sections are linked together by means of a repeated theme for solo violin which the composer intended to stand for the Queen whose gift for story telling saved her life. But there is little attempt to make the music tell definite stories, something music cannot do.

Mr Casella's concerto has not been played in Boston before, though the noted Hungarian violinist, Szigeti, to whom it is dedicated, has performed it in many other cities in Europe and America.

Krasner Soloist Tonight

The soloist tonight is a recent graduate of the New England Conservatory, Louis Krasner, who has just returned from a concert tour of Europe. Born in Kiev, Russia, Mr Krasner was brought to Providence, R I, at the age of five, and has since made his home there. Tonight marks his formal Boston debut.

Anyone who wants to know what a Symphony concert is like can find out by hearing tonight's concert. The program and performance will be comparable to those offered during the Winter to Boston Symphony subscribers. The price of tickets is much less. The audience will not be a "Society" one, but the music will be what the fashionable Friday afternoon Symphony audience is accustomed to hear.

If tonight's program sounds too heavy (it isn't really heavy at all if you go by the music and are not afraid of the words "symphony," "Concerto" and "suite" on the program) there will be ample opportunity at the regular weekday concerts to hear some of the best orchestral music.

Monday's program is devoted to the music of the most popular of the very great composers, Wagner. It includes what many musicians believe to be his finest piece, the orchestral excerpt from "Goetterdammerung" which in the opera is an interlude following the death of the hero, Siegfried. This is a succession of the leading musical ideas or "motives" associated with Siegfried throughout the four music dramas "The Niblung's Ring."

There is an admirable phonograph record of Dr Karl Muck's conducting of this "Siegfried Funeral Music," in case you wish to hear it before or after the concert. Nobody who heard the former Boston Symphony conductor in this piece here will ever forget how marvelously he interpreted it. The record is one of the new electrical recordings, made last year in Berlin.

Tuesday's program includes Ravel's "La Valse," one of the winners this season in the voting of the Boston Symphony audiences for the final "request program" and an interesting example of modern French music; also one of the finest bits of orchestral tone painting yet produced, Mendelssohn's overture "Fingal's Cave," or "The Hebrides." The first few measures of this in particular can hardly fail to evoke memories of the sea foaming around misty rocky shores in any listener who has ever seen and heard it.

Wednesday's program, besides a group of pieces by American composers, includes Beethoven's greatest overture, "Leonore No. 3," one of the finest bits of dramatic music in the world. It is a sort of summary of his opera "Fidelio," for which he at first intended it to serve as overture.

"Leonore No. 3"

The hero is imprisoned in a dungeon as a political prisoner, under sentence of death. His wife, in disguise, has made her way to him, and is bidding him a last farewell. Suddenly in the distance a trumpet call is heard (off stage). The few measures following this trumpet call, which means that a pardon has come from the King and the prisoner's life is safe, portray the wife's feelings. The trumpet call is repeated and the final measures show the joy of the prisoners at release.

The story is a silly one, but Beethoven chose it for his opera because he was shocked at what seemed to him the immorality of the operas like Mozart's "Don Juan." The full title of Beethoven's opera is "Fidelio, or Conjugal Love." The music is so powerful that one forgets the foolishness of the story.

Friday brings the first Boston performance of Gershwin's latest serious piece "An American in Paris" written for the New York Philharmonic Symphony and first played by them last Winter. It is an attempt to describe the experiences and impressions of an American tourist in Paris in terms of modern "high-brow" jazz.

Thursday's program, Tufts College night, but open to the public, is full of popular favorites of the kind nicknamed "Chestnuts," but even these need not be sneered at. Two of them, Sibelius' "Finlandia" and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture belong to the Symphony concert repertory. Shubert's song "Ave Maria" is one of the most beautiful melodies ever written, in a rather tasteless arrangement by Wilhelmj; and Johann Strauss' "Blue Danube," the finest, as well as the most popular of all waltzes, are examples of worthwhile "chestnuts" from Saturday's program, which also includes from the Symphony concert repertory Weber's beautiful "Oberon" overture.

Any night except Thursday or Saturday will offer the curious visitor to the Pops a number of pieces from the customary Symphony concert repertory, which should prove to him that there is nothing awe inspiring or difficult about such music.

It is true that some of the Symphony repertory is difficult for untrained listeners to enjoy, but the greater part of it is readily likeable by anyone who cares for orchestral music at all. Mr Casella is not trying to make the Pops highbrow, he is merely playing the best music because it is the most enjoyable.

And any night except tonight there will be such old favorites as Handel's "Largo," Schubert's "Marche Militaire" and Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" among the numbers played. The encores are almost always chosen from such old favorites as these. The Pops really offer a musical education made easy, as well as a good time.

Complete Programs for Seventh Week of Pop

The complete programs for this, the seventh week of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, follow. The concerts begin at 8:15 and are over by 10:45. Alfredo Casella conducts the orchestra of 80 Boston Symphony players.

Sunday, June 9, First Symphony, Beethoven; concerto for violin (first time here), Casella; Suite "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakov. Soloist, Louis Krasner.

Monday, June 10, Wagner program—"Tannhauser," entrance of the guests into the Wartburg; "A Siegfried Idyll," "The Flying Dutchman," Overture; "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Prelude; "Dusk of the Gods," Siegfried's Death Music; "The Valkyrie," Magic Fire Music; "Tannhauser, Bacchanale," "Lohengrin," Introduction to Act III; "The Valkyrie," Ride of the Valkyries.

Tuesday, June 11—Overture to "The Secret Marriage," Cimrosa; Set of Act Tunes and Dances, Purcell-Bliss; Overture to "Semiramide," Rossini; Overture to "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; "Sadka," Rimsky-Korsakov; "La Valse," Ravel; "Molly on the Shore," Grainger; "Largo," Handel; "Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar.

Wednesday, June 12: Overture to "Cindarella," Rossini; Set of Tunes and Dances, Purcell-Bliss; Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Beethoven; "The Lake," from "Adventures in a Perambulator," Carpenter; March from "Stevensoniana," Hill; Adagio from the Nordic Symphony, Hanson; Hobgoblin from Symphonic Sketches, Chadwick; Suite from the Ballet "La Ciara," Casella; Hungarian March, Berlioz; Prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner; Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers," Verdi.

Thursday, June 13: March, "Under the Double Eagle," J. F. Wagner; Overture to "Mignon," Thomas; "Finlandia," Sibelius; Tufts Songs, Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni; Andante Cantabile, Tchaikovsky; Overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; Tufts Songs, Selection, "New Moon," Romberg; "American Patrol," Meacham.

Friday, June 14—Military March, Schubert—Casella; Suite, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; Overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Brandenburg Concerto No. 1, Bach; "An American in Paris," Suite, Gershwin; Prelude to "Lohengrin," Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin," Magic Fire Music from "The Valkyrie," Wagner.

Saturday, June 15—Entrance of the Gladiators, Fucik; Overture to "Oberon," Weber; "Ave Marie," Schubert-Wilhelmj; "Irish Rhapsody," Herbert; Suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; Marimba Solos: "The Rosary," Nevin; "Sweet and Low," Barnby; Scherzo, (soloist Lawrence White) Van Goens; Overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; Selection, "Showboat," Kern; Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss; "Marche Slave," Tchaikovsky;

Ready and Waiting

Louis W. Krasner (Fayer, Vienna)

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

About Pops Programs

The programs for the seventh week of Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, printed today in this department, prove that anyone hereabouts who likes the kind of music that furnishes the lighter portion of the Boston Symphony concert programs can hear some of it almost any night at the Pops, and smoke, eat sandwiches or cakes, and drink what used to be called "temperance drinks" while listening if he chooses.

These concerts are not "educational" or "uplifting" in purpose. Mr Casella, the notable Italian musician whom Boston is very lucky to have here each spring as Pops conductor, chooses the programs with the one idea of letting the audiences listen to a wide variety of music easy to enjoy. Yet anyone wanting to learn to appreciate Symphony concerts could hardly do better than to go often to the Pops before investing in a season ticket for one of the subscription series of Boston Symphony concerts.

Tonight the third of the special Sunday programs, offered fortnightly is actually, though not in name, a Symphony concert, at Pops prices. The laws of this State do not, as interpreted by the constituted authorities, permit the serving of refreshments or smoking at concerts on Sundays, so that the happy informality of the weekday atmosphere will be lacking tonight.

The audience tonight will hear Beethoven's First Symphony, a light and tuneful piece with little of the complexities of his later masterpieces in that form; Mr Casella's new violin concerto, and Rimsky Korsakof's "Scheherezade" suite, which phonograph recordings, radio performances and arrangements and selections of all sorts have made widely and generally popular. It is full of pretty tunes, all more or less Oriental in character, and carry out the Arabian nights atmosphere suggested by the title. The separate sections are linked together by means of a repeated theme for solo violin which the composer intended to stand for the Queen whose gift for story telling saved her life. But there is little attempt to make the music tell definite stories, something music cannot do.

Mr Casella's concerto has not been played in Boston before, though the noted Hungarian violinist, Szigeti, to whom it is dedicated, has performed it in many other cities in Europe and America.

Krasner Soloist Tonight

The soloist tonight is a recent graduate of the New England Conservatory, Louis Krasner, who has just returned from a concert tour of Europe. Born in Kiev, Russia, Mr Krasner was brought to Providence, R I, at the age of five, and has since made his home there. Tonight marks his formal Boston debut.

Anyone who wants to know what a Symphony concert is like can find out by hearing tonight's concert. The program and performance will be comparable to those offered during the Winter to Boston Symphony subscribers. The price of tickets is much less. The audience will not be a "Society" one, but the music will be what the fashionable Friday afternoon Symphony audience is accustomed to hear.

If tonight's program sounds too heavy (it isn't really heavy at all if you go by the music and are not afraid of the words "symphony," "Concerto" and "suite" on the program) there will be ample opportunity at the regular weekday concerts to hear some of the best orchestral music.

Monday's program is devoted to the music of the most popular of the very great composers, Wagner. It includes what many musicians believe to be his finest piece, the orchestral excerpt from "Goetterdammerung" which in the opera is an interlude following the death of the hero, Siegfried. This is a succession of the leading musical ideas or "motives" associated with Siegfried throughout the four music dramas "The Niblung's Ring."

There is an admirable phonograph record of Dr Karl Muck's conducting of this "Siegfried Funeral Music," in case you wish to hear it before or after the concert. Nobody who heard the former Boston Symphony conductor in this piece here will ever forget how marvelously he interpreted it. The record is one of the new electrical recordings, made last year in Berlin.

Tuesday's program includes Ravel's "La Valse," one of the winners this season in the voting of the Boston Symphony audiences for the final "request program" and an interesting example of modern French music; also one of the finest bits of orchestral tone painting yet produced, Mendelssohn's overture "Fingal's Cave," or "The Hebrides." The first few measures of this in particular can hardly fail to evoke memories of the sea foaming around misty rocky shores in any listener who has ever seen and heard it.

Wednesday's program, besides a group of pieces by American composers, includes Beethoven's greatest overture, "Leonore No. 3," one of the finest bits of dramatic music in the world. It is a sort of summary of his opera "Fidelio," for which he at first intended it to serve as overture.

"Leonore No. 3"

The hero is imprisoned in a dungeon as a political prisoner, under sentence of death. His wife, in disguise, has made her way to him, and is bidding him a last farewell. Suddenly in the distance a trumpet call is heard (off stage). The few measures following this trumpet call, which means that a pardon has come from the King and the prisoner's life is safe, portray the wife's feelings. The trumpet call is repeated and the final measures show the joy of the prisoners at release.

The story is a silly one, but Beethoven chose it for his opera because he was shocked at what seemed to him the immorality of the operas like Mozart's "Don Juan." The full title of Beethoven's opera is "Fidelio, or Conjugal Love." The music is so powerful that one forgets the foolishness of the story.

Friday brings the first Boston performance of Gershwin's latest serious piece "An American in Paris" written for the New York Philharmonic Symphony and first played by them last Winter. It is an attempt to describe the experiences and impressions of an American tourist in Paris in terms of modern "high-brow" jazz.

Thursday's program, Tufts College night, but open to the public, is full of popular favorites of the kind nicknamed "Chestnuts," but even these need not be sneered at. Two of them, Sibelius' "Finlandia" and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture belong to the Symphony concert repertory. Shubert's song "Ave Maria" is one of the most beautiful melodies ever written, in a rather tasteless arrangement by Wilhelmj; and Johann Strauss' "Blue Danube," the finest, as well as the most popular of all waltzes, are examples of worthwhile "chestnuts" from Saturday's program, which also includes from the Symphony concert repertory Weber's beautiful "Oberon" overture.

Any night except Thursday or Saturday will offer the curious visitor to the Pops a number of pieces from the customary Symphony concert repertory, which should prove to him that there is nothing awe inspiring or difficult about such music.

It is true that some of the Symphony repertory is difficult for untrained listeners to enjoy, but the greater part of it is readily likeable by anyone who cares for orchestral music at all. Mr Casella is not trying to make the Pops highbrow, he is merely playing the best music because it is the most enjoyable.

And any night except tonight there will be such old favorites as Handel's "Largo," Schubert's "Marche Militaire," and Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" among the numbers played. The encores are almost always chosen from such old favorites as these. The Pops really offer a musical education made easy, as well as a good time.

Complete Programs for Seventh Week of Pop

The complete programs for this, the seventh week of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, follow. The concerts begin at 8:15 and are over by 10:45. Alfredo Casella conducts the orchestra of 80 Boston Symphony players.

Sunday, June 9, First Symphony, Beethoven; concerto for violin (first time here), Casella; Suite "Scheherezade," Rimsky-Korsakov. Soloist, Louis Krasner.

Monday, June 10, Wagner program—"Tannhauser," entrance of the guests into the Wartburg; "A Siegfried Idyll," "The Flying Dutchman," Overture; "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Prelude; "Dusk of the Gods," Siegfried's Death Music; "The Valkyrie," Magic Fire Music; "Tannhauser, Bacchanale," "Lohengrin," Introduction to Act III; "The Valkyrie," Ride of the Valkyries.

Tuesday, June 11—Overture to "The Secret Marriage," Cimrosa; Set of Act Tunes and Dances, Purcell-Bliss; Overture to "Semiramide," Rossini; Overture to "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; "Sadka," Rimsky-Korsakov; "La Valse," Ravel; "Molly on the Shore," Grainger; "Largo," Handel; "Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar.

Wednesday, June 12: Overture to "Cindarella," Rossini; Set of Tunes and Dances, Purcell-Bliss; Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Beethoven; "The Lake," from "Adventures in a Perambulator," Carpenter; March from "Stevensoniana," Hill; Adagio from the Nordic Symphony, Hanson; Hobgoblin from Symphonic Sketches, Chadwick; Suite from the Ballet "La Ciara," Casella; Hungarian March, Berlioz; Prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner; Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers," Verdi.

Thursday, June 13: March, "Under the Double Eagle," J. F. Wagner; Overture to "Mignon," Thomas; "Finlandia," Sibelius; Tufts Songs, Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni; Andante Cantabile, Tchaikovsky; Overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; Tufts Songs, Selection, "New Moon," Romberg; "American Patrol," Meacham.

Friday, June 14—Military March, Schubert—Casella; Suite, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; Overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Brandenburg Concerto No. 1, Bach; "An American in Paris," Suite, Gershwin; Prelude to "Lohengrin," Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin," Magic Fire Music from "The Valkyrie," Wagner.

Saturday, June 15—Entrance of the Gladiators, Fucik; Overture to "Oberon," Weber; "Ave Marie," Schubert-Wilhelmj; "Irish Rhapsody," Herbert; Suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; Marimba Solos: "The Rosary," Nevin; "Sweet and Low," Barnby; Scherzo, (soloist Lawrence White) Van Goens; Overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; Selection, "Showboat," Kern; Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss; "Marche Slave," Tchaikovsky;

HERALD JUNE 9

ays the gallant gondolier Gaylord Ravenel in "Show Boat," about to depart from

POPS PROGRAM

Tonight in Symphony hall the Pop concerts will enter on the seventh week of their 44th season with the first Boston performance of Alfredo Casella's violin concerto, in which Louis Krasner will be the soloist. Mr. Casella will also present at tonight's concert the First Symphony of Beethoven and Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade."

Other evenings of the week will be an all-Wagner program tomorrow; a program featuring American composers on Wednesday to include Carpenter, Hill, Hanson and Chadwick. Tufts night on Thursday and the program of Saturday will both be conducted by Arthur Fiedler. These, like all other nights, will be open to the public; on Friday the first Boston performance of George Gershwin's latest symphonic score, "An American in Paris." This piece had its first performance by the New York Philharmonic orchestra in New York on Dec. 12 last.

The programs this week follow:

MONDAY, JUNE 10

Tannhaeuser, Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg
A Siegfried Idyll.
The Flying Dutchman, overture.
The Mastersingers of Nuremberg.
Dusk of the Gods, Siegfried's Death Music.
The Valkyrie, Magic Fire Music.
Tannhaeuser, Bacchanale.
Lohengrin, Introduction to Act III.
The Valkyrie, Ride of the Valkyries.

TUESDAY

Overture to "The Secret Marriage"...Cimaroso
Set of Act Tunes and Dances..Purcell-Bliss
Overture to "Semiramide".....Rossini
Overture to "Fingal's Cave"...Mendelssohn
"Sadka," Tone Poem....Rimsky-Korsakov
"La Valse," Choregraphic Poem ... Ravel
"Molly on the Shore".....Grainger
Largo .....Handel
Pomp and Circumstance .....Elgar

WEDNESDAY

Overture to "Cindarella".....Rossini
Set of Act. Tunes and Dances..Purcell-Bliss
Overture to "Leonore," No. 3....Beethoven
"The Lake," from "Adventures in a Perambulator".....Carpenter
March from "Stevensoniana".....Hill
Adagio from the Nordic Symphony—Hanson
Hobgoblin from Symphonic Sketches
.....Chadwick
Suite from the Ballet "La Ciara"....Casella
Hungarian March, "Rakocky" .....Berlioz
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers"...Verdi

THURSDAY

March, "Under the Double Eagle"
.....J. F. Wagner
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
"Finlandia," Symphonic Poem....Sibelius
Tufts Songs:
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana"...Mascagni
Andante Cantabile.....Tchaikowsky
Overture to "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner
Tufts Songs:
Selection, "New Moon".....Romberg
American Patrol .....Meacham

FRIDAY

Military March.....Schubert-Casella
Suite, "A Midsummer Night's Dream"
.....Mendelssohn
Overture to "William Tell" .....Rossini
Brandenburg Concerto No. 1.....Bach
"An American in Paris," Suite....Gershwin
Prelude to "Lohengrin" .....Wagner
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin"
.....Wagner
Magic Fire Music from "The Valkyrie"
.....Wagner

SATURDAY

Entrance of the Gladiators.....Fucik
Overture to "Oberon" .....Weber
Ave Maria.....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Irish Rhapsody .....Herbert
Suite, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Marimba Solos:
The Rosary .....Nevin
Sweet and Low .....Barnby
Scherzo .....van Goens,
Lawrence White
Overture to "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner
Selection, "Showboat".....Kern
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"
.....Strauss
Marche Slave .....Tchaikovsky

Special interest attaches to the first performance in Boston of Casella's Violin Concerto at the Pop concert tonight. One of the composer's latest scores, having been written in 1928, it had both European and American performances in the season past. The concerto was played by Joseph Szigeti with the orchestras of Chicago and Cincinnati. Its first performance, however, was at Moscow, where Mr. Szigeti played with the conductorless orchestra. He also played it in London, Paris, Rome, Frankfort, Vienna and other European cities, more than 20 times in all. As chance has it, Mr. Casella will on Tuesday night hear his concerto for the first time.

Louis Krasner, the solo violinist at this concert, was born near Kiev, Russia, and was brought to America (and Providence) by his parents at the age of 5. He graduated from the New England Conservatory with the highest honors. He began his public career in Europe last season, giving recitals and playing with orchestras in Vienna, Berlin, Paris, London, and lesser capitals. His appearance at the Pops is his first in this country since his European tour. He has played Casella's concerts at the recent Siena festival and at Rome with piano accompaniment.

INCORRECT PAGINATION

KRASNER FEATURED AS POPS GO INTO THEIR SEVENTH WEEK

TONIGHT in Symphony Hall the Pop Concerts will enter upon the seventh week of their 44th season with the first Boston performance of Alfredo Casella's violin concerto, in which Louis Krasner will be the soloist.

The composer will then conduct his recent score for the first time, although it was heard in many cities of Europe and America last season when performed by Joseph Szigetti, to whom it is dedicated.

Louis Krasner

Krasner, since graduating from the New England Conservatory, has had a remarkable season in Europe, giving recitals and appearing with orchestras in France, England, Germany, Austria and other countries. He recently returned from Europe, and his appearance tonight at the Pops will be his first in this country since his European success.

MONDAY—WAGNER PROGRAM

Tannhauser entrance of the guests into the Wartburg.
A Siegfried Idyll.
The Flying Dutchman, overture.
The Mastersingers of Nuremberg.
Dusk of the Gods, Siegfried's Death Music.
The Valkyrie, Magic Fire Music.
Tannhauser, Bacchanale.
Lohengrin, introduction to Act. III.
The Valkyrie, Ride of Valkyries.

TUESDAY

Overture to "The Secret Marriage" Cimarosa
Set of Act Tunes and Dances Purcell-Bliss
Overture to "Semiramide".....Rossini
Overture to "Fingal's Cave".Mendelssohn
"Sadko," Tone Poem...Rimsky-Korsakov
"La Valse," Choregraphic Poem...Ravel
"Molly on the Shore".....Grainger
Largo .....Handel
Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar

WEDNESDAY

Overture to "Cindarella".....Rossini
Set of Act, Tunes and Dances Purcell-Bliss
Overture to "Leonore" No. 3...Beethoven
"The Lake," from "Adventures in a Perambulator" ..... Carpenter
March from "Stevensoniana".....Hill
Adagio from the Nordic Symphony Hanson
Hobogoblin from Symphonic Sketches Chadwick
Suite from the Ballet "La Ciara".Casella
Hungarian March, "Rakocky"....Berlioz
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers"..Verdi

THURSDAY

March, "Under the Double Eagle," J. F. Wagner
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
"Finlandia," Symphonic Poem...Sibelius
Tufts Songs
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana" Mascagni
Andante Cantabile.....Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Tufts Songs
Selection, "New Moon".....Romberg
American Patrol .....Meacham

AMER. JUNE 9

"FATHER AND SON" IS GLOBE'S FEATURE

COMBINING an unusual plot with excellent character interpretation, "Father and Son," talking and sound production, comes to the Netoco Globe for the first four days of this week. Dorothy Revier, Mickey McBan and Helene Chadwick head the supporting cast. Second on the bill is "Tide of Empire," with Renee Adoree and George Duryea.

"Molly and Me," talking and sound drama of life backstage, with Belle Bennett and Joe E. Brown, heads the bill for the last half of the week. Co-featured is "Office Scandal," with Phyllis Haver and Raymond Hatton.

FRIDAY

Military March.....Schubert-Casella
Suite, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Brandenburg Concerto No. 1.....Bach
"An American in Paris," Suite.Gershwin
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin" Wagner

SATURDAY

Entrance of the Gladiators.....Fucik
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Ave Maria .....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Irish Rhapsody .....Herbert
Suite, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Marimba Solos:
"The Rosary".....Nevin
"Sweet and Low" .....Barnby
"Scherzo" ..... van Goens
Lawrence White
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Selection, "Showboat" ..... Kern
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss
Marche Slave ..... Tchaikovsky

MUSIC

Herald AT THE POPS JUNE 10

Alfredo Casella's violin concerto in A minor was given its first Boston performance last night at a symphonic program at the Pops. Louis Krasner was heard as the soloist. The concerto is written in three movements, which were last night played without pause. At first hearing it seems that perhaps it would have been wiser to allow pauses; the last movement especially seemed to be a little too long.

But the work itself is interesting, pungent, bold, and vigorous, in classical style, though rishly ornamented and with a wealth of colorful, and frequently, stark and blaring, modern harmony. The first two movements contain passages of noble and tender melody, moments of dramatic intensity, and some rhythmic patterns of originality and effectiveness. The solo instrument is given a part requiring a tremendous technique, delicacy, and passion. There are some passages required of the solo instrument that make one wonder whether the composer really intended to get tone and pitch out of them, or merely percussive effect, and there are other pieces of writing in the part that are entirely hidden by too heavy an orchestration. In the main, the solo instrument sings rhapsodically, intermittently, merely adding poignancy and decoration to the musical ideas carried out by the splendid orchestration. For this reason, the cadenzas were especially logical and beautiful, for they were not merely repetitional developments of theme designed to allow the soloist to prove his mettle. The Rondo (last movement), seemed to be less original and less inspired than the other two movements, though the finale was magnificent.

The playing of Louis Krasner was more than intelligent and adequate, . . . almost all that one could demand at first in a concerto of such difficulty. He has a sure and poised technique that surmounts all difficulties not only accurately, but without ever sacrificing a live and warm tone. In those moments when his instrument was inaudible, it was obviously either the composer's intention, or the fault of the orchestra. It is to be hoped that this young musician, who has so much of feeling, violinistic skill, and intelligence to offer will be heard here soon again and often.

Beethoven's first symphony opened the concert last night, and Scheherazade (Rimsky-Korsakov) concluded it. The symphony was played delightfully on the whole, though the Menuetto got a little blurred, through being taken a trifle too fast. The Scherazade was given a fiery and impressive performance, though in spots it could have stood some polishing.

A large audience applauded the conductor-composer, the soloist, and the orchestra.—E. B.

NEW CASELLA WORK PLAYED

Concerto for Violin Given First Performance Here

POST JUNE 10

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It is altogether fitting that while Alfredo Casella is established in Boston as conductor of the Pop Concerts he should be heard from time to time as interpreter of his own music. His Rhapsody "Italia" and the suite from his ballet "La Giara" have become firmly established in the current Pops repertory, and as much at the audience's as at the composer's desire. Recently place was found on a Sunday evening programme for Mr. Casella's new Organ Concerto, and last night at Symphony Hall his Concerto for the violin, completed here last spring, had its first performance in Boston, with Louis Krasner as soloist.

There is much in the Concerto of last evening that is immediately attractive. Furthermore, since the piece is long and somewhat involved in structure, embracing several divisions strung together without pause, undoubtedly there are in it merits and beauties that would become more apparent upon a second acquaintance. On this single hearing the final division seemed unduly prolonged and the least ingratiating portion of the work, while the slow section in which is evinced a lyric feeling not always too common in Mr. Casella's music, seemed by far the most arresting. In this Concerto, as in all of his later compositions, Mr. Casella has written as an Italian, he has permitted himself to be influenced by folk idioms; there are dramatic passages that recall, if ever so vaguely, the opera house; there is a Latin clarity in the instrumentation.

Mr. Krasner, a former pupil of the New England Conservatory just returned from a series of European successes, showed himself last evening a virtuoso of high attainments. Mr. Casella's music was far from easy and not always grateful in the conventional sense, but Krasner met its exactions with cool assurance. There was much applause for both composer and violinist from the good-sized audience. Beethoven's First Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" comprised the remainder of the programme.

177

SYMPHONY PROGRAM AT POP CONCERT

Louis Krasner Soloist in Casella's Concerto

Globe June 10

Mr Casella's violin concerto in A minor was the novelty on last night's symphonic program at the Pops. The other numbers were Beethoven's First Symphony, and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherezade." The soloist was Louis Krasner, a graduate of the New England Conservatory who has recently returned from a concert tour of Europe. A large audience seemed much pleased with program and performance.

Mr Casella's concerto is dedicated to Josef Szigeti, the distinguished Hungarian violinist, remembered here from an appearance at the Boston Symphony concerts several years ago. Szigeti has played the concerto during the past musical season in a number of European and American cities. Last night's was the first Boston performance.

There are no pauses between the divisions of the concerto, which are linked by cadenza passages, but the outline of the work follows the usual scheme of a slow movement sandwiched between rapid ones. The solo violinist is set a very difficult task, which Mr Krasner executed successfully. Mr Casella wrote with a virtuoso violinist in mind, yet did not produce a mere show piece. The music has the composer's characteristic virtues of sincerity, seriousness, fineness of taste, and harmonic orginality. The scoring for orchestral is deliberately subdued in color, with no attempt at brilliance.

The whole work is written in a fluently melodic vein, yet there are no salient and memorable themes. The general effect is like a long recitative from which measures could be cut here and there without harming the whole. The slow movement is the weakest section, rather too lusciously harmonized, after the manner of Puccini or Respighi. An admirable performance brought many recalls for conductor and soloist.

Mr Krasner is a skillful violinist, who would doubtless please recital audiences. He did not last night impress one as an artist of the first rank, because of a certain lack of authority and distinction of style, but it is hard to judge a performer in a totally unfamiliar work.

Mr Casella and the orchestra gave an admirable performance of Beethoven's youthful symphony, an ingratiating work despite its obviousness aping of Mozart, and its inferiority to his best work as well as to the later work of Beethoven. One especially admired the fine playing of the strings.

In Rimsky-Korsako's familiar and popular tone poem Mr Casella took several passages rather slower than one expected. His reading was a personal and interesting one, though less brilliant than some others one recalls.

Special nights this week at the Pops, all of them open to the public, include a Wagner program tonight; a program arranged for the National Federation of Music Clubs Wednesday, including works by four well-known American composers as well as European classics, and Tufts College night Thursday, with college songs and pieces like Meacham's "American Patrol," to be conducted by Arthur Fiedler instead of Mr Casella. P. R.

TRANS. JUNE 10

Gershwin Later

"An American in Paris" for the Pops, June 27—Bolm Ballet Next Week

INSTEAD of Friday, as had been planned, Gershwin's "An American in Paris" will have its first performance at the Pops on Thursday evening, June 27. In the meantime Mr. Gershwin will assist at rehearsals, and it is expected that he will be present on the evening of the performance.

Immediately in prospect are Adolph Bolm and his ballet. Beginning next Wednesday and continuing through Tuesday of the succeeding week they will give the following dances each evening with the exception of Sunday as the concluding portion of the program: Strauss's waltz, "Vienna Blood"; Hellenic Dance from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Tauris", Rubinstein Waltz; "The Amazons," Schubert; "The Music Box," Liadov; "Hungarian Dance," Brahms; Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." Arrangements will be similar to those for the Duncan Dancers earlier in the season, with Mr. Casella conducting the orchestral part of the program, and Mr. Fiedler, the ballet.

TRAV.

URSDAY, JUNE 13, 1929

SYMPHONY MAY TOUR EUROPE

Koussevitzky, Coming Back for Harvard Degree, Will Urge Plan

Europe may have an opportunity next spring to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra if Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, is able to carry out his plans to take the musicians abroad with him for a concert tour.

Next week he will visit Boston for a few days to receive an honorary degree from Harvard University. Although friends of the conductor and officers in charge of the Symphony hall management last night declined to comment on the possibility of the orchestra's leaving the country, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees, said that it is a matter of raising sufficient funds.

"If some individual or group comes forward with money to pay the expenses of such a trip, then I shall call the trustees together, and I think it probable that they would vote to sanction the tour," he said. "I think it would be a very desirable thing to make the trip."

WOULD "SHOW" PARIS

Mr. Koussevitzky's recent experiences in Paris are said to have added impetus to plans that he has held for several years to take the orchestra abroad.

He cancelled his performance of "Boris Godounoff" at the opera because players who had not rehearsed under his direction were substituted at the last moment for musicians of the orchestra who had other engagements. Rebelling against this custom, he is said to have determined and declared that a year hence he will show Paris what can be done with a properly rehearsed orchestra.

Mr. Koussevizky is quoted as saying that the tour he plans will include Great Britain, France and Germany, with each city of the European circuit to be thought of as a special problem.

"A piece by an American composer at every concert," he said, according to dispatches from Paris, "the modern school of American composition. That's the idea."

CONDUCTOR CONFIDENT

Final decision on the tour rests with the trustees, according to Judge Cabot, who further explained:

"We conceive it to be our duties as trustees to provide for the maintenance of the orchestra at home. Since the orchestra operates at a deficit, which we must ask the public to make up, we would not feel justified in going to the public at the same time to ask for money for a trip to Europe. If somebody chooses to give the money, that is another matter."

Although Mr. Koussevitzky has not disclosed where the money is to come from, dispatches indicate that he is quite confident that he can carry out his plans. The sum required would be much more than $100,000, according to Judge Cabot.

Walter Damrosch succeeded in taking the New York Symphony orchestra across Europe and the Cleveland orchestra has visited Cuba, but in spite of the efforts of Leopold Stokowski to obtain authorization to take his Philadelphia orchestra abroad, the management could not see its way clear to provide the funds.

HAS FREE HAND

The Boston orchestra, with those of Detroit and Minneapolis, have given concerts in Canada, and Arturo Toscanini brought his orchestra from La Scala in Milan to this country, but the New York orchestra is the only American orchestral group that has played across the Atlantic.

Mr. Koussevitzky's artistic control of his musicians is complete and is not subject even to modification by the trustees, by virtue of the tradition established by Maj. Henry Lee Higginson.

The players are not permitted to engage in performances that will interfere with the requirements of the orchestra and the conductor is free to select his own programs and to insist on as frequent and as long rehearsals as he finds necessary.

Performances by the Boston Symphony orchestra already have called forth favorable comment from European visitors who have had an opportunity to compare its work with that of Continental groups.

Orchestra Conductor Urges Europe Tour

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

MALDEN WIFE ASKS SEARCH FOR MATE

Morris Wyman Disappears After Making Call

Mrs. Morris Wyman of 12 Steeves court, Malden, today asked the police of that city to institute a search for her husband, who disappeared lalst night after he had visited the home of Mrs. A. L. Philbrook at 1430 Salem street, Linden, in an effort to arrange a mortgage on a house on Bickford road for Mrs. Smith, who was with him.

The two talked with Mrs. Philbrook for two hours, and left at 8 P. M. They have not been seen since. Mrs. Wyman told the police that she had been married 19 years, and that this is the first time he has been away from her. She said that her husband had no money, and that he had been ill for two years. Wyman is of dark complexion, 5 feet 2 inches tall, and wore a blue suit and a gray hat.

In addition to searching for Wyman the police are looking for Mrs. Smith to learn of she knows anything about Wyman's whereabouts.

At The Pops Tonight

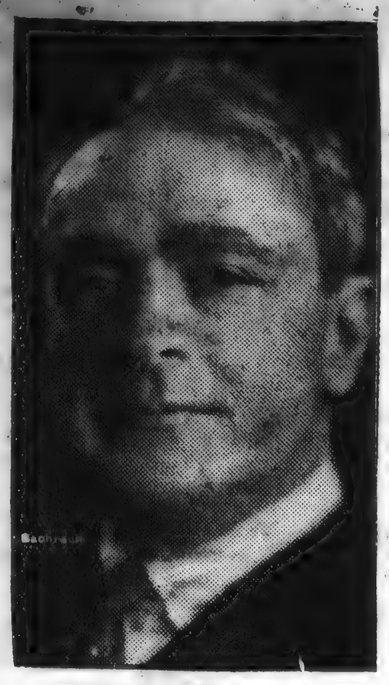
Tufts Night

March, "Under the Double Eagle" J. F. Wagner
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
"Finlandia," Symphonic Poem..Sibelius
Tufts Songs
Tuftonia's Day
Brown and Blue
Tufts Today, Tufts for Aye
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana" Mascagni
Andante Cantabile.....Chaikovsky
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Tufts Songs
Spell It Out
Aren't You Glad
Alma Mater
Selection, "New Moon".....Romberg
American Patrol .....Meacham

Conductor: A. Fiedler

JUNE 13

Plans Foreign Tour



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

SYMPHONY MAY MAKE EUROPEAN TOUR NEXT YEAR

(Continued from Page One)

we would not feel justified in going to the public at the same time to ask for money for a trip to Europe. If somebody chooses to give the money, that is another matter."

Although Mr. Koussevitzky has not disclosed where the money is to come from, dispatches indicate that he is quite confident that he can carry out his plans. The sum required would be much more than $100,000, according to Judge Cabot.

Walter Damrosch succeeded in taking the New York Symphony orchestra across Europe and the Cleveland orchestra has visited Cuba, but in spite of the efforts of Leopold Stokowski to obtain authorization to take his Philadelphia orchestra abroad, the management could not see its way clear to provide the funds.

HAS FREE HAND

The Boston orchestra, with those of Detroit and Minneapolis, have given concerts in Canada, and Arturo Toscanini brought his orchestra from La Scala in Milan to this country, but the New York orchestra is the only American orchestral group that has played across the Atlantic.

Mr. Koussevitzky's artistic control of his musicans is complete and is not subject even to modification by the trustees, by virtue of the tradition established by Maj. Henry Lee Higginson.

The players are not permitted to engage in performances that will interfere with the requirements of the orchestra and the conductor is free to select his own programs and to insist on as frequent and as long rehearsals as he finds necessary.

Performances by the Boston Symphony orchestra already have called forth favorable comment from European visitors who have had an opportunity to compare its work with that of Continental groups.

BOS. AMER. JUNE 15

FINE FEATURES FOR POPS

Features of interest are announced for the Pop Concerts next week, the last but one of the season. On Sunday, June 23, Alfredo Casella will conduct a Russian program for the last Sunday concert.

Another feature will be the annual Request Night next Tuesday, the numbers determined entirely by the vote of the Pops public, and reveals Handel's Largo as still the favorite in the whole Pops repertory, with Ravel's "La Valse" taking second place.

The program for tonight, in which Arthur Fiedler will conduct the Victor $10,000 prize march as an encore, is as follows:

Entrance of the Gladiators	Fucik
Overture to "Oberon"	Weber
Ave Maria	Schubert-Wilhelmj
Irish Rhapsody	Herbert
Suite, "Peer Gynt"	Grieg
Marimba Solos:
The Rosary	Nevin
Sweet and Low	Barnby
Scherzo	Van Goens
Overture to "Tannhauser"	Wagner
Selection, "Show Boat"	Kern
Waltz, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube"	Strauss
Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky

TRANS.

Concerts Next Week

JUNE 15

Progress of the Pops

EVEN the best-laid plans sometimes go astray. So it has been with the arrangements for Adolph Bolm and his ballet to dance at The Pops next week. Due to regrettable but unavoidable circumstances it has been necessary to cancel the engagement. So for the most part The Pops will run familiar course.

On Monday evening the hall has been reserved for Boston University. Tuesday will be "Request Night." As has been the case in previous seasons, Handel's "Largo" still leads the list of favorites. Second place was voted to Ravel's "La Valse," which also stood high in the voting at the end of the Symphony season just closed. On Friday evening, Mr. Casella will conduct the complete Beethoven "Eroica" Symphony. On Saturday, June 22, Saint-Saëns's Concerto for 'cello and orchestra will be played for the first time at the Pops with Jacobus Langendoen as soloist. The last of the Sunday concerts on June 23, will be an all-Russian program, and will include Chaikovsky's Fourth Symphony.

In Prospect

Unless further postponement is deemed advisable, Mr. Gershwin's "An American in Paris," which had been announced originally for last evening, will be played at the concert of Thursday evening, June 27. In the meantime, Mr. Gershwin is expected to assist at rehearsals of the piece, and he will probably be present at The Pops when it is played.

CLOSING WEEKS OF THE PO

The Pop concerts in Symphony start Monday evening on the final night of the present season. Next day evening, June 23, Alfredo Ca will conduct for the last Sunday concert a program of Russian musi feature of the coming week's prog will be the annual request night of T day evening. The Monday evening concert has been taken entirely by ton University, but all other night open to the public. The programs th after in the week follow:

TUESDAY EVENING
(Request Night)

Pomp and Circumstance	E
Largo	H
La Valse	R
'William Tell' Overture	R
Ave Maria	Sch
Italia, Rhapsody	Ca
Peer Gynt Suite	G
Beautiful Blue Danube, waltz	Str
"1812" Overture	Tchaikov
Encores—Liebestraum	Liszt-Her
Kammenoi Ostrow	Rubin

WEDNESDAY EVENING

Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor"	Ni
Masque Suite	Ha
Roumanian Rhapsody	En
Marche Joyeuse	Cha
Pastorale d'Ete, and "Pacific 2-3-1"	Hone
Prelude to "Lohengrin"	Wa
Overture to "Rienzi"	Wa
Hungarian March, "Rakoczy"	Ber
Hungarian Dance	Bra
Hungarian Rhapsody (No. 2)	L

THURSDAY EVENING

Triumphal March from "Aida"	V
Three Dances from "Cephalus and Procri
Overture to "Der Freischutz"	Gretry-M
Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished"	W
Overture to "William Tell"	Schu
Turkish March, from "The Ruins of Ath	Ro
Waltz, "Artist's Life"	Beeth
Polovtsian Dances, "Prince Igor"	Bor

FRIDAY EVENING

Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nu burg"
A Siegfried Idyll	Wa
Ride of the Valkyries	Wa
Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Ero	Wa
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker"	Beeth
Song without words	Tchaikov
Marche Slav	Tchaikov
	Tchaikov

SATURDAY EVENING

Entrance of the Guests into the Wartb "Tannhauser"	Wa
Minuet	Bocch
Turkish March, "The Ruins of Athens"	Beeth
Overture to "La Forza del Destino"	V
Overture to "The Barber of Seville"	Ros
Concerto for Violoncello and orchestra A minor	Saint-Sa
Soloist, Jacobus Langendoen
Hungarian March, "Rakoczy"	Ber
Slavonic Dance	Dvo
Intermezzo, "Geyescas"	Gran
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen"	B
Ride of the Valkyries	Wag

SUNDAY EVENING
(Russian Programme)

Symphony No. 4, in F minor	Tchaikov
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor"	Boro
Night on Bald Mountain	Moussorg
Capriccio Espagnole	Rimsky-Korsa

HERALD June 16

Self-Service at the Theater Ticket Office

Newly Invented Automatic Ticket Seller by Which Patron Makes His Own Selection of Space for Reservation at Symphony Hall Concerts.

'Ticket Cafeteria' Permits Public to Make Own Selection From Board

New Device Proves Success at Boston's Symphony Hall—Concert-Goer Chooses Stubs for Places He Wants and Leaves Them at Box Office as Reservation

Enter: The Portable Automatic Subscription Rack, otherwise known as the "ticket cafeteria."

This latest invention for making ticket buying easy is on view daily at Symphony Hall, Boston.

It's the first of its kind, so far as is known, and it's making a hit with the public.

With it, the buyer may make his own selection of location. Every seat in the house is in view, and its exact distance from the platform is clear.

No more need the seeker for a ticket harbor suspicions that the box office man is "holding out" the best tickets.

Really Application Blanks

This device holds application blanks—which look just like the tickets themselves as they project from their pockets—for a series of six concerts next winter.

Instead of going to the box office to inquire if there are tickets, to such a number and in such a location, the prospective purchaser has only to go to the rack, survey the reproduction of the ground and gallery plan, observe what tickets have not yet been sold and choose for himself.

All the box office man has to do—thankfully enough, no doubt—is to stand in his little window a few feet away and be ready to accept the reservations.

At first sight the rack appears to be filled with genuine tickets. The first half-inch of the little pasteboards is an average stub of an average ticket to a Symphony Hall concert. The remainder, something like six inches in length, is an application blank to be filled in with the name and address of the purchaser.

Payment Before October

Tickets must be paid for and taken up by Oct. 15.

The public has had its curiosity tickled most satisfactorily by the infant invention. Quantities of people have gone in, looked about curiously for some guardian of the rack, smiled at the blank window of the box office, selected a "ticket" or two, or three, or four, finally going over to the box office with casual interjections about "I thought, from the looks, they were the tickets themselves, and this was an 'honor system' thing."

To the staff at Symphony Hall the device has already proved its worth. Certainly it is a plan which might well be copied far and wide, for it saves the public the bore of waiting in line for tickets and saves wear and tear on box office men, a not inconsiderable item in itself.

KOUSSEVITZKY MAPS SYMPHONY TOUR IN EUROPE

MONITOR JUNE 19

Itinerary for Boston Orchestra Starts With London, Ends With Paris

By WINTHROP P. TRYON
SPECIAL FROM MONITOR BUREAU

NEW YORK—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, coming from Europe for a three-days' stay in America, brings with him an itinerary for a concert tour in May and June, 1930, to include Great Britain, France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Czechoslovakia, Austria and Switzerland.

Evidently he has all arrangements provisionally made. For as he talked of the project on board the Ile de France while the liner was steaming up New York harbor, there seemed nothing left to be attended to, except ratification of agreements with the musical bureaus of the various cities chosen.

Yes, one more thing. A couple of official invitations must be accepted; for it appears that the orchestra will be, or already has been, asked to visit France and Germany by the governments of those countries.

Tour Opens in London

According to the proposed schedule, the tour opens in London and closes in Paris, with enough concerts in each place to make a little season. British cities, besides London, noted down are Manchester, Liverpool, Glasgow and Edinburgh. Among continental cities, Paris is named first and last. Brussels, Amsterdam, Hamburg, Berlin, Prague, Vienna, Zurich and Geneva are between.

To the two regular concerts in Paris there will be added a special meeting in the interest of the university world at the Sorbonne, which will conclude the enterprise.

As Mr. Koussevitzky set matters forth, the time is propitious in many ways for such a tour as he contemplates.

Speaking generally, orchestral performance has taken on extraordinary development in America of late. There is such a thing as the American orchestral idea which deserves to be known internationally. There is an American orchestral taste of a peculiar and exacting sort.

Would Carry Welcome Message

Many orchestras in the United States might with good reason, therefore, undertake a voyage over the water, and would be quite certain to have a pleasurable message for European audiences.

Then, too, speaking particularly, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, having a long tradition of discipline behind it—nearly 50 years—is completely prepared for the adventure of travel.

An itinerary is what Mr. Koussevitzky has brought back for his brief call, and nothing more. Permission to take the Boston Symphony membership across the sea he has yet to secure. But in regard to that, he manifests no uneasiness. The affair evidently impresses him as requiring consideration, but only on the score of ways and means.

Concerning the tour's practicability he showed no doubt at all. Indeed, he seemed inclined to treat a spring European tour as no less natural and inevitable a thing than the winter season in Boston.

178

C AND CIANS

GLOBE June 16

Eighth Week of "Pops" in Symphony Hall

One of the features of the coming week which is the last but one of the Pops will be request night next Tuesday, the numbers being determined entirely by the vote of the Pops public, and reveals Handel's Largo as still the favorite in the whole Pops repertory with Ravel's "La Valse" taking second place.

The Monday Pop concert has been entirely taken by Boston University, but all other nights are open to the public. The program of the week follow:

Reqcest Night, Tuesday Evening, June 18—Pomp and Circumstance, Elgar; Largo, Handel; "La Valse," Ravel; overture to "William Tell," Rossini; "Ave Maria," Schubert; "Italia," rhapsody, Casella; suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; waltz, "By the Beatutiful Blue Danube," Strauss; overture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky. Encores: "Liebestraum," Liszt; Herbert; march, "On the Mall," Goldman; "Kammenoi Ostrow," Rubinstein.

Wednesday, June, 19—Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai; Masque Suite for string orchestra, Handel; Rumanian Rhapsody, Enesco; "Marche Joyeuse," Chabrier; "Pastorale d'Ete," Honegger; "Pacific 2-3-1," Honegger; prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner; overture to "Rienzi," Wagner; Hungarian march "Rakoczy," Berlioz; "Hungarian Dance," Brahms; "Hungarian Rhapsody" (No. 2), Liszt.

Thursday Evening, June 20—Triumphal march, from "Aida," Verdi; three dances, from "Cephalus and Procris," Gretry-Mottl; overture to "Der Freischutz," Weber; Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished," Schubert; overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Turkish march, from "The Ruins of Athens," Beethoven; waltz, "Artist's Life," Strauss; Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin.

Friday Evening, June 21—Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," "A Siegfried Idyll," "Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner; Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55, Beethoven; ballet suite, "Nutcracker," Tchaikovsky; "Song Without Words," Tchaikovsky; "Marche Slave," Tchaikovsky.

Saturday Evening, June 22—Entrance of the guests into the Wartburg, "Tannhauser," Wagner; minuet, Boccherini; Turkish march, from "The Ruins of Athens," Beethoven; overtuure to "La Forza del Destino," Verdi; overture to "The Barber of Seville," Rossini; concerto for violoncelló and orchestra in A minor, op. 3 (soloist, Jacobus Langendoen, Saint-Saens; Hungarian march, "Rakoczy," Berlioz; Slavonic Dance," Dvorak; intermezzo, "Geyescas," Granados; gipsy dance from "Carmen," Bizet; "Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner.

Sunday Evening, June 23—Russian program, Symphony No. 4 in F minor, op. 36, Tchaikovsky; Polovtsian dances, from "Prince Igor," Borodin; "Night on Bald Mountain," Moussorgsky; "Capriccio Espagnole," Rimsky-Korsakov.

Plans Foreign Tour

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

SYMPHONY MAY MAKE EUROPEAN TOUR NEXT YEAR

(Continued from Page One)

we would not feel justified in going to the public at the same time to ask for money for a trip to Europe. If somebody chooses to give the money, that is another matter."

Although Mr. Koussevitzky has not disclosed where the money is to come from, dispatches indicate that he is quite confident that he can carry out his plans. The sum required would be much more than $100,000, according to Judge Cabot.

Walter Damrosch succeeded in taking the New York Symphony orchestra across Europe and the Cleveland orchestra has visited Cuba, but in spite of the efforts of Leopold Stokowski to obtain authorization to take his Philadelphia orchestra abroad, the management could not see its way clear to provide the funds.

HAS FREE HAND

The Boston orchestra, with those of Detroit and Minneapolis, have given concerts in Canada, and Arturo Toscanini brought his orchestra from La Scala in Milan to this country, but the New York orchestra is the only American orchestral group that has played across the Atlantic.

Mr. Koussevitzky's artistic control of his musicans is complete and is not subject even to modification by the trustees, by virtue of the tradition established by Maj. Henry Lee Higginson.

The players are not permitted to engage in performances that will interfere with the requirements of the orchestra and the conductor is free to select his own programs and to insist on as frequent and as long rehearsals as he finds necessary.

Performances by the Boston Symphony orchestra already have called forth favorable comment from European visitors who have had an opportunity to compare its work with that of Continental groups.

BOS. AMER. JUNE 15

FINE FEATURES FOR POPS

Features of interest are announced for the Pop Concerts next week, the last but one of the season. On Sunday, June 23, Alfredo Casella will conduct a Russian program for the last Sunday concert.

Another feature will be the annual Request Night next Tuesday, the numbers determined entirely by the vote of the Pops public, and reveals Handel's Largo as still the favorite in the whole Pops repertory, with Ravel's "La Valse" taking second place.

The program for tonight, in which Arthur Fiedler will conduct the Victor $10,000 prize march as an encore, is as follows:

Entrance of the Gladiators	Fucik
Overture to "Oberon"	Weber
Ave Maria	Schubert-Wilhelmj
Irish Rhapsody	Herbert
Suite, "Peer Gynt"	Grieg
Marimba Solos:
The Rosary	Nevin
Sweet and Low	Barnby
Scherzo	Van Goens
Overture to "Tannhauser"	Wagner
Selection, "Show Boat"	Kern
Waltz, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube"	Strauss
Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky

CLOSING WEEKS OF THE POPS

The Pop concerts in Symphony hall start Monday evening on the final fortnight of the present season. Next Sunday evening, June 23, Alfredo Casella will conduct for the last Sunday Pop concert a program of Russian music. A feature of the coming week's programs will be the annual request night of Tuesday evening. The Monday evening Pop concert has been taken entirely by Boston University, but all other nights are open to the public. The programs thereafter in the week follow:

TUESDAY EVENING
(Request Night)

Pomp and Circumstance	Elgar
Largo	Handel
La Valse	Ravel
"William Tell" Overture	Rossini
Ave Maria	Schubert
Italia, Rhapsody	Casella
Peer Gynt Suite	Grieg
Beautiful Blue Danube, waltz	Strauss
"1812" Overture	Tchaikovsky
Encores—Liebestraum	Liszt-Herbert
Kammenoi Ostrow	Rubinstein

WEDNESDAY EVENING

Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor"	Nicolai
Masque Suite	Handel
Roumanian Rhapsody	Enesco
Marche Joyeuse	Chabrier
Pastorale d'Ete, and "Pacific 2-3-1"	Honegger
Prelude to "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Overture to "Rienzi"	Wagner
Hungarian March, "Rakoczy"	Berlioz
Hungarian Dance	Brahms
Hungarian Rhapsody (No. 2)	Liszt

THURSDAY EVENING

Triumphal March from "Aida"	Verdi
Three Dances from "Cephalus and Procris"	Gretry-Motti
Overture to "Der Freischutz"	Weber
Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished"	Schubert
Overture to "William Tell"	Rossini
Turkish March, from "The Ruins of Athens"	Beethoven
Waltz, "Artist's Life"	Strauss
Polovtsian Dances, "Prince Igor"	Borodin

FRIDAY EVENING

Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg"	Wagner
A Siegfried Idyll	Wagner
Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner
Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica"	Beethoven
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker"	Tchaikovsky
Song without words	Tchaikovsky
Marche Slav	Tchaikovsky

SATURDAY EVENING

Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, "Tannhauser"	Wagner
Minuet	Boccherini
Turkish March, "The Ruins of Athens"	Beethoven
Overture to "La Forza del Destino"	Verdi
Overture to "The Barber of Seville"	Rossini
Concerto for Violoncello and orchestra in A minor	Saint-Saens
Soloist, Jacobus Langendoen
Hungarian March, "Rakoczy"	Berlioz
Slavonic Dance	Dvorak
Intermezzo, "Geyescas"	Granados
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen"	Bizet
Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner

SUNDAY EVENING
(Russian Programme)

Symphony No. 4, in F minor	Tchaikovsky
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor"	Borodin
Night on Bald Mountain	Moussorgsky
Capriccio Espagnole	Rimsky-Korsakov

TRANS.

Concerts Next Week

JUNE 15

Progress of the Pops

